

THE

MUSEUM

OF

POBBIGH LITERATURE AND SCIENCE.

Vol. XXVIII.

JANUARY TO JUNE, 1836.

PHILADELPHIA:

PUBLISHED BY E. LITTELL, AND BY

G. & C. CARVIIL, NEW YORK—OTIS, BROADERS & CO., BOSTON,

J. S. HOMANS, BALTIMORE.

1836.

APZa MBa

general transfer and the second

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

Arranged under the names of the works from which they are taken.

	EDINBURGH REVIEW.	PRASID'S MAGAZINE.
	Page Page	Dage .
	Journal by Frances Anne Butler 1	William Cobbett
×	Finters' account of Puerto Rico	Earl of Mulgrave
	Quin's Steam Voyage down the Danube 61	Sir Walter Scott, "The Sere and Yellow Leaf," 313
	Cooke's Memoirs of Bolingbroke 70	"Honour, Love, Obedience, Troops
	Life and Works of Baron Cuvier	of Friends,"
7	Alford's School of the Heart	Robert Macnish
	Cape of Good Hope—the Caffre War	Regina's Maids of Honour
	The state of the s
	QUARTERLY REVIEW.	ECLECTIC REVIEW.
	Personal History of Louis Philippe	Random Recollections of the House of Commons 372
	Quin's Steam Voyage down the Danube	and the second s
	To Washington Irving	CHRISTIAN OBSERVER.
	Meyen's Voyage round the World
	Frederic the Great	Bishop White398
	Lord Exmouth	Bishop Chase
	Pring and Moodie on South Africa	American Missionaries419
	R. v. J Flamstend	A STATE OF THE STA
	Dinners' Clubs, &c	UNITED SERVICE JOURNAL.
	18 by Joanna Baillie	Modern Marooners145
	* spaign with Zumalacarregui	Leaves from my Log Book
	Popes of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries 543	Maurice de Saxe
	Charles and the second	An Excursion in Ceylon,
	BRITISH AND FOREIGN REVIEW.	Drunkenness in the British Army
	The section of the se	Death by Moonshine
	Teequeville's Democracy in America535	Cable
	*	Virtues and Vices
7	RETROSPECTIVE REVIEW.	The Malays
	Colley Cibber's Life	Sea at the Cape of Good Hope
	Cont. Cibics & Line	The Chinese
	THE RESERVE THE PARTY OF THE PA	British Troops in America454
	EDINBURGH PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL.
	Great Suspension Bridge at Fribourg	NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.
0	Scientific lutelligence	Temptation of Rachel Morison
		The last in the Lease
	BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.	Revenge of the Signor Basil
		Liberty and Slavery in America
		Mildred Pemberton
9.1	Memoirs of Luther	Sabbath Rhymes and across columnities to the contract of the contract of A Song
	The Future	MONTHLY REVIEW.
	Fanny Fairfield	Random Recellections of the House of Commons376
	Protestantism in France
1	Winter Sketches, by Delta	WETROPOLITAN.
1	William Pitt564	Japhet in Search of a Father
	AN CONTRACTOR OF THE PROPERTY

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

Page	Page
	The Tin Trumpet,
The Personal 398	Back Woods of Canada,
The Charity Sister	Literary Statistics of Austria,
The Charity States,	Irish Varieties,
27 V P (c) - 100 (c) (c) (d)
ALBUM.	The second secon
A Murderer's Death Bed,	JUVENILE FORGET ME NOT.
A CONTRACTOR OF THE PARTY OF TH	Mrs. Tetty and her Ward, 11
TAIT'S MAGAZINE.	The Little Teacher,
Little Fanny Bethel,	The Donkey Boy and the Dog Rose, 36
Matthias d'Amour,	To the Robin, 38
Florence O'Brien,	The Orange Boy, 58
	The Grandmother, 69
The second secon	Papa's Letter, 83
SPECTATOR.	_
The Oriental Annual, 76
Slavery in the United States, 78	FORGET ME NOT.
William Cobbett,	A Chinese Visitation, 38
Miss Lloyd's Bermuda,	Life in the Woods, 71
	A Night near Montevideo, 89
	Juliana,
Conquest of Florida,	Control of the second of the s
Horse Shoe Robinson,	KEEPSAKE.
Literature of the Annuals,	The Fisherman of Scarphout
Southey's Life of Cowper,	Eve's Legend,
LITERARY GAZETTE.	compositor to the control of the con
The Virginia Springs, 81	NAVAL ANNUAL.
Mrs. Trollope on France,	The Pirate,
The state of the s	The state of the s
COURT JOURNAL	FRIENDSHIP'S OFFERING.
Mias Smythe,	The Countess, 44
and any majeria and a second an	Alleman and the second
Warner and the same of the sam	AMULET.
CHAMBERS' EDINBURGH JOURNAL.	The state of the s
Humanity of British Naval Officers,	Drowned Fisherman,
Pronunciation of Different Nations in Europe, 642	Insurrection in Trinidad,
and had a second with the second with	Scene from Inez de Castro
TIMES.	The Squire's Bargain,
	The Wreck. 123
Letter from Ceylon, 96	The Mother, 134
8 (10 to 10	***************************************
ATHENEUM.
The Breton Joiner,	Hogg's Visit to Damascus, 73
Manna of the Dessert,	The second secon
Gas	TWENTY YEARS IN RETIREMENT,

PLATES IN THIS VOLUME:

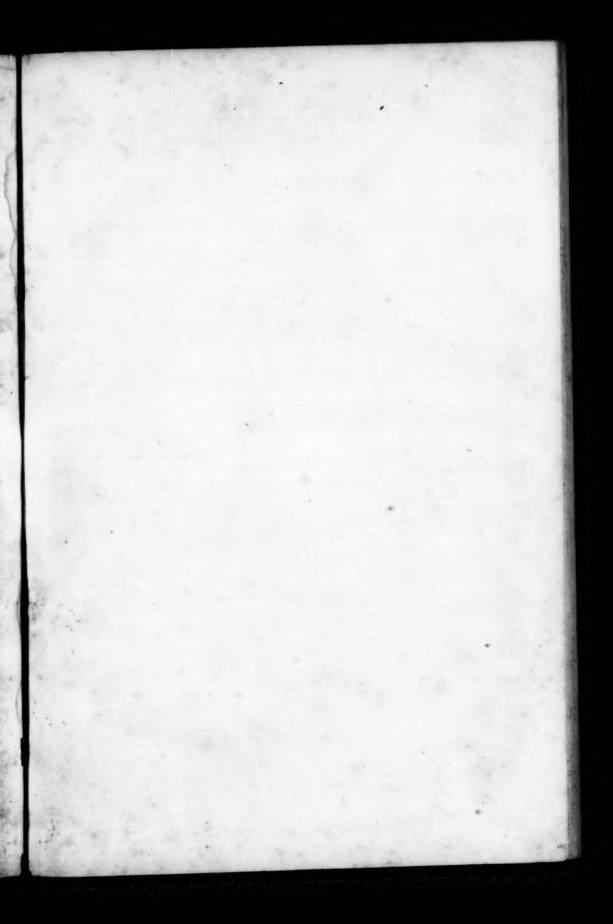

THEODORE E. HOOK.

WILLIAM CORRETT.

LORD MULGRAVE.

ROBERT MACNISH.

REGINA'S MAIDS OF HONOUR.

Theodore: 1. Hook

AUTHOR OF SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

MUSEUM

Foreign Literature, Science, and Art.

From the Edinburg Review-

JOURNAL BY FRANCES ANNE BUTLER. 2 vols. 8vo. London: 1835.

Mrs. BUTLER's Journal has all the freshness, confidence, and indiscretion of an intercepted correspondence. Among its many indiscretions, her declarations against the Pressgang'-that body before whom statesmen tremble-is pre-eminently indiscreet. But the sort of temptation, under which foolish and fearless schoolboys provoke a nest of hornets, appears to have been irresistible. Passages like the following were pretty certain to bring them out: Except where they have heen made political tools, newspaper writers and editors have never, I believe, been admitted into good society in England.'-'Here I do solemnly swear, never again with my own good-will to become acquainted with any man in any way connected with the public press. They are utterly unreliable people, generally; their vocation requires that they should be so, and the very few exceptions I must forego. However I picture is a picture from the life—the original drawings might like them, I can neither respect nor approve of their taken on the spot. Our surprise, however, is perhaps as trade—for trade it is in the vilest sense of the word. The great as that of our neighbours, only of a more agreeable presentation of one of the prescribed race is forced upon kind; first, at the extraordinary rapidity and truth with her. She keeps her word: 'I was most ungracious and which the impression of the moment has been committed forbidding, and meant to be so.' Among the catechising to paper-so little lost, so little added; next, at the frankgentlemen who, after the fashion of the country, introduced ness and good faith with which she has retained these her themselves to her, there was one who (she was afterwards first impressions, in spite of the thousand and one terrors, told) was a newspaper editor. She cannot believe it: 'He looks too fat, fresh, and 'good tempered for that.'s Her for the press. The genuine juice of the grape, unmeditone is equily light and irreverent in speaking of contributors to annuals, of scribblers for narrow coteries, and of cellars of a wine merchant, than a production so perfectly other small literati. There is no accounting for the natural, in the literary market. It is more like thinking prejudice which can entertain, or the audaciousness which aloud than any thing of personal history we ever expected can publish, such opinions. Of this we are quite aware to see in print. Now, thinking aloud, which would be Our readers, however, may perhaps by this time be able to rather a hazardous practice with most people, is not likely account, in part, for a good deal that they may happen to to be less hazardous than usual in the person of a young have heard about the 'vulgarity' of Mrs. Butler's Journal. and lively actress—the writer, while in her teens, of so bold She has had the misfortune also to raise up another class a play as that of Francis the First. We do not offer the of enemies. While some of our writers are shocked at result of the experiment as the precedent of a pattern-girl, much offended at the freedom of her remarks upon their received by governesses as authority for their pupils. That manners. Is there any, and what degree of reason in these objections?

There are too many impulses and contingencies belonging to most kinds of talent to make

The impression which, on her first coming out, her father's horsewhip over certain shoulders, necessarily made upon her, has remained much too absolutely on her mind. She would at once perceive the injustice to individuals and the injury to the public, of similar reflections on the stage. Yet a daily press is a thing which we could less spare than a daily theatre; and the degradation of its members, by indiscriminate abuse and exclusion, becomes proportionally absurd. What Sir Joshua Reynolds did for artists, and Garrick for performers—change their position in society—merit and encouragement may do for the members of the public press.

VOL XXVIII. JANUARY, 1836 .- 1.

inclination to read the stars scattered over its pages. For any thing we can tell one way or the other, they may be very improper mischief-making stars, or 'the maidenliest stars in the firmament.' Confining ourselves, then, to the printed text, we should like to know, whom and what the public can have imagined the present journal was to place before them?—a pure and shrinking snow-drop, just brought out of the numery of an English nursery?—the milliper's flower—ane of the curtseying conventional nonentities of fashion?—or some more stately personification of matronly reserve, sculptured out from our native granite? If so, the public may well be surprised. But, in fact, the absurdity of such a representation, in the present instance, would probably have been surpassed only by its stupidity. Mrs. Butler has dealt more kindly by us. Instead of getting up for the booksellers a book which a hundred other travellers could have manufactured as skilfully as herself, she has given us one of those vivid realities which it is beyond the faculty of authorship to create. Her of vulgarity, the Americans, it is said, are likely to be as whose manners, feelings, and expressions may be safely We take the book as it is, having neither means nor talents desirable, but as an exception in life. This must he particularly true in the case of women.

tions, for exposure sentences or half sentences detached more than successor to Mrs. Montague's authorityfirst conjecture would be-probably from a too early and as a manufacture. For our own part, therefore, we feel indiscriminate companionship with the old English drama. obliged to Mrs. Butler for refusing to be put into the The grossness which disgraces many of our Elizabethan mould. plays can mislead nobody. But the most feminine characters appear in them with a degree of freedom, which is worn so gracefully and innocently, that its inconsistency with our present manners may be more themselves not more so) spitcful one-sided exaggerations—casily overlooked. In the next place, the far greater part splenetic attempts to depreciate their institutions or their of the promiseuous society into which an actress is thrown people-more especially the childishness of making instiby her profession, is, of course, quite indifferent to our tutions answerable for matters of fact, which properly arbitrary distinctions, between the talk which is to charm belong to other causes. The caricatures of Mrs. Trollope us on the stage and to shock us off it. A young person and of Captain Basil Hall were much more disagreeable to placed within the capricious influence of these causes, will us than the assumption and arrogance of Mr. Cooper. But be getting out of bounds before she is aware. She must this is not enough of favour! No small portion of the constantly want reminding 'there are differences, look you.' American population regard advocates of our complexion If she should fall in with professors of the gaie science of as little better than enemies in disguise. They reject rive la bagatelle, who seek to make of her a sort of Gresevery thing as an insult which stops short of unqualified set's Vert vert for their amusement, the simplicity and panegyric. What may be the value of Mrs. Butler's vivacity of their unconscious pupil are the very elements opinions on America, is itself a matter of opinion. Senof their success. It is true that we never heard of Miss sible persons will have regard to the subject of which she Kemble talking as Miss Kemble here and there has may be speaking at the time. She says she knows nothing written. However, once satisfy her that she is wrong, and about politics. We believe her. Nevertheless, she lamher censors need not anticipate a prolonged resistance, poons the English Whigs; lauds the American institutions either from the defects of education or the peremptoriness for things they have no merit in; and opines about the of self-will. A girl, who gave up waltzing with males, at tendency of America to monarchy-about the necessary a moment, in compliance with the scruples of a clergyman and New York, may be expected to part as readily with bits of slang, where the chances of misconstruction are much anism with the character of New England, as peremptorily greater, and the temptation considerably less. But really as if her knowledge of politics entitled her to have an we ought to stop. We are entering into suggestions and opinion of her own. Her decisions concerning actors, explanations infinitely more serious than the nature of the scenery (out of doors' scenery we' mean), literature, and case requires. The paragraphs to which the supposed society, are much more likely to be correct. But let her objection fairly applies are very few in number; and the judgments be what they may—right or wrong—they alteration of a word or two to some more quiet and pretty behaved expression, would set every thing right. In what we have said, we have assumed that it is desirable that women should continue to be women in the most characteristic within her personal experience, and communicating the women should continue to be women in the most characteristic within her personal experience, and communicating the women should continue to be women in the most characteristic within her personal experience, and communicating the women should continue to be women in the most characteristic within her personal experience, and communicating the within her personal experience, and communicating the women should continue to be women in the most characteristic within her personal experience, and communicating the women should continue to be women in the most characteristic within her personal experience, and communicating the women should continue to be women in the most characteristic within her personal experience, and communicating the women should continue to be women in the most characteristic within her personal experience, and communicating the women should continue to be women in the most characteristic within her personal experience, and communicating the women should continue to be women in the most characteristic within her personal experience. teristic of all attractions, in the purity and delicacy of the made upon her mind. Are there any marks of want of female mind. But the more important the object, the more understanding for this purpose? Did she carry out with necessary is it that it should be gone about in the right her the evil eye—observing the world before her in a manner. There are freedoms, of which Desdemona says, mocking spirit? Or is the honesty of her revised dewhere virtue is these are most virtuous. In this respect, scriptions open to suspicion? On these points, it is easy good breeding stands upon equal grounds with virtue. It is a bad sign to be over fastidious. Without knowing some indeed, who shall conceive that they have any just more of the matter, we should not conclude that Mrs. reason for complaint. Her book, it should be remembered, Montague was less of a lady for having once in a way told Charles Fox, that she did not care 'three skips of a louse' preface, that it does not pretend to be so. It is simply the

The way in which the supposed specimens of bad taste for him. We say the same of the equivalent étouderies have been selected, in the newspapers and other publical of Mrs. Butler. A lady of the old school—successor and from their quick and flowing context—makes them appear repeated to us a list of expressions, from the use of which infinitely worse than they really are. For, the head and ladies had been excluded during her lifetime; and added front of her offending amount to little more than occasional her apprehension that, if things went on so, the time must instances of a vehement and random style, which (though come, when English men and English women would be it has nothing improper in itself, yet) as it is not the speaking different languages. The choice Latin of Corlanguage of good company, it is somewhat startling to nelia and the Roman matrons, did not derive its peculiar hear a gentlewoman indulging in. For instance, she has refinement from the principle, on which Swift defined a no timid misgivings about the personality of Satan. An nice man to be a man of nasty ideas. The English nation old magician could not speak of him with greater fami- was once as distinguished in its real life as in its drama for liarity. The difficulty which the ladies of New York the variety of its characters and its humours. There can experience in pronouncing broadly and distinctly the first be no doubt but that society has lost in its picturesqueness syllable of Hell-gate (the name of one of the wonders of from the habit of passing its rolling stone constantly over the neighbourhood) passes her comprehension. There is us, and attempting to keep our minds as flat, smooth, and some minor garnish of 'Lord! Mercy me's and uniform as our lawns. People cannot be made as like quothas,' almost as much out of the common way. If each other as fashion expects them to be, but by destroying we are asked, where can she have picked this up? Our the vital principle, and treating man not as a growth, but ti a J we find ly a ti gel or wal in in Ti it

of the principal commercial towns, with the addition of a few later notes.

On this part of the case, a few passages will be decisive with regard to the general spirit in which she has written. The following extract consists of two prragraphs. In the first, she is expressing her feelings at the moment of looking down from its mountains over the Hudson; in the second, she has recorded her graver reflections after a three years' residence.

'I thought of my distant home; that handful of earth thrown upon the wide waters, whose genius has led the kingdome of the world—whose children have become the possessors of this new hemisphere. I rejoiced to think that when England shall be, as all things must be, fallen into the devouring past, her language will still be spoken among these glorious hills, her name revered, her memory cherished, her fame preserved here, in this far world beyond the seas, this country of her children's adoption.'—Loving and honouring my country as I do, adoption. — Loving and honouring my country as I do, I cannot look upon America with any feeling of hostility. I not only hear the voice of England in the language of this people, but I recognise in all their best qualities, their industry, their honesty, their sturdy independence of spirit, the very witnesses of their origin—they are English; no other people in the world was licked to a three did were any other recognise. would have licked us as they did; nor any other people in the world built up, upon the ground they won, so sound, and strong, and fair an edifice.'

Is this the language of a hostile temper? The first thing that a national caricaturist seeks to misrepresent is with eggs, poultry, &c., being questioned as to whether the condition of the body of the people. Not only is Mrs. Butler sensible that a greater degree of comfort is enjoyed by the population at large in the non-slaving states than by the same class in the Old World; but she attributes their well-being to their democracy, with as much ignorance of the real nature of the case as their novelist, Cooper, could desire. Take her sketch of the pleasure grounds in the neighbourhood of New York.

'The walks along the river and through the woods, the steamers crossing from the city, were absolutely thronged with a cheerful, well-dressed population, abroad merely for the purpose of pleasure and exercise. Journeymen, labourers, handicraftsmen, trades-people, with their families, bearing all in their dress and looks evident signs of well-being and contentment, were all flocking from their confined avocations, into the pure ly place. I do not know any spectacle which could give a foreigner, especially an Englishman, a better illustration of that peculiar excellence of the American government—the freedom and happiness of the lower classes. Neither is it to be said that this was a belider air, the bright sunshine, and beautiful shade of this loveor an occasion of peculiar festivity—it was a common week-day—such as our miserable manufacturing popu-lation spends from sunrise to sundown, in confined, incessant, unhealthy toil—to earn at its conclusion, the inadequate reward of health and happiness so wasted. The contrast struck me forcibly—it rejoiced my heart; it surely was an object of contemplation, that any one who had a heart must have rejoiced in.'

In one of her notes she says,

none here needlift up the despairing voice of hopeless and helpless want towards that Hoaven which hears the leading fushionables of New York and Philadelphia journal of her twelvemonths' professional sojourn in some when men will not. Thrice blessed is this country, for no such crying evil exists in its bosom; no such moral reproach, no such political rottenness. If we have any faith in the excellence of mercy and benevolence, we If we have any must believe that this alone will secure the blessing of Providence on this country.

> It is impossible to read this kindly and benevolent nonsense without wishing to be informed what are the moral means and political machinery by which America brings about the blessed result of plenty of employment at good wages. The fair enthusiast may be assured that, on this point at least, the continuance of the blessing of Providence upon America, depends, not upon any such indefinite notions as were floating in her mind, but, upon the proportion between the supply of labour and the remunerating demand for it. The worse, however, her political economy on this occasion, the less plausibility is there in presuming the existence of undue prejudices against a country, in whose favour her blunders are com-

> The next thing in which national unfairness generally betrays itself, is in the colour given to estimates of the general character of a people, But Mrs. Butler is apparently quite as ready to do full justice to all that she has admired or liked in them, as to speak her mind on what was disagreeable to her.

> The following passage contains some of her proofs of their honesty:-

> A farmer who is in the habit of calling at our house the eggs were new-laid, replied, without an instant's hesitation, "no, not the very fresh ones, we eat all those ourselves." On returning home from the play one night, ourselves. On returning nome from the play one night, I could not find my slippers any where, and, after some useless searching, performed my toilet for bed without them. The next morning, on enquiring of my maid, if she knew any thing of them, she replied with perfect equanimity, that having walked home through the snow, and got her feet extremely wet, she had put them on, and forgotten to restore them to their place before my return. Nobody, I think, will doubt, that an English farmer and an English servant might sell stale eggs and use their mistress's slippers; but I think it highly doubtful, that either fact would have been acknowledged with such perfect honesty any where but here.

From her account of them, they are, substantially and in grain, one of the best bred people on the face of the The particular forms and habits of European earth. refinement may be often missed; but a sentiment of universal good-will is widely spread among them, which is a far better thing. The standard of fashionable manners is for ever changing. The generation which has gone before is usually the laughing-stock of the generation which comes after. But a desire to accommodate and to please is the sterling element and sole ultimate condition of all good-breeding. 'The demeanour of men towards women in the streets is infinitely more courteous here than with us; women can walk, too, with perfect safety, by themselves, either in New York, Philadelphia, or Boston; on board the steam-boats no person sits down to table until the ladies are accommodated with seats; and I have 'This country is in one respect blessed above all other, and above all other deserving of blessing. There are no poor—I say there are none, there need be none; order to afford me room.'

Southern States; and widely scattered over the Union, a scious of her own merit ('clever girl than I am'), she is not

They are humane. They avoid giving unnecessary pain; not merely in the case of human beings, but in that of our fellow-creatures; using that comprehensive word as our Creator will expect it to be used-the coloured population, we fear, alone excepted. 'It is a circumstance,' she says, 'which deserves notice, for it bespeaks general character. I have not seen, during a two years' residence in this country, a single instance of brutality towards animals, such as one is compelled to witness hourly in the street of any English town.

The union of liberty and order, which is the principle of their government, is also the principle of their homes. The real household virtues-good sense and good feelingare powerful enough to overcome considerable disadvantages in the rambling education and juvenile publicity of their women.

The term which I should say applied best to the tone and carriage of American girls, from ten to eighteen, is hoydenish; laughing, giggling, romping, firting, screaming at the top of their voices, running in and out of shops, and spending a very considerable of their time in lounging about in the streets.'

But what is it that follows?

These very girls, whose manners have been most should have pointed out as romps and first pre-eminent, not only make excellent wives, but from the very moment of their marriage seem to forsake society, and devote the marriage seem to forsake society, and devote the new solutions to be constituted in the constitute of the consti vote themselves exclusively to household duties and retirement.'—'A young American lady, speaking upon this subject, said to me, "We enjoy ourselves before marriage; but in your country girls marry to obtain a greater degree of freedom, and indulge in the pleasures and dissipations of society." She was not, I think, greatly mistaken. She was not, I think,

This is not the way in which the subject would have been dealt with by a writer who was looking out for the opportunity of passing off real falsehoods under the coun-

were just what malice would have desired.

Her nature takes fire as soon from American as from Reading Willis, she is of opinion that all beautiful things with the latter creed. But be that as it may, she was quite in the right to defend against her mother her girlish recital, 'almost sadly,' of the balcony scene in Juliet.

character. Therefore attentions paid to her father and in general an ignorant and inattentive set, and the audithem accordingly as things of course; more astonished Philadelphia is as noisy as in London, and a clever Jackwhen they happened to be omitted than gratified when they sonite can contrive to vote for 'old hickory' nine times represents the best spirits of the place. She tells them were paid. Nevertheless, daughter to Charles Kemble, that they will find at Boston something better still—real niece to Mrs. Siddons, representative three times a-week good society; amenity and accomplishments in the of queens and heroines-over and above all, properly conlarge portion of country gentry, 'using that term in the too proud and saucy to be insensible to kindness manifest-best sense in which it was once used in England.' ed towards themselves. There was a scandalous attempt to injure her before the public, by misrepresenting an unlucky private conversation she had had at Washington with a young gentleman, when out riding, about his horse. The Philadelphia theatre was her place of trial; and the audience carried her through in the handsomest manner. How does she feel their conduct? 'At the end, the people shouted and shricked for us. My father went on and made them a speech, and I went on and made them a curtsy; and certainly they do deserve the civilest of speeches, and lowest of curtsies from us, for they have behaved most kindly and courteously to us; and for mine own good part, I love the whole city of Philadelphia, from this time forth, for ever more."

in up the as n w b n si r n ti a

ii

Nor, on reconsidering the sum total of her recollections,

did she change her mind.

'The people here are much more civil and considerate than can be imagined. I sent yesterday evening for some water-ice; the confectioner had none; when lo! to night he brings me some he had made on purpose for me, which he entreats my acceptance of. I admired - had in her hand; and at the end a pretty fan Mrs of the play, she had it sent to my dressing room,-and these sort of things are done to me, not once, but ten times every day. Nothing can exceed the kindness times every day. Nothing can exceed the kindness and attention which has encountered us every where since we have been in this country. I am sure I am bound to remember America and Americans thankfully; for, whatever I may think of their ways, manners, or peculiarities, to me they have shown unmingled good-will, and cordial, real kindness.'

The extracts which we have given look, we think, very like a friendly estimate of things and persons. At all events they are sufficiently favourable to entitle the writer of them to the privilege of stating with impunity the case, as it has appeared to her, on the other side. She has passed to the credit of their account the several items of political greatness, honesty, courtesy, and humanity; and has added her own personal obligation for boundless kindness. After this, is she to be all but stoned for setting tenance of apparent truths. The materials for a safe lie down in her tablets, day by day, as they occurred, the opposite matters, whether serious or trifling, which have most annoyed or most amused her? And what, in truth, English genius. Witness her tears at the speeches of does the burden of her imputed testimony against America Webster, and at the poetry of Bryant and Willis. There actually amount to? For the most part her troubles and is so little critical reserve in her admiration that she readily horrors are those of a quick and susceptible and somewhat places her poetical theories at the disposal of either poet.

romantic girl, who is pining after home, and is comparing Reading Bryant, bright, trustful, and wholesome ('in concerning the grant of the standards which she had left behind every thing with the standards which she had left behind tradiction to the literature of the age,)' she is satisfied that her; the riding school at New York with Fossard's; an 'melancholy is not essential to the nature of a 'poet.' evening among the rank and fashion of Chesnut Street with her last evening at Devonshire House. It may be are sad, and that it is sad to read fine poetry among the truly a blessed country for the vast majority of mankind rest. Her temperament apparently connects most readily notwithstanding the following deductions:

There is no such thing as a good lady's horse to be got throughout the Union for love or money; horses are called well broken when they are no longer wild; a decent rider, Mrs. Butler visited the United States as a sort of public man or woman, is scarcely ever to be seen; their actors are herself would have been no general criterion. She took ince cannot find it out; an election at the Quaker city of

in their shop windows; while the dependence of the rich folks fresh from Europe. upon the poor (instead of the European alternative, the deof national drollery or romance, consists in going to Lempriere's Dictionary for the names of their wooden villages and negro slaves; drunkenness, while it is much less common among the poor than in England, is a frequent recreation of the rich; spitting on floor and carpet is so general that a clean white gown may be covered with yellow spots from the gentlemen's tobacco in a single afternoon; a nasal inflection is a national characteristic, while sundry poculiarities of pronunciation and accent more or less distinguish the principal divisions of the country; they play such queer tricks in modernizing the English of our liturgy, that their language must run a great chance of being driven from the solid anchorage which our ancestors had laid down in our old translation of the Bible; privacy any where is out of the question; an officer in the American army considers his commission to be a sufficient right ble English ladies are seldom seen; married women be-things must not be thought of after this fashion; they times in three years -she is in the store room, while her spoiled children, unaccustomed to contradiction. They is led by chits-of whom the girls are brought up en evi- trump. desce and in a bustle, and the boys are made men of business at sixteen; these democrats are as title-sick as a Butler found her situation sufficiently uncomfortable. 'I inferior government,—just, honest, and rational perhaps, pulse of the moment, an open course. 'I know' (says he,) but not enlarged or liberal; finally, and to conclude—the 'no country where less independence of mind, and less free-working of the whole brings in the higher classes a sys-dom of discussion are to be found than in America.' The

over; the division of labour and capital is not yet visible tem of life and manners any thing but agreeable to gentle-

A great deal of this may not be very pleasant hearing; pendence of the poor upon the rich), is visible enough in but it is all told, meaning to tell the truth, and not mean-the conduct of careless innkeepers, conversible shopmen, ing to be impertinent. Where this is the case, it is more and washerwoman, who sit down while their mistresses absurd in nations, even than in individuals, to take offence. are standing; for three years together a pretty woman may Mrs. Butler says what she thinks of other nations as unrenot get a single article of dress which shall not be ill made; servedly as of the Americans. She goes out of her way what is almost as bad-poetical mountains are degraded to mention the vanity and blasphemies of the French. She by the appellations of Crow's Nest and Butter Hill; no speaks as ill of the filth of London hackney-coaches as of nightingales are to be heard in New England, nor rivulets the paces of American saddle-horses, and was as sensible singing through the fields; the people are given up to the to the dirtiness of her hotel at Dublin, and to the savagerealities of life, and mainly to that dull reality, the making ness of the Highland serving-man at Glasgow, as to her money; they are in too great a hurry to allow themselves similar miseries in the Northern states. English pride and time to perfect any thing, and will scarcely pause to keep prejudice find no more favour from her than American ira Christmas or a birth-day; the want of a class with inde- ritability-nor our boarding-school trick of quizzing, than pendent means, and, therefore, able to command literary their intrusive cross-questioning curiosity. Both nations leisure, and follow up the higher intellectual pursuits, is a are alike unteachable in music; nationally unteachable. national misfortune; the population, in consequence, is If the fine breeding of the 'Provoked Husband' must be marvellously indisposed to humour, which is fancy laugh-heathen Greek to the American exclusives, the imaginative ing, and to poetry, which is fancy sad; the principal effort faculty is gone forth from among our higher classes. Our loss (by far the greatest) is so complete, that she would a thousand times rather act Juliet and Ophelia to a set of Manchester Mechanics, than to the most select of our aristocracy. This, by the way, is telling tales out of schoolfor in their private theatricals she had particular opportunities of seeing what they were like-being, as it with them behind the scenes. The fine ladies of New York saw 'nothing particular' in her lady Teazle. She vindicates herself by a sneer. 'I am not 'genteel enough, and I am conscious of it.' However, our own variety of this interesting species—Almack patronesses and their tribe—do not get off much better. It is only in a different way. They are, among women, what the Camelia is among flowers, beautiful without sweetness; they are bright and polished as ice, but as slippery, as treacherous, and as cold. What then? Neither nation, nor French nor English, she of introduction to any body—young ladies included; visi-is well aware, will think of directing the columns of a tors, once acquainted, walk in without leaving the visitees an option in the matter; the fair sex have a great dislike to ings. The diary of one of her days opens with, 'Read being called 'women;' their feminine refined appearance Byron's Life-defend me from my friends!' Suppose a is in singular contrast with their style of dress (French gone page in Mr. Moore's diary were to begin, 'Read Mrs. mad,) and with their practice of talking across each other, Butler's journal-defend one from one's self," would either five or six at a time, at the top of the shrillest voices in party meet the less amiably conditioned towards each the world; the thorough-bred look and manners of our no other? No indeed: Europeans have learned that these come at once household drudges or nursery-maids; you would make us bad else.' The Americans, on the other will not find a lady at home in the morning six or seven hand, appear in this respect to be little better than so many husband is at the counting house; for the most part society cannot play at cards unless they are allowed to call the banker's wife in England; the distinguishing points on live myself in daily expectation of martyrdom; and as for which American exclusives pride themselves, find, however, any body attempting to earn a livelihood here, who has but ample scope for variety in different parts of the country; as much as said he prefers the country where he was born the aristocracy of New York rests its pretensions upon its to this, he would stand a much better chance of thriving, wealth, that of Boston upon its intellect, that of Philadelphia if he were to begin business after confinement in the Peniand of the south upon birth; a curious novel might be tentiary.' This account of the national temper is confirmed made in illustration of the struggle bitween the levelling by M. de Tocqueville to the fullest extent, in his remarka-spirit of American institutions and the separating and di-viding spirit of American society; the effect of universal The ansjority, by removing out of the way every check, suffrage is to check mental cultivation, and give them an even the most temporary, has left to tyranny, and the imWo to the writer who ventures to step out of it!

Nothing is more embarrassing in the ordinary intercourse of life than this irritable patriotism of the Americans. A stranger may be very well inclined to praise many of the institutions of their country; but he begs nnany or the institutions of their country; but he begs permission to blame some of the peculiarities he ob-serves—a permission which is inexorably refused. America is, therefore, a free country, in which, lest any body should be hurt by your remarks, you are not al-lowed to speak freely of private individuals or of the state, of the citizens or of the authorities, of public or of private undertakings, or, in short, of any thing at all. except it be the climate and the soil; and even then Americans will be found ready to defend either the one or the other, as if they had been contrived by the inhabitants of the country.

Again,

Works have been published in the proudest nations of the Old World, expressly intended to censure the vices, and deride the follies of the times; Labruyere inhabited the palace of Louis XIV, when he composed his chapter upon the great; and Molière criticised the courtiers in the very pieces which were acted before the court. But the ruling power in the United States is not to be made game of; the smallest reproach irritates its sensibility, and the slightest joke which has any founda-tion in truth, renders it indignant. From the style of its language, to the more solid virtues of its character, every thing must be made the subject of encomium. No writer, whatever be his eminence, can escape from this tribute of adulation to his fellow-citizens. The maonly learn from strangers, or from experience.'

'A stranger does indeed sometimes meet with Americans who dissent from these rigorous formularies; with men who deplore the defects of the laws, the mutability and the ignorance of democracy; who even go so far as to observe the evil tendencies which impair the national character, and to point out such remedies as it might be possible to apply; but no one is there to hear these things beside yourself, and you, to whom these secret different language in public.

'If ever these lines are read in America, I am well assured of two things: in the first place, that all who peruse them will raise their voices to condemn me; and playing the part of courtier to itself! The consequence doubtful about 'that 'ore gal,' but who guessed she was is, it must gradually lose all relish for truth, and fall into 'o' some account,' will do well to gratify his curiosity in worst state of degradation (for a more humiliating and the same manner. more penal one cannot be imagined),—a preference of Though Mrs. Butler has said nothing about the Ameri-flatterers over friends. We say what we are saying out cans, which, whether we look at the matter or the manner majority has traced a formidable circle round the mind. of a sincere regard for the Americans, but under a still greater reverence for freedom of opinion. If they compel The three following extracts are from the work just men-tioned. They are taken from an excellent translation by that case, our choice is made. We still hope, however, Mr. H. Reeve, made under the immediate superintendence that they may find the means of reconciling our regard of the author. ration of them is purely ludicrons. By perseverance in it, the blustering Demos of America would do more towards discrediting Republicanism by their intolerance, than they can ever do towards recommending it by their economy.

Theatrical stars 'shoot too madly from the sphere' of ordinary womanhood, for ordinary rules of 'maiden meditation' to apply to them. Mrs. Butler's idea of herself is, that she has even more than the national English abhorrence of coming in contact with strangers. At the same time, she has apparently no idea that any thing need be kept secret from the public; and would go through with her gambols round the room just the same, whoever might come in. Her father and herself accordingly are shown up with as little ceremony as the rest of the world. If Mr. Charles Kemble chance to get a little elevated (in her language, 'how comed you so indeed?') or if, walking home at night, he is betrayed into the frolic of longing for a gimlet to bore a hole in some wine casks, left impru-dently in the street—out it comes. The merits and demerits of his acting, or his reading, could not be canvassed more impartially, were he a perfect stranger to her. is to the full as nonchalant and explicit about herself. She knows she can behave as ill and be as odious as any body when she has a mind. She must have seemed a strange animal to the fashionables of New York, whilst they were seeming just as strange to her. She dislikes to wear a diamond ring on account of the 'abominable ugliness of her hand.' Lawrence's portrait of her is admirable, inasmuch as it overcome the material impediments, and put her spirit into her face. The harder portions of her social jority lives in the perpetual practice of self-applause; creed, and personal character, are trotted out with the and there are certain truths which the Americans can same indifference to effect, good or bad. 'We're a blessame indifference to effect, good or bad. 'We're a blessed pack of drudges, and deserve to be so.' Her satisfaction in occasionally escaping from our wearisome genera-Hence no great men either in literature or in politics. tion in occasionally escaping from our wearisome genera-for thought, like affection, sinks to mediocrity when it tion, and forgetting herself in Dante, is what many persons may manage to understand. But her declaration that the human race cannot stand in competition with a landswallow for her favour, is not so easy to forgive. 'Poer little creature! how very much more I do love all things than men and women.' If that is the case, no wonder her fellow-creatures are less agreeable to her than herself. There is no moment of my life when I would not rather be alone than in company.' Yet she tires often of herself. be alone than in company.' 'I would give the world for a good shaking. I am dyreflections are confided, are a stranger and a bird of pas-ing of the blue devils.' This, however, is a consumma-sage. They are very ready to communicate truths mation not always to be prevented even by hock and waltz-which are useless to you, but they continue to hold a ing. 'Sweet German waltz, next to hock, the most intoxicating growth of the Rheinland!' These are more confidential revelations, it must be admitted, than the public is in the habit of receiving. A negro servant, who brought peruse them will raise their voices to condemn me; and in the second place, that very many of them will acquit he had yet seen Miss Kemble at the theatre. He answered, "No. I have had the pleasure of seeing Miss Kemble in This is a melancholy and disheartening point of view. private society.' Let him buy her book as she herself A whole nation employed from year's end to year's end in could tell him little more. The Kentuckian who was

he man and the man

PEtia

o Fris wood

the before of the missis

she had not a perfect right to say; on the other hand, she suddenly from out of her heaven, and wishes herself dead. has given the Americans, without any breach of gallantry, derivative as against herself. An ornamental tube is over the frivolous frippery of her theatrical toilette; paying son appears to have suspected her of belonging to the the headlong capricious style of a moonish youth, changea-ble, longing, and liking, for every passion something, and rily lose their animal spirits and natural pleasures from the for no passion truly any thing, as boys and women are wear and tear and artificial habits of the stage. The fro-for the most part cattle of this colour.' Now, this is too liesome humour of our young heroine at times took eccenthat for the time is uppermost in it.

peared—pursued from place to place by anonymous love journey:—'At one place where we stopped, I saw a meek-letters and bouquets—wandering over the world in a pro-eyed, yellowish-white cart-horse, standing with a man's fession which places a woman to a certain degree in a speddle on his back. The opportunity was irresistible, and false position, and which, loathe it as she may, and per-the desire too. I had not backed a horse for so long. So haps in proportion as she loathes it, must act upon her sen- I got upon the amazed quadruped, woman's fashion, and ment and character-being all this, it necessarily follows, took a gallop through the fields, with infinite risk of falthat a picturesque exhibition of her authentic self cannot be a very grave, uniform, business-like affair. The out.

This was the mixed and somewhat tangled skein of rich embroidered fancy, make at times glorious confusion. rica, and out of which, sailor-fashion, she has spun a very It is the emptyings of Falstaff's pockets, with many finer pleasant yarn. It is not, to be sure, as full of detail and they grew' (call it patriotism or what you will,) is indulged the same things, to see them in the same spirit. What and gloried in, so as to take from her comparisons between are trifles to philosophers or day labourers, are serious country and country, every thing of a judicial character. matters in the eye of a Rosalind or a Beatrice. The dif-For instance, her avowed panting after a wreath of English ference between a good or a bad horse in the rides which fog in preference to the surpassing sunsets of New York, did her 'ten thousand goods;' between a pleasant neighis one of those sontimental bravadoes in which a pretty bour at dinner and a bel esprit who, by way of critical woman is allowed to exhaust the sorrows of exile, or any conversation, tells her that the Hunchback is by no means other sorrow.

the Baltimore schooners which she describes-of light ence readily electrified and an audience of cabbages; before the reader is aware. The skill with which she grace- with her father-were points of more immediate concern fully touches serious subjects, and the depth and beauty to Miss Kemble on her theatrical trip to New York and of many passages, are in comical juxtaposition with the Boston, Philadelphia and Baltimore (for that is all), than other half of her nature and occupations. At one moment the issue of the South Carolina insurrection against the she is absorbed in the principles of her art, or half mysti-Tariff, or of Jackson's struggle with the Bank. Such is fied in dim spiritual metaphysics, or walks out to breathe accordingly the character of her Journal. An American more freely a bright poetical atmosphere of her own, or kinsman made out for her that the Kembles were originally is found almost transfigured on a mountain top, ready for Italian people—pirates—by name Cambo bello; the same any extravagance that enthusiam can devise, or drops down family as the Scotch Campbells and Norman Beauchamps not a barometer, unless it is properly constructed, the compliments to her new furbished bonnet,—'it is a wor-quicksilver what it ought to be, and the scale correctly thy old thing that;' or coaxing herself, 'dear little good noted. Now, this is not the nature of Mrs. Butler's book. me,' for her economy in abstaining from the purchase of It is, at the best, a mirror; and not so much a mirror re- a pelerine which she did not want. She has recorded withflecting an image of America as of herself. General Jack- in the twelvemonth, we are sorry to perceive, cryings enough to last any reasonable person a life and more. family of scribbling ladies, when he told her that the South However, if she 'can weep for nothing, like Diana in the Carolina disturbances had no larger source than 'the nib fountain,' she wants as little also to make her merry. of a lady's pen.' It is curious to see the influence of the There is always an ecstatic hour to be got arranging sex as powerful over American politics, as in the court of flowers. A nosegay reconciles her in a minute to our Queen Anne or Louis the Fifteenth. But the representa- prison-house of torments. The public are bound, we tion which Mrs. Butler has given of herself, is a conclusive think, to look with interest on the history of all who are proof that the possibility of making a national or political born and trained and in a great degree sacrificed to our use of her pages never entered into her head. Otherwise enjoyment. And sacrifice is, alas far too much the hisshe would have been upon her guard; and written less in tory of all genius and of every species of public life. It is much her way of going on, upon her own showing; her centric flights, and must have put her in some danger of book being a window to her mind, in which all is seen the tread-mill or a lunatic asylum, with a generation who at for the time is uppermost in it.

are not very indulgent to a joke. As they went through While yet a girl; Miss Kemble rose up on a sudden the the streets of Philadelphia, during the riot of an election, self-taught ornament of the London theatre. Naturally of she kept brandishing her father's theatrical sword out of a vivid temperament, and of mercurial and uncertain spirits the carriage window. Another of her freaks was bolder—very clever, running one feeling into another, without still. They were travelling from New York to Boston, the slightest warning made, from her talents and celebrity, en voiturier; or, in American phraseology, as exclusive exthe principal attraction of almost every circle where she ap-tras. The following adventure occurred to them on the pourings of her volatile spirits, o'er-wrought feelings, and thought and feeling that she took out with her to Amethings beside. With regard to her notices of America, she philosophy as De Tocqueville. There are readers enow, does not affect to disguise her foolish weaknesses, and to however, whom it will not suit the worse for that. In ass herself off for more than she is worth. A passion for former days, Carneades and a Greek mima, visiting Rome, England, the yearning of the roots for the soil in which were not expected to look for the same things, or, seeing her sorrow.

as good as Shakspeare; between milliners that can make

Mrs. Butler gets rapidly over the ground. Like one of a gown to meet behind and that cannot; between an audibuild and raking masts, she is away and back again, be [tween acting with such sticks as Mr. Keppel and acting

On this, the little aristocrat exclaims, 'How I wish it were! true !" And (what is worse still) would rather be descended from a half-heathen Saxon giant than from William Penn himself, or than have the wealth of the earth for her dower! This is the fortune which she would like to coniure for herself. Fortunately, she is not quite so foolish in dealing with the interests of others as with her own. The sight of one of Stanfield's Annuals from the Rhine did The sight of one of Stanfield's Annuals from the Rhine did not make her wish to turn America into a dreamland of romance. She was content with the aching of her own heart to be back again in Europe, in the old land of fairy tales,—the feudal world of legendary ruins. But, for lifted their overwhelming sides against us, it would have America, in case rained castles, and picture galleries, and cultivated refined society, are incompatible with a population of no poor, she is willing to leave it as it is. On that supposition, she says, 'I would not alter the present state of things if I could!' She would only get away.

tive powers. The reader must suppose her fairly out at sea in the packet boat from Liverpool to New York.

to keep ourselves warm by singing. After tea, for the first time since I have been on board, got hold of a pack of cards (oh me, that it should ever come to this!) and bed. Bed! quotha! 'tis a frightful misapplication of but a bed on shipboard? And yet I have seen some but a bed on shipboard? And yet I have seen some fair things: I have seen a universe of air and water; I have seen the glorious sun come and look down upon this rolling sapphire; I have seen the moon throw her silver columns along the watery waste; I have seen one lonely ship in her silent walk across this wilderness, meet another, greet her, and pass her, like adream, on the wide deep; I have seen the dark world and oh! above all, the soleme thoughts that wait needs a dream, on the wide deep; I have seen the dark world of waters at midnight open its mysterious mantle beneath our ship's prow, and show below another daz-zling world of light. I have seen what I would not but have seen, though I have left my very soul behind me, England, dear, dear, England! oh, for a handful of your earth!

A few days after this, a change comes over the temper of the sea.

'I fairly danced myself tired. Came to bed. But oh! not to sleep-mercy, what a night! The wind blowing like mad, the sea rolling, the ship pitching, bouncing, shuddering, and reeling, like a thing possessed. I lay awake, listening to her creaking and groaning, till two o'clock, when, sick of my sleepless berth, I got up and o clock, when, sick of my sleepless berth, I got up and was going up stairs, to see, at least, how near drowning we were, when D——, who was lying awake too, implored me to lie down again. I did so for the hundred and eleventh time, complaining bitterly that I should be stuffed down in a loathsome berth, cabined, cribbed, confined, while the sea was boiling below, and wind blowing above us. Lay till daylight, the gale increasing furiously; boxes, chairs, beds, and their contents, wooden valuables, and human invaluables, rolling about and clinging to one another in glorious confusion.

Her pretty appeal to Night, in the Style of a fragment of 'Old Play,' we should fear, must have been in vain-

Night! silent nurse, that with my solemn e Hang'st o'er the rocking cradle of the world, Oh! be thou darker to my dreaming eyes; Nor in my slumbers, be the past unfurled.

Night, thou shalt nurse me, but be sure, good nurse, While sitting by my bed, that thou art silent; I will not let the sing me to my slumbers With the sweet lullables of former times, Nor tell me tales, as other gossips wont, Of the strange fairy days, that are all gone.

ai le h ir

que cl of ri gl

pi

to

ve

th

be

al

re

w

hi do th

w

les

gh mi

de Li

da

in

be

80.1

sea

ble

wh

fac

an

int

4

COL

and

ver

SON

ed, wh Ne

On finding herself a little more sea-worthy, she says,

The land storm with which they were greeted at New York must have been still more terrific, with its holiday of We must give a few examples of Mrs. Butler's descripthe elements and its mad lightning- Wide sheets of purple-glaring flame, that trembled over the earth for nearly two or three seconds at a time; making the whole world, The ship seudded before the blast, and we managed river, sky, trees, and buildings, look like a ghostly universe keep ourselves warm by singing. After tea, for the cut out in chalk. In due time came her country rides, and the opportunity of admiring at her leisure the beautiful younger world which appears to her 'to have received the initiated Miss — in the mysteries of the intellectual portion of the beloved younger son—the "coat of many so. Played till I was tired; dozed, and finally came to sackcloth season of the year,' cannot bribe her from her > and oh! above all, the solemn thoughts that wait upon him; as he goes stripping the trees of their bright foliage, leaving them like the ungarlanded columns of a deserted palace.

> Her partial feelings move with equal grace in their poetical attire :-

Oh! not upon thy fading fields and fells
In such rich garb doth autumn come to thee,
My home!—but o'er thy mountains and thy dells His footsteps fall slowly and solemnly Nor flower, nor bud, remaineth there to him, Save the faint-breathing rose, that round the year, Its crimson buds and pale soft blossoms dim,

In lowly beauty constantly doth wear. O'er yellow stubble lands, in mantle brown

His wanders through the wan October light; Still as he goeth, slowly stripping down

The garlands green that were the spring's delight. At morn and eve thin silver vapours rise Around his path; but sometimes at mid-day He looks along the hills with gentle eyes, That make the sallow woods and fields seem gay. Yet something of sad sov'reignty he hath-

A sceptre crown'd with berries ruby red; And the cold sobbing wind bestrews his path With withered leaves that rustle 'neath his tread; And round him still, in melancholy state Sweet solemn sounds of death and of decay, In slow and hush'd attendance, ever wait, Telling how all things fair must pass away.'

She has even more brilliant things to say of winter, both in verse and prose, and of its clusters of 'enormous crystal grapes, the pendant adornments of the silver-fingered ice-god.' We beg to remind her that the case for, what fun! Again, I had an opportunity of perceiving and against, church music, is not fairly tried, when they how thorough a chimera the equality is that we talk of sing Psalms to the tune of 'Come live with me and be my love.' However she shall remain in quiet possession of her articles of faith, whether against soft church music or in favour of stern sermons, out of consideration of her quaint smile-so new and yet so like. 'The day was most levely, and my eyes were constantly attracted to the her pew, with a wish for the days of King Herod.

Her sketches of scenery, on her journey from Baltimore to Washington, at Trenton Falls, and round Boston, are all very picturesque. The figurantes thrown in to give life to a Claude or Poussin, do not do their work half so well as the outline of herself, with which she every where animates her landscapes. At one time, she passes us galloping duction in my life. They sat a little while, behaved along the golden sands of the sea-shore, as close to the very like Christians, and then departed." restless edge as her horse will hear to go; or stops to watch the reviving breeze dipping like a bird its fresh wings into the water. At another, we follow her along the tongue in behalf of antiquity. water courses, as they come dancing and singing down the hills like merry children, laughing as they run; or look

The following is very prettily expressed. We are as glad as she is that she is not in Parliament. She would den days, which, like the flowers in the sun-dial of Linnaus, were wont so gaily to mark the flight of time, were not becoming so dim in our calendars. I wish St. Valentine's day, and May morning, and Christmas day, and New Year's day, were not putting off their holiday suits to wear the work-day russet of their drudging fellows. I wish we were not making all things, of all sorts, so completely of a neutral tint. I would at least the Reform Parliament of England for ten thon. be in the Reform Parliament of England for ten thousand pounds!"

Her eye is equally quick for the humorous. While at BC0,---

'The captain proposed as a toast, 'The Ladies—God bless them,' which accordingly was being duly drunk, when I heard, close to my elbow, a devout, half audible —'And the Lord deliver us!' This from a man with a

At New York

' Presently after, a visit from "his honour the Recorder," a twaddling old lawyer, by the name of and a silent young gentleman, his son. They were Mrs. — 's yelps and singing, properly so called, and very droll. The lawyer talked the most; at every half accordingly pished!—and pshawed!—and oh lorded!—sentence, however, quoting, complimenting, or appeal- and good heavened! away—staring at the perpetrator ing to "his honour the Recorder," a little, good-temper- with indignant horror through his spectacles.'

But there are conversations which a reinter's brush can who the other assured me, was the Chesterfieldian of New York (I don't know precisely what that means): not follow. The next is one of them. It passes, we dare YOL XXVIII. JANUARY, 1836.—2.

The following is one only of many similiar trials of her patience:-

church windows, through which the magnificent willows of the burial-ground looked like golden-green fountains rising into the sky.' She must have been thinking of the door. I've heard of men's shutting the door in the face-I've heard of men's shutting the door in the face glorious fountains at Saint Peters. It was not near so of a dun, and going out the back way to escape a bailiff; pretty in her to visit a fidgety little child, in the corner of but how to get rid of such an attack as this I knew not, and was therefore fain to beg the gentlemen would walk in: and accordingly, in they walked, four as fine grown men as you would wish to see on a summer's day. I was introduced to this regiment, man by man, and thought, as my Sheffield friend would say, "If them be American manner's defend me from them." They are traders, to be sure; but I never heard of such wholesale intro-

She is always ready, with or without provocation, to give

We passed a pretty house, which Colonel . hills like merry children, laughing as they run; or look called an old mansion—mercy on me, him, and it!—
down with her from the heights while she is thinking of old! I thought of Warwick Castle, and of Hatfield—
the temptation of our Sarjour; or share her mortification. the temptation of our Saviour; or share her mortification old! and there it stood with its white pillars and Italianwhen, on stooping to gather violets, she finds them scent-looking portico, for all the world like one of our own less things—mere pretences of violets—and flings the lit-cit's yesterday-grown boxes. Old, quotha! the woods, and waters, and hills, and skies, alone are old here—the works of men are in the very greenness and unmellowed imperfection of youth-true, 'tis a youth full of vigglad as she is that she is not in Parliament. She would give very bad votes; and, if she spoke, would probably remind us of the boards of Covent Garden:—

'St. Valentine's Day! I wish all these pretty, golden days, which, like the flowers in the sun-dial of Linneus, were wont so gaily to mark the flight of time, happy without convergence that the sun that is matter of glory quite sufficient—they are never Linneus, were wont so gaily to mark the flight of time, happy without convergence that the sun that the

> Jan Steen might have drawn a picture from some of her interiors.

When the gentlemen joined us they were all more or less "how come'd you so indeed?" Mr. — particularly. They put me down to the piano, and once or twice I thought I must have screamed. On one side vibrated dear Mr. —, threatening my new gown with a cup of coffee which he held at an - And the Lord deliver us?' This from a man with a awful angle from the horizontal line, singing with every face like one of Retsch's most grotesque etchings, and body who opened their lips, and uttering such dread-an expression half humorous, half terrified, sent me fully discordant little squeals and squeaks, that I thought into fits of laughter.' other side, rather concerned, but not quite so much so, stood the Irishman, who, though warbling a little out of tune, and flourishing somewhat luxuriantly, still retained enough of his right senses to discriminate between parlours.

'That we must live, I know, and that money is ne-cessary to live, I know; but that our glorious capacities of soul, mind, and body, the fitting exercise of which alone in itself is happiness, should thus be chained down to the altar horns of Mammon, is what I never down to the altar horns of Mammon, is what I never ragged memory; for, for aught I know to the contrary, will believe wise, right, or fitting. I at length spoke, for my heart was burning within me, and burst into an eloquent lamentation on the folly and misery of which the world was guilty in following this base worship as it does. But when I said that I was convinced happiness at all, but "shocking bad hats," with feathers in them.

to tell he need not care about his plainness.

- breakfasted with us. How unfortunately plain he is! His voice is marvellously like his father's, and it pleased me to hear him speak therefore. He was talking to my father about the various southern and western theatres, and bidding us expect to meet strange coadjutors in those lost lands beyond the world. On one occasion he said, when he was acting Richard the Third, some of the underlings kept their hats on while he was on the stage, whereat -- remonstrated, requesting them in a whisper to uncover, as they were in the presence of a king, to which admonition he received the following characteristic reply :- "Fiddlestick! I guess we know nothing about kings in this country!"

There is nothing like public rooms and public conveyances for teaching people to feel every where at home.

As to privacy at any time, or under any circumstances, tis a thing that enters not into the imagination often happens that those affections, so strong, so deep, of an American. They do not seem to comprehend, so making up the sum and substance of female existof an American. They do not seem to comprehend, so making up the sum and substance of female exist-that to be, from sunrise to sunset, one of a hundred and that to be, from sunrise to sunset, one of a hundred and fifty people confined in a steam-boat, is in itself a great into springs of acute suffering. These wells of feeling misery; or that to be left by one's self and to one's self to one's by so many strangers, who crowd about you, pursue their conversation in your very ears, or, if they like it better, listen to yours, stare you out of all countenance, and squeeze you out of all comfort.'—' Young women and squeeze you out of all comfort.— Young women here, accustomed to the society of strangers, mixing generalities, have specialities in their heads. The proportion which she and her colleague allowed—not more than earthly, subject to the gaze of a crowd from morning till onight, pushing and pressing, and struggling in self-dering fence, conversing, and being conversed with, by the chance companions of a boarding-house, a steam-boat, (in the truth of which we perfectly agree), how will they or the lotel of a fashionable watering-place, they must or the hotel of a fashionable watering-place, they must tally with each other? deportment, and become free and familiar in their man-

say, now and then between father and daughter in other We think the Americans themselves must enjoy the following picture of the militia of New York, on the anniversary of the evacuation of the town by the British troops:-

O, pomp and circumstance of glerious war! They were certainly not quite so bad as Falstaff's men, of it does. But when I said that I was convinced happiness at all, but "shocking bad hats," with feathers in them. might and did exist most blessedly upon half the means which men spent their lives in scraping together, my father laughed, and said I was the last person in the straight line, or stoop too much, or turn their heads round world who could live on little, or be content with the mediocrity I vaunted. I looked at my satin gown, and held my tongue, but still I was not convinced.'

The infantry were, however, comparatively reapercable straight line, or stoop too much, or turn their heads round too often. Mr —— remarked, that militia were self-dom more steady and orderly in their appearance. But the cavalry! what gems without price that were! Apparathy extremely frightened at the There can be no question what name is to occupy the shambling tituppy chargers, upon whose backs they blank which follows. However, if he has many such stories to tell he need not care about his plainness. how formidable they must appear to the enemy, when, with the most peaceable intentions in the world, they thus jeopardied the safety of their enthusiastic fellow-Bold would have been the man who did not citizens. edge backwards into the crowd, as a flock of these woredge backwards into the crowd, as a flock of these worthies a-horseback came down the street—some trotting, some galloping, some wracking, some ambling; each and all "witching the world with wondrous horsemanship." If any thing ever might be properly called wondrous, they, their riders and accountrements, deserve the title. Some wore boots, and some wore shoes, and presented these had got on experted the street and some wore shoes, and one independent hero had got on grey stockings and

weda

Ch

A cer

the me

say

but

the

diff

cha

nes

nar

whi

the

frag ject And mai on t whe fam

degr

the

cone

are a in F pres Way be m spec So v

cast.

Mrs. Butler takes up, in passing, many graver subjects of remark. Among them, she hits off very justly the principal causes of the difference between male and female religion :-

'The fragile frame, the loving heart, and the ignorant mind, are in us sources of religious faith. But it

Perhaps it would be wise in her not to meddle or make with questions of either religion or metaphysics in private conference with male logicians, who while arguing

"Tis strange that feelings should pass from our hearts deportment, and become free and familiar in their final mers, and noisy and unrefined in their tone and style of and minds as clouds pass from the face of heaven, as conversation. An English girl of sixteen, put on board though they had never been there;—yet net so, after all; one of these Noah's arks (for verily there be clean and unclean beasts in them), would feel and look like a dows behind; they leave a darker colour upon the face of scared thing.'

The theories of moral formation and of moral trial are decent women are to perform in them. only a difference in words. They come to the same thing. We have no objection to an actress making a distin-The improvement of one's individual nature is not indeed guished marriage. Quite the contrary. It is highly usewomen, is to complete the system of contraries, which is or Miss O'Neill from the stage, was like shutting up one already so remarkable, between the Eastern and Western of the parks, or enclosing Hampstead Heath. Our fore-Christian heaven almost entirely to themselves.

degree of excitement which is raised by the perfection of sure, some of the sundry stories, plays, and novels on the illusion, and on the absence of Christian motives of which, it seems she had already set to work, amid the inconduct in the characters and the plot of dramatic pieces, terruptions of the stage. are as old as Christianity itself. They were much insisted on in France by the members of the Port-Royal, and are at present one of the Shibboleths of a party (smaller every way except in numbers) among ourselves. All that can be said is, that those who feel themselves the worse for this species of excitement had better certainly stay at home. So with respect to the reading books, dramatic or othercast. Yet what in this life of ours is to become of such East Indiaman, and was commonly out of England for uppersons? They must of course take a survey of their wards of two years together. He was not in the least wasted capabilities, and time, precious time, expended in vain. Yet not in vain; even though our feelings we have not a word to say. Madame de Staël's saying, change,—pass, perhaps, to our own consciousness—cause altogether,—'tis not in vain—life is going on—experience and solemn wisdom may come with the coming time; and existence is, after all, but a series of experiments upon our spiritual nature."

It is refuted (where refutation is wanting) by the actual condition of the French drama. One thing, besides, is plain enough; you must have decent plays, if besides, is plain enough; you must have decent plays, if absolutely the only object of human life; yet it ought to ful from its tendency is to raise the standard of the profesbe so completely the paramount one, that no other object sion. But we have a great objection to their quitting the should be left in competition with it by any reasonable public service as the consequence of their marriage. It is person. To suppose, as above, that the spiritual experi-one of the most obnoxious forms conjugal vanity and exment of human life fails, with men, and succeeds with clusiveness can assume. The carrying off Miss Farran worlds. Women, who can hardly get into the Mahome- fathers had a great deal to get over before they could bring dan beaven at all, would, on this supposition, have the themselves to hear the thoughts of a real woman on the public stage. It was one of those innovations, however, On her professional criticisms we have little to offer, which, when once accomplished, is accomplished for ever. A combination of Kean and of the male Kensbles would There are many parts in life where men still take the certainly make a greater actor than either extreme, as re-place of women very needlessly; but this branch of male spectfully personified. The narrative of her strange ex-monopoly is clearly at an end. William the Fourth need postulatory by-play with her American Romeos would never fear having to wait, as Charles the Second had, for seem to be decisive, as far as she is concerned at least, on the curtain drawing up, till 'her majesty was shaved.' the Grimm controversy, concerning the reality of the im. No successor to the handsome Kynaston will drive to Hyde mediate feelings of a performer. Yet her Ophelia, she Park with our women of quality, in his theatrical pettisays, was always moved by her father's Hamlet; and she coats, after the play is over. Hissing, hooting, pippin-peltwas sufficiently herself to dislike to act Juliet to his Romeo. ing, and driving them from the boards, as a public scandal, She is wrong, we think, in declaring against small theatres. was the reception given to the unlucky Frenchwomen (or Nobody wishes to have them the size only of a private room; 'monsters rather,' as Prynne calls them) who first ventured but many are desirous to bring them back to the size of on the rash experiment in England. Actresses are quite the theatres of former days. As regards the actors, their safe at present against this kind of outrage; even when difficulties might be altered rather than diminished by the they unsex themselves in hose and doublet. But there is change. But if an intermediate size were taken, so as to much evil short of this. The difficulty of keeping up a give sufficient distance for the illusion, and yet sufficient tolerable supply of good female performers, and the chances nearness to catch the natural voice and natural counte- against the combination of excellencies, which is necessanance of the performer, the spectator's part of the prob-ry to make a really superior actress, are almost infinite. lem would be solved. The well-intentioned proposition by The public, therefore, can ill afford these matrimonial rewhich some moral alarmist startled her-to wit, that our tirements, which eclipse before their time the gaiety of natheatres should represent for our amusement detached tions. In the case of Miss Kemble the mischief is done. In the case of Miss Kemble the mischief is done. Her London audience, which the Americans, she says, discussing. The proposal was made with the express object of reducing the excitement within harmless bounds, welcome as they do to us,' will welcome their favourite no And there can be little doubt but that it might be so more. There is no chance of her return to a profession managed as in that respect to be perfectly successful. But, that she cordially detested. Under these circumstances, on this principle, her stage reformer ought also to consider the only compensation Mr. Butler can make to us he must whether he can justify reading a play at home to his make. He is bound to see that she goes on with her faithfamily, except piecemeal. Arguments, grounded on the ful and amusing journal, and that she finishes, at her lei-

From the Juvenile Forget-Me-Not, for 1836,

MRS. TETTY AND HER WARD. BY MARY HOWITT.

My mother died when I was so young as to have no wise, which are not of a purely and positively religious recollection of her. My father was commander of an lives in other respects also, and see where (to be consistent wanting in affection for me, though he saw me so rarely —if that they ever think of) the analogy would lead them, that I used to lose all remembrance of his person in the For plays, any way immoral (not confining immorality to intervals of our meeting, and had, as it were, to commence control; and as it happened that there were no nearly con-hended herself! Again, she was very rheumatic, and as mother most faithfully during her long illness which ended nity of attending Divine worship, and thereby gaining some than poor Mrs. Tetty.

rosy child which he afterwards found me. As we lived could knit and sew, and was qualified in every respect for in a secluded village in a part of England remote from a notable housewife. I watched our little meals cooking any considerable town, but where my mother's property when she was otherwise occupied; I neatly mended my lay, I had not the advantage of attending any good school; own clothes, folded them up, and put them by with scrubut as all the hamlet consisted of small farmers and their pulous care; I even tried to wash, mounted in my little labourers, I was looked upon as by no means inferior in pair of pattens to the wash-tub, and was praised for my accomplishments, or even learning, to any of them, though skill; I could iron without burning the clothes or my think of it; for what lay beyond the affairs and objects of guardian, to be as well-trained a little maiden as any in our narrow every-day life I knew nothing-nay, even of the three next counties. these I knew, as it were, only the externals. I never re- I believe I was naturally observant, so that the habitual Sected; I was only a mere animal, using its five senses, exercise of this first faculty in the infant mind was obbut no more: but of an intellectual or spiritual existence tained without poor Mrs. Tetty's interference; and yet, knowing as little as the fowls of the air. We were all as when I call to remembrance how she commended me for people having eyes, but seeing not; ears, but hearing not; what she called my "sharpness," she, after all, perhaps, and hearts, but yet not comprehension. I was, in most was the great spur to its exercise, for a kind word from respects, like Peter Bell and the primrose, which

" A yellow primrose was to him, But it was nothing more.'

To me, however, a flower had charms beyond the mere pang; but I could not then foresee the happy consequences outside, and stirred sentiments within me which came and it would produce to us both. the moral duties to avert his anger; I therefore had to- was, wherever I went, an honoured and welcome compan-wards him no sentiment but that of undefined fear.— ion. There was not a man, woman or child, in the village Here ended all my religious knowledge-all was vague, that I did not familiarly know. Many a baby had I reverence which all the human family owe to their hea- had sincerely mourned. These are small things to write venly Parent, I knew nothing. This my utter ignorance about, and I tell them, not to make my young readers my father saw and deplored, nay, even tried to remedy; think too well of me, but as traits of my early character, but his visits were either too short or my nature too volatraining, and life; and if I add that I believe I was gentile, for any permanent impression to be made by his in- erally beloved, let me not be thought vain, but do, my structions: and, in spite of his earnest entreaties to Mrs. dear young reader, take into consideration that, among Tetty, that I might be properly taught in these matters, I the poor people with whom I associated, there was so made no progress whatever; and how, indeed, could I? much kindness, so much patient endurance of poverty and for poor Mrs. Tetty, with the best will in the world, was pain, and such unostentatious sympathising of poor neigh-quite inadequate to the task. She was very ignorant, and, bour with neighbour, that no one could have been, as I having weak sight, could barely spell out a chapter in the was, among them daily, nay, almost hourly, without hav-Bible-which, by some unaccountable chance, seemed ing the heart improved, and the affections and charities always to open at a chapter of genealogy. Poor dear of its nature called into activity, and thereby winning their

a new acquaintance with him every time he returned.— soul! what sorrowful confusion she used to make when But the circumstances of his profession were beyond his she tried to enlighten me on things she so dimly comprenected branches of our family to whose care I could be the church had the reputation of being damp, and service instrusted, my father found it impossible to do otherwise was performed in it only every other Sunday, owing to than place me with an old woman who had attended my the clergyman living at a distance, I had not the opportuin her death, and to whose charge she had especially com-mitted me; and indeed a kinder, better nurse never lived rigid churchwoman, and this prevented our attending any of the chapels; so that, from various causes, we seemed No father saw me gradually improving under her care, excluded from public worship altogether. She, however, from the little aickly baby my mother left, to the strong kind soul! taught me all she knew, and that well. I I was so utterly ignorant that now I am frightened to own fingers; and was believed, by my simple-minded her and when did she give me any thing else? -was to d a b to co ou an le ye fa th fin fo sie w

vig

wi

wa

kin

hen

mar

dres

plin

her the

I

robb on n

in m man

ing a

me sufficient stimulant and reward.

No child ever loved the most tender mother better than I did my humble friend, and our separation was a cruel went, yet were never understood; but generally speaking, At eight years old I was a tall, robust, ruddy girl, with all that surrounded me were but things with names; I an immense quantity of curling chestnut hair, dangling learnt their names, and there my knowledge ceased: but into my eyes and hanging about my shoulders. I knew afterwards, when my mind was awakened, I was amazed every field in the parish, and every creature wild and tame at the ramifications, as it were, of knowledge which spread that might be found in them. In the summer I went into from the commonest things that surrounded me; and then the hay-fields, to work or play, as I willed it, and to ride it was that I found to my infinite amazement, that glass, in the empty wagons, or to tear my frock and hands in for instance, was not mere glass, nor salt mere salt, but gathering sprays of wild roses, or long trailing stems of involved in a thousand ways, subjects of the most delight the beautiful blue vetch. I was up with the earliest dawn ful interest. But how much more did all this apply to my to pick mushroons in the old pasture-fields; I went a-glean-spiritual nature as connected with religious knowledge! ing; I gathered blackberries, and spent whole days in I had been told that there was a God-that I must repeat picking bilberries on a wide heath some miles off, with a form of words called prayers morning and night, or that the poor children of the parish, who gained their living he would be angry; that I must speak the truth, or he at that season by doing so; and being taught by Mrs. would be displeased: in short, that I must perform all Tetty to give my gatherings to my humble associates, I dark, and unpleasing. Of love, gratitude, and the filial nursed, and for many a little creature's untimely death I confidence and love. Mrs. Tetty was a most kind-hearted, the country over in every direction, and was, in my vawill to relieve. Oh, when I look back to those times, some of the defects of my early education. and see their happiness, their simplicity, and their humble such was I, when my father announced his intention usefulness, how do I mourn over the one fault which of visiting us, and for a longer period than usual. The

to his agent in town, paid our small though amply suffi-cient stipend, and there was an end of the matter. Our done differently in the prospect of my father's coming, cottage was on the farm of this good men. It was a nor was I instructed to do thus and thus, nor to say this sweet little spot embosomed in trees, with a large garden or the other before him; for Mrs. T.tty believed every and a small orchard of old mossy trees, which, neverthe. thing had been done that he could desire, and exactly acless, produced apples so red and so golden, that, in after cording to his wishes. years, whenever I heard of the Hesperian apples, I saw in the trees, and in their gnarled trunks, the robin, the chaf- hopes, and full of affection and buoyant spirits; and "all the trees, and in their gnaried trunks, the robin, the char-finch, the missel-thrush, the throstle, and the blackbird, the day of the throstle, and the blackbird, there was that day no service, my father took me by the found warm and safe retreats: for in my predatory excur-sion I never harried the nest of any bird which, as it orchardran a small winding brook, with broken banks, mosloves the water side. The stream was shaded by alders, his father's death, which occurred when he was but seven with here and there an immense half-decaying willow, his father's death, which occurred when he was but seven which formed in itself a picturesque union of old age and years old; and he had always thought it of the highest vigorous youth. On the orchard-banks grew snowdrops importance that children should receive very early religious and wild daffodils, flowers which I can never see without knowledge; it may therefore be imagined what would be the freshness and happiness of my early years returning with the memory of that green quiet orchard. Under the rant as a little Pagan. My answers to his questions, and hedges, among the brown half-dissected leaves of the holly, my remarks, were, I believe, painfully irrational or foolish; sprang up the first violets of the year—violets thickly and I am ashamed to think how the ignorance which, in the clustered as the stars in the sky, white and blue, an almost interphase the stars in the sky, white and blue, an almost interphase the stars in the sky, white and blue, an almost interphase the stars in the sky, white and blue, an almost interphase the stars in the sky, white and blue, an almost interphase the sky in the sky custered as the stars in the sky, white and blue, an almost instabile succession, though my little basket and wounded his deeply religious mind. Never shall lorget the agony of my spirit when I saw him burst was filled every morning.

the other, which the kind creature never refused.

robbins, and a sparrow so remarkably tame as to sit perched robe, and have me ready for a journey to-morrow. What on my finger, cat from my lip, come at my call, and nestle a sad evening that was! I sate like one stupified with in my bosom to rest for hours together. I had a cat and some strange sorrow, and many, many times half bemany families of kittens, and a terrier dog, wonderfully lieved it a painful dream, from which I tried in vain to ugly, as every body assured me, but come, nevertheless, of wake. Nothing in the world, I am sure, could have preso good a race as to be in general request for every rat-catch-vailed on poor Mrs. Tetty to make the needful preparaing and otter-hunting within many miles. I had strolled tions, but the knowledge that I must be the sufferer if she benevolent creature; and was enabled by the allowance grant and out-of-doors life, as bold and independent, and that was made for my maintainance, and our really frugal as full of adventurous pleasure, as the most arrant gipsy way of living, to be a general benefactor. I was her al. that pitched her tent in our lanes. This life of freedom moner, and through my intimate knowledge of every gave me the full use of all my limbs, and an energy and household, I became acquainted with all its wants and independence of character, which I found afterwards exsorrows, which we had often the means and always the tremely useful, and which, in a degree, counterbalanced poisoned it all-our ignorance of the true nature of God tidings were those of great joy, for dear Mrs. Tetty had and religion, though in practice often so truly Christian! always encouraged, in my young heart, the most ardent Although I was a considerable heiress in this country affection for my father; and, perfectly believing she had district, I knew little of it. There was no parade about entirely fulfilled her duty towards me, she anticipated his coming with impatience almost country. any thing. The honest farmer who acted as my father's coming with impatience almost equal to my own. We bailiff quietly collected his yearly rents, transmitted them talked of it morning, noon, and night: and such was the

The first few days of my father's visit were days of fancy those of our old orchard. Among the branches of unmingled pleasure; he found me grown beyond his were, had sought our protection. At the bottom of the orchard began to question me on religious subjects. He sy, and covered with every graceful and abundant plant that and I have heard it said, performed family-worship for his horror to find me, though a Christian's child, as igno. Our garden was as old-fashioned as could well be conceived: we had no flowers but of the most primitive felt as if I had, in some way, betrayed a fatal secret, which kinds, but those in such luxuriant abundance as quite to would bring misery on dear Mrs. Tetty; for I heard my make up for their inferior quality. Never did I see such father couple her name with epithets which, though I could clumps of crocuses as ours, nor such roots of polyanthu-not fully understand, I knew to imply indignant reproach, ses, and yellow and lilac primroses. Poor Mrs. Tetty After some time he took me again by the hand, and reloved her garden next to myself, and was very particular in turned with me to the house, when he poured out his the management of her auriculas, pinks, and carnations; deep displeasure against the amazed Mrs. Tetty. She had hence hers were reckoned the finest in the country; and warm feelings—loved me better than her life; and, bemany an old neighbour came in on a Sunday evening, lieving me so faultless a creature, was no less hurt than andressed in his best, to walk in our garden, and quietly com-pliment Mrs. Tetty on the extraordinary excellence of and distressing scene was my father's determination to reher favorite flowers, or to beg a cutting or root of one or move me from her guardianship; and, spite of my prayers to remain, and Mrs. Tetty's tears, expostulations, and It was a happy life I led! I had tame rabbits, pet upbraidings, she was ordered to pack up my little wardneglected to provide comfortably for the journey, which, clasped my arms round Mrs. Herman's neck, and shed she was told, would be a long one.

kind creature wept over me, and kissed me, and folded set off again to our village to bring back with him my me in her arms,—looking in my face with the most pas- kind and early friend. early morning I awoke; all was still in the house except gan to give me infinite pleasure. I thought I knew the the crickets, which I heard chirping on the kitchen hearth dress Mrs. Tetty would arrive in—the handsome chintz—but no Mrs. Tetty was in bed! I started up half terrigown and lawn apron, the scarlet cloak, and the black the moon, the kind creature sitting, her face covered with scribed her over and over again to my new friend,she could no longer restrain. She had been busy all the what he would assuredly say at our first meeting. But I night making preparations for my journey; and now, was wrong; my father found her ill in bed-ill, as the while some little dainty was baking for me in the oven, doctor avowed, from excessive grief; and though she rose had stolen up, to be near me while I was yet under the up, as soon as she heard the glad tidings, declaring she was same roof. The rest of the night I did not sleep, but, at capable of undertaking the journey that very day, it was my earnest request, was carried down to the warm kitch too much for her; and I had to receive her a feeble invalid.

In the morning my father seemed softened towards my against their kindness. poor friend. He allowed our tediously long parting without reproof, and even wept himself to witness the vehement sorrow of the poor old woman, to whom, in truth, intrusted the care of my person and clothes, to which she both he and I owed so much.

under the care of a widow lady of the name of Herman, her, made her a rich woman. an early friend of my father's, and who, having lost several But the soul of a child so used to affection as I had been, erto she had but dimly felt. could not long remain insensible to kindness; it instincas the opening flower can the sunshine.

Mrs. Herman and myself, in a few days, were therestill be my attendant, though under her own inspection .knowing. I was so overpowered by this goodness, that I grossing interest to her; and in all she found something tears of joy and gratitude which prevented the utterance I will not attempt to tell my young readers what a me- of words. My father was a man of the most generous imlancholy going to bed mine was that night-how the dear, pulses; he soon consented, and the next day I saw him sionate love, and then hiding hers in her apron to conceal Mrs. Tetty was endeared to me still more by this sepaher grief. I laid myself down upon the bed where we ration; and, having become a little sensible of my own had so often lain together; and, burying my face in the ignorance, I was filled with the happy scheme of impart-pillow cried myself into an uneasy sleep. In the very ing to her information and sentiments which already befied, and, drawing the curtain aside, saw, by the light of mode bonnet, trimmed with old-fashioned lace. I deboth her hands, and presently after heard the sobs which how happy she looked, how cheerfully she spoke, and en-hearth, where, dressed with the most solemn care, All the household were affected by her arrival, and the and wrapped in her best scarlet cloak, we sat down to most unwearied kindness and attention were bestowed pass the time together, with protestations of affection and upon her. These things all touched the feeling heart of with many tears, till the early hour which was fixed for Mrs. Tetty; and she, who, like me, had entered the house with prejudice against its inmates, could not be proof

My father did not stay with us long enough to witness her recovery and establishment in the family. To her was had so long carefully attended. She had a little room of Our journey was a long one; and, finally, I was placed her own; and the allowance which was still continued to

Now began, indeed, the golden days of my life. young children of her own, the excellent management of Bible, which had hitherto been a sealed book to us both, whom had excited my father's admiration, was willing to lay open before us; and the joy of my life was to sit at receive me in the place of a little daughter. I am asham-dear Mrs. Tetty's knee, and read to her the simple, beaued to confess that I was so wretched in parting from dear tiful, and effecting narratives it contains. In her mind Mrs. Tetty, that I closed my heart against any one who there was nothing to counteract the influence of good; might be chosen to supply her place, wickedly determin-ing not to love her, nor even make myself amiable to her. and with the knowledge sentiments awoke which hith-

It was wonderful that, with a heart so capable of retively feels it in the tone of the voice and the expression ceiving Divine knowledge, she had lived so long in ignoof the countenance, and can as little resist its influence rance of its facts. I recollected afterwards that my father, while deploring my neglected state, had said he had seen little children younger than myself, sprung of Pagan fore better friends than it had been my intention we ever parents, in the lonely islands where God had blessed the should become. She knew all the circumstances of my missionary labours, reading the Bible under their palmyoung life from my father, and, having won my confi-trees. Poor dear, Mrs. Tetty constantly reminded me of dence, soon penetrated my heart and soul, and, so doing, the old people in those islands, as my father had described found much that made her love and admire my poor hum-them, receiving, as a thirsty soil drinks in water, the ble friend. She encouraged me to talk about her, and on knowledge of God and the blessed means of our salvation, this subject I had never done. What was my surprise with a comprehension amazing to those who instructed when one day, after such a conversation, she observed to them, --- so far did it seem beyond the measured limits of my father, on entering the room, that she hoped he would their other faculties. With what amazement and delight allow Mrs. Tetty to take up her residence with us, and did we read the story of Joseph! his being torn from his doting father came home to her heart. The exploits of My father seemed amazed; but Mrs. Herman, with that David—the lives and deeds of Elisha and Elijah—the incandour which was her characteristic, without even object-tegrity and wonderful deliverance of the three faithful ing to my presence, pleaded so kindly for the poor woman, children from the burning fiery furnace, and of Daniel setting forth our many obligations to her, and ending from the lions' den—but, above all, the history of the by hoping we might be the means of instructing her on Shunamite woman and her little son, and of David and subjects she seemed so ignorant of, and yet so worthy of the lost child of his affections,-were full of the most ento which her own heart and its experience responded .-But if I first pointed out these extraordinarily interesting histories to the 'ear old creature, it was she who first awoke my mind to the beauty, the purity, the benevo-lence, and the heroism, of the character of our Saviour. What a pleasant life we now led! Mrs. Herman ever encouraged me to converse on these subjects, which to me were the most delightful and interesting we ever spoke upon; for she made religion so lovely to my heart by the cheerfulness of her conversation, and the brightness of her hopes, that I could not believe any one could shrink from

it as a gloomy subject.

Thus passed over several years. In the meantime I was learning a variety of things which it was necessary for me to know,—geography, and the natural history and manners of the inhabitants of the eastern countries, among the rest: these I found wonderfully to elucidate my knowledge of Scripture facts, and I aspired to teach Mrs. Tetty the same; but here, poor thing, she was as dull as a block, and seemed to comprehend nothing about them; her heart was not touched by them, and all Mrs. Tetty's knowledge must pass through her affections. I therefore left her to her Bible alone, while I read and studied various other books, and gained as much knowledge as to satisfy my friends, if not myself.

But why need I now pursue the subject? my kind young readers who have gone thus far with me, will be sure that the latter days of poor Mrs. Tetty were made as happy as possible—they were so indeed! She lived to a good old age; and then, full of love and peace, passed to that brighter world for which the knowledge of her latter years had so worthily prepared her.

From the Juvenile Perget-Me-Not, for 1836.

THE LITTLE TEACHER. BY MARY HOWITT.

CONSTANCE SPEAKS.

Now, brother Claude, Sit down on this seat, I pray; Sit down, this very minute, For you've learnt nothing to-day.

There's a good little brother! Now w'ell turn the book through, And I'll find some pretty pictures, And explain them all to you.

Now listen to every word I say-That's a dear little fellow; But don't you call green blue, And red, yellow.

Listen with both your ears, Claude, And look with both your eyes; Green, you know, is for the trees, And blue is for the skies.

And these butter cups are yellow, And this rose is red; It's no use talking at all If you dont remember what is said. And now, love, this is water, With a dog plunging through, And he frightens those two geese Till they don't know what to do.

And there's an old-fashioned lad Laughing as loud as he can; Like Tommy Merton in a cocked hat, And with a coat and waistcoat like a man.

And that fat woman in the yard Has been washing you may see; She is hanging out the clothes to dry, As busy as a bee.

"Marget!" shouts the magpie in the cage, And his chattering will not cease, So she never hears how the dog Is barking at the geese;

Or else she'd off with her pattens, And out in a famous hurry, To drive those lads up the road Away with a hurry-skurry!

Now, if you turn your eyes To the farm-yard over the way, You may see the cows ready for milking, And a wagon-load of hay.

If you want to know the farmer's name, It is "Jeremiah Stack;" I can read it on the wagon-side Painted in letters black.

And there stand the bec-hives under the wall, Four of them in a row; And look at that little bantam !-Can't you hear him crow?

But there's nobody about the house, Either behind or before: So now, Claude, we'll turn on And look for something more.

And next are tall cameleopards, See how stately they stand! Not in this country, you see, But in their own native land.

This is a peep into Africa; See what great trees are there! Palms as high as church-steeples, Towering up into the air.

I'm sure to be in such a country Would fill one with amaze; Only look at that cameleopard Stooping his long legs to graze!

And that other with his long neck, Just going to brouse, Half way up that huge tree, Upon its thick, leafy boughs!

And, I dare say, not far off,

There are elephants if one could see;

I should not wonder if a great bull elephant Were just behind that tree;

Lifting up his great trunk To reach something for himself, Or else resting his heavy tusks As if upon a shelf.

Yet big as these creatures are, They are so tractable and mild, That a great black elephant Has often been led by a child.

Now let us see what comes next:-Oh, here's a summer's day, And there are the country people All busy making hay.

What a very different scene Is this one from the other! A hay-field is a pleasant place, I can tell you, little brother.

I've been in a hay-field All day from morning till night; And, dear me! what things I saw That filled me with delight!

There I saw the nest of the field-mouse, So snug and so round! Full of pretty little young mice, In a hole in the ground.

And there I saw dragon-flies, Some purple and some gold; And flowers, like garden-flowers, As many as my hands would hold!

Then we had dinner-such a dinner! All of us, under a tree; You shall go to the hay-field, Claude, And what fun it will be!

Now, I declare, this very minute We'll go, for I heard say, That the people were haymaking Down in the meadows to-day.

From the Quarterly Review.

LOUIS PHILIPPE ET LA CONTRE REVOLUTION DE 1830. Par B. Sarrans, jeune. 2 tomes. Paris, 1834.

WE alluded to this work in our last Number as a formal bill of indictment preferred against Louis Philippe, for every species of political apostacy and of private ingratitude. We now resume a more particular consideration of the work-not with the view of entering into the guarantee to maintain the existing dynasty on the throne polemic details of the squabbles between the citizen-king and his quondam friends-with which our readers are, we believe, sufficiently acquainted, and may be, we fear, somewhat tired-but for the purpose of recording some anecdotical facts concerning the new dynasty. Though we are far from giving implicit credit to all M. Sarrans's assertions-and, though we reject the whole of his doctrines and most of his reasonings, it is impossible to deny that he has made out his case of ingratitude and apostacy against Louis Philippe: but he has made one great, and in every sense, radical mistake-he lays the whole blame of this change on the king, when in fact, the greater part of it belongs to the persons and principles which the king has been forced to repudiate.

Ad hominem M. Sarrans's argument is conclusive; -and the answers which the king and his friends have attempted are miserably weak, and must necessarily be so, because they have not yet had the courage to produce their real de-fence—by honestly confessing 'That they have abandoned the principles which they and M. Sarrans professed in 1830, because they have found, by cruel experience, that with such principles no government-no society could exist.' Upon this truth they have had the boldness and good sense to act but they have not yet the moral courage to grow it; and until they shall frankly make that admission, M. Sarrans and their other antagonists may urge with perfect justice the shameful inconsistency between their practice and their professions.

t the contract to the je

wi

the tri vie

did

Du

cati

first cou

de I that

but

tion

thou

Sarr

circu

that i even

Polig

de Pe

men,

of W intent

cil to

ture o

civilit

that se

sion fr

which

measu

the Or

refer to revivin

torical

peet M

really !

whethe letters,

rant of

in the b

necessar

the Char objects (VOL.

We

Before we proceed to the main object—the personal histopy of Louis Philippe—we think it right to notice one or two assertions made by M. Sarrans relative to England, which we can, from our own knowledge, pronounce to be either utter mistakes or gross misrepresentations; for instance, he says, that the elevation of the Duke of Orleans to the throne of France was the favourite project of Dumouriez even to his last hour. At the moment when Louis XVIII. meditated the invasion of Spain, the old general com-municated a project of this kind to Mr. Canning—then prime minister—who entertained it, and opened a nego-ciation to that purport, but it was interrupted within three weeks, by the death of Dumouriez.'—p. 106.

We do not insist on the misstatement (though of some importance) of Mr. Canning's being at that time (1823) prime minister, nor on the absurdity of supposing that a negociation for such great and prospective objects could be defeated by the death of the poor old Dumouriez, at the age of eighty-four and in the retirement of an English village. We knew General Dumouriez personally during the latter years of his life, and we can say, that we never heard him express any thing like the sentiments imputed to him; and, indeed, long before the war with Spain was or could have been even meditated, the poor old man was totally incapable of originating or conducting either intrigue or negociation. But, we further know, and can now, without any breach of confidence, assert, that no such proposition ever reached the British government from any quarter, and that, consequently, no negociation was, or could have been opened on the subject. If our readers will take the superfluous trouble of referring to the Parliamentary Debates, they will find that Mr. Canning was, at the time, the object of an exactly opposite and contradictory charge, namely, of having in his speeches on those Spanish affairs represented England as bound by express of France. This was as little true as is M. Sarrans's contrary statement; but when Mr. Canning's language could have given rise to such a misunderstanding, it is clear that he could not have volunteered an intrigue for the overthrow of that dynasty, towards which he was supposed to be too favourable.

On another point M. Sarrans is equally misinformedhe says,-

And to this he adds the following note:

'To account for Lord Wellington's direct intervention in a matter which was rather in the department of the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, it is necessary to know that some weeks before the appearance of the Ordonnances, M. de Polignac had sent over a secret agent to his Grace, to communicate confidentially his intended measure, and to assure him that the expedition to Algiers had no other object than to produce a military success, which might re-act favourably on the pro-jected coup d'état.'-p. 87.

We can take upon ourselves to assert, that every statement and inference in this note is absolutely false, and without even a colourable pretence,

All the world knows, because it has been published in the journals and in the parliamentary debates of both countries, (our readers will find it stated in the Quarterly Review for July, 1833, vol. xlix. p. 524,) that the Wellington cabinet, immediately on the accession of Louis Philippe, did require and obtain a categorical answer on the subject of Algiers-but the special and direct interference of the Duke himself on that occasion, and the previous communication with M. de Polignac respecting the ORDONNANCES, are absolute falsehoods. Our readers well know that, on the de Polignac by their respective enemics-and especially by that pattern of accuracy and candour, Lord Broughambut the trial of the ex-ministry in Paris, and the declaration of the Duke of Wellington in England, had, we made at coronations with the modern Order of the Bath. He thought, dissipated that calumny for ever; however, as M. enumerates baronets centuries before the title was invented Sarrans has thought proper to repeat it with such special circumstances, we take upon ourselves to assert, not only the privy council, confer the peerage! that there was no such agent, but that there was not any even the slightest—written or veroat communication by any it seems according to M. Sarrans's new Art as very Polignac's design made to the British government, or to any it seems according to M. Sarrans's new Art as very Polignac's design made to the British government, or to any it seems according to M. Sarrans's new Art as very Polignac's design made to the British government, or to any it seems according to M. Sarrans's new Art as very Polignac's design made to the British government, or to any it seems according to M. Sarrans's new Art as very Polignac's design made to the British government, or to any it seems according to M. Sarrans's new Art as very Polignac's design made to the British government, or to any it seems according to M. Sarrans's new Art as very Polignac's design made to the British government, or to any it seems according to M. Sarrans's new Art as very Polignac's design made to the British government, or to any it seems according to M. Sarrans's new Art as very Polignac's design made to the British government, or to any it seems according to M. Sarrans's new Art as very Polignac's design made to the British government, or to any it seems according to M. Sarrans's new Art as very Polignac's design made to the British government, or to any its seems according to M. Sarrans's new Art as very Polignac's design made to the British government, or to any the polignac's design made to the British government as very polignac's design made to the British government according to the polignac's design made to the British government as very polignac's design made to the British government according to the polignac's design made to the British government according to the British governm men, by the appearance of any intercourse with the Duke serious and such ridiculous ignorance about one part of of Wellington, that when he left England with the secret this subject, we naturally feel some suspicion as to his trust. intention of accepting the place of President of the Council to Charles X., he did not even communicate his departure or its motives to the Duke, and even evaded the ordinary civility of a parting visit; and we further finally assertthat so far, so blameably far-was this system of retrocession from English counsels carried, that the first intimation which the British cabinet had of any unusual design or measure was by the same Moniteur which had announced he advocates-and whose statements he records. It is not the Ordonnances to the people of Paris.

We did not expect to have ever again had occasion to lon Barrot, all of whom appear to have contributed to this, refer to this topic; but when we find M. Sarrans gravely even more directly than to his former work; these volumes reviving such fables, we think it right, for the sake of his-contain a letter from each of these persons, which, so far torical truth, to repeat the contradiction. We do not sus- as they are concerned, accredit the book; and in truth all pect M. Sarrans of intentional micrepresentation; but it is the facts of the book relate to them, or rather to Louis really surprising how ignorant of us and all our affairs, Philippe in his intercourse with them. M. Sarrans has whether recent or remote, the French, even their men of also been at the pains to hunt up some old publications, letters, are; and not merely uninformed, but utterly igno- and he has been furnished with some original documents, rant of matters, which they, nevertheless, venture to discuss and from all these sources has collected a mass of anecdotes in the boldest style. For instance, M. Sarrans, thinking it relative to the personal and political life of the King of the the Chamber of Peers in France with our House of Lords, though the commentaries of M. Sarrans are deeply tinethe Chamber of Peers in France with our House of Lords, though the commentaries of M. Sarrans are deeply tinethicks to the former as exclusively found, while, he says, bured with party prejudice and personal animosity. These objects to the former as exclusively feudal, while, he says, tured with party prejudice and personal animosity.

VOL. XXVIII. JANUARY, 1836 .- 3.

'A few days after the revolution of July, Lord Stuart the annals of England prove that her peerage was largely de Rothsay, the English ambassador, received from increased by persons connected with trade, at a time when, Lord Wellington orders to require from the new government of France a categorical answer as to its instances (most of which happen to be no instances at all) stances (most of which happen to be no instances at all) from 'Camden's excellent work on British Commerce,'-Camden never having written any such work-and then to make all sure he subjoins-

> The following is a chronological list of the merchants who have been ennobled by the crown since the close of the sixteenth century.

> 1464-Sir John Gillott, merchant and mayor of York, knight of the order of the Bath.

> 1465-Sir Ralph Josline, merchant-draper, knight of the Bath and baronet.

> 1471-Henry Weaver, sheriff of London, knight of the Bath and baronet.

> '1487-Sir William Horne, trading in salt-meat, a baronet.

1490-John Perceval, merchant-taylor, baronet. 1513-Sir Thomas More, sheriff of London, afterwards Lord Chancellor and privy councillor to Henry VIII.

'1583-Sir John Allen, merchant, privy councillor to Henry VII.

'1628-Sir William Acton, knight of the Bath and

'1536-Sir Thomas Adams, knight of the Bath and baronet.'-vol. ii. p. 244.

Could it have been believed that any man-much less a first burst of the events of July, some such community of literary man-a publiciste by profession-volunteering to councils was imputed to the Duke of Wellington and M. discuss a matter of history and legislation, could have, by any ingenuity of ignorance, contrived to accumulate such a mass of blunders? Not one of his examples is a case of peerage! He confounds the occasional knights of the Bath -and even imagines that knighthood, the baronetcy, and We wonder that of such peerages-instead of a list of nine, he did not enumerate even the slightest-written or verbal communication of M. de nine hundred since the close of the sixteenth century, which, serious and such ridiculous ignorance about one part of worthiness in others; and although we may presume that he knows a little more of France than he does of England, we confess, that if we had not some other evidence than his own for most of his statements, we should not have paid them much attention. But the truth is, that Sarrane derives all his importance from his connexion with Lafavette and his party,-whose views he developes-whose cause Sarrans we trust, but Lafayette, Lafitte, Dupont, and Odilwe shall endeavour to put aside, and to exhibit to our same reason that they now quote it—namely, because they readers the real character of Louis Philippe, which, like think it does no credit to him—so long their idel, and most other real characters, will be found to be a mixture now their bete noire. We, on the contrary, think that, on of good and bad—of something to be approved—something to be consured—and a good deal to be pitied, as the serve it for the sake of justice and truth. The facts may weakness of human nature-and much to be forgiven, as be of little historical value; many of the details are insigarising from the irresistible force of circumstances.

Duke de Chartres in 1790 and 1791, and which, having most eventful age. been lost or forgotten when he emigrated, was soon after Mademoiselle d'Orleans, became charged with the super- foot-notes. intendence of the education of M. de Chartres and his two

' How often'-says Madame de Genlis, in allusion to the trials and privations to which the young prince was exposed after his escape from France- How often, since his misfortunes, have I applauded myself for the education I had given him-for having taught him the principal modern languages—for having accustomed him to wait on himself—to despise all kinds of effeminacy-(mollesse)-to sleep habitually on a wooden bed, with no covering but a mat—to expose himself to heat, cold, and rain—to accustom himself to fatigue by daily having given him the taste and habit of travelling. He had lost all that he had inherited from birth and for-He tune-nothing remained but what he had received from nature and me !'-Mém. de Genlis, iv. 203.

One of the modes by which Madame de Genlis endeaenough, but the Jacobin turned king is still more so.

own purpose—he quotes nothing that can do the king into the successive depths of democracy were chiefly credit, and once or twice, by an omission, makes the pasnificant and puerile, as may be well expected, when we M. Sarrans sets out by showing that his Majesty began remind our readers that the author was only seventeen life as a Jacobin-his first political declaration was in the when the journal was kept; but it affords many interesting strong and homely designation of himself as 'Louis Phi- traits of personal character, and must be, at all events, culippe Egalité, by misfortune a French prince, but by choice rioua, as the first chapter, written by his own hands, of the a Jacobin to his fingers' ends.' This general thesis M. life of a man, who, whatever be his ultimate destiny, bas Sarrans elucidates by extracts from a journal kept by the already secured a prominent place in the history of this

We must introduce this journal by a few preliminary published in Paris. Our readers are aware that the cele-explanations, and we shall occasionally intersperse observabrated Madame de Genlis, in addition to the education of tions on some prominent passages, and subjoin a few to a state of site gob n pwit

st

te

to

th le

80

Me

fan

my

me

and rec

3.881

cre

bly-

The journal begins with the entrance of the young brothers, under the masculine title of governor; and cer. Duke de Chartres into the Jacobin Club-an event of containly as regarded mere education, she justified the singu- siderable importance in a public view, as marking his falar confidence which was placed in her: never had any ther's adhesion to the principles of that society, and which experiment a severer trial, or, we will add, a more suc-cessful result. The early education of Louis Philippe, as Jacobins, we find, were so much pleased at seeing the experience has shown, not only fitted him for the respecta. Duke de Chartres amongst them, that they presented him ble and honourable maintenance of the station to which he a formal address, of which the first sentence is curious:was born, but afforded him support and consolation in 'Sir, we congratulate curselves! Should we not also condeep and unexpected adversity; and now, in an equally gratulate you? You have been our prince-you are now unexpected elevation, enables him to fulfil with vigour and our colleague, &c. Signed 'Manuel, president; Lepage, intelligence the most difficult and the most awful duties. that which was a matter of congratulation to the Jacobins, was a source of deep affliction to his amiable and excellent mother, and became the immediate cause of an open rupture between her and Madame de Genlis-by whose counsels that princess believed that her son had taken this unhappy and degrading step. Madame de Genlis, in her Memoirs, attributes it solely to the Duke of Orleans himself; but it is, we think, clear that she must share the re-sponsibility. We have the young duke's evidence, that his father only approved his own proposition; and we shall and violent exercise, and by walking ten or fifteen see, as we proceed, that this too-docile and over-affectionate miles with leaden soles to his shoes—and, finally, for pupil would never have thought of making such a proposition without Madame de Genlis's previous concurrence;her husband, M. de Sillery, proposed him—her personal friends, and the attendants whom she had placed about him, all became members also. When, in a year or two after, she, with her niece and Pamela, accompanied Madevoured to teach her royal pupils to examine and regulate moiselle d'Orleans to England, they designated themselves their own mind and conduct was the keeping a journal; 'les quatre émigrées Jacobines.' (Correspondance de d'Orand it is to a portion of a journal so kept—extending from léans, ii. 90.) In short, it is clear that she countenanced, the autumn of 1790 to the summer of 1791—that M. and probably advised her pupil's entry into the Jacobin Sarrans refers. This journal certainly affords some very Club-which, however, as she justly observes, had not, at piquant contrasts—the prince turned Jacobin is striking this period, attained its subsequent ferocity and infamy. There is another circumstance in this affair, which corro-M. Sarrans, of course, quotes no more than serves his borates the opinion that the plunges of the Duke of Orleans sage look worse than it really is. We happen to possess came Jacobin at the moment of that violent excitement a copy of this little work, and as it is rare, and has never, which followed the duel of Messrs. de Castries and Lawe believe, been translated, we think our readers will not meth; but the father himself did not become a member of be sorry to possess it in extenso-particularly as, amidst the club till the commotion occasioned by the flight of the the deluge of French memoirs with which we have been king, when, not without some demur, he was admitted. lately inundated, this curious little piece has been care- (Journal des Jacobins, 23d June, 1790.) Again-it was fully suppressed. Nay, in the laboured apologetical life of amidst the massacre of the 10th of August that he soli-Louis Philippe in that liberal, but most filmsy and false cited the change of his name to Egalité. We say moral publication, the Biographic des Contemporains, it is not cowardice, for he showed more than once, and particularly even alluded to. The fact is, that the Liberals have at his last hour, personal firmness.

hitherto endeavoured to hush up this publication, for the 6th of November, 1793, he was brought before the revolutionary tribunal, and, after a mock trial, condemned to tend to-morrow death, on a series of charges, of all of which he was noto-riously guiltless. He treated the dreadful mockery with contempt, and begged, as an only favour, that the sentence might be executed without delay: the bloody indulgence was granted, and he was led, at four o'clock, when the daylight was almost failing, from the court to the scaffold.

'I confess,' says the editor of the Correspondance d' Orleans, 'I had the barbarous curiosity to see him go to execution; I took my station opposite his palace, that I might observe the effect which, at his last moments, these scenes of former splendour and enjoyment might have on him. The crowd was immense, and aggravated, by its reproaches and insults, the agony of the sufferer. The tatal cart advanced at so slow a pace. that it seemed as if they were endeavouring to prolong his torments. There were many other victims in the same cart; they were all bent double, pale, and stupified by horror: Orleans alone-a striking contraststood upright, his head elevated, his countenace full of away from it. its natural colour, with all the firmness of innocence. building with the tranquil air of a master, who should be examining whether it required any additional orna-This air was, no doubt, studied and ment or repair. put on-I, as well as every body else, could see that it was; it was even said that he had prepared himself for it by wine; but, with all that, I was astonished-I am still astonished to think how such a man as d'Orléans could, by any means, have subdued his natural characcourage and tranquillity.

We return from this digression to observe, that as to the rupture between the Dutchess of Orleans and Madame de Genlis, the latter, in her Memoirs, does tardy and rather reluctant, but yet complete, justice to the former.

'The cause,' says she, 'of the Dutchess's coldness towards me was evidently a difference of opinion on the politics of the day; and I am now ready to acknowvisions-her judgment, alas! was better than mine. Mem de Gen , iv. 81.

With these preliminary observations on the state of the family, which will tend to explain some things that might be otherwise obscure, we proceed to the Journal itself.

JOURNAL OF LOUIS PHILIPPE, DURE DE CHARTRES.

'22d Oct. 1790 .- I dined at Mousseaux"-next day my father having approved my anxious wishes to become a member of the Jacobin club, M. de Sillery proposed me on Friday.

'2d Nov.—I was yesterday admitted to the Jacobins, and much applauded—I returned thanks for the kind reception that they were so good as to give me, and I assured them that I should never deviate from the sacred duties of a good patriot and a good citizen.

'3d Nov .- I was this morning at the National Assembly—in the evening at the Jacobins, where I was put on the Committee of Presentations, that is on the com-mittee appointed to examine candidates. This com-

*A villa of the Duke of Orleans, so close to Paris, on the north-west, as to be within the walls.

of an eye-witness the account of his last hours. On the mittee meets every Thursday. I requested one of my 6th of November, 1793, he was brought before the revolu- colleagues to express my regret at not being able to at-

'Chitcau Neuf." 7th Nov .- Attended mass; they did not offer us incense, my grandfather insisting on exact obedience to the decrees of the National Assembly. If they had attempted to offer me the incense, I had made up my mind not to allow it. Messrs. de Gilbert, father and son, dined here to-day; the son is seventeen and a half, and very steady,—very civil and very amiable; although his father and all his family are aristocrats, he is nevertheless a great patriot, which has won my heart. . . . So my trip to Château Neuf is over. We shall set off to-night at eleven. Although I have been very happy to pass this time with my mother and my grandmother, I have felt great pain in separating myself from those with whom I have lived so long, and particularly my Friend [Madame de Genlis], whom I shall always consider as a second mother-and my brother [the Duke de Monipensier] from whom I had never been separated before. I felt deeply, in the course of this little journey, how dear everything at Bellechasse is to me, and how painful it would be to me to be long

By a refinement of cruelty, the cart was stopped at the gate of his palace; I saw him run his eyes over the throughout the Journal designated emphatically as my friend (mon amie). She resided in a convent in the Faubourg St. Germain, called Bellechasse, where the Duke of Orleans had erected a pavilion for the residence of her and his daughter Mademoiselle Adelaide-thither the young men used to come every day to receive the instruction of their Governor. We may as well take this opportunity of observing, once for alk that the romantic attachment of ter, and worked himself up to such an appearance of Louis Philippe for Madame do Genlis, and the passionate expressions of fondness which, as we shall see by and by, he employs, might create a surmise that he felt for her more than filial affection, but there is no real ground for any such suspicion; the fact is notoriously otherwise, as might be proved, if it were necessary, by some very naïves confessions in the course of the Journal. We here see, and shall see more fully hereafter, that the young duke laments, as so much time lost, his occasional visits to his mother, who-notwithstanding his visible indifference for ledge that her fears which, at the time, appeared to me her and his enthusiasm for his friend—continued to treat so exaggerated, and even so unjust, were but two well him with all the affection and attention that she was allowher and his enthusiasm for his friend-continued to treat founded. She did not permit her imagination to lead ed to show him. In reading, however, his extravagant her astray;—she did not abandon herself to romantic expressions concerning his friend, it must be recollected that the Journal was intended for her future inspection, and that the youth would naturally write in a way that would be most agreeable to her. This will account, in some degree, for the excessive fondness he professes for her, and will also explain the choice of topics, &c.; but, after all, there is no doubt that he felt for her the warmest gratitude and affection.

> '7th Nov .- I forgot to say, that however happy I should have been to return with my mother, I opposed her coming back with me, as she seemed rather un-well. I should have come in the cabriolet with Gardanne; but she preferred travelling all night to return with me,-besides, she can sleep in a carriage

> ' Paris, 9th Nov .- We left Chateau Neuf at eleven at night, and arrived at Bellechasse at ten next day. I got on horseback at Angerville, nine leagues off; it was still

> * A country seat of his grandfather, the Duke de Penthievere.

> t Under the old church regime, incense was presented to persons of higherank—a kind of feudal honour which was abolished in the general abolition of all feudal dark, and I rode to Parls. In the evening I attended the Jacobins. We learn from a subsequent entry, 26th the Jacobins. They appointed me Censor (they do the duty of ushers). As the hall is much too small to condenue to the denunciation—but had it been ever so just, it was not the tain the 'Friends of the Constitution,'—[the formal title of the Club, which derived its popular name from meeting at the convent of the Jacobins,]—whose numbers increase daily, a committee was named to look out for another said, that I had had the honour of being place. They were discussing the king's household troops. M. Mathieu de Miranbal (a young man) spoke particularly well. I learned that I had been named one of a deputation to convey to the National Assembly the proposition relative to the Tennis Court.

'10th Nov .- Yesterday my father sent for me, re ceived me most kindly, and gave me fifty louis, of which I gave my brother ten. My father desired me to call on Madame de Lamballe—I went directly; and from her to the Assembly, and from that, with my father's approbation, to dine with M. Bonne-Carrère, who had been spokesman of the deputation to the Assembly. He had invited the whole deputation and several mem-bers of the Assembly. The dinner was very gay, very patriotic, and very decent.

'11th Nov.—At the sifting of the Assembly M. Biau gat moved that the committees of the constitution and of military affairs should unite to prepare a decree on the composition of the king's guard of honour. M. de Beauharnois proposed that the king should never com-mand the troops in person. M. Malouet opposed both these motions. Alexander Lameth complained that these motions. Alexander Lameth complained that the friends of liberty were always represented as the tends of liberty were always represented as the tends of the king. On this the Blacks [royalists] cried "Yes, yes, and 'tis true," and the Câté Gauche "No, no—the true friends of the king are those who have destroyed the ci-devant clergy and the parliaments—his who was destroyed the vi-devant clergy and the parliaments—tyrannies under which we had so long groaned." The Câté Gauche and the galleries applauded violently. I joined in the applause. M. do Cassigny Juigné, dejoined in the applause. M. do Cassigny Juigné, dejoined in the applause. M. do Cassigny Juigné, dejoined in the applause. The president that I should be turned out for having dared to applaud. The President shrugged that the shoulders—I continued my applause, and then ple cry, which sounds so sweet in patriot ears—"God I had well seen and distinguished them. Thence I or four of these latter would have applicated some convents to my committee at the Jacobins, where I announced [denounced?] to the committee that a person lately admitted by the committee, and now standing for election friend his card of admission—he was suspended, active to the committee, and now standing for election friend his card of admission—he was suspended, active to the committee and now standing for election friend his card of admission—he was suspended, active to the committee and now standing for election friend his card of admission—he was suspended, active to the committee and now standing for election friend his card of admission—he was suspended, active to the committee and now standing for election friend his card of admission—he was suspended, active to the committee and now standing for election friend his card of admission—he was suspended, active to the committee and now standing for election friend his card of admission—he was suspended, active to the committee and now standing for election friend his card of admission—he was suspended. by the society (M. Meeke), was concerned in an aris-tocratic paper called La Gazette Générale. He was in excluding members who shall lend their cards, but M. consequence adjourned sine die.

We are afraid that this passage is one of the least creditable to the writer that the Journal contains. M. Meeke seems to have been a person attached to his education. Madame de Genlis, when inculcating on him his duty towards his attendants, says,- You should confer on Messrs. Myris and Meeke - if he should remain with youand your other masters and attendants, any favour in your power.'-(Mém de Genlis, vol. iii. p. 284.) M. Myris was his drawing master, who continued attached to him, and for his conduct at Jernappes was made a chef de brigade-of him we shall hear more hereafter; but poor M. Meeke, as Madame de Genlis suspected, seems to have quitted him probably on account of politics-and the 'favour' which, in pursuance of Madame de Genlis's considerate advice, he seems to have conferred on him, was a denunciation to 16th Nov .- At the Jacobins-I rose to speak, and said, that I had had the honour of being admitted last year (though under age) into the Philanthropic Society. This society was in the habit of distributing 100,000 (400t.) per annum, but this year the funds had fallen off by one-half, because several very affluent persons had retired under pretence that the Revolution prevents their contributing four louis a year. In this they have two objects—the first to discredit the Revolution for having destroyed so good an institution; and, secondly, to make it enemies of all the poor whose pensions should be thus stopped, by saying, "It is the Revolu-tion deprives you of your bread." I said I thought that it was worthy of the club to support the Philanthropic Society, and I invited all who could afford four louis a year to belong to it, and those who could not, to contribute what they could afford. I was much applauded, and, on the motion of M. Faydel, a subscription which had been raised a month ago, for a poor man who had refused it, was transferred to the Philanthropic Society.

'17th Nov .- I was yesterday at the National Assembly-the question was about Avignon. I had forgotten up his shoulders—I continued my applause, and then ple cry, which sounds so sweet in patriot ears—"God took up my opera glass to see who were the two memsave the nation, the law, and the king," and Vice is bers who had noticed me. There was a cry of "Down liberté. It was clear from all that passed that the pawith the opera-glass?" but I did not take it down till triots had a great majority over the aristocrats; three I had well seen and distinguished them. Thence I or four of these latter would have applauded some con-

Pujot had not read it. I solicited the indulgence of the velle, who was to read an address at the bar, and requested me to stop to hear it—the address seemed to me fine, but rather long. I wish he had said some-thing of religion. This morning, at seven o'clock, I attended at the hospital of the Hotel Dieu, to see the patients dressed and to learn to dress. I returned at a quarter past eight. I dined at the Palais Royal with my father.

* M. Sarrans has rather uncandidly suppressed all the rest of this article. It is evident that he wishes to leave an impression as if Louis Phillippe had applauded free and without a king; but as he expressly states that neither he nor his company did so, Sarrans is

th m at fre he al

f It does not appear what this address was-probably about the civil constitution of the clergy, which was at that time under discussion.

guilty of a misrepresentation.

^{*} A bombastic address from the Jacobins to the National Assembly, for a due commemoration of the celebrated oath in the Tennis Court, at Versailles.—See Moniteur, 9th Nov. 1790.

'24th Nov.—Another delightful day at Bellechasse. Here we see the Duke does not lament the days spent This morning we attended at the Hotel Dieu; I visited at the Jacobins, nor the dinners at the Palais Royal, or and bled some patients.

We find in the French papers, that Louis Philippe has had recent occasion to exercise this very useful but unusual accomplishment of being able to bleed. When he was lately travelling in Normandy, one of his postillions had a very severe fall, and was senseless. The king, to the great astonishment of his attendants and the spectators, jumped from the carriage, pulled out a lancet, and bled the poor fellow with skill and success. This was one of Madame de Genlis's practical items of education,

'25th Nov .- After dinner to the Jacobins-I was the first who arrived. They gave me some letters from the country to abstract—for, except the letters be very interesting, they only read abstracts. One of the abteresting, they only read abstracts. One of the abstracts (not one of mine) was in these-terms: "A letter from the society at Foix inclosed a copy of an address to the king, and states a fact against M. Lambert, the comptroller-general." The address itself was now called for, and found to be in the form of the old regime—"your kingdom—your faithful subjects, who would shed their blood for your sacred person." This was received with murmurs, in which I took no part. A member of the National Assembly for Foix endeavored to justify. the National Assembly for Foix endeavored to justify M. Lambert, and said that we should excuse the oldfashioned style of his countrymen, who were so remote, that public spirit had not yet made its way amongst them, but that they loved and blessed the constitution. On my proposition, supported by some other members, the club passed to the order of the day. I got to Bellechasse at a few minutes past eight.

'26th Nov .- I went this morning to the Hôtel Dieuthe next time I shall dress the patients myself. Yesterday I was to have dined at Villoni's, No. 17, Place des Victoires, at nine livres a head; Messrs. Barnave, Eameth, Noailles, Mirabeau, Sillery, &c. who were to have been of the party, did not go, because M. Brissot, who had so grossly calumniated M. Barnave, and callwho had so grossly calumniated M. Barnave, and called him "a tool of tyranny," was to be there. Instead, therefore, of that, I went to dine at Mousseaux, where were Madame de Buffon, an danother lady, and Messieurs Valkiers, St. Fare, Belsunce, d'Henencourt, and Sheldon. After dinner they began to play cards, on which I went away to the Jacobins—I called the attention of the club to the latter which M. Macka fix and tion of the club to the letter which M. Meeke [see ante, 11th Nor.] had published in "Carra and Mercier's Journal." I was asked if I answered for the truth of his I was asked if I answered for the truth of his statements; I said no. I returned to Bellechasse at three-quarters after eight.

'27th Nov —I was last night at the Assembly—there was an enormous crowd. M. Voidel made a speech on the obstacles which the bishops, the chapters, and some of the parochial clergy throw in the way of the execution of the decrees on the civil constitution of the clergy, by their protests and declarations. He stated amongst others the conduct of a parish priest near Peronne, who, not satisfied with exciting the people to refuse the payment of taxes, excited them to massacre the tax-gatherers. I had taken notes of the whole discussion to write it out here, but, as I am three days in arrear, it is impossible.

· 1st Dec. 1790.—I dined yesterday with my grandfa-ther [the Duke de Penthievre] at the Hotel de Toulouse; my mother dined there too; I returned to Bellechasse my mother than the transfer of the art a quarter past four. Though I am delighted at dining frequently with my mother, yet all does not go as I had hoped. I had hoped to be able to continue my studies almost without interruption, but I was mistaken, and I was mistaken, and of the am sincerely grieved at it: of the seven days of the week, I can give but three to my beloved Bellechasse this distresses me very much.

the Place Vendôme, but is greatly distressed at the loss of two hours in dining with his mother.

2d Dec .- I went yesterday morning to the Hotel Dieu-I dressed two patients, and gave one six and the other three livres. Dined at Bellechasse, and went early to the Jacobins; we had to elect a president and secretary. I voted for MM, de Mirabeau and Beauharnais, who had the majority of votes. M. Barnave spoke exceedingly well on the club which calls itself the representatives of the National Guards of France-M. de Lafayette had granted them the right of sending two of their members every day to attend the king-they solicited the same indulgence at the National Assembly. M. Barnave showed how impolitic it would be to allow the National Guard to become a body apart, and that the soldiers should not be separated from the citizens, &c.

I was named Censor.

3d Dec.—I dined yesterday at the Palais Royal, and afterwards attended the committee of presentations at the Jacobins. 'I endorsed the proposals of M. Lecoupthe Jacobins. I endorsed the proposals of M. Lecoup-pey, Conad, and Alyon. I also endorsed those of Messrs. Henezet and Issonrah. I had inquired about the first, and the result was favorable to him. The se-cond was recommended to me by M. Myris, who an-swers for his patriotism. M. Bonne-Carrère read from a committee the project of a regulation for the proceedings of the club. One article was, that no one should be admitted under the age of twenty-one, except under particular circumstances. I proposed eighteen-saying, that at eighteen one was quite equal to understand our discussions-that the club, having no legal character, should be looked upon as a school, where young men should learn betimes to overcome their natural timidity, and fit themselves for one day defending the sacred rights of the nation from the tribune of the Nasacred rights of the hands from the tribune of the National Assembly. My reasons were not convincing, and my amendment was rejected. I then said that I had had a kind of personal interest in the amendment, because my brother—[M. de Montpensier was now but fifteen - desired ardently to enter the club, and that this rule would postpone him for a long time. M. Collot d'Herbois told me that it should not affect him—that when one had received an education like ours, he fell into the provided case of exception.† I returned to Bellechasse at three-quarters past eight. This morning I have been to the Hotel Dieu and dressed patients. 6th Dec.—I dined to-day at the Palais Royal with my brother and sister.‡ After dinner M. de Cubières showed some experiments in optics; during this time I went out with Edward, and went to the house of one Bailly, a Bookseller. I told him and his wife that I greatly protected Topin, that I could answer for his good conduct and good principles; that he had been for six years in love with their daughter, and that I hoped they To which there being no would consent to the match.

"'To teach my pupils Greek, I have attached to their establishment of education M. Lecouppey, an ex-cellent Grecian.'—Mem. de Gen. iii. 324. M. Conad appears to have been his medical attendant.

M. de Montpensier was soon after admitted, for we find him on the 21st of June proposing the admission of his father.

Mademoiselle Adelaide, who is supposed to be the wife by secret, but not illegitimate nuptials of General Athelin, her brother's first aide-de-camp. few days we learn this lady has taken the title of Ma. dame, to the great scandal of the Liberals, who look on it as a symptom of feudality.

§ This Edward seems to be the same person mentioned afterwards as Topin, who appears to have had some office about the Duke de Chartres.

self in], and got back at the end of a quarter of an hour little Bellechasse. We had the same deputies to M. de Cubiere's optics. We returned to Bellechasse usual, Messrs. Voidel, Sillery, Barrère, and Volney. at six o'clock; we found there Messrs. Voidel and Volwent afterwards to the Hotel Dieu. ney, who remained till nine; 'tis impossible to be more agreeable. This morning I have been to the Hotel-had decreed the day before that the ci-devant princes Dien, and dressed.

These days will profit me, and they do me a good that amongst their sons to the exclusion of daughters.

where were Mesdames De Lacharce and St. Simon, any company there. I am glad that it was on the occaand Messrs. De Lacharce, De Menou (the gambler), De sion of a wedding. It was n honour of Popin's mar-Tiars, De Resching, &c. All the talk was about play, riage. God send that it may be a good omen for me, mixed with some pleasantries disgustingly aristoczatifor I long very impatiently for my own wedding.

24th Dec.—I was last night at the committee of went away. All these gamblers came to dinner by mispresentations. M. Carra said that it was reported that take; they were to have dined here on Sunday and they were going to blow us [the Jacobins] up by gunplayed at hazard. That was the account given by my powder in the cellar. I said "that it was absurd—mother, of whom I could not help asking the reason of they dared not." But others insisted that the cellars

The reader has just seen the good nature with which the Prince contributed to young Topin's marriage, and we find that Madame de Genlis placed Madame Topin about governness, she wrote to the princess-'I flatter myself eight o'clock. shower of gumblers.' Now, mark; -when, in consequence of Dumouriez's defection, the Duke de Chartres, Mademoiseille Adelaide and Madame de Genlis were forced to emigrate—this same 'estimable and friendly,' Madame Topin hastened voluntarily to that execrable inquisition the Commune of Paris, and denounced the emigration of her benefactors, and endeavoured to make their conduct still more odious by malignantly adding, that at a certain conversation at which she happened to be presentthe said Madame de Sillery (Genlis) had emphatically applauded the language used by the said Dumouriez, with the double purpose of completing the corruption, of the mind, and opinions of the said eldest son of Egalité, who was corrupted, on the one hand, in politics by the said Dumouriez, and on the other, by the said Madame de Sillery in religion.'-(Déclaration de la Citoyenne Topin, Jeudi, 18 Août 1793. Brit. Mus. No. 261.) Now let us turn to the disgusting aristocrate, Madame de Lacharce. When, after the execution of Egalité, his two younger sons, Montpensier and Beaujolais, were imprisoned in a dungeon at Marseilles, under circumstances of the most wanton and atrocious barbarity-this same Madame de Lacharce quitted Paris, proceeded to Marseilles, took up her abode in an obscure inn near the prison, with the sole object of communicating with the poor children, and of alleviating their sufferings; and she continued for above de Genlis.—Mém. de Gen iii. 204. six months to brave every kind of privation and danger in their behalf, even to the conclusion of their long and cruel and very prudently disappointed, this little stratagem confinement:—(See Mem. de Montpensier.) The contrast to pass the evening alone with her; but, as we shall see,

difficulty, I gave Topin the key of the room [to let him-| '20th Dec .- Passed the whole of yesterday at my dear

'22d Dec .- Yesterday I was at the Assembly. They who had territorial endowments should have, instead, Sth Dec. 1790,-Another entire day at Bellechasse, annual allowances of a million of francs each, divisible These days will profit me, and they do me a good that lamongst their sons to the exclusion of daughters. I cannot tell. I was this morning at the Hotel-Dieu, Yesterday they granted to each of the king's brothers and dressed.

'15th Dec.—Yesterday I took M. Saiffert to the Panthern, to show it to him, as he was looking out for a life annuity of a million, and to my father a million for twenty years, to be employed in paying his debts. I dined at Bellechasse. At half-past six I came to the place for the Jacobins. Then I went to the Assembly Palais Royal with my friend te a concert given by M. to procure a box-ticket for my friend; afterwards I rode.

'18th Dec.—Yesterday I dined at the Palais Royal, my apartment. It is the first time that there has been where Mesdames De Lacharce and St. Simon.

this shower of gamblers. I then went to Jacobins, and should be examined. I said that I saw no objection to afterward to Bellechasse.'

We must here pause to observe a curious contrast.— of three—Messrs. Fevelat, Carra, and myself. We visited the cellar, where we found a great deal of wine, but nothing to create any uneasiness. I indorsed the certificate of M. Potocki.f

Mademoiselle Adelaide as sub-governess; and when she I dined at the Palais Royal, and then went to the Philanthropic Society, whence I could not get away till '25th Dec .- I went yesterday morning to confession. There was music at half-past nine. that you will always be kind to Madame Topin, who is so tending to dedicate myself to devout preparation for the good and so estimable, and has so sincere a friendship holy ceremonies of the next [Christmas] day at Belle-for me.' Mem de Gen., iv. 78. The reader will also have chasse, and to stay there till midnight, I waited for for me.' Mem de Gen., iv. 78. The reader will also have classes, and half an hour, that I might not arrive at Bellechasse till observed the slighting way in which Madame de Lacharce half an hour, that I might not arrive at Bellechasse till has been mentioned, as one of a 'disgustingly aristocratic' my brother should be gone. All this happened, as I had foreseen; but my friend would not permit me to stay; and so I came back on foot to the Palais Royal at halfpast ten. I found them all at supper, and made the best excuses I could for my absence. After supper, having retired to my own room to pray, Edward brought me a note from my friend, in which, to console me for having been sent away to-night from Bellchasse, she promised me that she would keep me in her room when there was company, and that I should not go next day to the Hotel Dieu. These promises, and the affectionate expressions of her note, overwhelmed me with joy. I went to midnight mass at St. Eustache, returned at

> she gives her maiden name as La Corne, while the young person in whose marriage the Duke interested himself is mentioned in the Journal—entry of the 6th of De-cember—as the daughter of M. and Mad. Bailley. The girl had, no doubt, been the offspring of Mad. Bailley by a previous marriage to M. La Corne. "Myris was, as before said, a draughtsman and engraver, and drawing-master to the young D'Orléans. He accompanied Louis Phillippe to the army, and there distinguished himself, but did not emigrate. He passed through the Reign of Terror by the patronage of Barrère, with whom he probably got acquainted at Bellechasse, and was afterwards employed as an engraver by

‡ It is evident that Madame de Genlis disapproved of, is striking, and not much to the credit of the Citoyenne." allowed him to come when there should be company. This observation will explain some subsequent allu-

^{*} We observe, in Citoyenne Topin's declaration, that sions.

there are several passages in the Journal which seem to attest her success; but if, as we hope and believe, Louis Philippe still feels such sentiments, what must be his dis-M. Sarrans has not extracted some of these evidences of Louis Philippe's piety. We hardly know any imputation

⁴ 26th Dec.—I spent the whole of yesterday at Bellechasse. I was perfectly happy. In the evening I did not dare to go into my friend's room, although she had treated me with great kindness all day, and that Madame de Valence was with her. I was afraid that through her excessive kindness to me, she might put herself to inconvenience, in order to allow me the pleasure of being with her.

'1st Jan. 1791.—Dined yesterday at Bellechasse. At night, after supper, I went to my friend's apartment. I stayed there till a few minutes past twelve, and had the happiness to be the first to wish her a happy new year. It is impossible to be happier than I am with her; and, in truth, I cannot conceive what will become of me when I shall be no longer with her.

'2d Jan.—I was yesterday morning at the Tuilleries in the dress of the Order [du St. Esprit]. Thanks to my father, they have done away with the aristocratic list of princes, dukes, peers, &c., and called us in order of seniority, with the exception of Monsieur and M. of Artois, who were not so called. Monsieur took the same rank as when he was a prince. The Cardinal de la Rochefoucault took the place of the cardinals, and did not answer to the call. They gave incense to the Bishop of Senlis, who officiated. The Queen spoke to my father and my brother, but not to me. Nobody, indeed, said a word to me-neither the King nor Monsieur-nor, in short, anybody.'

The peculiar Jacobinism of this entry about the 'Order' is explainable by the fact, that, much as he seems to is explainable by the fact, that, much as he seems to went to Bellechasse, where in spite of my headache and despise it, the young duke was deeply offended by not though I had a good deal of fever, I wished to stay late, having received it the very day at which, by special indulgence, princes of the blood were admissible. The king, dissatisfied with the conduct of his father, had postponed the reception for a year-inde ire. When the young prince was so loud against the aristocratical forms of what is, in its essence, only an aristocratical form, he should have recollected that it was only by an aristocratical favour that he was admitted at all-for the statutes required that the knights should be at least thirty years of age. His recent zeal in attending the Jacobin Club was probably the reason of his being treated so coolly by the king and queen.

' At half-past two I went to Bellechasse, dined at the Palais Royal, and in the evening received visits til half-past nine; supped, went home, and stayed with my friend till half-past twelve. There is nothing in the world so amiable as she.

'5th Jan .- Yesterday I was at the Assembly. They were discussing the question of juries. M. Duport was of opinion that evidence should not be taken in writing. Messrs. Robespierre and Goupil insisted that it should. The matter was not decided. At two o'clock they went the usual private prayers.

two in the morning, and got to bed at half-past two.

performed my devotions at this mass.'

Whatever may have been Madame de Genlis' political corrors—and they were errors which, in the beginning of bate, that the president should attend the king to request the "Revolution, were shared by many of the wise and him to cause the heave expected the transfer of the Assembly then decreed, after a long detection, were shared by many of the wise and him to cause the decree expected the transfer of the Assembly then decreed after a long decrease. the Revolution, were shared by many of the wise and him to cause the decree against the members of the Asgood—she wisely and piously endeavoured to develop sembly who have not taken the oath to be put into exsentiments of religion in the heart of her pupils. And ecution. I did not leave it till half-past four, when I hastened to Bellechasse to tell my friend the news. half-past five we went to the Theatre Francais-the first night of "Despotism Overthrown," by Mr. Harney. It is the revolution dramatized—the taking of the Bastile, gust and horror at the blasphemy which now raises such an audacious voice in France? We a little wonder that for, and crowned on the stage. This morning I have been to call on M. Harney, but he was not at home.

'7th Jan .- I went this morning to the Hotel Dieu in which, in the present state of the public mind in France, would more tend to render the king contemptible and odious to the party which placed him on the throne.

'26th Dec.—I spent the whole of yesterday at Bellechasse. I was perfectly happy. In the evening I did me-my visit seemed to give him great pleasure.

'8th Jan .- In the morning to the Assembly-at six in the evening to the Jacobins. M. de Noailles presented a work on the Revolution, by Mr. Joseph Towers, in a work on the Revolution, by sale of the pro-served that I should be appointed to translate it. This posed that I should be appointed to translate it. proposition was adopted with great applause-I, like a blockhead, consented, but expressing my fear that I should not fulfil their expectations. I returned home at a quarter-past seven. At night my father told me that he did not approve of it and that I must excuse myself to the Jacobins on Sunday.

'10th Jan.--I dined yesterday at Bellechasse, with the usual deputies," and M. de la Touche in addition. In the usual deputies, and M. de la louche in addition. In the evening I went to the Jacobins, with Messieurs de Sillery and Voidel: I said (by my father's order) that, not being capable of making a work, I could only undertake for a literal translation, and that M. Pierret would put it in order, and prefix his own name to it. This as agreed to.

'12th Jan .-- I passed all day at Bellechasse, busy with my translation

'28th Jan .- Dined on Thursday at Mousseaux. was terribly hot, occasioned by the tubes for heating the I had a bad head-ache. On going out to go to obins I was struck by the cold. I endorsed the Jacobins I was struck by the cold. Messrs. Galand, Topin, and Gaspard-Fontaine, of whose patriotism I was certified by M. Lebrun. Thence I but my friend sent me away, reminding me that I was to be at the Hotel Dieu in the morning. On getting home I sent for M. Conad, who pronounced that I had a good deal of fever—I perspired all next day—I got up for a short time about half-past nine in the evening, put my feet in water, and went to bed again at half-past ten. My mother came to see me several times; my friend wrote me two delightful letters, which did me more good than all the apothecary's medicines.; Next day rose at noon-as soon as I had said my prayers and the office § of the day, I hastened to write to my friend. My father came to see me and stayed half-an-hour-I then ate a roasted apple, and read some of Paul and Virginia.

t How differently does he appreciate the personal visits of his mother and the letters of his friend!

& Mes prieres et mon office. - The office was a stated service for a particular person or day, over and above

^{*} He means Messrs. Voidel, Barrère, and Volney, who, with her husband, now called M. de Sillery, formed Madame de Genlis's usual dinner-parties. † Probably M. Pieyre. See the entry of the 16th June, donation. Barrère was guardian of Mademoiselle Pa- ried, on a division, by a majority of 12.

This, and a former notice of Barrère, are a little inconsistent with the account which Madame de Genlis gives of her relations with Barrère, and, we must confess, tend to throw a little doubt over the candour of her Memoirs. She gives an amiable account of the little she saw of this man's character, and adds, 'Such he at that time appeared to me, and such no doubt he was. Cowardice alone made him the sanguinary monster he afterwards was. But, after all, I never was intimate with him. I saw him only once a-week, Sunday-when I received everybody. never wrote to him but once in my life to ask a literary question, to which he replied, and he subsequently wrote another letter (in allusion to the first), to which I made no answer, and I never had any other correspondence with him.'-Mem. de Genlis, vol. iv. p. 98. Now, certainly, this is not reconcileable either with the Prince's frequent evidence that Barrère was one of those persons who were so exclusively frequent at Madame de Genlis's as to be called the usual deputies, or with his being on terms of called the usual deputies, or with his being on terms of such peculiar intimacy as to be chosen the guardian and trustee of the mysterious Pamela. The truth is, that Madame de Genlis, as well as every one else connected with the House of Orleans, favoured and fostered the revowith the House of Orleans, favoured and fostered the revodevour its own children-they then became anxious to tionaries, which he promised. forget and disclaim the share they undoubtedly had had in its earlier stages.

8th Feb .- Yesterday for a moment in the Assembly -then to Mr. de Rochambeau, to ask him how I could have my regiment ordered to his army. He told me that he was now asking M. Duportail [the minister at scar] for cavalry, which he was in great want of, and that I had only to ask to be quartered at Bethune. Thence to Bellechasse-then dined at the Palais Royal, and afterwards to the Jacobins, and returned to Bellechasse. After supper went to my friend's apartment, and I remained alone with her—she treated me with infinite goodness, and I came away the happiest of men.

The regiment mentioned in the foregoing extract was the 14th dragoons, at this time quartered at Vendome, of which the duke had been colonel ever since he was ten years old; but honorary colonelcies being now abolished by a decree of the Assembly, he was obliged, though only seventeen, to join and take the command. The young Jacobin, who is so 'disgusted' with aristocracy in others, would do what he could.

13th Feb .- Yesterday at eleven to the National Assembly: the question was concerning the growth of sembly: the question was concerning the grown of the grown of the concerning the grown of the g

At a quarter past seven my friend came to see me—I going when and as often as I will into your garden and gave tea, ices, creams, &c. This visit gave me the your house, to see that you have not planted tobacco in greatest pleasure. I afterwards had Messieurs Myris, and Giroud to supper. During supper my mother and Madame de Lamballe came to see me 47th Feb.—All yesterday at Bellechasse: where dined and will finally exercise the right of insurrection, &c. Messieurs Voidel, Sillery, Barrere, and Volney. My M. Ræderer's speech was to my mind admirable and friend and M. Barrere at last signed the contract and unanswerable. The free culture of tobacco was car-

> Here we pause to observe, that we were at first surprised that M. Sarrans, in his bitter animosity against Louis Philippe, had not quoted this passage: it is one of the most curious of the whole journal, when we see how ardent and how fixed was the writer's opinion that the monopoly of tobacco would justify insurrection, and recollect that this very monopoly is one of the most prominent ways and means of Louis Philippe's budgets; but here, as in many other instances, M. Sarrans is obliged to spare Louis Philippe, because he could not expose him without also exposing many graver delinquents, and even the revolution itself-which, after clamoring at the outset against numerous abuses, vexations and oppressions, and procuring decrees for their abolition, was obliged to re-enact, and often with additional severity, these alleged abuses and vexations. But we return to the diary.

te w P fit ta fe w fe

hatw

m; by

th

bu

res an wi

be

fat de

it

the

ble

the

tha sup

mo pre

ins

my

fau

prov

fecti

alre

the proc

4] pup self kno min whe follo

atter

of a

for a

T

7

'17th Feb .- I was appointed one of a committee of the Jacobins, to examine a plan of public education by M. Leonard Bourdon—cidevant Lacronière. I arrived

Millin, editor of the Chronique, to beg him to insert in lutionists and the revolution, until, like Saturn, it began to his journal an article on the residence of public func-

'10th March .- To the Jacobins; at first I stopped half an hour in the Societé Fraternelle; then I went up. They were unwilling to make a report to the National Assembly on the affair of the priest of Issy. Eveque, alleging that there had been a legal decision, and that the Assembly could not annul it. Nevertheless M. Merle made the report to the club; and then added, that on the 25th the High Court at Orleans would be in operation, and would take cognizance of the affair. After that I rose and said, that there was a decree of the National Assembly, that the High National Court at Orleans could only try those whom the Assembly should have invested and that therefore the office should have impeached, and that therefore the affair should be referred to the Assembly to decide whether the accusations against the priest of Issy-l'Eveque were of a nature to be sent to the National Court, or to be left to the ordinary tribunals; and then, whether there were grounds of impeachment. M. Merle answered, that what I stated was the law for future, but not for cases pending. I answered, that it seemed to me that the Court at Orleans had a very great power, since it was to decide, first, whether a case was within its juris-Jacobin, who is so 'disgusted' with aristocracy in others, feels no kind of objection to thus jumping over the heads of all the officers of the army.

'9th Jan.—Yesterday I went to a new club, Hotel des Etats Généraux, Rue de Richelieu, of which I am the founder, to sign the engagement which we take not to play at any game of chance. Thence to M. Duportail, who answered that it was difficult, but that he would do what he could.

was to decide, first, whether a case was within its jurisfield. Hen whether here were grounds to put the person on his trial; then whether he was guilty; and, inally, what punishment should be inflicted; that it was for the legislative body to decide previously whether there were or were not grounds to put the person on his trial; then whether he was guilty; and inally, what punishment should be inflicted; that it was for the legislative body to decide previously whether there were or were not grounds to put the person on his trial; then whether here were grounds to put the person on his trial; then whether he was guilty; and inally, what punishment should be inflicted; that it was for the legislative body to decide previously whether there were or were not grounds of the head was for the legislative body to decide previously whether there were or were not grounds of the head was for the legislative body to decide previously whether here were or were not grounds of trial, and that it was for the legislative body to decide previously whether there were or were not grounds of trial, and that it was for the legislative body to decide previously whether there were or were not grounds of trial, and that it was for the legislative body to decide previously whether there were or were not grounds of trial, and that it was for the legislative body to decide previously whether there were grounds of the person on his trial; then whether he was guilty; and the person on his trial; then whether he was guilty; and the person on his trial; then whether he was guilty; and the person on his trial; then affair to the National Assembly.'

This again is not very amiable. The Prince seems to mother that I could hereafter dine with her only twice regiment at Vendome, and considering his youth, will apa week. She expressed herself satisfied; and added pear, we think, to have conducted himself with premature that whatever suited me should always suit her, and good sense and decision. It must, however, be observed that she was very sure that I would dine with her as that he was accompanied by his sub-governor, M. Pieyre, venience myself.

used to visit those in the neighborhood, and even in dis-since. tant towns.' (Mem. de Gen., iii. 159.) But it is to be feared that, at this particular moment, these excursions were only an excuse to separate the children still more effectually from their mother: they at least seem to have had that effect, and they brought matters to a crisis. The pect of being separated from Madame de Genlis.

'2d April.---Yesterday I had a long conversation with my father and my friend. I shall write the subject of it by and bye."

22d May .----have occasioned a suspension of my journal. I now resume it, and shall give an account of all my actions, and even of all my sentiments. In reading this you will read my soul--nothing shall be omitted, be it good, be it bad. For the last year I have felt constant tempthe passion which now consumes me. I am well aware been useless. that this still distant, but it will come at last-that idea supports me-but for it I should sink, no doubt, into the same irregularities as other young men. O my mother [Madame de Genlis], how I bless you for having preserved me from all those vices and misfortunes, by inspiring me with that sense of religion which has been my whole support! If I did formerly believe in another life, and if I did not know that my falling into any fault of that kind would kill her . .

This curious passage ends thus abruptly. It would the head of 'Reprimand to M. de Chartres,' an additional when he neglects his duty and attentions to others to shall wait on the mayor, the president of the district, &c.'

on the foregoing extract we must make two remarks—of a little boy who does not dare to quit his governess for a minute.'—Lecons d'une Gouvernante, Mem. iii. 283.

' Vendome, 15th June, 1791 .-- Yesterday I left Paris at half past eleven with M. Pieyre. I went to bid adjeu once again to dear Bellechasse and its inhabitants. visited the aqueduct at Maintenon --- the arches are of a fine proportion --- there are about forty-five of them --two next entries refer to the unhappy discussions that I don't exactly know their height. Louis XV, ruined were at this time going on between the duke, the duchess, them, [*les a abimes—a vulgarism, begging his high-and Madame de Genlis; and to a fit of illness into which Mademoiselle either fell, or pretended to fall, at the pros. with which be built the Chateau of Cressy, for Madame de Pompadour. These aqueducts, then, were built for one woman and ruined for another.'

Here we must observe that his highness, in order to make an epigram, misstates his facts, and shows a very The misfortunes we have suffered for strange ignorance of the history of this aqueduct of Mainthese six months---my attention to my poor sister---my tenon, which was no more built for Madame de Mainte-business--my establishment in my new apartments, &c. non than the bridge of Orleans was built for the Duke of non than the bridge of Orleans was built for the Duke of Orleans, or Westminster Abbey for the Marquis of Westminster. It was part of a plan for conveying water to Versailles, which happened to pass near the town of Maintenon, whence it, as well as Madame de Maintenon, took tations incident to my youth... I have suffered a great its title. As little correct is he in stating that was demolded; but this pain has no bitterness: on the contrary, ished for Madame de Pompadour. It was discovered, beit leads me to anticipate future happiness. I think of fore Madame de Pompadour was born, that the original the happiness I shall enjoy when I shall possess an amis- engineers had been mistaken in their levels, and the aqueble and pretty wife, who shall be a legitimate object of duct was abandoned only because to finish it would have

'I saw the Cathedral of Chartres. It is finished and very fine. The group of the Assumption seemed to me finer than when I saw it last on my return from Britanny. It is by M. Bridau, and of one block of mar-ble. Slept at Bonneval at the Poste, an indifferent inn. Next day I left Bonneval at eight o'clock, and stopped at Chateaudun, where I wrote to my friend and my brother. I breakfasted and arrived here at a quarter past two. Some time after M. de Lagondie, first lietenant-colonel, waited on me, and soon after the other officers. prove, if there were no other evidence, that the duke's affection for Madame de Genlis was purely filial. We have very well. I dined at the inn. He assisted at my dinalready seen that Madame de Genlis endeavored to check ner, and invited us to dine with him to-morrow. Our this extravagant fondness; and we find in her works, under afternoon was spent in thinking where we [the Duke this extravagant fondness; and we find in her works, under afternoon was spent in thinking where we [the Duke this specific and the board of Postgrand to M de Charters' an additional and his suite] should establish ourselves, this house the head of 'Reprimand to M. de Chartres,' an additional proof of her desire to correct this excessive attachment:—
'I am pleased with you all,' says she, addressing her pupils; 'the Duke of Chartres has been a little more attentive to general society, and has not pinned himself so closely to my petticoat as he usually does. He knows how I appreciate his friendship for me; but it is mine for him which forces me to treat him unkindly found only M. de Lagondie at home. To-morrow I when he neglects his duty and attentions to afters to shall wait on the mayor, the president of the dis-seems to us ultra-aristocratic. A lieutenant-colonel, it "" This he does not seem to have done, unless it was seems, did not dine with young Equality, he only assisted upon two leaves which appear here to have been cut out of the Journal. (Orig. Ed.)

The Duke now proceeded to take the command of his more than assisting at the dinners of Louis Philippe.

VOL. XXVIII. JANUARY, 1836 .- 4.

often as I could, but that she would not have me inconall essential matters; but still it is a good trait in so young These excursions were part of Madame de Genlis' sys- a man, in such a position, to listen to advice. Alexander tem of education. She says: 'All our drives and airings Picyre (called in the original edition, by an error of the were instructive. We only went out to visit cabinets of transcriber, Sieyre) was a literary man—the author of one pictures, of natural history, physics, curiosities, or manu-successful play, the Ecole des Pères, and a number of small factures; and when we had exhausted those of Paris, we occasional works of little merit. He was alive not long . '16th June, 8 o'clock.—Yesterday, after supper, 1 of—his father's son, went to bed at a quarter past nine, and rose this morning at a quarter to five, and went to all the stables with the lieutenant-colonels---returned at half past sevencourt of justice, and the king's commissary. On my return I wrote this journal, and set out for the "Friends of the Constitution" [the branch Jacobin Club], where I was received with much applause. The president addressed me on the good example which I gave, and on the officers were at their posts. I visited the hospitals its members. I answered (without preparation) that I hid themselves under the bed-clothes.

clear from the sequel that it had an effect which the young quarter-masters, and a great many more dragoons than prince prabably neither intended nor perceived. Ha. there were the first time. bituated, as we see he had been at Paris, to consider the that his object was to pervert the minds of the soldiers, liveliest alarm.

The second is on the virtue of economy, which ap-[and they endeavoured to neutralize what they thought his peared, it seems, quite as early as any of the other great dangerous designs by dissuaring him from entering so osqualities of Louis Philippe. Let us not, however, be un-derstood as depreciating this most valuable disposition, his youth and utter inexperience rendered him really unfit, which, whether in prince or private man, is the surest while his personal rank and authority could not but tend foundation for the comfort of life and respectability of to seduce his troopers to the opinions of the Jacobins. It character. Madame de Genlis justly thought it of se would have been equally contrary to good manners and great importance, that she strictly inculcated it on her pu-good discipline to have avowed to their colonel their suspils, and, in her administration of the domestic arrange-picions of his ultimate object, and they endeavoured, as we ments of Bellechasse, gave them practical examples of this shall see, under some injudicious pretexts, to restrain his useful quality; but the lesson has been, in Louis Philippe's personal interference. We dare say the young man had case, attended with a degree of success beyond what, we no bad intention, but, in the then state of affairs, it will be have reason to suspect, Madame de Gerlis herself approved. seen that there were many circumstances which tended to increase the suspicions which were naturally entertained

m

be

Pu he 11 to do the rib

res

44 I ma the tine you

mit

hab dist beli regi don opin I ca but : tired riors

at la senc

oblig Isha

bysh

my c even my d

I mig

ward

accou

back

and e

Duke be ba on the

Jacobi

W

'17th June.-I went early this morning to the stables -there were no officers there, though there should always be one. In returning, I went to inspect the rethe lieutenant-colonels--returned at half past seven—breakfasted--wrote to my father--and began to make my arrangements; I unpacked all my baggage, and am now quite established. At ten o'clock came M. de Lagondie, and at eleven I accompanied him to the parade--the officers formed a circle, the colours in the centre. M. de Lagondie notified to the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men, that they were to receive me as their colonel---the colours and regimental chest were then taken to my quarters. The officers them came in a body to visit me, and I afterwards dined with them at the inn. They were very civil, and drank my health; I drank theirs, and that of the regiment. I then paid visits to the president and attorney of the district, to the mayor and attorney of the muncipality, to the commandant of the national guard, the president of the court of justice, and the king's commissary. On my

the pleasure that the society felt at seeing me amongst -saw the venereal patients-they were ashamed, and should do my best to justify the favourable reception which the society had had the kindness to give methat my whole life should be consecrated to the service of my country, and that I hoped that the 14th regiment, which I had the honour to command, would be always in the same high order in which I received it, and would continue to be an example of subordination, discipline, and patriotism. Returned home soon after seven, wrote to my mother and my friend—supped, said my prayers (effice et prieres), and went to bed at half past nine.'

hid themselves under the bed-clothes. I told them that I hoped their present sufferings would render them more correct in future—there are now seven of them. On my return, I wrote this journal. The band came desired them—I gave them two louis. I then took a short walk with M. Pieyre. At one dined with Messrs. Damonville, Ducastaign, and Roussel: one can't get them to talk of public affairs. M. Damonville seems clever, but I endeavour in vain to make him talk—I can get nothing out of him. I called on the mayor, he was not at half past nine.' Here again we must pause a moment to remark upon company me, which gave me the greatest pleasure. It this early visit to the Branch Jacobin Club, because it is found there the two adjutants of the regiment, my own

Our readers will here observe some circumstances which Jacobin Club as the centre of patriotism, and acting, ne could not but add to the suspicions which his officers doubt, by the example r d instruction of his father, he saw originally felt of M. de Chartres' intentions. It must be no harm, but, on the contrary, great merit in this early recollected that the public mind was at this period in a visit to the Branch. But to the officers of the regiment, state of the greatest excitement, and that even trifles bewho knew and felt that the mother club and all the branch came important. Hence M. Sarrans quotes as an instance clubs were both in form and principle, subversive of the of peculiar Jacobinism the rewarding the band of the royal authority, and were bent on overthrowing all exist-regiment for its breach of discipline in coming without ing order and particularly all military discipline, it could orders, and regaling their colonel with a tune that all the not but appear equally offensive and alarming that their other officers must have considered as a signal of revoltyoung colonel should, on the very day of his taking the com-mand, hasten with such precipitate seal to unite himself political discussions, and his vexation at failing in the lauwith those local demagogues; and when he followed this dable attempt of debauching their principles and, above up by, what, in other circumstances, would have been a all, the increased number of dragoons at the Jacobin club laudable attention to the details of his duties, they feared -must have created in the minds of the senior officers the must retire. I have forgotten to riy, that I went yes. more active part in the every terday to the mayor to represent to him that it was aboutly indispensable that he should send out of the ing firmness and prudence. town all the girls that infected our regiment. He pro-mised me to neglect nothing to get them all out of the town; but he observed to me that he could not drive them out by force, except they should disturb the public peace. The officers were talking and laughing during divine service. I ordered them to keep silence, and to behave decorously on such occasions. I decided, also, that an officer under arrest should be at liberty for the purpose of attending mass.

'20th June.—This morning at six to stables. It rained heavily. On coming out of one of M. Mastin's stables I met M. de Lagondie who said, "How, Sir; you come to the stables in such weather?" "Sir," I replied, "nothing can prevent me doing my duty." "But. Sir, you should not make yourself so common; it would be better that the men did not see you so frequently." "I do not see any reason for that." "The men may lose to destroy those impressions." "The men may lose ribbon and your being a Bourbon. It may be dangerous to destroy those impressions." "Far from believing that it would be dangerous, I am very desirous that their respect should be to my person and not to those other nonsenses" [ces balivernes--blue ribbons and Bourbons!] "It is, however, with such nonsenses that men must be managed; if I might have ventured to advise you about the Club, I would not, in your situation, have refused the separate seat which they offered you by way of distinction, for it seems to me imminently dangerous that you should be seated on the same bench, and side-by-side with one of your private soldiers; that must give him the habit of looking upon you as his equal." "I should sooner have eaten this chair than have received any distinction whatever. I hate them all, and can never believe that they can be necessary to the discipline of a regiment. I declare to you, that as much as I respect an old officer who wears the mark of the service he has done his country, so much do I despise him who passes his life at court in pursuit of a blue ribbon; that's my opinion about honorary distinctions—you have yours. I can't alter mine; let us change the subject." "I have but a single observation to add: inferiors sometimes get tired with seeing too constantly the face of their superiors, and if you go every day to stables, the men may at last be weary of seeing you, and your constant pre-sence may even become disagreeable." "I am infinitely wards I went to the riding-house, wrote, and settled the accounts of Boulange, and Leval, whom I am sending back to Paris, because they are deficient in the order and economy that suit me.'

Atterup up the carriage; upon which the crowd cried out, "No carriage,—on foot, on foot, that we may have the pleasure of hooting them, and expelling them ignomiand economy that suit me.'

Jacobin Club, the news arrived that the unhappy king, at ance was agreeable to the mob.

19th June.—At six o'clock to the stables—M. de Giffard was not at his post—M. Perrin was. I went to the Club; the regular presidents were not yet arrived. I was called to the chair ad interim. I made many objections; that I could not stay long; that I had letters to write; that it was post-day for Paris; all in vain; I was obliged to take the chair, and so I did; but at the could not stay I really had invaines and of helf an hour I said that I really had invaines and M. de Chartres. But he was soon called upon to take a end of half an hour I said that I really had business, and M. de Chartres. But he was soon called upon to take a more active part in the events of the day, and he did so with-for such a youth and so violent a Jacobin-surpris-

' 27th June .- The great events which have occurred since Wednesday (22d) have prevented my continuing this Journal. Thursday, the (23d, I attended, at the head of the regiment, the procession of the Holy Sacrament." I had been required by the municipality "to doubt the guard, to stop all carriages, and to employ the best energies of the brace patriots that I command to maintain the public peace." At noon I had brought back the regiment, but with orders not to unboot or unsaddle. I asked Messrs. Dubois, d'Albis, Jacquemin, and Philippe to dinner. They brought us word that the people had collected in a mob and were about to hang two priests. I ran immediately to the place, followed by Messrs. Pieyre, Dubois, and d'Albis. I came to the door of a tavern, where I found ten or twelve National Guards, the mayor, the town-clerk, and a great affluence of people, crying "They have violated the law; they must be hanged—à la lanterne!" I asked the mayor what all this meant, and what it was all about. replied. "It is an old priest—[i. e, a priest who had not taken the new oaths]—and his father, who have escaped into this house; the people pretended that they have insulted M Buisson, a priest, who has taken the civil oath, and who was carrying the Holy Sacrament, and it can no longer restrain them. I have sent for a carriage to convey them away. Have the goodness to send me two dragoons to escort them." I did so immediately. There was the mayor motionless before the door, and not opening his mouth. I therefore addressed some of the hottest of the mob, and endeavoured to explain "how horrible it would be to hang men without trial; that moreover they would be doing the work of the executioner which they considered infamous; that there were judges whose duty it was to deal with these men." The mob answered that the judges were aristocrats, and that they did not punish the guilty. I replied, " That's your own fault, as they are elected by yourselves; but you must not take the law into your own hands." Upon this there was a great confusion; at last one voice cried -" We will spare them for the sake of M. de Chartres." "Yes, yes, yes," cried the people; "he is a good patriot; he edified us all this morning—[by having attended the procession of the constitutional priests -Bring them out, we shall do them no harm.' I said, I said. "Do you promise me?" 'Yes, yes; we shall do them no harm." I went up to the room where the unhappy men were, and asked them if they would trust themsence may even become disagreeable." "I am infinitely obliged to you, but you will allow me to believe that I shall not make myself disagreeable towards the men by showing a great deal of scal and assiduity in fulfilling my duties and in being always the first at my post; but even if it were so, it would not prevent my fulfilling my duties; and if I were to yield to such considerations I might indeed be well accused of weakness." After shall receive no harm." I called to the driver to bring up the carriage; upon which the crowd cried out, "No

^{*} The procession of the Holy Sacrament, which used While all this was going on at Vendome—while the to be an object of religious veneration, was now become, Duke de Chartres was sneering at 'blue ribbons,' of which from the anti-religious fanaticism of the mob, the cause he had a few months before been so greedy, and descanting sion it seems that the procession was led by a priest who on the claims of 'old officers,' over whose heads he had so had taken the oaths, and the danger was that the mob gladly jumped—while he was thus disgusting and under-mining his officers, and fraternizing with his men in the tend. Hence we shall see that M. de Chartres' attend-

away the mayor and M. d'Albis. I remained alone cipality, and declared that I disavowed any other. with M. Dubois, and we endeavoured to make the pea-sant loose his hold. I held one of the men by one hand, and by the other endeavoured to free the coat. At last, one of the National Guard arrived to our assistance, it to M. de Lagondie. To-morrow, on parade, I am to and by force cleared the man. The crowd was still in-creasing. It is but justice to the people of Vendome to say that they kept their word, and tried to induce the peasants to do no violence to the men. Seeing, however, that if I had continued my march some misfortune must inevitably occur, I cried, we must take them to prison, and then all the people cried, "To prison! to of the resignation and emigration of the great body of the prison!" Some voices cried, "They must ask pardon officers. of God, and thank M. de Chartres for their lives. was soon done, and we set out for the prison. As we was soon done, and we set out for the prison. As we went along, one man came forward with a gun, and said to us, "Stand out of the way while I fire on them." Believing that he was really about to fire, I rushed forward in front of my two men, saying, "You must kill me first." As the man was well dressed, M. Pieyre said to him,—"But how can you act so?" "I was only looking." says the man was well are not charged." We joking," says the man; " my gun is not charged." We again continued our way. On arriving at the prison, there was a great crowd assembled. The dragoons were mounted by M. de Lagondie's orders. I ordered them to dismount, saying, that the people had promised me, and that I needed no help but their word.

The two men were lodged in the prison. they were there, the people wanted to attack the Oratoire [a religious house], the superior of which has not taken the oath, and whose church was the resort of the refractory [those who did not approve the new constitution of the clergy], and those whose children had not attended the procession-in short, of the aristocrats. 1 observed that that was not the way to proceed; that they ought to request the mayor to suggest to the superior of the Oratoire that they were displeased at seeing his church filled with the refractory. They answered—"A fig for the mayor...you must do it." I answered that I was ready to accompany the mayor. I did so. The supe-niously from the town." "Well," I said, "on foot, be it so, 'tis the same thing to me, for you are too honest fellows to forfeit your word." We set out amidst hisses and a torrent of abuse. I gave my arm to one of the men, and the mayor was on the other side. The priest walked between Messrs. Dubois and d'Albis. Not thinking at the moment, I unluckily took the direction towards Paris. All the people followed, singing the song of the Champ de Mars, and making a dreadful uproar. One man ran up crying "a la lanterne with the rascals!" He narrowly escaped being hoisted up himself for saying so, "Because," said the people, "we have promised M. de Chartres, and we will keep our word." The mayor asked one of the men where he would wish to go,—he answered, "To Blois." It was directly the contrary way from that which they were niously from the town." "Well," I said, "on foot, be I shall only say that the day after my affair, the company directly the contrary way from that which they were and that even if there were such a one, they were not taking. The mayor wished to return, and to pass across the proper persons to execute it; that they should trust taking. The mayor wished to return, and to pass across the whole town. I opposed this, and we changed our direction, but without going back through the town. It without going back through the town. I we passed a little wooden bridge of a few planks without rails; there the mob cried to throw them into the river, and endeavoured, by putting sticks across, to trip them up into the water. I again reminded them of their promise, and they became quiet. When we were about a mile out of the town some of the country peo- is about a mile out of the town some of the country peo- is about to take place. There is no decree which orders about to take place. There is no decree which orders about to take place. There is no decree which orders about to take place. There is no decree which orders are running down the hill and precipitated them—it he exile of manipuring priests, and they ought not to be ple came running down the hill and precipitated themple came running down the hill and precipitated themselves upon us, calling out "Hang or drown the two scoundrels!" One of them seized one of the poor wretches by the coat, and the crowd rushing in forced mediately and deposed a copy of my note at the munimediately and deposed a copy of my note at the munimediately and deposed a copy of my note at the munimediately and deposed a copy of my note at the munimediately and deposed a copy of my note at the munimediately and deposed a copy of my note at the munimediately and deposed a copy of my note at the munimediately and deposed a copy of my note at the muni-it to M. de Lagondie. To-morrow, on parade, I am to have an answer.

ot a spenh gdhtil

to he en

of

an

me qu

to

WF ins

the

oin

141

tha

oat

mu

dan

con

[ad

of a

This new oath imposed on the military was a Jacobin

'4th July .- I had postponed to vesterday evening the declaration with regard to the oath, because there happened to be a great procession of reliques which had brought a vast crowd of peasants into town, and I feared that the refusal of the oath on the part of any of the officers might have occasioned some commotion. After dinner, Messrs. de Lagondie, Rouillon, Damonville, and Montureux, informed me that they could not take the oath, but requested me to keep this secret, lest, as they said, it might occasion some disturbance in the regiment. One of these gentlemen I regret very muchM. de Montureax--this refusal, however, diminishes very much the favourable opinion I had conceived of him; for I do not love a man who prefers quelqu'un some one ... i. e., the king] to his country. The municipality inquired if I should not oppose their departure. answered no. That evening, at half-past eight, Bessard, the adjutant, came into my room to say that the company of Montureux was very much affected by the departure of their captain, and that he feared there would be some disturbance. I told him to apprise me of the slightest thing. Messrs. Perrin and Ducastaign came to tell me that they would take the oath, as well as Messrs. Jacquemin, Roussel, and the two adjutants. M. Dubois (to whom I had given 500 livres [201.] the day before yesterday) declared that he would not take ready to accompany the mayor. I did so. The superior was very obstinate: he would not yield at that time, but he went off next morning. After dinner I went to the municipality, and stayed while they were drawing up the proces verbal of what had happened. I went again next day, and signed it.

'1st July, 1791...-The length of the foregoing recital to the company of gardeners was equivalent in quantity having prevented my continuing the journal regularly. having prevented my continuing the journal regularly, and value to about six gallons of small beer in England.

bly to the doubts of the sincerity and loyalty of the young prince, which some other expressions has led us to conceive. Hitherto his Jacobinism might be attributed to inexperience and example, and appears to have been tempered by more moderation and good sense than might have been expected from so young a man in such difficult circumstances; but his unwonted liberality to M. Dubois at this critical time, and the implied expectation that this favour would have induced him to take the oath, leads us to suspect that the young colonel was not quite a passive instrument in the hands of the revolutionists, but as exerting himself to seduce his regiment from its allegiance to ' quelqu'un.'

"We" remained assembled till half-past one in the morning, but nothing happened --- all was quiet. did not go to bed till we knew that all these gentleman were gone As there are no officers remaining of Mastin's company, I have given M. Perrin temporary or-ders to command it. At half-past two I was called up by a deputation from Moutoire [a small town, the first stage to the westward of Vendome], which would not grant passports to the [non-juring] officers without my permission. I answered that I could not give those gentlemen passports as they considered themselves as no longer officers, nor could I oppose their departure, having no authority to do so. On this answer they gave the passports. This morning all is quiet. Ail the gave the passports. This morning all is quiet. Ail the dragoons are at their post, as well as the officers who have taken the oath. At half-past ten we assembled on the terrace of the abbey. I said the official latter annexed. I then read the decree, and the official letter annexed to it. I pronounced the oath, and that instant all the helmets were raised on the points of the swords, with cries of "We swear," and then, on one side, "Vive la nation!" and on the other, "Vivent les dragons!" Although the weather was execrable, there was a crowd of spectators. We returned amidst the applause of the whole people. I gave a general invitation to dinner. After dinner I went to Montoire with M. Roussel. I manner : there was the same enthusiasm as at Vendome, the same shouts, and the same applause. '5th July .-- I wrote to our detachments at Caen. answer---that takes up a great deal of time. I am, moreover, the only superior officer left, and have consequently a great deal more duty than before. If I wish to read or walk ever so little, I have no longer time to write my journal---this throws me into arrear, so that, instead of my date on the 5th, I am actually writing on since that it was about to require me to take, on the latter of July, the same oath as last year: I answered that I could not possibly do so; that the Assembly had, by its decree of the 22d of June, changed the form of the oath; that if it were allowable to take by oath, all the refractory officers would immediately return and offer to take it. Notwithstanding this, the municipality has written to the committee on the conalso written to the department, which replied in accor-They had dance with my opinion. The municipality also sent to consult as to what I thought they should do relative to [administering, on the approaching celebration of the

We must state that this last parenthesis adds considers. 14th of July, the oath to the National Guards. plied, that I saw no difficulty; that I thought they would be fulfilling the views of the National Assembly by administering the oaths to the National Guards; and certainly, if they were not invited to the ceremony, they would cry out against the municipality, and pro-bably attend in spite of them. They wrote, besides, to the municipality of Blois to know what they would do. The 13th of July at six in the evening, the municipality issued orders for the attendance of the National Guards -they had already begun to complain, and they thought that this order came rather late --- they had wished have given an entertainment, a dinner, &c. &c. to the dragoons, but it has been postponed.

At eleven, on the 14th of July, we marched to the Place de la Federation ; cries of " Bravo! vivent les dragons," accompanied us. When we came on the ground, we were saluted by a discharge of artillery. Each company of National Guards took the oath, which the municipality went round to administer; then we, with our helmets on the points of our swords, shouting with all our might, " Vive la nation! Vive la Garde Nationale! Vivent les Vendomois! Vivent les Dames de Ven-dome," &c.

This inauguration of a constitution to the cry of ' Hurra for the Ladies!' is droll enough of itself, but is peculiarly so when we recollect that the ladies whom the honest dragoons were thinking of had so narrowly and so recently escaped rigour beyond the law of the colonel (see entry of 19th June); but it is still more important to observe, as indicative of the total annihilation of all appearance of ressect towards the royal authority, that the king's name is nowhere joined in these shouts of applause.

'I had forgotten to say that the day after the first oath, I, accompanied by all the officers who had taken it, went in a body to the Club, where we were received with immense applause.

'26th July.—The day before yesterday we assembled on the mall; all the National Guards assembled. Each of us took two National Guards under our arms, and we administered the oath to the detachment there in like proceeded in that order to the front of the abbey. They presented me a match to fire the cannon, which was to be the signal for the fete"-I fired the gun. They then sat down to table; I among the rest, and I found myself Sille-le-guillaume, and Mamers, to apprise them of the seated next to a drunken man. They sang some versea decree as to the oath, and that they should conform the seated next to a drunken man. They sang some versea decree as to the oath, and that they should conform the sound of my intreaties, but of my resistance, thereto. I am overwhelmed with letters, which I must spite me up and carried me on their shoulders round lifted me up and carried me on their shoulders round the tables, and insisted on placing me on a kind of elevated platform, where were the colours [of the National Guard and our standards. I endeavoured to escape, but in vain; they succeeded in placing me there, but they did not keep me long, for I immediately threw be recognized as military commandant. I read the essay on voluntary servitude of La Boëtie, t and made some extracts. I read also some German, Italian, and English. In the evening I read some of Mably and Emile.

1st August, 1790 .- A delightful day. Vivent les dragons! there is not such another regiment in France. With such men we shall give a good reception to any t A ' seditious declamation,' as it is somewhere called, by a counsellor of the Parliament of Bordeaux, 1550.

^{*} We probably means those of the officers who took the oath.

to Here he had left a blank, probably for the purpose of afterwards writing in his speech, but he did not do no.' (Orig. Edit.)

^{*} The postponed fete before alluded to, given by the National Guard of Vendome to the dragoons--part of the general system at that time played in seducing the army from the king.

scoundrels (gueuz) who may have the audacity to enter I then went to the Club. They expressed great good-same gueux, and was by their bayonets restored to his rank with me. and property.

We have had a sham fight to-day; I was one of the first taken prisoner.

'3d August....Happy day! I have saved a man's life, or rather have contributed to save it. This evening, after having read a little of Pope, Metastasio, and Emile, I went to bathe. Edward and I were dressing ourselves had not come up and seized one of his legs, which de-prived him of the power of jumping on me. We then got him ashore. He could scarcely speak, but he nevertheless expressed great gratitude to me as well as to The man we saved is one M Philippe does in this Journal. to avail myself of them: The man we saved is one M. Siret, an inhabitant of Vendome, sub-engineer in the office of roads and bridges. I go to bed happy!

4th August.—This morning I read the papers and some English. I wrote to my friend that I was happy in thinking of the pleasure with which she would read my letter. M. Siret came to pay me a visit; he is very much affected, and very grateful. I read some Latin, Club, where I read a speech on the abolition of orders.* account of what had happened yesterday. The president believe, the main stay of anything like order and governpronounced a panegyric upon me with many compliments, extempore, but very well expressed. rected the journalists to be written to.

Pope. At five, to the riding house, and afterwards read volution itself than of Louis Philippe. Emile.

also soon revisit Bellechasse

'11th August.—Another happy day. I had been in-vited yesterday to attend at the Town-House with some non-commissioned officers and privates. I went to-day, non-commissioned officers and privates. I went to-day, but to that of valois which so long governed France, and was received with an address; there was then read a letter from M. Siret, who proposed that the municipal body should decree that a civic crown should be given of Orleans! Vive la Liberte! well in Charte! Vive la Liberte! body should decree that a civic crown should be given to any citizen who would save the life of a fellow crea- p. 29. the and that, in course, one should be presented to me.

The municipal body adopted the proposition, and I received a crown amidst the applause of a numerous ascembly of spectators. I was very much ashamed. I nevertheless expressed my gratitude as well as I could.

Here the Journal concludes. There are in it many puerile passages, and a few which, even under all attenuating circumstances, may be called blameable. Nor can M. Sarrans, or any other enemy of Louis Philippe, have any difficulty in finding in it striking contrasts and gross contradictions to the present position and professions of when I heard cries of "Help, help, I am drowning!" the new king. But we think it must be agreed that, on I ran immediately to the cry, as did Edward, who was the whole, it is creditable to his good sense, and even to the whole, it is creditable to his good sense, and even to farther. I came first, and could only see the tops of the his goodnature. Let it be recollected that it was written person's fingers; I laid hold of that hand, which seized at the age of seventeen,-that his mind, ever since it was mine with indescribable strength, and by the way in capable of receiving a political idea, had been imbued with revolutionary doctrines by the precepts of his instructors, the authority and example of a father, and a general popular enthusiasm, which had not yet assumed the mad and bloody aspect which it soon after bore,-and we think we Edward. I think with pleasure on the effect this will may truly assert that few young men of that period,—if produce at Bellechasse. I am born under a happy star! their conduct were reported with equal fidelity and minute. Opportunities offer themselves in every way: I have only ness,—would appear in so favourable a light as Louis

ti ti n se se co

ha

to

he

the

BUG

nes

rec

wh

me

Ver

the hun

not siste only

ects

mul unh deep very

*ban the y

Egal erasi

of pr he, " alas!

when

jeopa own (believ sin ar Sarrai In to dre

proofs

ragoni

a com

But M. Sarrans proceeds to give us some subsequent anecdotes with the same object,—that of depreciating the king, and with (we think generally—there are some exceptions) the same result, that of raising him in our estimation,-not certainly as a hero of high mind, generous spirit, or of brilliant talents, but a man of good sense, and wrote to my friend and to my father. I went to the energy, and courage, who (waiving the consideration of the means by which he was placed on the throne) has ex-The Club ordered it to be printed. M. Siret gave an ecuted a difficult task with great ability, and been, as we ment in France.

We can join M. Sarrans in wondering at the ignorance 5th August -Yesterday morning at exercise. On and dupery of the heroes of July, who were induced to toth August — resterony morning at exercise. On accept Louis Philippe as king, because he was not a Bour-lius Cosar, Sterneeim, and Mably. Dined, and after dinner read some of Ipsipyle, Metastasio, Heloise, and credit of those enlightened patriots and of the glorious re-

That bold 'experiment on the historical and constitu-8th August.—Did business with M. Jacquemin for tional intelligence of the Parisian public seems to have Sth August.—Did business with M. Jacquemin for tional intelligence of the Parisian public filling up the vacant commissions in the regiment. We been the device of M. Thiers,—then a journalist and have at last received orders to march. We are going creature of Lafitte,—now, or lately, the favourite minister of the king. The following proclamation was provided the serial of serving our country, and shall We are at last certain of serving our country, and shall nister of the king. The following proclamation was not miss the opportunity of using our swords. I shall bably from his pen, it at least executes his idea:—

'Citizens! -- Louis Philippe d'Orléans, proclaimed by the nation Lieutenant-General of the Kingdom,

'To the people .-- Louis Philippe of Orleans, pro-* The Assembly had lately abolished orders of knight-claimed Licatenant-General of France, -- is a Bourbon; hood; we should be curious to see the essay of his Royal though of the second branch, -- the son of Egalite; who

France, and our country shall be free, or we shall perish will and much regret [at the approaching departure.] I replied, that I should feel the liveliest regret at leaving the instructive to recellect that, within little more than most desirable to the friends of liberty; that in which is leaved again. two years, this patriot-prince was but too happy to save his one could serve his country; and that, if Icould ever own head by deserting to the army of those 'gueux who had had the audacity to enter France;' and that twenty years after, he returned to his country in the train of those pable, this [reception] would be a very powerful one

Highness, so many years Knight du St. Esprit, and now was the son of Louis Philippe, who died in 1755; who Grand Master of the Legion of Honour. was the son of Louis, who died in 1752; who was the Grand Master of the Legion of Honour.

Another plea on which his partisans recommended the Duke of Orleans was, that he had not only fought vives is the declaration which the Duke of Orleans and his for the Revolution in its earlier days, but never, even brothers made, signed, and deposited in the hands of Louis in his exile, had thought of drawing his sword against XVIII., at Hartwell, in 1803. his country. This pretence M. Sarrans destroys by hishis country. This pretence M. Sarrans destroys by his-torical facts and documents—for instance he produces die faithful to our legitimate sovereign; and if (which Twickenham, to the late Bishop of Llandaff, on the occasion of 'the murder of his cousin,' the Duke d'Eng. for it never can be de jure---any other than our legitimien,—in which amongst many anti-national sentiments, fidelity and confidence the voice of honour and duty. the duke expressly says-

'I quitted my native land so early that I have hardly the habits or manners of a Frenchman, and I can say with truth, that I am attached to England, not only by gratithis passage: tude but by taste and inclination. In the sincerity of my heart do I pray that I may never leave this hospitable soil. But it is not from individual feeling only that I take so much interest in the welfare, the prosperity, and the success of England,—it is also as a man. The safety of Europe, of the world itself, the happiness and indepencause of the hatred with which we are pursued by the corsical usurper. May Providence defeat his atrocious designs, and preserve England prosperous and happy! &c.-p. 94, heroes of the Three Days, whose chief complaint against he took occasion to deny publicly that he had had any recur to the memory of Louis Philippe during that day, had frequently vexed him, Lafayette. This expression when, for ten mortal hours, he assisted at the re-establishment of the statute of the 'Cersican usurper' in the Place directly encourage the designs against Charles X, but he not complain, for they are, no doubt, in his opinion, con- neutrality. He would have been contented with the comsistent with the character of a Citizen-King,—his bile is paratively safe and inoffensive station of regent and guar-only stirred when he has to reproach Louis Philippe with dian to Henry V., and only accepted the throne in his own acts which we think becoming a sovereign responsible for right when he found that, if he did not do so, there would the tranquillity and security of a great, but giddy and tu-be no throne at all, and that at no distant day he must ex-multuous people. We have no desire to dwell on these unhappy frailties; but there is one of them, of no very a new emigration. We therefore co very curious rapprochement-we mean the pusillanimous indications of the basest treachery in the following lively abandonment of his coat-of-arms. Now we find that in account of the manners of the Duke of Orleans at the the year 1791, when it was proposed to the miserable court of Louis XVIII.:-Egalite to propitiate the blatant beast of democracy by erasing his arms from some domestic object, he had enough of pride and courage left to refuse,- il me semble,' said he, 'une indigne lachete,' (Mem. de Genlis, vol. iii.)—but, profusion of civility in the most affable gestures and alas! that slight exertion of spirit was still selfish, and expressions. It really was a sight to see him at a royal when, soon after, he foresaw that he was personally in banquet: at every toast to the health of the King, of jeopardy, he did not scruple to endeavour to postpone his mondame, of the Dukes of Angouleme and Berry, he own danger by the execrable lachete-(for such we really believe it was)-of voting the death of his innocent cousin and sovereign. We must proceed, however, with M. Sarrans' anecdotes of Louis Philippe.

In additional refutation of his pretended resolution never to draw his sword against France, M. Sarrans produces, proofs that he made two or three several attempts at Tarragona, Cadiz, and Gibraltar, in 1808, 9, and 10, to obtain son of the Regent, who was the son of the younger brother of Louis XIV.;—and yet they have had the audicity to publish that he sis not a Bourbon! Capet and Bourbon he notoriously is.'—p. 33.

Another curious rapprochement which M. Sarrans rebrothers made, signed, and deposited in the hands of Louis fidelity and confidence the voice of honour and duty, &c.'--vol. i. p. 100.

And in another declaration, dated 1816, there occurs

'The irrevocable principle of legitimacy is now the only guarantee for the peace of France and of Europe -- the revolutions we have suffered have only given additional proof of its force and importance.

But here it is only justice to repeat, what we have bedence of the human race, depend upon the safety and fore observed, that we see strong reason to doubt that Louis independence of England; and that is the honourable Philippe had any direct share in preparing or effecting the overthrow of the elder branch. His evident want of preparation-his conversation with M. de Mortemart-and his original reluctance (whether it was the reluctance of loyalty or of prudence) to assume the crown, leave us lit-Such sentiments can, in our opinion, do no discredit tle doubt on this point; but we were not aware, till we to Louis Philippe, but they may a little surprise the found it in these volumes, that soon after the Revolution the Restoration was, that it was accomplished by the share in bringing it about, and appealed to Lafayette for success of England, for which Louis Philippe thus ear. the truth of the statement. Lafayette corroborated the nestly prayed. But did this remarkable passage never assertion, and added, that the duke's 'negative opposition' Vendome, and stood bureheaded before the brasen effigy of knew something about them and gave them only a 'neg'the murderer of his cousin.' Of that and other acts of ative opposition.' When the explosion came, he still humiliation, and we must say of meanness, M. Sarrans does endeavoured to maintain the same position of balance and

We therefore cannot agree with M. Sarrans in finding

When the Duke of Orleans came to court, he exhibited the most profound politeness to all the attendants --- even to the lowest servants and sentinels---it was a would press his hand to his heart; and several times during the dinner, as if impelled by an irresistible affection which could not await the tardy course of eti-quette, he would himself burst out into cries of Vive le Roi ! --- Histoire de la Restauration, vol. i. p. 113.

To the same effect is the evidence of the Abbé de Montesquieu.

'I remember,' says he, 'that I had the honour of nea command in the Spanish armies then acting against gociating with Louis XVIII. the affair of the restoration

There is another anecdote of the same class. The Duke of Orleans,-forgetting his early contempt of adventitious honours,-was extremely anxious to merge his title of Serene Highness in that of Royal Highness. Louis XVIII. would never consent to this innovation-he remembered, and used to quote with pleasantry, the anecdote of a chancellor of France who, when Louis XIV. consulted him about conferring by patent the title of Royal Highness on one of his natural children, cut the design short by saying quaintly, 'To make Royal Highnesses, your Majesty must have the assistance not of the Chancellor, but of the Queen.' Charles X. was not so punctilious-he granted the Orleans family this favour, touched it is said by the affectionate zeal which the duke had exhibited at his coronation,where, when he approached to offer his allegiance, he electrified the assembly with a supercrogative exclamation or 'Vive à Jamais Charles X." (vol. i. p. 145.) The 'à jamais' of the French from 1789 to the present hour have been of marvellous brevity!

M. Sarrans introduces a mot of M.de Talleyrand's which M. Sarrans introduces a mot of M.de Talleyrand's which we never before heard, but which is so characteristic of the style of that eminent disear that we have no doubt of favour, except that of the lame gentleman in the sedan the style of the eminent disear that we have no doubt of chair. Louis Philippe was proclaimed king. M. Lafitte its authenticity. In a select society one evening at Lafitte's, they were talking of revolutions, and, we suppose, of the English revolution, which had called the Prince of Orange to the throne. 'Now,' said Berenger, 'if we had somebody,—the Duke of Orleans, for instance'—'The Duke of Orleans ?' interrupted M de Talleyrand; 'Ah, that would be—not somebody, but something?'

'Let us,' said he, 'take the younger branch instead of the elder, and the country is saved! Gerard says of Orleans?' interrupted M de Talleyrand; 'Ah, that would be—not somebody, but something?' would be-not somebody, but something!"

In proof of the ingratitude of Louis Philippe to Lafayactor in the affair:

lution. It would have been much easier to have joined influenced by timidity and reluctance to take on his own the cry of the people...." No more Bourbons!" than to head all the responsibilities of the revolution,—was glad endeavour to persuade them that the Duke of Orleans to devolve on the firmer temper and more masculine unendeavour to persuade them that the Duke of Orleans to devolve on the firmer temper and more masculine unwas not a Bourbon. The Duke, no doubt, took a step at once able and bold when he went to the Hotel de Ville; the moment was decisive, and it was there, no doubt, that he received the crown; but, beyond all doubt, he would not have gone had he not ascertained beforehand that Lafayette had adopted him; and it he had gone without Lafayette's concurrence, he would not have come out King of the French. vol. i. p. 199 on more trials for libels. Lafayette had be formed that the trial of libels there shall be no more trials for libels. It is not not according to this period is worth preserving. When at the Hotel de Ville the founders of the new dynasty were discussing their 'bill of rights,' and some one insisted that the trials of libels—delits de la presse—should be by jury, Louis Philippe exclaimed,—'Why talk of employing juries in the trial of libels? there shall be no more trials for libels. "—(il n'y aura plus pe délits de la presse)—vol. i. p. 66.

' Not come out King of the French?' exclaims Sarrans-'he would not have come out alire!' and he gives good promise, M. Sarrans proves statistically, by a catalogue of reason for his opinion-the duke was certainly in danger four hundred and eleven indictments for libels within the from some of the republican fanatics. The following ac- three first years of the reign, the great majority of which count of the procession of the new royalty to the Hotel were still more unluckily, for attacks on the king personalde Ville is graphic:

Who will ever forget the burlesque march of the candidate monarch? What eye that saw will ever cease to remember M. Lafitte in a sedan chair [Lafitte had a sore leg], following as close as possible the white horse of the citizen-king, or rather the royal horse to the duke of his patrimonial property. I succeeded resque scene of Messrs. Mechin and Vinnet [two leadin that object. With what warmta and energy did his highness not express himself against the Revolution, the chairman to maintain their position between the tail and what he called his errors (egaremens) of 1789 and 1799! Next morning I met him in the king's closet, where he was expressing the deepest gratitude to his tone that would have shaken a church? And then, the acclamations tolerably loud in the Court of the Palais Duke of Orleans was in a state of emotion difficult to describe.—vol. i. p. 114. the hero of Jemappe, endeavouring every now and then to revive, by his gestures and his voice, the flagging enthusiasm-turning round every minute to the sedan-chair to express to the people his devotion to M. Lafitte—making signs of confidence to General Gerard—smiling on M. Viennet—nodding to M. Mechin---and exhibiting his hat with tricoloured feathers to the dull and contemptuous eyes of the crowd! In the rear of all this followed a tail consisting of one reeling drummer, four doorkeepers, eighty members of the chamber of deputies, and a crowd of mute spectators. Who can ever forget that farcical close of the three glorious days? -р 202.

At the Hotel de Ville, however, the crowd was no longer mute; they were loud and violent against the Duke of Orleans, and for a republic. The Duke professed that he was himself 'all for the republic.' He had in the morning told M. Lafitte, 'How happy I should think myself to be a shopkeeper in the Rue St. Denis under the republie! and he now more emphatically declared that his reign would be 'but a bridge to arrive at the republic' himself gives us in a few words a picture of the state of minds of some of the leading men on this point.

In proof of the ingratitude of Louis Philippe to Lafay-ette, Sarrans quotes the following statement of M. Odillon doctrinaires, would rather have had Henry V., but accept-Barrot-a most competent witness, because an important ed Louis Philippe as the least departure, since departure there must be from the line of succession. The people were against any king, and only submitted-with a very 'I declare, on my honour and conscience, that General Lafayette held in his hands the result of the Revolation of Lafayette, who—himself > presse.)-vol. i. p. 66. The rashness of this over-liberal ly; and this number, we learn, has been increased since the publication of M. Sarrans work to near six hundred.

We are now arrived at some cabinet anecdotes; and when we remind our readers, that since July, 1830, there have been twenty essential changes in the French Cabinet -six being of prime-ministers—they will appreciate the measuring complacently his managed steps so as not difficulty of Louis Philippe's position who endeavors to outstrip the chairmen who carried the future prime steer between the two antagonist principles of monarchy Who could forbear to smile at the pictu- and revolution, and therefore obliged to appeal alternately

all d In fa mine nich

had i

first

b II an in case by the issue

to

th m

stu

ha

chi hav

Tal mei

iste

ed f

just indi

sion

ters : reagh Mette n'a p nich, mome tres d

VOL

to one and the other, and to be in turns a citizen-king and Lower Seine. His majesty read a little way and then a legitimate sovereign,-

' Je suis oiseau, voyez mes ailes-Je suis souris, vivent les rats!

In Louis Philippe's first ministry was an old republi- withdraw him." was reluctant but the king flattered-Lafayette advised,--(vol. ii. p. 61.)

justices of the peace, for the single department of the

stopped at the name of one Aynard, saying, 'I never will sign this list; here is a man whom I never will appoint to any public office.' 'Allow me, Sir, to ask why; and if there be the slighest taint on his integrity or patriotism, I 'That fellow,' said the king, 'went to can—one Dupont, called De l'Eure because he was deputy law with me.' 'Pardon, Sir, but that would be a reason of that department. As this man was the representative only if his suit was founded in fraud; but in that case you, of the republican party, it was of great importance in the no doubt, would have gained your cause.' 'No; I lost it.' first days of the new reign to have him in office. Dupont It was not till after a month of delay and discussion that the list was signed and the man appointed, (p. 64.) Again; Lafitte insisted, and Dupont yielded; but in a few months a few days after this the first presidency of the Court Roythe king discovered that he could not go on with him; he ale of Caen became vacant. Dupont proposed M. Le found him so full, as a royal apologist tells us, of 'sus- Menuet a patriot magistrate, who had been removed from ceptibilités democratiques,'-so democratically! impractica- that very seat during the Restoration. The king made ble, that it became absolutely necessary to get rid of him. several futile objections; he was too old, &c. At last he Dupont is offended, and in these days—when there is, it was driven to tell the real reason—this man had been emseems, no impropriety in revealing cabinet secrets—has had no scruple in furnishing Sarrans with some anecdotes of his long squabble, reminded him, that the King of France should intercourse with the king, in order to show that his alledged forget the quarrels of the Duke of Orleans, and Le Menuet crime of susceptibilites democratiques was no more than was appointed. Such is M. Sarrans' statement, who boldly an bonest adherence to the principles originally professed by the king himself. The differences began early, and as authority of Dupont himself—yet, we confess, these two usual, on trifles. Louis Philippe, observing that his minister did not wear the ribbon of the legion of Honour, should feel such unreasonable rancour—more incredible said, 'How, M. Dupont, you have not the cross? I give that he should avow it—and, most of all, avow it to the it to you, and here's my own,' taking it from his button-hole. 'Forgive me, Sire, I have long been an efficer of one little circumstance which leads us to hope and believe the order.' 'In that case I promote you to be a com- that the king is misrepresented. M. Sarrans, after this mander.' 'I thank your majesty but I cannot except that last story, goes on to say, that such scenes are frequent, favour.' M. Sarrans a little diminishes the value of this and that hardly did Dupont ever present a list of new apstardy self-denial, by letting out that M. Dupont would not pointments that the king would not exclaim, 'Shall we have been so obdurate, had he been offered, as was exnever be done with this St. Burthélemi of the public serpected and almost promised, either a pension or a place of vants? The king may from his private lawsuits have chief judge in one of the superior courts, which would learned something of the characters of Aynard and Le have been a permanent provision for the patriot minister! Menuet; they may be republicans and agitators, or otherwise bad subjects, and he may have demurred to them in-The next occasion of dissent was the appointment of dividually on that account; but there seems reason to be-Talleyrand to the embassy of London; this Dupont vehe-live that his chief and general objection was to the 'St. mently opposed, but in vain. Some days after, the min- Barthelemi'-the massacre-the sweeping disorganization ister of justice—that was Dupont's department—present- of the public service—which Dupont, to satisfy his own ed for the king's signature the appointment of twenty new political fanaticism and the expectations of the radical party, was endeavouring to effect.

When the budget was proposed in cabinet, a sum of 25,000 francs (1000l.) was appropriated to each minister indifferent about liberty, but that the whole national passion is for equality—an absurd sophism, which is refuted by way of outfit. Dupont refused to accept it; he said by the universal rage for every species of personal distinction which the Revolution has left---the peerage--all degrees of official rank---and, above all, the Legion said the king, 'your allowance for outfit?' 'Yes, Sir.'
of Honour, which has been lavished to the greatest and most ridiculous extent--
'Sir, I blame no one: I only obey my own conscience.' Sir, I blame no one; I only obey my own conscience.' As you please, Sir; but allow me to say, that there is such a thing as a wantonness of delicacy! Let us talk of something else.' A few days after another brusquerie republicaine of Dupont was near causing an open rupture. The cabinet was in deliberation; General Athalin, the nich son the mania of decorations with which Bonaparte king's aid-de-camp, came to tell him a second time that had infected continental Europe, and which, at the time a deputation from La Ferte-sous-Jouarre was waiting ne speak of, had not reached good old England. At the to present an address. 'Well,' said the king, rising first meeting of the Congress at Vienna, all the minis- and turning to his ministers, 'I must go and let off [lacher, a vulgar and hardly decent term] a little speech to them.' The king was probably not out of hearing when Dupont exclaimed with indignation, Let off a little speech! ... What's that he says? Let off! This very speech, nich, with affected surprise; and, after looking for a moment at the fine figure and plain attire of Lord Casmost patriotic figure in the Moniteur. We preserve it as a tlereagh, he added, 'Pas de decoration?---Ma foi! e'est curious specimen of the mode in which 'The King of the however, which his majesty treated so flippantly, made a French,' plays the part of a Liberal.

On les prodigue par boisseaux, Aux pékins comme aux généraux, Jusqu'aux merchands de toiles !"

In fact, not to be decorated is the distinction. This reminds us of a pleasant observation of Prince Metter. ters appeared in stars and ribbons, except Lord Castle-reagh, who had not yet had the Garter. One of the brilliant company saw this with surprise, and whispered Metternich--- Voyez donc, M. le Ministre d'Angleterre n'a pas de décoration.' 'Comment?' replied Mettertres distingue!

VOL. XXVIII. JANUARY, 1836 .- 5

^{*} It has been of late the fashion to say that France is

July, and walk in the ways of the Revolution which has tional Cabinet of the Tuileries! created it.' 'I hope,' said the king, 'we all mean the same thing.'-- Perhaps so; but it seems not in the same more curious anecdote. way. Your majesty may think that your ministry is Pending the proceedings against the ex-ministers, when, what it was at first, and if you do not take care'.—The out France. It happened that a murder had been commit-king endeavored to appease him, but he left the room.— ted in a distant department by a mother and daughter on to justify us, we hope, for offering some specimens.

Dupont and Thiers had been charged by the cabinet to know me-I promised to remain in office till after the trial laws must be executed. After some minutes of melanof the ex-ministers, and I generally keep my promises—choly silence the king said, 'I know my duty,—you are but if you wish that I should go sooner'—'I am very unanimous—I submit.' M. Dupont then gently moved far, M. Dupont'—'Oh, come, Sire, speak your mind.' 'I the warrant towards him for signature,—the king uttered should be very sorry, M. Dupont'-'As you please, Sire, but a cry of horror, and pushed the paper away. pray do not embarrass yourself on my account."—p. 78. Dupont my heart is as tender as yours, but I am responsible for the execution of the laws, and we must finish this even on M. Sarrans's own showing. The following must affair; besides, it is in some degree a kind of commutation have been still more agreeable.

a public proclamation, talked disrespectfully of the measures of the government. The majority of the Cabinet Let us have done with delays, Sire, for justice has its newere for removing him, and Lafayette and Dupont threat cessities.' We do not think that this speech showed ened to resign if Barrot should be dismissed. The king was either a tender heart or logical head-it failed at all events obliged personally to interfere to endeavor to arrange the to subdue the king. He again requested a further delay matter. 'I have spoken,' said he to Dupont, 'with M. de of forty-eight hours. At last he signed. The day after, Lafayette on the subject. M. Barrot's dismissal is very Lafatte, then prime minister, went into the closet,-the disagreeable to him, but he at length sees that it is abso-king had not closed his eyes all night,—he attempted to lutely necessary, and will consent to it provided he is not excuse what he called his weakness, but he could not arto appear in the business.' Dupont, who had just heard, ticulate three words; his emotions increased,—he lost his as he said, from Lafayette, that he 'never resuld consent to voice,—he burst into tears, and threw himself into the arms it,' replied, warmly, 'You are mistaken, Sire, Lafayette of M. Lafitte, exclaiming,- 'My father-my father-died never said so.' 'What, Sir, oried the king, 'do you give on the scaffold!'
me the lie?' 'I do not give you the lie, but I repeat that M. Sarrans treats this 'new-born humanity in the

I thank you for this excellent address—it expresses M. de Lafayette neither did nor could say what your mamy own sentiments. I have always maintained the lesty has repeated, for, not two hours ago, he told me the rights of the nation, and will always maintain them lirect contrary, and M. de Lafayette is not a man to wheel I identify myself with the people. Tell your constituents so. I am a Citizen-King.'—vol. ii. p. 70. king with gravity, you again give me the lie.' 'No, Siro, but On another occasion the Dectrinaire party in the cabinet I maintain the truth; but let us have done with it-I resign.' had prepared a restrictive law against clubs and associa. Then M. Dupont, I shall let the world know soly you retions, and the king supported it. Dupont was astonished, sign. I shall state that it is because you have insulted 'What?' he cried, 'the men of July are forbidden to as me.' 'And I shall state the contrary.' 'I shall give you semble, without special licence, if they exceed twenty? the lie.' 'Do so,' rejoined Dupont; 'and see which of the It is absurd—impossible? But, M. Dupont, replied the two the world will believe? And this scene occurred not king, the government must defend itself."— The govern-between two porters in a cellar of La Place Maubert, but ment needs no defence if it will follow the principles of between a king and the head of the law, in the constitu-

We shall conclude these strange revelations by a still popular; you are under a great mistake—I warn you'— as Sarrans sneeringly observes, Louis Philippe and his cabiBut, M. Dupont'—interrupted the king. Even as to you, net were seized with a sudden fit of humanity, a general Sire,' continued Dupont, 'you, yourself-it is no longer order was issued to suspend all capital punishments throughted in a distant department by a mother and daughter on (p. 77.)

These cabinet scenes though less surprising to the atrocity: they had been condemned, and were now in These cabinet scenes though less surprising to the prison awaiting punishment. The local authorities, Brougham-Durham controversy-are still curious enough says Sarrans, pressed the execution, stating that there was so much exasperation against the malefactors, that, if the sentence were not promptly executed, they could not be draw up a manifesto on the relations of France and Bel. responsible for the public peace. Dupont brought the gium according to certain principles previously agreed on. case before the cabinet, who agreed unanimously on the ne-When the draught was submitted to the king, he thought cossity of making an example. Dupont then stated the some of the expressions might be offensive to foreign pow. case to the king, and finding him adverse, insisted on his ers, and made considerable alterations with his own hand, hearing the matter debated before him in cabinet. He At the sight of these 'mutilations,' as he called them, Du-pont exclaimed, in allusion to a phrase in one of Moliere's During that week, the king, pale, feeble, and with a trembplays -- What a cursed boat I have embarked in ! -- Ah, ling voice, had never ceased repeating that he would yes?-said the king, good humouredly-it is a cursed rather resign his crown in all its newness, than sign a boat, indeed; but you have the good luck to be only a sentence of death. 'Really,' said M. Lafitte, I pity the king, passenger—I am in it for life.' 'For life?' replied Du. I think I am myself as good natured as another; but I canpont. 'Faith, at the rate you are going I am not sure of not comprehend his extreme uneasiness.' At last the day that; at all events, this may suit you, Sire, but it does not, for discussion arrived. The king came with haggard eyes, I boldly tell you, agree either with the principles of July trembling hands, and a feeble voice, and said, I am ready or with me? 'I hope, M. Dupont, you do not want to pick to hear.' The Duke of Broglie spoke first, and left nothing for his colleagues to add; they were unanimous—the of punishment you are about to sign, for we propose that M. Odillon Barrot, who was prefect of police, had, in you should remit to one of the parties the mutilation with n si ri te ni

ey

an

of thi

mi me D_0

Lo rep We

plo

tre-

part

was retri have min

of B

plore

duce

duty,

can

phras

rans justify a suspicion that Dupont insisted so vehemently revolts which ensanguine his country! for the execution of those wretched women with the view of forcing on the king a precedent for a capital execution? should on this occasion have contemplated the possibility of his being soon called upon to exercise his authority in the case of M. de Polignac and his colleagues—persons whom he individually knew, and whose errors he, with every other rational man, must have thought undeserving of death; but this contemplation would only serve to bring to his mind the case of his unhappy father, who, great as his crimes had been, undoubtedly was innocent of the facts for which he was condemned, and who perished-as M. de Polignac was in danger of doing-a victim to the blind fury of the populace. The association of ideas was therefore not merely natural, but inevitable; and admitting M. Sarrans's suspicion that Louis Philippe line under the special excitement of their officers, which see no reason—but the contrary—to suspect that he was not additionally influenced by the recollection of the fate that in one house only—No. 12 of the Rue Transnonain see no reason-but the contrary-to suspect that he was of his unhappy father.

and continues to be, more convulsed, more bloody, more was his first—the acceptance of the crown. We do not bly, the cause: for they are the fruits—the inevitable conretract our former opinion, that for that step there may sequences of the struggles between the principles on which have been some cogent and even laudable motives-the im- his authority is founded and the authority itself. In vain minent danger of a bloody anarchy on one side, and, on has he tried-by fifteen or sixteen changes of ministry, the other, the hope of preserving the crown in the house in which he has employed men of all shades, from the of Bourbon; but we fear the day will—if it has not alrea. Republican Dupont, to the Carlist Argout—to form a condy-come, when Louis Philippe and his family will desistent and coherent cabinet; equally vain will be his replore that he should have been, by any circumstances, in cent combination of a dozen third-rate lawyers under the duced to deviate from the straight road of honour and experienced mediocrity of the Duke of Bassano! M. de phrase, gladly exchange his citizen royalty to be 'a citi-was diligence in business, and moderation of character.

hing of the barricades,—the king of the mitroille of St. but how much more gladly would be find himself again Mery,-the king of the legal massacres of La Vendée,'- Duke of Orleans under the light and indulgent authority has a base hypocrisy, put on for the purpose of ultimately of the legitimate sovereign! We believe him in spite of saving the lives of the ex-ministers. We believe no such M. Sarrans's sneers, to be a man of humanity; what then thing-but might not this insinuation on the part of Sar must be not feel for all the blood shed in those monthly Occupied and alarmed with our own internal difficulties of forcing on the king a precedent for a capital execution? and dangers we pay too little attention to the state of It would be very natural and very reasonable that the king France. Does the English public know that there are at this moment more goals and more prisons in France than at any period of her history, except the short reign of Robespierre? Does the English public know that there now are, and have been for above six months, many hundreds of state prisoners, incarcerated under circumstances of illegality and severity which the annals of the old Bastille cannot exceed, and that these unhappy persons are, by every means which can evade the rigour of their gaolers, imploring but hitherto in vain, to be brought to trial? Does the English public know that-since the publication of M. Sarrans's work-in consequence of an émeute in last April, a massacre was perpetrated in Pairs by troops of the was actuated by the desire to save the ex-ministers, we was, under all its frightful circumstances, as horrible as the twelre persons-paralytic old men-young children-wo-But we must conclude; the long extract from the jour-men in their night-clothes-and men rising half dressed nal has already carried us far beyond the limits which we from their beds-and all, we need hardly add, as innocent should otherwise have assigned to this subject. M. Sar-as sleep-were murdered outright by la force publique rans's work, though written with great partiality and bit with every aggravation of brutality-one old man's corpse terness, and occasional malignity, contains a mass of unde- having FIFTY-ONE ball and boyonet wounds-that these dreadniable facts and reasoning exceedingly important to the ful scenes took place on the night of the 13th of April, and history of the July Revolution. M. Sarrans accumulates that now, in the month of November, there has been neievidence against Louis Philippe personally of inconsisten ther justification for innocence, nor punishment for guilt, ey in his principles, and ingratitude towards his partisans, nor vengeance for blood? And the city of Paris-so and he proves that the reign of the Citizen-king has been, inured has it become to such samples of 'liberty and order' -seems to think as little about it as the city of London. despotic, than any similar period in the whole half century But the king, in whose name, and in whose supposed of revolution, the Reign of Terror hardly accepted; but defence these dreadful deeds were done-ought his he has not shaken our opinion that it is highly unjust to heart to be more at ease, his eye less haggard, his nights throw, as he and his party do, all the blame of these errors, less sleepless, than when he had to sanction the legal execumisfortunes, and crimes, upon the king and his govern-tion of a parricide? We are well aware that such scenes ment. The real source of the evil is the Three Glorious sometimes occur in war, by marauders and plunderers, and Days and the principles which they brought into fashion. in towns taken by storm, and we know that when the Louis Philippe has had all along but one alternative- fury of a soldiery is once excited, it is difficult to restrain either to abandon the government to the anarchists, or to it; but when did it ever before happen that a great capital repress the anarchists with the strong hand of power.— was placed by its own government in a state of siege— We may lament, and we do most sincerely lament, the de stormed by its own garrison—and men, women, and chilplorable scenes of which France has been and is the theadren put to the sword, naked or in their beds, by the potre—the prosecutions, the persecutions, imprisonments, lice of the city? We really wonder that a humane and massacres, which have desolated her principal cities, and enlightened man like Louis Philippe does not abdicate at particularly Paris; but-tu l'as roulu, George Dandin-it all rieks a crown which he finds can only be maintained is the just price and inevitable punishment of rash revolt by such a series of horrors—horrors, for which he may and blind innovation. Louis Philippe's only error as king not be personally blamcable, but of which he is, ostensiduty, and to forget the allegiance which he had so often Bassano may be, for aught we know, personally a respectable man; but even in his best days—under his earliest can well believe that he would now, to repeat his own masters, the Directory and Buonaparte—his chief merit gen shopkeeper in the Rue St. Honore under the republic; He has not probably become, by increase of years, bolder, such a stormy crisis. His administration, therefore, gives tering, to share the delight with which a couple of donus no hopes; it must be feeble, and it will be short,—and keys (after either standing all day in the sun in the dusty may, we fear, tend rather to aggravate than lessen the difference town, or being hard ridden and well thumped by reckless system (which he has all along partially followed) of govern- approach was, no doubt, music to the mother's ears. ing by himself, and relying on, not his ministers but his army. But in their present anomalous and conflicting state, mat- whose parents they probably belonged, as they were furters cannot remain. France must again pass through a despotism-a republic-or a restoration,-and probably dock, which, after having turned in their happy beasts, all these-before she can settle down into a constitution which shall command the undivided respect and rational obedience of the nation. Neither the sovereignty of the refused to move in the coarse ponderous padlock, which people, nor the power of the sword, can ever be the basis of a permanent government!

From the Juvenile Forget-Me-Not, for 1836.

THE DONKEY BOY AND THE DOG-ROSE.

By the Author of "SELWYN," "MORNING WITH MANNA," &c.

tionaries alone you probably do, as well as from the fre-quent allusions of older persons—that there was once in keys for their supper) from all further cares for the fashion a science called "physiognomy," by which its inventor (a Swiss physician named Lavater), and his followers, among whom I believe we may all more or less a far higher rank of life than these poor donkey boys, be reekoned, professed to discover the characters of indiand older too-for the eldest seemed hardly eightviduals from the features and expression of the face?— would have been quite content with the "thank'ye, And are you aware, that to this somewhat exploded theory ma'am," and pull of his little ragged cap, with which has succeeded, in our times, another styled "phrenology," the party most obliged got over his obligation to my exemplified, I dare say, to yourselves sometimes by the good aunt and ran off to his sport. But to her surprise gentlemen at whose knee you stand thumping your little and she was not ashamed to own her delight-his little heads all over, according to which many think they as companion, a year younger (and hardly looking, as he certain, by the bumps raised by nature (not falls or fisty- was, seven years old), turned back from following his cuffs) on the tender skull, what sort of persons you will brother, and shyly but yet confidingly looked up in her all turn out in after-life, and what sort of lessons you will face and offered her a white briar-rose he held in his take most kindly to in the meantime?

amiable, but infinitely surer and safer than the ones I have my aunt, who loved them, had been searching the hedges mentioned; in which my grand-aunt, one of the best and in vain), brilliant and new blown, without a speck cleverest of women, professed herself an adept: and that of dust on its snowy petals or deep green glossy leaves, is, the guessing at or rather forming an entire character but evidently dear to its little owner's heart and fancy; out of the glimpses afforded into its hidden economy by and that it was which, with the grateful feeling evinced slight, and to many persons insignificant traits. My aunt, by parting with it, as well as the pretty manner of the it is true, was not infallible; she had no window, to be action itself, gave it its value in my aunt's discerning sure, that looked directly into that dark "chamber of imegyes. Her divining faculty was immediately at work, agery," the heart, but she was seldom wrong in it: and and told her—how could a dog-rose say so much, and that you may be aware how favour worth having may be that in five minutes?—that, in the little sickly bud of sometimes won by trifling marks of a good heart (as I humanity before her lay folded up the precious elements am sure you all are among yourselves, how easily it may of gratitude, and taste, and feeling. Gratitude to acknow-be lost by even slight tokens of a bad one), I shall tell ledge and requite even a trifling favour; taste to select you, as she has often told me, the story of the Donkey and value an elegant but simple flower; feeling to dis-Boy and the Dog-Rose. These are not fine materials to cern that it would be equally appreciated by another; found a tale upon. Yet from nothing more exalted than and, above all, that most winning of human qualities, the former, or more rare than the latter, sprung the whole disinterestedness, in giving his pet rose away. train of grateful prosperity on the one hand, and gratified benevolence on the other, which forms the subject of the kind aunt's head to her heart. Indeed, I rather think enjoyment, and more especially for those creatures to whom pretext she could make for learning something more if was a rare luxury, led her to pause, and even turn back about the family.

firmer, or more capable of holding the helm of the state in a few steps in the pretty lane along which she was saunficulties of Louis Philippe, unless, indeed, its extreme little visiters to the place) were returning to their pasture, weakness should be another step in the unconstitutional and one of them to her colt, whose impatient bray at her

> The animals were ridden a-field by two little boys, to nished with a key to the carefully locked gate of the padthey endeavoured (with an attention that betokened creditable bringing up) to fasten again. But the rusty key (the gate being a very high one) swung far above the little urchin, who, when he had unlocked it so cleverly, forgot he was exalted on the back of the now far distant donkey. In vain did he clamber even on the top of the gate itself; the more he twisted and turned at the unlucky key, the more stubborn did it seem to grow.

b

ri ti

th

m

wa

it's

as t

28 Y

be s

mal

and

town

Bloo ent i for h

poeti hear

joym that :

inclin

destir Th

in Ha eleme

of fut

My aunt was not one to see childhood in distress, even of this trifling sort, without stepping in to remove it. One turn of her dexterous hand, exerted from the proper position, on a level with the refractory lock, set-Do you know, my dear young friends-from your die tled the matter at once; and released the boys (as ready,

Now, most children, and many good children too, in hand.

But there is a third sort of divination, not only more Now, it was not only the first of the season (at least following pages.

My aunt, a widow lady of large fortune and influence, was walking late on a summer evening in the neighbour-hood of a beautiful village in the Isle of Wight. Her sympathy for every thing that lived and had a capacity for remarked), but walked off herself after them, to see what shady side of fifty), that before she reached the cottage for life on one briar-rose's testimony. the eldest was riding on the gate, for which his late clamber had probably inspired him with a relish; while the and can feel for such; and, having no children of my own, youngest (young enough, she perceived, to be yet wearing am the more disposed to help those of others. If you a pinafore), who had his floricultural propensities "finely will trust me with Jem to S— (only across the water, developed," helping his mother to water her pinks and you know), he shall weed the grounds under my gardener

The widow coloured, just about as faintly and prettily good behaviour." as the fading "May" bush under which she was stand. The poor women

he liked roses better than rattles, and put down his little woman, "how can you make such a return to so kind a face to smell them long before he could speak; and now lady?" you see he'd rather help me water than ride or play with Bill."

thought my aunt. "Love to his mother may have some by Monday, when my servants leave this to go home be-

she, to draw out further particulars.

"No! please your ladyship," said the mother, firmly, ten good years to come. Now, Master Thorpe, the shoe- in the business." maker in town, says he'll take him, for poor James's sake and mine, for nothing, and give him a bite and sup with she told him the story of his brother gardener's orphan

"A lover of roses-one of Nature's florists to be bred a father. town shoemaker :" thought my aunt; and poor Robert "It shan't be my fault, ma'am, if we dont make him Bloomfield, the poet, of whom you must all have heard, one," said the good natured Wilks, whose soul was in eat in irragination before her-creating a world of beauty his profession also; "he takes to it mighty natural for for himself and others in a dingy garret, among rude, un- such a hop o' my thumb as he is!" joyment in despite of physical obstacles, and recollected for he grew and throve under them as a plant, that has in Hampshire had been lately transferred to his natural fore him, whether his conduct and docility had been such element, the stable, his bent for which was testified by as to justify her in keeping him as an apprentice, and breaking the shrubbery for whips, and bestriding every future journeyman, instead of making shoes in a garret, ridable and unridable animal in the parish. And here seemed a present opening, at least, for Jem, if his mother would let him go so far, on the mere chance (if deserved) fastest, at this last supposition, to the eye of the boy (by of future favour; for my aunt, kind and warm-hearted as whom it had long been lost sight of in brighter antici-

They, however, so far outran her (my aunt was on the she was, had not romance enough in her to adopt a protege till he is big enough to go to his trade, and perhaps longer, "Your son seems fond of flowers, I think," said my if he behaves as well as so kind a mother's son ought to aunt to the pale, mild-looking woman, with widow written do. He shall have decent clothes to work in, schooling as plain on her face as her cap; "and a judge of them, after work-hours, and good wholesome food to strengthen too; for this rose he has just given me might sit for its him for whatever may be his lot in life. Remember, I promise no more, and even this will depend on his own

The poor woman was overjoyed, of course, for, like little ing, and said, "Jem takes after one that's gone, my lady Jem, she was not selfish; and the thought of her boy's -his father was a gardener;" and the poor woman present gratification and possible future welfare far out brushed her eyes with the corner of her little boy's weighed in her mind the pain of parting from him. Some boys would have made their best bow to the lady-even "And you would like to be one too, I dare say," said Bill would have tugged his cap and said "Thank ye!" my aunt, stooping over Jem to give his mother time to But Jem's feelings lay always too deep for words; and. recover herself. The child only blushed, the same pale having no rose in his hand to convey them by to a stranger, tint as his mother; and she answered for him, "That he he sidled up to his mother, hid his face in her apron, and would my lady! he's just wild for it. From the cradle began to cry. "Oh! Jem, Jem!" cried the mortified

"I like him all the better for it," said my aunt; "joy and grief both at once are too big for his little heart, and "There may be more than love of flowers in that," I should be sorry he left his mother with dry eyes. But, thing to do with it, and, perhaps, love to his father's me-fore me, Jem will step with a lightened heart into the boat mory too—who knows?" "And do you think to make a gardener of him?" asked reconcile him to S-, not to mention old Wilks, the gardener, who is a friend to industrious little boys."

To shorten a long story (about nothing, too, I am afraid yet reluctantly, glancing at Jem as if sorry to blight the some will think), Jem arrived safe at S—; and if he hope she knew was at his young heart. "He that's gone cried for grief to leave his mother, he cried again for joy warned me against it. 'No lone woman,' says he to me, when he first saw, the beautiful garden in which he was poor fellow ! 'can afford to breed a son a gardener now-a- to live all day long. By the time Mrs. S- got home days; for even if one could scrape the 'prentice fee (and (which, having visits to pay, was not for a month, though it's a mortal high one), they won't take little boys now, her directions about Jem had been minutely attended to), as they used to do, but must have great lads that can dig Wilks reported that the little island boy was the steadiest as well as learn; -so that poor Jem there (who's like to at a job of weeding of any chap of his years he ever saw. be smally) couldn't hope to do for me or himself even for "He does it, ma'am, as if he loved it-as if his heart was his own to save him coming home to dinner with me." boy, and his strong wish to be a gardener, like his poetical journeymen! But though she blessed God in her But a hop o' my thumb (thanks to fine air, gentle exheart for endowing him with this possibility of mental en- ercise, and wholesome food) Jem did not long remain; that among the most successful of our florists are the melanguished in a poor, ungenial soil, expands when brought chanics of smoky Sheffield and Manchester, she yet felt into one adapted to its nature. Many where the suits inclined to save Jem the struggle between his nature and of neat drab working-clothes which Jem had outgrown before the time came when, being too old for a weed-The boy who weeded the grounds at her beautiful place ing-boy any longer, his kind mistress asked Wilks, be-sad prospect of being prematurely invalided by rheuma-tism had for some time been impending with cruel cer-fire to the wood-stack in the court-yard, behind his lady's tainty. "Keep him, by all means, ma'am," said he dressing-room) the cuts received in the struggle, from a warmly; "I'd rather trust him now, child as he is, to scythe-blade the ruffian carried, were first carefully dressed lay a lot of carnations, or pot a few tender cuttings, by her own hands; and when, some days later, at the when my back won't let me stoop to it, than either of trial, he was told by the judges on the bench that they the two hulking lads, who eat twice as much victuals, scarce knew which most to admire, his veracity in the and have journeymen's wages besides!"

And a journeyman in due time Jem became, too; requiting the old gardener's protection in the way most con-court; "it was his gratitude which I thought most of." genial to his grateful disposition, by being literally "feet to the lame," and enabling his old teacher, by the skill and lowed her reverentially to the grave—served her successor, luable place some years longer than would otherwise have flock of children in hereditary devotion to her memory. been the case. And w' as at length the faithful servant, yielding to age as well as infirmity, was with his own consent pensioned off, he resigned his beloved garden to his youthful deputy, not only without repining, but with a secret pride in the superior skill and ability of his pupil and successor.

The first thing Jem did on being installed in the pretty garden house, whose roses he had tied up so many years be-fore he dreamed they could ever be his, was to fetch his mother to inhabit it with him. Bill's settlement in life had just left her alone in her own humble dwelling; and Jem, from whom, at every annual visit, she had felt it more painful to part, carried her off in as much triumph (the old neighbours said) "as if the dear old woman had been a bride." "And no bride," thought he to himself, "shall I ever carry home who would wish it otherwise!"

His good mistress, I am sure, did not. She knew that dutiful sons not only make kind husbands but faithful servants also,

The fidelity of Jem was soon put to a trial very different from those to which all in his station are liable. Not only would he have scorned to wrong his employer by selling or giving away (as many gardeners do) what was not his to bestow; not only would he prevent any one else from wronging her at the risk of all the ill-will it might draw down upon him, but he really shewed himself ready, which is not often necessary for servants in modern times, to hazard his life for his benefactress.

are, many of you, my young friends, are quite old enough states committed to his charge, terminating a little to the to remember the rick-burnings and other sad doings by south-west of Canton. It was near the close of the year which ignorant and misled people, a very few years ago, 1812, and this progress was the first that had been made outraged Providence and destroyed their own means of in this direction for fourteen years.

sometimes lives of others.

her late husband for agricultural pursuits, was more nearly was not over-fond of ship-visiting; but, being obliged by attached than is usual in country seats to the farm-offices; the nature of his office to go on board one of our ships, and as these were again surrounded by huge ricks of corn the Warley was selected to receive that honour. Her and hay, Jem, during the fires, could get no sleep at night captain was absent, being extremely ill at Canton, and she thinking of the danger his dear lady would run should the was, therefore, only under the command of her chief officer, bands of incendiaries (who seemed in their blind rage to Mr. N-..... Her selection, on this account, occasioned spare neither friend nor foe) make their way to her a little discontent among the commanders of the other premises. If they could lose sight (as was then too often ships; but the Warley had been longest arrived, was the case) of her many benefits, Jem could not. Gratitude therefore in the best order, and was the largest and finest was still, as at seven years old, the prevailing sentiment in ship. his breast; and for nights together, after all the toils of the day, did he keep guard (unknown to all but his approving portance in China, closely related by blood to the Emperor, mother, whose prayers, you may believe, went with him and, therefore, not only royally, but celestially, descended. to his midnight watch) through all the long dark hours, The hum of his approach preceded him for days; and with his loaded sparrow-gun, over his mistress's valuable nothing could present a stronger proof that superstitious pations), or of the old gardener himself, over whom the when having succeeded in apprehending, after a desperate witness-box or his courage in the fray?

" I could have told them," said my nunt, who was in care with which he executed his orders, to retain his va- for her sake, with equal fidelity-and brought up a fine

From the Juvenile Forget-Me-Not, for 1836.

tl

th

of

ch

m

th

na

80

SUL

of

len

con

fron

ther

exec

of th

seve com

his

ceed

but t

rious

rest,

cers

ley at

was,

of the

leadin

purpo did no

placed

and he before

the lin vidiual

found |

timidly old Vi

cushior

that it

TO THE ROBIN.

WHY before me chirp and flutter? Pretty bird, thy wishes tell; Though I know not what thou'dst utter, Guessing, perhaps, may do as well.

If I'm near thy nestled darlings, If thou atriv'st their haunt to hide, I, who scarce know tits from starlings, Know myself-and turn aside.

Meditating no invasion On thy little sacred store, Here came I without occasion, Here most likely come no more.

From the Forget-Me-Not, for 1836. A CHINESE VISITATION.

BY THE HON. MRS. ERSKINE NORTON

Notices had been received at Canton that the Vicerov of the district to the south of Pekin had taken his depar-Civilised as these times are called, and in some respects ture from that capital, and was in progress through the subsistence, while they madly injured the property and Orders were received from the Factory, by the company's ships lying at Whampon, to hold themselves in rea-My aunt's house, in consequence of the partiality of diness to welcome the great man, who, it was suspected,

farm-yard and yet more precious person.

And was he not rewarded, think you, my young friends, vernment of China than the universal flight which his approach occasioned—not that the people dreaded oppression durins were impressed with the idea that the Englishman or injustice, but—they dured not to okupon him! they ima that performed the totan, although rather in an awkward gined such a sight would strike them blind; and upon and inexperienced manner. an occasion when other nations would think it the highest Having met with a gracious reception, the officers re-

The river and its banks, always swarming with life and stillness; the provision-boats, usually managed by women, the regal boat was no sooner alongside, than up ran seveslipped away from their accustomed stations about the ral of the attendants with a ladder of their own, which ships, bearing with them sea-nymphs of all sorts, bidding they fixed and covered very expeditionsly with carpeting. In adieu to their English friends, and hastening to hide the mean time, the chief officer descended into the boat, meteor had appeared and passed.

of the East India Company, those princes among mer-from the gangway to a sort of chair of state, which had man-of-war impresses an intelligent foreigner so much as selves round in silence, presenting a line of backs, decothat of one of these trading vessels: the one, in more or rated with long plaited tails, reposing on their rich robes navy; but the other is peculiar to England, a type of the head round a little, and said in an anxious undertone in solidity of her wealth and of her wisdom.

surrounded by the officers, several supercargoes, and some in his chair, bowed again, and took his station by his side. of the first Chinese merchants of Canton, all in full dress; riously fitted up. rest, was soon alongside that of the Viceroy; all the offi- stature and advanced in years. cers were received on board with much politeness; the As soon as the Viceroy was seated, a pipe was presentthe line, in spite of the almost painful efforts of each indi-very much, but begged there might be no guns fired off vidual to restrain it: The disconcerted leader, however, while he was on board.

respect they could pay to assemble round their sovereign, turned to their boats, and, taking that of their visiter in or his representative, the Chinese, with a more exalted tow, quickly gained the opening of Whampon Reach; on idea of reverential awe, considered themselves unworthy their coming in sight, the Company's ships manned their to look upon him, and that the only proper thing to do yards, and saluted with twenty-one guns, to the no small was to get out of his way in all directions, as fast as pos-discomposure (as they afterwards learned) of the object of their courtesy.

The Warley had, of course, her side-ladder (a perfect activity, began to present an appearance of unnatural staircase in point of convenience and safety) ready; but themselves in some little creek, until the expected earthly and received the Viceroy at the door of his cabin; after having made a very profound obeisance, he took him by The morning arrived; the English ships were decked the hand and helped him up the ladder. On his arrival out in all their colours, ready to fire their salute and man on deck, all the Englishmen bowed respectfully; but the their yards at the expected signal. They were all ships Chinese merchants, who had formed themselves into a line chants. I do not think that the view of our most superb been placed in the centre of the quarter-deck, turned themless perfection, is common to all nations that can arm a of cloth and silk. One of them ventured to move his English: "Leave go his hand, Mr. N-;" but Mr. The chief officer of the Warley stood upon his deck, N- declined the hint, and, having seated the Viceroy

The dress of all the Chinese present was not only splenthe band was at its station, and the collation prepared. At did, but, what we less expect to learn, was remarkably length, the distant sound of the gong gave notice of the becoming. It consisted of the finest broadcloth of the approach of the Viceroy; every ship sent off a boat to meet darker colours, chiefly crimson and puce, confined round him; that of the Warley, under the command of her sethe waist by a belt, embroidered in gold, or silver, with a cond officer, of course took the lead. They attained the clasp of precious stones; a large square of silk was laid on bend of the river, which concealed the Viceroy's boats the breast and back, also richly embroidered with various from view, and, turning it, were soon in contact with devices, of which the crane was the most prevailing. The them. The first boat of the procession was that of the caps of the Mandarins were peculiarly shaped, the higher executioner, in which was erected a gallows, surrounded part being composed of a profusion of thick silk threads, by soldiers armed with swords and whips: then came that gathered and fastened at the top with a brilliant gem, difof the Viceroy, attended numerously by others, containing fering in size and value according to the rank of the several Mandarins, his household and troops, together with wearer. The military wore in addition one or two peacomplete depots of all that it was thought possible he or cock's feathers drooping backwards. Boots turned up and his cortege might require. Nothing by the bye, can ex-square-toed, of black satin, very handsomely embroidered, ceed the comfort and order of Chinese boats generally; completed the dress. The prevailing colour of the Vicebut those in which persons of distinction travel are luxu-roy's was yellow. Most of the Chinese present were tall The Warley's boat, followed by the and well formed; the Viceroy himself was of rather low doors of the Viceroy's cabin were thrown open, and the ed to him by one of his attendants, while another filled it officers, forming a line, with their companion of the Warley at their head, prepared to enter. He of the Warley single whiff. For a few minutes a perfect silence prevailwas, although young, rather short and fat; in the anxiety ed. Mr. N—— then gave a signal to the band, which of the moment to support, with dignity and propriety, the struck up with a roll of the long drum. The old man leading part allotted to him on this occasion, and for that started, and, taking the pipe from his mouth, enquired purpose holding up his head in a becoming manner, he hurried what that was. He was told it was music by an did not perceive a small ledge at the entrance of the cabin, English band. He had the good breeding to listen with placed along as a support to the doors-it tripped him up, apparent pleasure to our national air; but he whispered and he came with a heavy, ecrambling fall upon his face something to his interpreter, who, stepping round to the before the Viceroy. An irrepressible titter ran through chief officer, told him that the Viceroy liked this music found his feet, brushed his knees with his sleeve, and then After the performance, the Viceroy was apprized that timidly looking up, met the grave and placid eyes of the refreshments were laid for him below, but could be brought old Viceroy, almost buried as he was among his silken up on deck should he prefer it; he replied, he was very cushions. What made the blunder more diverting was, comfortable where he was, and desired that they should that it was easy to perceive that the Viceroy and his Mancourse, was not permitted by his English hosts. While and the cherry-brandy went merrily round. the trays were preparing below, the Viceroy amused himself by conversing with a few of the backs and long plaited tails, that still kept the same immoveable line in which deed! truly oriental and imperial!-twelve fine fat bulthey had at first arranged themselves; he spoke to them locks, several jars of wine, (a light acid wine resembling by name, and seemed to be as familiar with them as we claret, but inferior to it) tubs of preserves, a suit of clothes are with faces of our acquaintances; and, had they changed for each of the ship's company, and two suits, with a preplaces and turned round, he would, probably, have been at sent of money, for each of the band. A small, neat parcel a loss to know immediately and exactly which were the faces that belonged to such or such among his friends, the beautiful workmanship, and in it were two little gold pills; backs.

The trays were brought up, and from one of them he took some very slight refreshment; he then accepted, with evident pleasure, a glass of cherry-brandy, which the Chinese are very fond of; he took half and presented the remainder to Mr. N-, who, being aware of the great compliment his so doing implied, received it with satis-

He then requested to know whether it would be agreeable to the Viceroy to view the ship below; this was acceded -, as before, handed him down the companion ladder: although touching his hand was evidently a breach of Chinese etiquette, yet the Viceroy being a perfectly well-bred man, and the principles of good-breeding being the same in all countries, however they may vary in external appearances, he by no means declined the proffered assistance. On arriving below, he seemed to appreciate the order, neatness, and comfort, of the arrangements; and admired the spacious and handsomely fitted up cabin rived at a safe distance.

band again commenced; he waved his hands to the Eng- afford, it must be confessed, but too good grounds for his lish; spoke affably, as he passed along, to the backs and sarcastic remarks. Here, however, besides the feelings of tails; and, assisted by Mr. N-, descended to his boat, the soldier and the royalist, additional bitterness is imparted followed by his immediate attendants. The chief officer to the Colonel's pen, by his recollection of the sufferings saw him safely immersed among his silken cushions in and losses of his 'father-in-law, Don Francisco Arambureo, his own cabin, and then took his leave, receiving many one of the wealthiest landed proprietors of Caraccas.' But compliments and thanks from the Viceroy. As soon as at the same time he is a strong partisan of negro eman-

boats in silence, and then the real fun of the business ment, contains some of the most pointed examples which commenced. The Chinese faced about, and embraced have yet been adduced in its favour. He is moreover a each other and their English friends, with marks of extra-political economist; and has garnished his pages with a vagant joy; as to Mr. N-, he had risen many degrees great many citations from Say, who appears to be his favour-in their opinion, and a certain reverence mingled with ite authority. But with all his ardour for the cause of free their first congratulations to him. "How happy you must trade in general, he nevertheless impresses upon his gobe! You have held him unreproved by the hand! You vernment, the necessity of protecting the manufactures of have taken cherry-brandy out of the same glass! You have spoken face to face to the near relative of the sun and Puerto Rico will not take, though as good and better than moon! Are not you dazzled? do not your eyes water?" At those of France and England, owing to a perverse prejuthis the Englishman's politeness gave way, and he burst dice; and they should be compelled, in his opinion, to adopt into such a long and glorious laugh, that not only his more impartial sentiments by the gentle arguments of the eyes watered to their heart's content, but the infection Custom House; while, on the other hand, they should be caught his comrades and English guests, and many even restrained from importing provisions from abroad, that they of the Chinese, who, being well-informed men, and in the may be encouraged to develope their own agricultural reconstant habit of communication with foreigners, had sources. If, without entering into our military author's (whatever they might pretend to outwardly) got rid of speculations on these subjects, we shall content ourselves many of their prejudices. After this unexpected deathwith the facts which he has brought before us, concerning blow to all dignity, some of the commanders of the other the present condition of this island, we shall find, in his ships having come on board, the good things were vigor- details, some singular views of a state of society which were ready to be sent from his own boat, but this of ously attacked; the salute was fired, the band struck up

Their glee was by no means moderated by the arrival of a large boat with presents from the Viceroy-presents inwas handed to Mr. N-; it contained a silk purse of he was assured that this was a rare and highly complimentary present, and that the pills possessed some extraordinary virtues.

Thus concluded this Chinese Visitation, apparently much to the satisfaction and enjoyment of all parties.

From the Edinburgh Review.

R

ÀB

th

st ne

au

un

mi

tin

of

the

все

En

to v

not clin

dist

the

Her mor

nun

An Account of the present state of the Island of Puerto Rico. By Colonel FLINTER, of the General Staff of the army of her Most Catholic Majesty. 8vo. London: 1834.

This volume has the recommendation of presenting us with a full and interesting account of a valuable island, less known in this country than evan Japan or Madagascar: and it possesses an additional value in our eyes, from being the production of a writer who has evidently formed his opinions on his own account. His sentiments do not savour of any class or school: on the contrary, he frequently advances, in the same breath, positions which are of the captain; but the more important parts of the ship, its usually maintained by persons of opposite principles in machinery, and management, he appeared not in the least political matters. Thus, being an officer in the service of to understand, and, therefore, remarked them but slightly; Spain, he has a high respect for the administration of the he was, however, much struck at the number and size of late King Ferdinand, and a thorough contempt for the all the guns, enquired their calibre, and asked several other various liberal sects which overturned his absolute throne, questions concerning them; at the same time, requesting and have now taken his daughter under their protection. that the parting-salute might not be fired until he had ar- He moreover holds in utter abhorrence all the promoters of the South American revolution, and all persons and things On his coming on deck he prepared for departure: the connected with the new republican governments; which they had pushed off, the bands ceased and the gongs began. cipation; and his book, written before, but published after, For a short space, those on board watched the receding the passing of that great enactment by the British Parliawas not believed to exist in the West Indies, and which, although even here, water, according to our author, is a priori conceived impossible.

years, the regiment of Spanish troops which was in perinternal condition. It will be perceived, no doubt, that his reader will make allowance for the spirit of exaggeration which appears occasionally to dictate his eulogies on his favourite colony.

The early history of Puerto Rico affords few features of interest. Although one of the oldest colonies of the Spanish crown, it served for three centuries only as a convict station; and its free population presented, until a few years ago, a marked specimen of the besotted indolence which military and civil expenses were defrayed by remittances mere occasional torrents. from Mexico; and it was not until the revolution caused to the extreme embarrassment of its financial condition, like many of the early acts of the restored government, by its enlightened sagacity. But this decree, whilst it greatly encouraged free industry, unfortunately at the same time gave an impulse to the employment of slave labour, which of capital than from motives of humanity. Colonists whre invited to the island on the most liberal terms-lands were allotted gratis; the settlers were freed from direct taxes, and, for a certain number of years, from the tithes and alcabala; as well as from the exportation duties, which formed one of the most impolitic features of the old Spanish system.

From the period of this decree, the advance of Puerto in the virgin regions of America. A preat additional impulse was given by the arrival of capitalists, driven by civil war from the Spanish Main; -men distinguished in the more prosperous times of South America for their, steady regularity and probity in the transaction of busi. 180 inhabitants to the square mile. ness. Our limits will not allow us even to abridge our author's account of the rapid improvements of the island; and of the manner in which her soil has been cultivated until she is become, next to Brazil and Cuba, the most forthe production of their staple article, and at the same time a granary competent to supply all the ordinary wants of her abundant population.

The island appears to be one of the most lovely of all island is frequently without rain for many months together, the results displayed in the work before us. VOL. XXVIII. JANUARY, 1836 .- 6.

according to theories generally received amongst us, was always found at half a yard beneath the surface. The sugar-cane, notwithstanding the drought, thrives abund-Colonel Flinter appears to have commanded, for several antly, and most of the chief plantations of this island are formed on this coast. This inestimable benefit of moismanent garrison at Puerto Rico; and must have had am-ture, Puerto Rico derives from its forests, which as wet ple opportunities of becoming fully acquainted with its clothe a large portion of the interior; the thick cover at once attracting the rain and preventing evaporation. By local partialities sometimes lead him into apparent over-the laws of the colony every person who cuts down a tree statements and manifest contradictions; but every candid is bound to plant three in its place. But it is to be feared that a law so difficult of enforcement is habitually violated, and that it will come, like some other islands, which formerly exhibited a similar feature, to present a naked surface to the ineffectual vapours of the Atlantic: its fertility will then diminish, and its perennial rivers waste away; even as the clearing of the forests on various parts of the Mediterranean coasts,-in peninsular Greece and Sicily, for example, -which were well wooded within the historical characterised a Spanish settlement of the old times. The era, has diminished the classical rivers of antiquity into

Although the climate of Puerto Rico does not appear to these remittances to cease in 1810, that the island, owing differ materially, as far as its effects can be measured by instruments, from that of other islands of the Gulf of began to attract the notice of the mother country. In Mexico, yet its inhabitants certainly seem to enjoy a more 1815 a decree was published in its behalf, distinguished, than ordinary exemption from the evils which afflict humanity in these sickly regions. The mortality, according to our author's tables, does not exceed that which prevails in some of the healthier countries of Europe. A still more singular characteristic appears to distinguish this had hitherto been unused, rather from indolence and want island from its neighbours, namely, the great deficiency of native animals of every sort; especially the entire absence (if our author can be credited) of those noxious reptiles and insects which seem to inherit the rest of the West Indies as their peculiar possession.

The population of Puerto Rico amounted, according to the Spanish census of 1830, to 323,858; of which 127,287 were free people of colour, and 34,240 only, slaves. But Rico in wealth and population has been unexampled, even as the numbers of all the classes were probably underrated; and as there was every inducement to return an under estimate of the slaves, in order to avoid the capitation, our author calculates, apparently on good grounds, the whole number at 400,000, and the slaves at 45,000; or nearly

Here, then, we have a free white population of 200,000 souls, or half the entire amount of inhabitants. What causes can have produced a result so utterly different from that which exists in all the West India Islands, except midable rival with which our colonies have to contend in those of Spain? Whence arises this numerous and prosperous Creole yeomanry, (for we shall see that a great proportion of them are owners or occupiers of land,) whilst other colonies are divided between a few white proprietors, and a degraded multitude of slaves, with hardly a vestige those regions of leveliness which are washed by the Carib. of an intermediate class? Such was not always the state bean Sea. Even in that archipelago it is distinguished by of our own islands. Without admitting the exaggerated the luxuriance of its vegetation and the soft variety of its accounts of the early greatness of Barbadoes, we have scenery. It comprises every kind of tropical landscape in abundant evidence that Antigua, St. Kitts, Dominica, and a space not much exceeding the area of one of the larger, other colonies, possessed, a hundred years ago, a multitude of English counties, Like Jamaica, it is divided from cast English settlers; who have gradually dwindled away, by into west by a range of forest-covered monntains, which do temperance, by their own misconduct, and above all through not appear to exceed 3000 or 4000 feet in height, but the extension of the sugar cultivation, and of its companion the which are sufficient to create a very marked difference of slave trade, to the small remnant which now exists. We beclimate between their opposite declivities. The northern lieve that if any causes should arise to give a sudden impulse district is moist, subject not only to the periodical rains of to the colonial industry of this now happy Spanish island, the West Indies, but visited also by occasional showers. it would soon follow—as Cuba is already following—the Hence its undulating surface is adapted for pasture and the baneful course of our own settlements, and purchase wealth more ordinary kinds of cultivation, and is intersected by at the expense of happiness. But this is an opinion which numerous perennial rivers; whilst the southern part of the our readers will be best enabled to estimate, by observing portion is settled in the towns: indeed, the capital, San pendent and happy being in existence. - Pp. 76-78. Juan, with about 8000 souls, is the only place which seems to merit such a title. Some of the best, in point of connexions and respectability, are the descendants of military men, who, during the long period when the island was a nately for the happiness if not for the riches of the island, situated on the southern coast. They hardly pay at preeent, according to our author, the expenses of cultivation. But there are, in addition, some 1300 small plantations provisions. There are 148 coffee estates; but in this branch of cultivation, as well as that of sugar, the larger capitalists have been gradually losing money and abandoning their estates; whilst the small farmer who pursues various lines of industry on his little tract of land, has been able, in this way, to increase his comforts.

It is this class that forms the distinctive feature of the population. A numerous race of cultivators-brave, for their courage was hardly tried in the exigencies of the ings, opinions, and prejudices,-is something so widely different from what is to be found in our own islands or social refinement of their country.

for their hospitality, and, like them, they are ever ready present or a care for the future—without wants, withto fight on the slightest provocation. They swing them out wishes, without ambition. —P. 80. selves to and fro in their hammocks all day long, smoking their cigars, and scraping a guitar. The plantain grove which surrounds their houses, and the coffee-tree, the Colonel has here given, any symptoms of the industry frugal subsistence. game-cocks, and a machete—form the extent of their lamentable deficiency, much of the grosser parts of their moveable property. A few coffee-trees and plantains, character may be progressively removed. moveable property. A rew comee-trees and plantains, and a horse, an acre of land in corn or sweet potatoes, constitute the property of what would be denominated a confortable Xivaro—who, mounted on his sugar, 250,000 of coffee, and 35,000 of cured tobacco, meagre and hardworked horse, with his long sword protection in the property of the fore persentire. loons, sallies forth from his cabin to mass, to a cock, upwards of 1000 each, to the poorest of the free peasantry,

Of the free inhabitants of Puerto Rico, a very small pro-light, or to a dance, thinking himself the most inde-

Riding out one afternoon in the country, I was overtaken by one of those sudden showers of rain so common in tropical climates. I fled for shelter to the nearest house, which happened to be the cottage of a poor Xivaro. It was on the slope of a little hill, surmen, who, during the long period when the island was a mere garrison, formed alliances and settled within it.—
These people maintain the pride of their descent with all carefully cultivated, and a large patch of potatoes was the stateliness of grandees; and some of them are opuciose by. I placed my horse without ceremony under lent. Wealthy merchants and planters (many of whom the projecting roof. I entered the humble dwelling are foreigners) form the next class; but the latter, forto-nately for the happiness if not for the riches of the island. "God save all here," which was courteously answered form altogether but a small, and not now a very thriving by the man of the house, who seemed to be about forty class. The number of sugar estates is about 300; chiefly years of age. He was dressed in a check shirt and wide linen drawers. He was coiled up in a hammock of such small dimensions, that his body was actually doubled in two; one foot rested on the ground, with which he propelled the hammock to and fro; and at belonging to poor cultivators, who, growing only an acre or intervals with his great toe he turned a large sweet potwo of cane, devote their attention chiefly to the raising of tato, which was roasting on a few embers, placed on a fing on the ground close to him, and which no doubt was intended for his evening meal. He had a guitar in his hand, from which he produced sounds which appeared to me discordant, but seemed to please him exceedingly. On my entrance he turned on his side, and offered me the hammock, which of course I refused to accept.— Two small children, perfectly naked, were swinging to and fro in another small hammock, and greedily devouring large roasted plantains. The woman of the house was squatted on the floor feeding four game-cocks, which were lodged in the best part of the house, while South American wars-of white blood, and Spanish feel-the husband every now and then would warn her not to give them too much corn or too much water. They received me with an urbanity unknown to the peasantry those of France-that we are almost tempted to ahandon of Northern Europe. They placed a large leaf of the those of France—that we are almost tempted to abandon the principles of political economy, and to feel grateful for the want of enterprise, and slothful contentment, which undoubtedly have prevented the conversion of the island into one wild sugar factory, with white overseers and negro labourers. Our author gives the extraordinary number of 19,000 proprietors of land in perpetuity: nearly 18,000 to these are small cocupiers, raising provisions and herding cattle. The Xivaros—as the white country population are called—are, it cannot be denied, an indoient race; could not discuss the merits of a game-cock. In going tion are called-are, it cannot be denied, an indolent race; could not discuss the merits of a game-cock. In going who seem to multiply under an easy condition of exis- away they offered me their cabin with as much polite-tence, without adding much to the commercial wealth or ness as if it had been a palace, and hoped to see me again. I was forcibly struck with the native courtesy of these people, and it gratified me to observe the con-Like the peasantry of Ireland, they are proverbial tent and happiness they enjoy, without a thought for the

e nti N

h

le g

sp

th Ci po rae va the

Th

hs sav

Wo

len

nat

into tion

nati

amo

of e

the | Of a fore with

the c

exter those Spain B food

which grows almost without cultivation, afford them a which he elsewhere attributes to the husbandmen of Puerto frugal subsistence. The cabins are that hed Rico. But it is quite clear, that the spread of these trowith the leaves of the palm-tree; the sides are often pical backwoodsmen over the virgin soil of the island, has open, or merely constructed of the same sort of leaves as the roof—such is the mildness of the climate. Some prevented it thus far from falling into the hands of the suas the roof—such is the mildness of the climate. as the roof—such is the midness of the climate. Some cabins have doors, others have none. There is nothing gar monopolist; and it furnishes a sufficient answer to those who imagine that a European race, living by its own poverty would protect them from violence. A few calabash shells, and earthen pots—one or two hamfords and of the bark of the palm-tree—two or three education, of which our author admits that there is a game-cocks, and a machete—form the extent of their lamontal to definition of the superior of the superi

Its revenue is stated at 800,000 Spanish dollars; its whole expenses, civil and military, at 630,000.

The free coloured inhabitants of Puerto Rico are by far more numerous than in any other West India island; and this fact alone,-when we consider the ineradicable prejudice attaching to colour, which has brought such infinite misery, and social discomfort, over great part of the world, speaks more than any culogy in favour of its people and their government. The whole British West Indies contained, before 1834, not more than 80,000 free coloured inhabitants, in a population of ten times that amount: of these, sixteen thousand were to be found in Trinidad alone, -an island which had long been governed by Spanish laws. Although white blood is, in Puerto Rico, as every where else beyond the Atlantic, a patent of nobility, yet the Xivaro no more treats with contempt and contumely his inferior in caste, than the grandee of old Spain his inferior in station.

But the good treatment of the slaves is the basis upon which the polity of the island may be said chiefly to rest. Small as their number may be, we may safely say, that in every community in which slavery is recognised, it gives a character to the whole society; -that the people in genradical, is but a passive quality, easily subdued by the pre. free labour. valence of strong emotion. His reasoning powers are of But it must be remembered, that, besides the greater Spain alone, until recently, knew and practised.

who possessed a cow or two for the supply of their family. Jin the elements of Christianity, so that they may be admitted into the church by Baptism within a year after their importation. Twenty-five stripes form the maximum of punishment. The regulations for the encouragement of marriage-according to our author's statement-are so favourable to the slaves, that they must frequently produce much hardship to the owner. These are only a few specimens of a clement code, which seems to be so seconded by the natural humanity of the people, as to leave as little of misery and shame attached to servitude, as is compatible with its miserable and shameful nature,

> Thus far it is easy to agree with our author, upon the whole, in his estimate of the condition of his favourite island. The statements by which he endeavours to establish the practicability of sugar cultivation, by unrestricted labour, although highly encouraging, are not, we confess, wholly conclusive. But they form the most important passages in his book; and, on a question of such infinite importance-one, as yet undecided, and which awaits for final decision the issue of the momentous experiment now in trial-all evidence is useful; and, we may add, without partiality, that all evidence which appears to hear on the side of truth and religion is peculiarly welcome.

In 1823, Jamaica, with 340,000 slaves exported eral are licentious, cruel, disorderly, according to the esti-mate formed of the lowest class. The peculiarities of 1,400,000 quintals of sugar. Puerto Rico, with 45,000 the Spanish character are as strongly marked in the slaves produces about 410,000. The French colony of New, as in the Old World. No national character, per. Guadaloupe, with twice as many slaves as Puerto Rico, haps, is so deeply engrained with opposite hues of excel. produces an equal crop of sugar. The soil of the latter codness of disposition,—paradoxical as it may seem to in great measure exhausted. But, on the other hand, caspeak thus of a people whose evil deeds are blazoned in pital and industry form essential elements of the manuthe worst pages of European history,—prevails wherever facture, in the British and French isles, while the Spaniards the Castilian standard has been raised, and the industrious are far behind in all pursuits requiring either. From Catalan and Biscayan have assembled around it. The these premises our author concludes, not unreasonably, Spaniard is, above all mankind, subject to strong and over. that a large proportion (which elsewhere, however, he calpowering passion. His goodness of disposition, although culates at one-fifth only) of this crop of sugar is raised by the same character as his moral,-fundamentally good, yet estates, there are in Puerto Rico some 1200 or 1300 swayed and distorted by every impulse of prejudice small sugar plantations, the property of the Xivaros of Thirst of gold in former times, then zeal for religion, and the interior, who live cheaply and work lazily, but who lastly, the spirit of party, have roused up in him all the contrive to raise a small quantity of this valuable arsavage ferocity of which nature is capable. Yet in the ticle, together with provisions and cattle. If such rough worst crisis of the passions, when the evil spirit was si-cultivation as this succeeds at all, it can only be in conselenced even for a moment in the bosom which it swayed, a quence of the vast productiveness of the soil, cleared of natural and graceful kindliness of heart has often shone its forests only within the last twenty-years, which gives forth in full brightness. It was while the mania of avarice the planter the same advantage over his brethren to ruled the early conquerors of America, and seduced them windward and leeward, as the settler of Illinois has over into practices revolting to human nature, that the foundathe cultivator of the worn out 'old fields' of the Atlantions were laid of a code of laws both for slaves and the tic coast. Such production can in the nature of things native Indians, the spirit of which has ever since prevailed be only temporary. On the other hand, the great sugar among the Spanish creoles, and which puts to shame t e estates, which must form the main sources of this comnations which arrogate to themselves exclusively the title modity, are evidently cultivated here as elsewhere by of enlightened. Shallow thinkers have often entertained slaves; and although at present the cultivation of sugar the paradox, that free states show less humanity in their on a large scale is extremely unprofitable, a rise in its colonies, than is shown in those under absalute monarchies. price would undoubtedly cause at once an increased im-Of all West India Annals, those of the French islands, be-fore the Revolution, were perhaps the most darkly stained with cruelty. And the free states of South America, on would be driven from the market by the slave-owning the other hand, have not only followed, but have still farther capitalists. Many contingent events might occasion such extended, in the midst of their monarchy and factions, a rise; -- as a temporary diminution of the produce of those principles of Christian mercy and justice, which the British islands! or an increased consumption in By the Spanish laws, the hours of labour, the amount of Upon the whole, therefore, notwithstanding the flattering food and clothing, and various other particulars in the anticipations of our author, we cannot see, in the pretreatment of the slaves, are minutely and humanely speci- sent state of Puerto Rico, much to justify his prophecy fied. Owners are obliged to have their slaves instructed that slave labour will be permanently dispensed with,

But it soon must call for a final adjustment. Slave la-ten years of age. vernment, by abolishing the slave trade, to enable her to valuable friends, and a very lovely and affectionate daughter. pass that crisis in safety. The island is only preserved from presenting a spectacle similar to theirs, by a concur-sixteen; a light delicately shaped girl, with a profusion of an unrestricted slave trade, and Puerto Rico will follow the and charms of another kind, was a very attractive person. slave has so far disappeared, and tyranny has so far begun memory was dear to her as the breath she drew. its usual work, that the planters openly cenfess that one of the ill-omened struggle which now convulses that unfortu- very pretty and very rich. nate monarchy!

From Friendship's Offering, for 1836.

THE COUNTESS.

BY THE HON. KIRS. ERSKINE NORTON.

Sweet are the uses of adversity; Which, like the toad, ugly and venomous, Wears yet a precious jewel in his head.

As You Like it.

Thomas Middleton was of lowly, but honest parentage; he would have once considered, the summit of his ambi- to her comfort and happiness. tion-he became chief and confidential clerk in a mercantile house of great wealth and respectability. A bachelor regularly from town; but Mr. Middleton would hear of no uncle in trade made him his heir; he then became a part. governess, no companion, no continued female resident in ner in the firm, and finally its sole representative, with a his house above the rank of house-keeper. very large and rapidly increasing fortune. He had mar-

merely from the preference which free labour will find ried one of the numerous daughters of a clergyman, whose sole dowry was a very slender trousseau; but she was well At present the question of the future destiny of this educated and well connected. Her health was delicate. beautiful and happy island may be said to remain undecided, and she died when their only child, a daughter, was but bour reinforced by the slave trade cannot long coexist In private life, Mr. Middleton was a frank kind-hearted with the industry of a free race of cultivators. Puerto Ri- nan, enjoying the fruits of his industry, in his own quiet eo, long neglected and unknown, now called into unexam-pled prosperity by the same causes which once raised ci-death of his wife, he thought himself, and therefore he ties and established small commonwealths in the windward perhaps was, the happiest man in the world: be neither islands, is fast reaching the same crisis in her fate which cuvied rank, nor desired fame; he had health, character, they reached; and it is in the power of the Spanish Go occupation, money pouring in from all quarters, many rence of circumstances which render the cultivation of bright chesnut ringlets, her eye-brows and eye-lashes of a sugar at present a disadvantageous investment of capital; somewhat darker shade; the latter by their length softenand by its yet unexhausted soil, which affords an ample ing the expression of a pair of very brilliant laughing dark return of other colonial produce to such labour as her free blue eyes; add to these, teeth of a remarkable beauty, and husbandmen are inclined to bestow upon it. Remove that a fine clear complexion, and I think that we have fairly obstacle and let capital flow into the island, together with made out that Harriet, independently of a hundred thous-

ge

you

be i find

or s strie

thar

her

him

fathe

she p

long -1741 press

Sh

expec proces

mand

a hed;

her fa

rived

vance

to a w

some.

fixed o

which

on, gai

ber fut

diately

as he a cried I

for the ways b

kissed tionate, and she

" Mis

" Fr

fortunes of Cuba. That island, when visited by Humboldt, She had been placed, after her mother's death, at a thirty years ago, was chiefly tilled by the labour of freemen. school near the metropolis; had acquired a little French, But at the close of the war, the baleful influence of African a little drawing, a little music, a very little needle-work, importation began. One hundred and eight-five thousand and a great deal of pretty dancing, together with as comslaves were landed at the Havanna alone in fourteen years; petent a knowledge of geography and astronomy, as most a peareful and industrious people became contaminated other young ladies from boarding-schools could boast of with vice and disorder of every kind; the slaves already some five-and-twenty years ago. The best part of her eduexceed in numbers the white free population; and the cation was that which she had imbibed from her mother, old Spanish kindness and loyalty between master and whose precepts she treasured with veneration, and whose

Hor father had but few female acquaintances; here and the reasons for the importation of fresh slaves is, to supply there a family in the city, with whom he and his daughter the masters with a guard of Mamelukes against the dis-dined and went to the play occasionally. Then there were contented negroes of the colony. If the colonists of Pu-the Thompsons at Brompton, with a large family of girls, erto Rico will not follow the example, which Antigua alone with whom she spent, now and then, a right merry day; of all the West Indian Islands has yet proclaimed, by s.t. and then old Mrs. Johnston of Hampstead, with her ting her negroes free on the day when statutory emancipa- comfortable house and neat equipage, who was always tion began, without apprenticeship, or deduction from free-delighted to see her; together with the rich and hosdom of any kind, it is at least in the power of the crown of Spain, without injustice to any one, to cause the greater Kensington, staid elderly ladies, who had come into posevil of the slave trade to cease; and to rescue one fair session of the large fortune of their brother, the stationer, island,-one loyal and gallant people,-from the insidious and who took great notice of Harriet, because, as they advances of ruin. Would that we could with confidence said, she was a wild giddy girl without a mother, and anticipate this or any other good result, from the issue of would moreover have the additional misfortunes of being

On the final return of his daughter from school, Mr. Middleton decided upon taking a country house; but nothing could induce him to fix on any residence beyond a morning's ride of the metropolis. He heard of two spa cious and beautiful neighbouring villas to be disposed of at Twickenham, and thither he and his daughter immediately repaired. They made their choice, and Harriet soon found herself mistress of a splendidly furnished mansion, with green-houses, and parterres, and shrubberies, and verdant lawns sloping down to the silver Thames, etc. etc. However, Twickenham is certainly a very pretty spot; moreover, at the young lady's disposal were placed a plain but handsome equipage, with new liveries, an enlarged and carefully selected establishment, a well chosen library; in by his integrity and application he had arrived at, what short, all that her indulgent father thought could contribute

Masters in the higher branches of education attended

The neighbouring villa did not remain long undisposed

and delightful abode, his lordship and his family took pos her. session of theirs.

" Harriet, my love," said her father, on his return from

out to dinner to-morrow?"

"Whom, papa?" "Your old friend and playmate, and my quondam ward, Frank Heartly."

"Indeed! I am so glad!" cried Harriet, clapping her hands-" It is two whole years since we saw him-is he much improved by his foreign travel?"

" his inward man foreign travel might injure, but never could improve: he is now three-and-twenty, with a splendid fortune, and, for his age and his class of society, has seen a good deal of the world, and appears to me to have been touched with but little of its alloy: he is the same sensible, kind-hearted, grateful Frank as ever. He inquired very particularly about you, and supposes he must no longer call you his little Harry, and rather dreads, I think, to find you sprung up into a finished boarding-school miss;-(Harriet smiled,)-but I told him that, in many respects, you were as little altered as he was. I hope he will be as great a favourite with you as ever, Harriet."

" I hope," she replied, with perfect simplicity, " I shall be a greater favourite than ever of his; and that he will find me so improved as not to need any more fault-finding, or scolding, or teaching: you know he was always very strict with me, and that I was much more afraid of him than ever I was of you, dear papa," passing her arm round her father's neck, and pressing her cheek to his. "Then," said Mr. Middleton, hesitatingly, "you like him very well as a-as a brother?"

" As an elder brother," replied Harriet archly.

" Yes." A slight cloud passed over the brow of the father, but he was unobserved by his daughter.

The next day, having completed her toilet for dinner she paused, with an emotion of girlish vanity, before her long dressing-glass: "I think Mr. Frank will find me very much grown at least"-she whispered to herself, sup pressing the real sentiment that was rising to her lips.

She was soon on the lawn, intending there to wait the expected arrival; but growing somewhat impatient, she manding a view of the road. She was moving parallel with the best terms." a hedge bordering a green secluded lane, which divided "That is true," replied Mr. Middleton; "the family her father's ground from those of the earl, their newly arrived neighbour: her attention was attracted by the advance of a horseman, who suddenly reduced his rapid pace to a walk on observing her; their eyes met; he was a handsome, fashionable-looking young man, and his gaze was which act of courtesy she as slightly returned, and, moving on, gained the summit of the acclivity, whence she observed diately to her station on the lawn.

" Miss Middleton !- Harriet !" exclaimed Frank Heartly,

as he advanced towards her.

"Frank! dear Frank!-how glad am I to see you!" cried Harriet, as she bounded along to meet him; her hands were soon in both his, and she presented her cheeks for the kiss, which, at meeting or at parting, he had always been accustomed to impress upon it: her cheek was kissed accordingly, but not with the usual hearty, affec- and expression. tionate, brotherly smack. He drew her arm through his, and she, placing her other on her father's, proceeded be- panied him round her little domain, and introduced him to

of; it was taken on lease by the Earl of Belmont, and, a tween them in the house, feeling so happy and lightfew weeks after the Middletons were settled in their new hearted, that the remembrance of that moment never left

Frank paid her no compliments, but his looks and manner sufficiently evinced the pleasurable surprise he expethe city one evening, "whom do you think I shall bring rienced, which, with the tact of her sex and age, sho fully perceived and enjoyed; but she enjoyed it merely as a triumph.

The dinner passed in interesting and animated conversation, of which Frank's anecdotes and descriptions of his continental visit, formed not the least part. Frank was the orphan and only child of a wealthy London merchant, and had been consigned to the guardianship of Mr. Mid-"In his outward man he may be," replied her father; dleton. Notwithstanding his wealth, he did not choose, for the present, to relinquish the mercantile profession, for which he had been educated, and his name still stood at the head of one of the first houses in London, > After dinner, they repaired a to verandah, festooned with all the flowers of midsummer, in front of which, numerous boats, both of business and pleasure, were gliding along on the river. It was a lovely evening, and the moon was just rising on a scene of much beauty. " I congratulate you, Mr. Middleton," said Frank, as he sipped his coffee; "on your choice of a villa: Twickenham is the most classical, and one of the most beautiful spots in our envi-Who is your next neighbour?" rons.

> " The Earl of Belmont has become so, since our ar-

"The Earl of Belmont !- to economise, I suppose," observed Frank.

"I have heard as much," said Mr. Middleton; " his ancestral residence, in the South, has been some years disposed of, on a short lease, and now, giving up his house in London, he retires here, antil his affairs can, in some degree, be arranged and retrieved; he has wisely avoided the watering-places, or a residence abroad. I am sorry for him; he is a man of talent and integrity, and has held situations of high trust in the country'

" Lord Delville is his only son, I believe?"

"His only one; he has two daughters, and they and the countess have been much censured for their extrava-

" But all is not lost," remarked Frank; " the earl has an only, and an unmarried brother in the East, who, for many years, has held lucrative situations, and is supposed proceeded along the shrubbery up a gentle acclivity, com- to have amassed immense wealth; and the brothers are on

"That is true," replied Mr. Middleton; "the family expectations are both distant and uncertain."

"I suppose," said Harriet, "it was Lord Delville I saw riding along the lane, to-day; how handsome he is!"

"He is very handsome," replied Frank; "I have met fixed on her intently and admiringly; he slightly bowed, him several times, but our acquaintance has not even reached to a bow."

"I have heard they are a very proud family," said her father's carriage approaching. She returned imme Harriet; "so I suppose there is no probability of their ever being acquainted with us." She looked towards Frank, as she spoke, but a fit of abstraction appeared to have come over him, and her father replied:

"There is certainly no probability of an acquaintance, unless they themselves make the first advances.

During the evening, Harriet was proud to show Frank the proficiency she had made in music, and played and sang some of his old favourite airs, with much sweetness

Before breakfast, on the following morning, she accom-

ther too well, ever to become a favored lover!"

The morning meal was not concluded, when a loud rap

mont and Lord Delville entered.

"Mr. Middleton," said the courteous nobleman, "I am but too happy, that our near neighbourhood presents me an opportunity of forming an acquaintance with a gentleman, whose name stands so high, both in his professional and private life: allow me to introduce my son, Lord Delville," Mr. Middleton, after having expressed his high sense of the honour conferred upon him, introduced his daughter, and Mr. Heartley: Frank was merely noticed by a slight cool bow from each of the visitors, and feeling himself somewhat de trop, retreated with his newspaper to a window, apparently to read, but, in reality, with his whole thoughts fixed on the scene and personages before him. He perceived, at once, to what the unusual condescension of this visit tended; and, as his eyes glanced from time to time over the party, he shuddered, instinctively, at the power he felt they unconsciously possessed over his future fate. The two fathers were engaged in cheerful and well-sustained conversation on general subjects, while the younger pair appeared still more pleased with their tête-a-tête. Frank was beginning to think that they were paying an unconscionably long first visit, when, to his relief, they rose to depart.

" Miss Middleton," said the earl, " I am specially commissioned, by the countess and my daughters, to express their hope of your permitting them to become as good friends, as they are near neighbours."

Harriet remained standing in complete reverie until her father's return from attending his visitors to the front door; his sphere to approach her; and the brightness dazzled her he expressed himself much gratified, but received no reply from either Frank or Harriet. "Come, Frank, we shall than the surface. be late; the carriage has been waiting this half-hour."

Frank started up: "Good bye, Harriet,-good morning, Miss Middleton."

Why, Harry," cried her father, " what's the matter ?are you so smitten with your new acquaintance, that you have not a word to throw at either of us, your old ones?"

Harriet blushed deeply: "Bless me! I beg your pardon !- are you going ?- good bye, dear Frank ;- do you come back again to us to-day?-Papa, let me wrap your every fibre of his heart, that to separate it seemed imposthroat up a little better, or you will get it sore again ;good bye-good bye!" and the carriage drove off.

At three o'clock the following afternoon, Mr. Middleton and his daughter paid their visit to the Countess of Bel- of her manner, and completely so, by her evident prefermont. They found a fashionable highly dressed woman, ence of Lord Delville. He complained to no one, for he still retaining the traces of great beauty. She received felt that he had no right to complain; but his sunken eye them with the most condescending politeness; their recep and pallid cheeks showed the severity of his disappointtion from her daughters was marked with more of dis-ment. tance, though equally civil. Harriet felt, and therefore appeared timid; and it was the display of this amiable defeet, that alone engaged the favour of the ladies: " The and future representative of an ancient and illustrious fagirl appeared modest and humble, and therefore might im- mily, made an offer of marriage to the daughter of Thomas

The countess did not belong, by birth, to the high arisher circle; her presentation at court was the most splendid hid her face on his shoulder.

her gorden and green-house plants; in all she did, she ap-| of the season; her vanity and extravagance were unboundpeared to have an anxious wish to please him, and to ob- ed; she was the queen of fashion; her very glance was tain his approbation: " Ah!" thought Frank, with a sigh courted, and her word was law. It is searcely to be exof mortification; "I see that, with the total want of tact pected, that such a person could bear with patience the two of a presumptuous boy, I have played the tutor and the bro. afflictions that now oppressed her, -the privation of wealth, and the advance of age

Lady Katherine, the eldest daughter, was selfish and announced visitors; the doors of the breakfast parlour were haughty, but possessed considerably more power of mind thrown open, and, to the surprise of all, the Earl of Bel than either her mother or sister. Lady Charlotte was pretty, thoughtless, and rather good-natured than otherwise.

Within the next few days, all Harriet's friends were informed, by the delighted girl, of the grand acquaintance she had made. The Thompsons would scarcely believe it; the Browns pretended to think nothing of it; the Smiths shook their heads, and prognosticated mischief; and old Mrs. Johnston put on her spectacles, that she might see into the matter more clearly, and, having done so, made the shrewdest guess of all, but wisely kept her discovery, for the present, to herself.

Matters proceeded rapidly at Twickenham. The ladies returned without delay the visit of the Middletons; this step was followed up by an invitation to dinner from the Belmonts, and it was almost immediately settled, that every disengaged evening, Harriet and her father should spend with them; but, in this arrangement, the counters caused it to be clearly understood, that no visitor of the Middle-tons was to be included. The earl's family dined once with their new friends; but it was under the proviso that no one should be invited to meet them.

But Lord Delville found excuses, daily, to pay a visit to Miss Middleton; and Miss Middleton began to watch for the accustomed hour, to distinguish his approaching footstep, and while she did so, to feel her cheek flush, and her heart throb. Alas! poor Harriet! Lord Delville was so engaging, so gentle, so respectful! his person so hand-some, his manners so refined, his sank so high! He seemed to her some " bright particular star," descending from inexperienced eyes so much, that they could look no deeper

The visits of Frank Heartly became less and less frequent; a cloud was gathering over his mind and brow-He loved Harriet with all the manly and devoted tenderness of his nature; he had loved her from early youth,her idea had mixed with all his future schemes of happiness, with all his hopes in life:-her extreme youth had alone prevented him from declaring himself sooner, but her image had been so long, and so closely woven with sible, except with life itself. On his late return from the continent, it was his intention to have made his offer, but he was somewhat checked, by the merely sisterly kindness

At the end of a very few weeks from the commencement of their acquaintance, Lord Delville, the proud descendant Middleton, the rich trader.

On his return home one evening, Mr. Middleton found tocracy of the country; she had been a beautiful stylish his daughter with the traces of tears on a somewhat fevergirl, without fortune, but well connected. The earl was ed cheek; her lips quivering with emotion; but her downallured and secured, as many wiser men have been before, cast eye beaming with hope and joy. She seated herself and since: her brilliant marriage was the talk and envy of upon his knee, and, throwing her arms around his neck, it, 1 oneland influ own The they Mr. Fran riet, count

priety

cums

the po

appro

tried I

were

flected

Faficd

in

she hap

and

anc

earl

high

not prove. The ately c confere the ver wreath the step Frank in a di " Is of earn offer Lord Delville had just made. The first feeling Mr. whispered close to his ear; "Frank-I am going to be-Middleton experienced, was one of mistrust; was it for her marrico!" wealth, and that only, that the proud family of the Belmonts sought the hand of his daughter? But his paternal that astonished even himself: Harriet nodded, while a pride parried the thought, and, as he looked upon his lovely blush and a smile and a tear, seemed all striving for masand innocent child, he deemed that a prince might stoop tery. Frank covered his face with both his hands, and from his throne and raise her up to share it, without incurring censure. Beyond his counting-house, Mr. Mid-shrieked when he withdrew them: he was ashy pale, his dleton knew little of the world, and, until deceived, he eyes seemed starting from his head, his lips were white judged others by his own kindly nature. He thought, too, and quivering, he snatched her to his bosom, and exclaimof Frank; and his strong good sense could not be silenced ed with a hourse and interrupted voice, "God bless you, as it suggested the probability of Harriet's happiness being Harriet !- may you be happy !" then threw her from him, far more effectually secured by a well-assorted marriage flew rather than walked along the verandah, and in rushwith her equal. He remained silent as these thoughts ing down the steps nearly overturned Lord Delville, and, rapidly passed over his mind; he then seated his daughter mounting his horse, rode off at full speed, in a chair beside him, and taking her hand, said,-" Harriet, my sole object is your happiness; tell me how you ing, Miss Middleton?" inquired Lord Delville; "he has yourself feel in regard to Lord Delville's offer."

himself is an amiable and highly educated young man, tions of Harriet, and, for a few minutes she wept in siand his being a good son and brother, gives the best assur-lence; then took the water, and struggled to regain her ance of his making a good husband; the character of the composure. earl himself is not only unexceptionable, but stands very high; then there is the rank-which, although I should Delville." not have been inclined to make any essential sacrifice to own circle, but from her exalted sphere, society at large! the gentleman should go off in a pet." The prospect is alluring. True, the family is poor, but "The affair is not exactly as you guess it," replied Harthey have well-founded expectations, and we are rich." riet, "but let us speak no more of it. Mr. Middleton paused, something he would have said of Harriet, if your mother were still living, she would not dis- est apparent kindness. approve of our decision on this important topic, I have tried to act, in all things regarding you, as though she as little delay as possible; that, in consequence of Harwere constantly present with me; and have always re- riet's youth and inexperience, shhe sculd reside with her ficeted how far she would be likely to approve or disap. husband's family, for a time at least; that a house should prove."

The next morning brought the carl, who was immediately closeted with Mr. Middleton. During the important the ceremony, should proceed on a little tour to the South, conference, Harriet slipped from the breakfast-room into visit the watering places, etc. where Harriet had never the verandah, which adjoined it, pacing up and down, re- been; and then return to the earl's villa at Twickenham gardless, for once, of all its beautiful shrubs and pendant wreaths. A quick foot was advancing and springing up the steps-she ran forward, and met not Lord Delville, but Frank Heartly; "O it's only you, Frank!" she exclaimed in a disappointed tone.

" It is only I-you expected, then, some one else?"

" Yes, I-I expected-Lord Delville."

" Is it even so then, Harriet?" he exclaimed in a tone of earnest inquiry.

"Harriet, my child, you have something to tell me; " It is even so-now Frank don't look so cross you seem agitated." And as he waited for an answer, he grave, I mean-and I will whisper to you a little bit of smoothed down her clustering, and somewhat disordered news, which I am sure will both surprise and please you; tresses. Without raising her head, and scarcely knowing so unruffle your brow and open your ears!" She then in what words she expressed herself, she told him of the playfully advanced, and putting her hand before her mouth,

" To Lord Delville?" inquired Frank, with a calmness

"Why, what's the matter with your friend this mornjust made an escape that would do credit to a hero of ro-" I feel," replied Harriet, timidly, but firmly, "that, mance !- and you, too, look so pale and so trembling ! should you approve of it, you will make me very, very something very interesting must surely have occurred-happy." sit down," he continued, supporting rather than leading her happy."

sit down," he continued, supporting rather than leading ner

That is enough," said the father, as he folded his to a seat; and, beginning to be alarmed, he hastened into daughter affectionately to his bosom; he then continued the breakfast-room for a glass of water; before his return, -"The marriage has many advantages; Lord Delville a sudden burst of tears had relieved the oppressive emo-

"You must be very much surprised at this scene, Lord

" I am not at all surprised, Harriet,-if you will now it, I acknowledge to be an advantage, and a very great permit me to call you so,-that this young man, apparently one-my Harriet a countess! one of the magnates of the such a favourite of your father, should make love to land! the progenitress of a race of statesmen and heroes! you; I am still less surprised," he continued archly, "that, influencing by the example of her virtues, not only her having accepted of me, you should refuse him, and that

The conversation between the fathers was most satisfac-Frank, but, although he felt assured that Frank loved Har-tory; no arrangements could be more liberal than those riet, he had made no such declaration, and, on that ac- proposed by Mr. Middleton. When the conference broke count, Mr. Middleton perceived, just in time, the impro- up, they joined the young couple, and the earl affectionpriety of mentioning his name at all under present cir- ately saluted his future daughter-in-law; the whole party cumstances. He therefore finished by raising his eyes to then proceeded to his residence, for the remainder of the the portrait of his departed wife, while he said :- " I think, day, and Harriet was received by the ladies, with the great-

> It was agreed that the marriage should take place with be taken in town, and splendidly furnished, ready for the ensuing season; that the young couple, immediately after to spend the remainder of the time until the London season opened.

> To all these arrangements the happy Harriet assented, and, in a fortnight after, she became the bride of Lord Delville; a flaming paragraph appeared in the newspapers, which was read, with mixed feelings of astonishment, envy and pride, by all the Thompsons, the Smiths and the Browns.

We pass over the bridal tour, during which the husband was, of course, all tenderness, and the bride all smiles and loveliness. In the first letter she received from a breath. her father, he told her, without any accompanying observation, that Frank Heartly had returned to the Continent.

The happiness of Harriet was even increased by her return to Twickenham, where she was again restored to petrified Harriet to receive her company. the society of her father and her new relatives; she found good breeding was so high,—the necessity of gaining a and loud laughing girls. complete control over Harriet, and of preserving that they "Well, Harry, my la already possessed over Lord Delville, so important,-that her a hearty smack, "how are you?" unsuspected simplicity of Harriet's character so perfect, and their acquaintance so short,—that she had daughters. as yet discovered nothing in them she could disap-Harriet, the defects which threatened to blight her peace, "Well, Harry, my dearand which were the more to be dreaded from the art that concealed them. Several little circumstances soon occurred, she is Lady Delville.now." which reminded Harriet that,-to use a couple of trite without its shadows

Such of the coterie of the countess as were within reach, would have been our own Harry still." and they were very few,-made it a point to call on Lady Delville: among these was a very fashionable and ed Mrs. Thompson's hand. very lovely young woman, the Honourable Mrs. Clermont, heavy coach was observed coming up the avenue: bonnets all your fine ladies in a heap."
with cherry-coloured ribbons were popping out of all the "Ludy Delville and myself are much indebted to you, drew up, Mrs. Clermont interrupted her story with an ex- " I thought . clamation: "In the name of all that is comical what have you here, my dear Lady Belmont? It surely must be some lordship, having bowed slightly to the now silent and gapcockney party who have lost their way, and take your lady-ing party, left the room by the door through which the ship's villa for the Bell at Edmonton!"

"What can they be?" cried Lady Catherine colouring violently, and casting a glance of doubtful inquiry at Har- folks," said Mrs. Thompson somewhat disturbed; "you riet; who, advancing to the window, beheld, to her con-must send them to us to learn manners." The distressed gratulation.

-the Thompsons from Brompton."

"Thompsons from Brompton!" shricked the ladies in

" Angels and ministers!" exclaimed Mrs. Clermont, " is there no hope-no way to escape?" and as the cherrycoloured detachment from Brompton bounced in at one door, the fair aristocrats glided out at another, leaving the

Mrs. Thompson was a complete specimen-probably no the guests' apartments carefully fitted up for her in the longer to be paralleled, of a city dame of the old school; good-humoured and good-hearted, illiterate, social, vulgar Although the characters of the counters and her daugh- and purse-proud: her daughters were like a cluster of ters were precisely what have been described, the polish of blooming peonies around her; fat, healthy, lond-talking

" Well, Harry, my lass!" cried Mrs. Thompson, giving

"Where are those ladies going to?" inquired one of the

" Stole away ! stole away !" cried Mrs. Thompson, as prove of, or dislike. She had no sister, no near female the last wave of Lady Charlotte's white drapery disappearrelative, and the current of affection that had been so pain-ed. Harriet was affectionately bissed by her former comfully checked by the early death of her mother, was again panions, who then sat down, and, taking off their bonnets, warmed in her bosom towards the mother and sisters of began to wipe and fan themselves with their pocket-handher husband: a closer intimacy, however, gradually dis kerchiefs: "What with heat, and dust, and laughing, we closed, even to the unwilling and inexperienced eyes of are all in a precious pickle," cried Mrs. Thompson;

hi of

el

(a

SU

de

to hir

ane

WO

in !

An

mo

at I

Ha

fice

had an i qua

tion

Mrs 7

wer

a pl

bear the L

walh

Smi

ed ti

"O mamma! you must not call her Harry any more-

"Lady Devil?" retorted the mother, " Heaven forgive similes,-the flowery path she pressed was not without its you, child, for making me swear with your ladys and your thorns, and the bright prospect which lay before her not ladyships! I tell you she is our own Harry, and, if she had married a bankrupt snuff-dealer instead of a lord, she

" I am sure of that," said Harriet sweetly, as she press-

"And how do these grand folks treat you, my love? who was, for the time, residing with a bachelor uncle and are you happy? and where's my young lord, eh?" whose pet she was, at Richmond; while her old East India While Harriet was answering or parrying Mrs. Thomphasband had gone to Cheltenham to subdue his bile, and son's broad questions, the girls were wondering at and restore his complexion, after a late season of dissipation in touching every thing about the room, picking flowers London. She had married the old gentleman for his wealth, without ceremony, and peeping through key-holes into the and expected, in spite of all Cheltenham could do, that she adjoining appartments. Whether it was that she herself should soon be that most enviable of woman-kind, a young, had become more fastidious, it is certain that the vulgarity beautiful, and wealthy widow. On her introduction to this of the Thompsons never appeared to her in so glaring a lady, Harriet could not help admiring her extreme beauty, light before. She was just beginning to have hopes of and the exquisite taste of her dress; but there was a some-their departure, when, in the midst of a roar of laughter, thing in her countenance and her manner that did not occasioned by some ludicrous observation of Miss Clemenplease her, although she scarcely confessed the unfavoura- tina, Lord Delville appeared—he looked confounded: " Is ble impression to herself. Mrs. Clermont seemed to be a this young gentleman, my lord?" asked Mrs. Thompson great favourite with the Belmont family, and the ladies as she rose, and seizing both his hands, shook them heartily: were listening with much delight to a humourous and sa- " I congratulate you, my lord, with all my heart, for havtirical description of some nobodies at Richmond, when a ing got hold of such a prize as our Harry! She's worth windows, and much noisy mirth was audible. As the coach ma'am," replied Lord Delville; and, turning to his wife,

... Clermont was here?' " She is with the counters," replied Harriet, and his

" Well, I can't say much for the civility of your great sternation, the broad, upturned, shining face of Mrs. Harriet was about offering some apology: "O no, don't Thompson of Brompton, who, with her four girls, was say a word about it, my dear! it's not your fault: come, come to pay their old friend and favourite a visit of con- girls, let's pack off! good bye, Harriet-come to us as soon as you can, without any of your lords and your ladies "O," stammered Harriet, "I,—I,—know who they are, —you shall have a hearty welcome, and a glass of wine, the Thompsons from Brompton." and a slice of cake at the very least."

Harriet wished them good bye, with tears of mortification in her eyes; she saw them to the door, then made her making his retreat. The carriage drove off, passing close escape to her own room. Soon after she heard Mrs. Cler. by the other ladies. That day the Misses Smith visited mont's carriage drive off, and Lord Delville entered the Thompsons, and learned from them the reception they der that you feel uncomfortable, but dry your eyes and the like treatment, and they wrote to Mrs. Johnston upon think no more about it : we must take better care for the the same subject. future, and contrive some means of ridding you of the plagues."

She was late for dinner, and only entered when the versation constrained: when the ladies retired to the her marriage, and expressing her regret that her increasdrawing-room, the countess began, with a preliminary ces of society are more rigid than among the class you of these observances is a decided separation, as a compa- Harriet. nion, from those whose inferior rank and education ex-(and she looked at Lady Katherine for her cue ;) "Thethat you will not be offended by my issuing a general or-old friend. der of 'not at home' to strangers inquiring only for you.

and the desertion of all my kind old friends cannot fail to residence.

wound him."

at this morning."

fices in this life-yes-the heir of Belmont is secrificed by carriage. his union with this merchant's daughter." Thus she Mrs. Clermont, that I am forced to resign mine?"

a plain yellow chariot was observed approaching; they beaver bonnets and feathers it contained: "They are the Misses Smith of Kensington." she said timidly.

Lady Delville, the heiress of the wealthy Mich.

walked quickly to the house. The chariot stopped; the servant had received his orders.

" Lady Delville is at home, I believe?" said Mrs. Smith.

" Not at home, ma'am."

"You mistake, fellow," said Miss Priscilla, "she enter- advantages, Lady Delville was not the fashion. ed the house not a minute since."

" Not at home."

" What does this mean ?" exclaimed they. VOL XXVIII. JANUARY, 1836 .- 7.

had experienced; and, on the following day, they went to What, in tears, Harriet?" eried he, " I do not won- the Browns to warn them against subjecting themselves to

Mrs. Johnston was one of those persons of real good sense and good breeding, who are to be found in every station; and before she received Miss Smith's note, she had family was seated; her reception was cool, and the con-herself written to Lady Delville, congratulating her upon ing age (she was a remarkably healthy and active old lady) would provent her extending her visits so far as "You must be aware, my dear Lady Delville, that in Twickenham; but she was convinced it was unnecessary the station to which you have been elevated, the concenan- to say how honoured she should consider herself by the acquaintance of Lady Delville,-how happy she would have been accustomed to mix in; and the most essential feel by again receiving her beloved and highly valued

Harriet kissed the note, and showed it to Lord Delville: clude them from the higher circles of society-hem!" the result was, that Mrs. Johnston was the only acquaintance, out of those we have mentioned, and a few more in the persons who visited you to-day, you must feel are not the city, that Harriet was permitted to retain, and occa-suitable acquaintances for Lady Delville; and I am sure sionally she had the happiness of spending a day with her

The season so much looked forward to and desired by I have not ventured to make this proposal without the the earl's family, rapidly advanced: it was thought better consent of Lord Delville, and he authorises me to say that to remove early, in order that they might more conveit has his entire approbation."

Iniently superintend the finishing arrangements of their

Harriet sighed, "I am bound," she said, "to obey and splendid mansion in Park Lane; an increase of establishto strive to please my husband; my first duty, I know, is to ment and equipage was also to be decided upon; therehim-but I dread incurring the displeasure of my father; fore, early in February they left Twickenhan for their new

Although accustomed to every comfort, Harriet was not "My dear love," said the countess, kissing her fore- prepared for the degree of tasteful magnificence that prehead, "we are all called upon at times to make sacrifices sides over the town-residences of our nobility. At that in this life: we will manage your father; leave him to us. time the appearance of London was very inferior to what And now, Charlotte, tell Mrs. Millan to bring us those it is now; and certainly no foreigner, from the outside of mode of dresses which madame la modiste sent us to look its houses, even in its most fashionable parts, could form an idea of the luxury that reigned within. A suit of Lady Katherine's eye rested for a moment gloomily on apartments were assigned to Lord and Lady Delville's Harriet, as her mother's words caught her ear: "Sacri-separate use; they had their own servants and their own

As London began to fill, a complete new scene of life, thought, but she merely said, that it was a pity the scene of which before she had no idea, opened to Harriet;—the had not taken place before Mrs. Clermont, who, although throng of visitors, the variety of amusements, the number an intimate friend, would be sure to retail it to all her ac- of morning and evening engagements, the drawing-room, quaintance, and would probably think it quite allowable to the opera, (Almack's did not exist at that period;) the season it with a few of her own clever and satirical addinear approach to all that was illustrious in rank, in talent, tions. "Alas!" thought Harriet, " is it for such friends as and renown: to all that was distinguished in beauty and wealth. She often asked herself if it were possible that The following day, as the ladies, with Lord Delville, this was the same city in which she had lived all her life, were taking their afternoon stroll round the little domain, so quietly and so regularly, where going to the theatre was an incident, and a ball at the mansion-house a great event. turned to reconnoitre; Harriet well knew the light brown So true is some sage's observation, that "the one-half of

Lady Delville, the heiress of the wealthy Middleton, the Lord Delville instantly drew her arm through his, and future Countess of Belmont, the wife of a very leader of the ton, beautiful, and in the bloom of youth, might at once be pronounced, without much risk of error, a star of first-rate brilliancy and attraction; but they, who thus pronounced her, found themselves, to their surprise, decidedly in error; for, in spite of all these seemingly overpowering

> The causes that contributed to her want of èclat were the following :- Lady Delville held but a secondary station in the Belmont family; she was completely under their treat her as a good natured, pretty, simple creature, and to all much chagrined at the marriage of the rich old bachecongratulate themselves on being hampered with nothing lor. Colonel Clermont watched narrowly the conduct of worse, when forced by necessity to receive wealth and low his brother's young wife; for he was convinced that Mr. birth into their family. It was soon perceived that to pay Clermont was the dupe of an artful and unprincipled wocourt to Lady Delville was not the way to secure the good man; and he was not particular in the means which he will of her noble relative, and it was known that she had employed to obtain such evidence of the criminal extent of no vote in the invitations to the countess's parties. She her levities as would be received in a court of law. was wondering and shy; wanted manner sadly; was difficult to draw out, and, when drawn out, was not considered May; and, from the commencement of that month, she worth the pains, for her education had been very superfi- had declined all invitations; her evenings were generally cial, and in no one accomplishment did she excel.

Delville was never known to refuse, and many a scrape and manners, the struggle was painfully obvious. did she get into by taking to her party some queer staring girl, whom nobody knew. Another instance of the want and when her father rose to depart, her hand lingered in of the tact of society was her never paying court to any his, and at last she found courage to say: " I do not feel one, and especially avoiding all leading characters of every very well-I am unwilling to let you go-will you allow kind. It is not to be supposed that none appreciated me to have this sofa made up for you as a bed to-night?" Harriet; there were a few-a very few certainly-who thought they perceived in this young and timid girl, a mind capable of the highest cultivation, with a purity of slight stir and bustle fixed his attention. At length Harheart, and a noble simplicity of thought and feeling, which riet's maid entered the room, and begged him to proceed uniformly compose the ground-work of characters of rare to his daughter's chamber; he did so, and found her firm superiority.

incumbrance was attached to a splendid fortune, than a mation." young, pretty, sweet-tempered, and affectionate girl. His own mind was not sufficiently acute to judge of hers; he mistook her simplicity for want of sense, her defective them—and, if possible, let no servants but my own know education for want of talent; he was neither surprised nor what is going forward." mortified that she made no sensation; it was not what he or his family expected or desired. When he united him- breathed a prayer for her safety; then left the room to exself to the merchant's daughter, he had made up his mind ecute her wishes. He despatched Lord Delville's valet, who, to treat her with kindness, and perfect attention to her at the expiration of two hours, returned with the informawishes; this he considered sufficient to secure to her all tion that his master was no where to be found; besides the happiness she was capable of enjoying; and, having so the three places mentioned, he had inquired at several resolved, he thought himself at liberty to pursue his own others, but could get no trace of him. schemes of pleasure, unquestioned and uncontrolled.

ever resolved to entangle him. Mrs. Clermont was, in her the family; desiring that the ladies should not be informed little way, a perfect Cleopatra: sne piqued min with her railleries, vexed him with her caprices, and tormented him might, the following day.

Mr. Middleton returned to his sofa, and Mrs. Nurse, smile, a marked, though momentary preference, would re- having watched both her charges safely asleep, lay down rule and governance, and they had no intention whatever session of the family estate; but his younger brother was that she should play the leading card; they affected to a needy half-pay officer with a numerous family, who were

Lady Delville's confinement was expected at the end of passed in her own apartments in the society of her father. As the period for her becoming a mother was not far The good man observed with pain that his daughter was distant, she was obliged to decline dancing, and the same not happy, but he wisely forbore to force her confidence : cause contributed materially to dim the lustre of her she made no complaint, but he could perceive the eagerbeauty. But the greatest sin of Harriet was her deficiency ness with which she listened for her husband's step, and in tact; she had only that sort of tact which prevented her the sigh of disappointment which usually succeeded her from wounding the feelings of others, and from doing or expectation. He could not help feeling with bitterness that saying any thing that could expose her to censure; but she was neglected, and that at a moment when the sensithere is another kind of tact, which she had not-she was bilities are most acute, and when the approaching crisis, constantly noticing the people, whom she ought not to especially towards so young and inexperienced a creature, have noticed. Any neglected country bumpkin, male or peculiarly called for sympathy, tenderness, and support. female, whom wealth or connection had temporarily drawn He often saw the traces of tears on her cheeks, and could within her orbit, was sure to meet with attention from sometimes scarcely recognise, in the pale and dejected Lady Delville; dependent authors or artists, not yet cele-countenance before him, his own once gay and happy brated, always met with respect and courtesy from Lady Harriet: he saw, too, that in his presence, she strove to Delville: if a chaperone was wanted, the young Lady appear cheerful, but, from the artlessness of her disposition

r a S

o li

m

n

h bo

ste

av

8 1

ou

the

had

des

wh

earl

on t

Hat

plies

ed b hear

It sterr

and cons

mun

der t

with his s

his it to the raised

7

One evening she seemed more than usually oppressed, "Certainly, my love"-and the arrangement was made.

Mr. Middleton could not sleep, and in about an hour a and composed. " I wish you, my dear father, to despatch It cannot be said that Lord Delville was ever passion- one of my servants for Lord Delville." She then informed stely fond of his wife; he had regarded her too much from him of three places, -Mrs. Clermont's was one, -where, the first as a burgain, and was only pleased to find that he had left word, he might be found. "The earl is at his bargain had turned out so well, and that no greater the House of Lords; when he returns, give him the infor-

" And the ladies?" inquired her father.

"They are out-I do not want-I do not wish for

The agitated father kissed the brow of his child, and

At two in the morning, a presumptive heir to the earl-He was one of those willing slaves whom the seductive dom was born. In half-an-hour afterwards, the earl re-Mrs. Clermont bound to her triumphant chariot; he had turned, and was led by Mr. Middleton to the chamber, before followed and admired her, because it was the fashion where he kindly saluted the young mother and her child, to do so; but, since his marriage, she seemed more than and expressed his displeasure at the absence of the rest of

for an hour or two, leaving Harriet's maid on duty, by the The elder brother of her husband was a baron, in pos- bed-side. The valet yet waited up to let his master in. At four o'clock the well-known signal was given, and he to make to you, and I forbear making any to your wife opened the door: "O, my lord!" said the man, "I have and daughters, although they have not behaved well to my been looking for you every where: my lady—" he stopt, poor girl. The blow it pleases Heaven to inflict falls almost terrified at the wild and haggard looks of his master.

" Speak, fellow!" exclaimed Lord Delville, sternly.

shortly replied: "is brought to bed of a boy." Lord Del-ville struck his forehead with his clenched hands, and rush-It was the opinion of the doctor, that no delay should

A single lamp was burning in the chamber, and Har-She saw the door softly open, and Lord Delville, with a countenance which she declared would haunt her all her doubts, and fears. life, enter: he approached the bed, and gazed for a few minutes on his wife and child. Harriet's extreme paleness, and a slight contraction of the brow, gave proof of recent suffering, but there was a smile of heavenly calm heart of her husband. The infant, round which both arms of the new-made mother were fondly clasped, lay on her light scenery around her, a carriage, which she knew to bosom.

A sigh, almost a groan, burst from Lord Delville; he stooped down and kissed both Harriet and her babe, and her by the footman; it was from Mr. Middleton, and conaverting his eyes, turned slowly away, proceeding to the tained but these words, in a hand very different from his door, which stood ajar; he leaned his head against it for a minute; then, with an effort almost convulsive, and without looking back, rushed forward, and the waiting-woman ter of an hour, Mrs. Johnston was on her road to town. heard no more, except the distant sound of the closing of the front door.

had that night succeeded, to the utmost, in the scheme he had laid, and that the injured husband had been fully and fatally convinced of the dishonour of his wife. " Do not desert me!" were the only words the unhappy woman spoke, as, on bending knees, and with streaming eyes, she clung to her companion in guilt; and, at the moment when the scene just detailed, was passing in the apart-ment of his wife, Mrs. Clermont was waiting for Lord Delville, in a post-chaise, a few yards from the door of the earl's house. Before noon, the next day, they were well on their way over the Straits of Dover.

" Has Lord Delville yet returned home?" whispered Harriet.

The young woman, with much presence of mind, replied; "He has been in your room, my lady, and has kissed both you and the child."

"Thank God!" she ejaculated, and, with a lightened heart, passed her hand fondly over her infant, and again composed herself to rest.

It is impossible to describe the astonishment and con-sternation into which the earl and his family were thrown, on the following morning, when Colonel Clermont called, and informed them of what had taken place. After some consultation, it was agreed upon, that the earl should communicate the painful intelligence to Mr. Middleton, in or- frame; while folded, like an infant, in the arms of Mrs. der that he might break it to his daughter. This was done: the earl, with symptoms of unfeigned distress, and and refreshing; the household met her at the gate, half in his innocent daughter. The unhappy father seemed struck taken into the house. She was pleased to observe, that, in to the heart; he leaned his head upon the table, and, for a few minutes, neither spoke nor moved: at length he raised his eyes, and, clasping his hands, exclaimed :

content to remain in the condition of life in which it our absence." pleased Him to place us! My lord, I have no reproach "Why, my lady," replied James, " if I had been in-

as heavily on your heads, as it does upon ours; may God grant strength to bear it, to her who needs it most !" He "Your lady-" the poor valet forgot, in his fright, the left the room, and, having given orders that, after her mefine French phrases he intended to have made use of, and dical attendant had visited Lady Delville, he should be retake place in informing Lady Delville of the whole truth: her inquiries for her husband had already become very riet's maid had ensconced herself in an easy chair, behind anxious, and he thought that the blow, which could not be a curtain, on the side of the bed farthest from the door. long parried, should be permitted to fall, before her mind became too much harrassed by her own conjectures,

At eight o'clock on the evening of that eventful day, as Mrs. Johnston, seated by the latticed windows opening towards her neat lawn, gemmed and perfumed by all the welcome flowers of spring, en attendant the preparation of around her mouth, which struck, like a dagger, to the the tea-equipage, and the renewal of the not yet discarded fire, was enjoying, with a few friends, the beautiful moonbe Lady Delville's, drove rapidly by, and, sweeping round, drew up at the gate: a note was immediately delivered to usual neat and legible writing: "We are all in great distress ;-pray come to my poor Harriet!"-and, in a quar-

She found the earl's mansion dark and shut up, with the knocker muffled; she was conducted to Lady Delville's It is only necessary to explain, that Colonel Clermont drawing room, and was there met by Mr. Middleton, whose neglected dress, and the grief-marked countenance made her fear that the worst was impending, for she thought only of the death of Harriet. It was, therefore, with the utmost astonishment, indignation, and grief, that she listened to Mr. Middleton's hasty recital of what had really occurred, and which was, indeed, to all appearance, bringing his daughter rapidly to the grave; a succession of long fainting fits had taken place during the day; she now, however, slept.

Mrs. Johnston entered the room; she slept, indeed, but the burning cheek, parched lip, half-opened eye, and convulsive movements terrified Mrs. Johnston. She took her place by her bed-side, and, through her long and dangerous illness, never quitted her.

At the end of six weeks, the patient expressed an anxious wish to return to her father's villa at Twickenham: it was complied with, and the arrangements were immediately made for that purpose. She took an affectionate leave of the old earl, and a civil one of the ladies, who had been regular in their daily inquiry and visit.

As she approached Twickenham, the vivid recollection of the happy months she had passed there, as a daughter and as a bride, rushed forcibly on the mind of Harriet. and violently affected her shattered nerves and weakened with no paternal shielding or softening of the conduct of joy, and half in sorrow; she shook hands with them all, his son, revealed to Mr. Middleton this public desertion of and begged to be carried round the gardens, before being spite of her father's absence, her gardens and green-houses were in the most exact order, and looked more beautiful than ever: " I have to thank you, James," she said to the " My child! my child!-would to God we had been gardener, "for your great attention to your charge during and beautiful; Harriet was alone, with the exception of comfortably settled, her father and Mr. Heartly returned the sleeping infant in her arms. "I wonder whether Mr. to town. Heartly will accompany my father?" and then she sighed, probably have requited it, even had I known of it!" And friend of here, as soon as she found her spirits equal to then the image of the handsome, the fascinating, the be- such an effort. loved Lord Delville, rushed over her heart and brain, and, strove to speak, but the silent tears were coursing each reading. other down the cheeks of Harriet, and, angry with himself, and followed by Mr. Heartly.

cated to his daughter, that Lord Delville had directed that English society especially ;-kissing the feet of those who the deeds of settlement should be returned; thus giving up were a step above her in the scale of fashion, and striving all claims upon his wife's fortune: he had also desired that unmercifully to kick down those who were a step below the child should remain under the sole charge of Lady her. Without birth, wealth, or education, she yet suc-Delville. Mr. Clermont and his brother were occupied in ceeded in planting herself in certain circles, where she had arrangements for bringing the cause before a court of law, no pretensions to be; she was callous to all affronts, and and the Belmont family, in their impoverished state, were received smilingly the broadest hints, while acting in direct in great consternation as to the result. They were about opposition to them.

leaving their mansion in town, and returning, on a more "You know," she continued, "I was very intimate with leaving their mansion in town, and returning, on a more reduced income than ever, to Twickenham.

It was decided by Harriet's physician, that, as soon as she had gained a little more strength, she should be re- the other lady, a middle-aged, well-dressed woman, with a moved to the coast for the benefit of the sea-air, bathing, benevolent but penetrating countenance.

clined to be careless,—which I am sure I was not,—Mr. and a change of scene; and Hastings, that salubrious, Frank, who has been backwards and forwards this last quiet, and cheerful spot, was fixed upon. Frank was demonth, would not have allowed me; and, indeed, since he spatched by Mr. Middleton to choose a residence; and he heard, ten days ago, that you were coming here, he has succeeded in securing a charming marine villa, near the been working with his own hands, inside of the house and town, splendidly fitted up, surrounded by a little domain, out, to have every thing in order for you." Poor Harriet tastefully laid out, in the most perfect order, and comfelt her heart swell, and her eyes again fill, at this speech; manding a beautiful view. Harriet was anxious to leave but she was fortunately not observed, for every body was Twickenham before the Belmonts returned to their resibusy admiring and talking to the baby, who had just dence there; and, within a month, with feelings of the most opened a pair of laughing eyes, and was crowing at all sincere gratitude and affection, she took leave of the kind and excellent Mrs. Johnston, who promised soon to pay On the following evening, Mr. Middleton had promised her a long visit, and, accompanied by her father, Lady to be at Twickenham; and Harriet and her baby, after Delville proceeded to Hastings. She was so satisfied with having been drawn round the grounds in a garden-chair, her new residence that she took it for a term of three were installed by Mrs. Johnston in the drawing-room, on years; scarcely aware at the time, but pleased afterwards a sofs, opposite the trellised window opening to the lawn, to recollect that Belmont Castle, the hereditary seat of the while she returned to meet Mr. Middleton, and to report earl's family, was situated on the coast of Sussex, a few progress. It was twilight, and all around were still, serene, hours' journey from her present abode. Having seen her

It was not Harriet's wish, under her peculiar circumand the recollection of the scene in the breakfast-room ve- stances, and in her present delicate state of health, to form randa strongly occurred to her; its meaning, she had of any new acquaintances: she had, besides, taken a distaste course never doubted, followed, as it immediately was, by to society, and only thought of that in which she had movthe departure of Mr. Heartly to the Continent, and she ed for one season in London, with feelings almost amount-had never seen him since: "Alas! how unconscious I ing to aversion. She had, however, promised Mrs. Johnwas of his affection ! and how ill, at that time, I should ston to allow her 'o introduce her, by letter, to a valued

A few days after her arrival she entered the library on pressing her infant closer to her; "O! how could he de- the marine parade, in order to make her subscription, and sert us, my child!" she exclaimed, passionately. At that to select some books and drawing materials. She sent on moment, a step approaching attracted her attention; it her carriage with her child and maid for a short airing, was Frank himself, slowly walking up the path. He looked while so employed; and waiting for their return, she was thinner and paler, than when she last saw him; his countenance was thoughtful, and even gloomy; he advanced, time since she had seen one, for, in fact, they were purwithout raising his eyes from the ground, until he was posely kept from her. Two ladies entered the library and near the house, when he cast an anxious look at the upper took their seats near her, but she did not even look at windows, as though he thought the object of his cares must them, for her eyes were rivetted by the following parabe in those apartments. All his mental preparations for graph: " On dit-that Lord Delville is about receiving a the interview were overthrown, on finding her so close to diplomatic appointment at one of the minor courts of Gerhim as he entered: the rosy tranquil infant, the pale, many, where it is expected he will reside for some time emaciated, and miserable-looking young mother!—could with his frail and lovely friend. It is averred, also, that he this be Harriet-the happy, levely, innocent Harriet,-at has relinquished all claim to share in the wealth of his seventeen? "Do you not know me, Frank?" she said, deserted wife: this is as it should be; but where are the as she extended her hand:—he took it, knelt, and pressed ten thousand pounds damages to come from?" With a it to his lips; he could not quell his deep emotion,—a trembling hand, Harriet laid down the newspaper, and burning drop fell on the hand he held, -he looked up, and took up another, merely to sustain the appearance of " How the papers do ring with the Delville business!" he turned away, and left the room. Harriet struggled to said one of the ladies, affectedly. Harriet raised her eyes, regain her composure, for she knew that her father must and recognised in the speaker a person who had been be near; he soon entered, accompanied by Mrs. Johnston, much indebted to her in London; and for chaperoning whose dowdy daughter, she had once or twice got into a In the course of the evening Mr. Middleton communi- scrape. She was one of those hangers on who spoil society, the Belmonts last season ?"

"I have heard you say so, very often indeed," replied

lac pri bei stre

m

at h and Crur to yo sho

with the g her fi M fortun

She h reader ter int

pitied."

" Why, poor thing ! one can't help pitying her to be sure; but she certainly was not a match for Lord Delville: with Mrs. Crumpley in the library. I have heard Lady Katherine say, that had he married an life, this affair would not have happened."

as you call it?"

"Because the family wanted money, you know."

claim to it, and she will probably die off, her health being proficient in it.

very bad, or sink back among her own set!"

"Well-mind what you are about, Mrs. Crumpley! sumptive heir, and that, in the usual course of things, nothing can prevent her becoming Countess of Belmont: these are weighty considerations for a person like you." This was said in a tone of strong and contemptuous sarcasm, but taken with a civil smile and an approving nod.

At this moment Harriet's carriage drew up; the footman putting his head into the library door, inquired if her ladyship were still there. The coronetted carriage instantly attracted the attention of Mrs. Crumpley; but, on the question being asked, her eyes were turned with surprise on the hitherto unregarded figure that had sat near face, as Harriet rose and, somewhat feebly, proceeded to the carriage, assisted into it by the bowing and officious although its style and expression were altered. shopman.

" Pray, sir," inquired Mrs. Crumpley, " who is that-is she a late arrival?"

at his desk, "she has just written her name down."

Mrs. Crumpley flew to the book; the other lady, who

" Ha! ha! I beg your pardon for laughing, Mrs.

to you, Mrs. Crumpley."
Such incidents as these, so young as Harriet was, and side, could only contribute to render her the more disgusted career; his talents were of the highest order, and he was with it; and her friends regretted the love of solitude, and universally courted and esteemed. " I shall hear of his the gloomy and misanthropic turn her mind seemed about marriage, next," thought Harriet. to settle in. It was only at the most earnest entreaty of of Mrs. Johnston's friend.

fortune, and considerable landed property near Hastings. been under important obligations to the late Mr. Johnston, come his debtor to that amount. and, strange to say, his daughter had remained sincerely

Three years glided away: du

"And of course," continued the first speaker, " I knew Mrs. Johnston. She was perfectly as fait at Harriet's hissomething of this Lady Delville." "I have heard her very well spoken of, and much whole resources of her powerful mind, her excellent heart, her tact and knowledge of the world. On her entrance, Harriet immediately recognised the lady who had spoken Nothing could be more advantageous to Harriet than accomplished and fashionable woman in his own sphere of the formation of this acquaintance, which soon ripened into the sincerest and most lasting friendship on both sides; "Why did he not then marry in his own sphere of life, marked on that of Mrs. Wilmot, by zeal and devotion, and on that of Harriet, by gratitude and respect. The fine taste, and cultivated intellect of Mrs. Wilmot, developed "Then I am very sorry they did not eatch a Tartar, those mental capacities in Harriet, which had hitherto lain who with her money would have kept the family in dormant. Besides a most efficient course of reading in her order. Lady Delville, I am informed, has arrived here. own language, the treasures of the French and Italian I suppose, as you were so intimate, you intend calling on were thrown open to her; the beauties of poetry, that highest, most veiled, and therefore least relished of the arts, " Hem !--it is said that the Belmonts mean to take no she now began to comprehend and enjoy; music and paintfarther notice of her; her money is no longer useful to ing relieved her more serious studies; of the latter, espethem, for her husband has, foolishly enough, resigned all cially, she was very fond, and became, at length, quite a

But there was an alteration in Harriet's mind, that surprised even herself: it seemed, as it were, to awake within Recollect that she is very rich, is the mother of the pre. her; a calm and dignified submission to her lot, took place of those inward repinings, in which she had unsparingly indulged; if the heart-felt laugh of youth and joy had fled for ever, the tear of heart-wringing woo had also ceased. Without losing one atom of its peculiarly feminine and delicate texture, her mind was gradually acquiring firmness and solidity. In the indulgence of her best affections towards her father and her child, and towards her small, but well-selected circle of friends; in the acts of benevolence to the afflicted and the poor; in the full employment of her time, and in the constant heart-exercise of the purest, meekest, and most trusting devotion, Harriet found that peace, which better experience had taught her, " the her, in a plain white morning dress, warm shawl, and world cannot give." Sea-air, bathing, exercise, and an exstraw bonnet, but she could not catch a glimpse of the cellent constitution, all contributed to restore to Harriet her former health, and even more than her former beauty,

By degrees, Harriet became more sought after than she had any idea of, and more the subject of conversation than she would have wished. Among the strangers who "Yes, ma'am," replied the man, as he re-seated himself visited Hastings, many a manœuvre was put in practice, and many a solicitation made to Mrs. Wilmot, to obtain a peep at Lady Delville; and those who had been acquainted with her in London, and also those who had overlooked had watched the scene, stepped up lightly behind her, with her in London, and also those who had overlooked and their eyes caught Lady Delville's name at the same her acquaintance there, all anxiously renewed it, as far as they could.

Her father frequently came down, and so did Mrs. John-Crumpley, but I can't help it-ha! ha! ha! good morning ston; Mr. Heartly more seldom, and when he did so, was usually Mrs. Wilmot's guest, with whom he had been long acquainted. He had been returned to Parliament, as one so very lately accustomed to see the world on its worse of the city-members, and was expected to run a brilliant

In the course of the first winter of Harriet's residence er father, that she at length consented to the introduction at Hastings, Mr. Clermont's cause came on. The damages were laid at ten thousand pounds; they were awarded at Mrs. Wilmot was a widow without children, with a large five thousand; which sum, before the court broke up, was paid by Mr. Middleton's attorney into the hands of Lord She had been foolish enough, or wise enough, as the Delville's, who immediately passed it into those of Mr. reader may choose to settle it,-thus circumstanced, to en-Clermont's agent. Lord Delville instructed his attorney to ter into no second matrimonial alliance. Her father had thank Mr. Middleton, and to acknowledge his having be-

Three years glided away: during this time, no written grateful for them, and had attached herself warmly to old communication was received from Lord Delville to his wife

sequently, they were excluded from her answers.

's; he sent up his card, and was instantly admitted ing so unwell." into the earl's bed-chamber, who was gasping under a rapid and violent inflammation of the lungs: the room had ness with me?" were the only reply. been cleared by his order, and no one remained but the physician and the valet. The earl held out his hand to commissioned to put into your hands this note from him, Mr. Middleton was hurried from the apartment.

himself set off for the continent, and be the bearer of the we have met before?" letter to Lord Delville.

The death of the good earl took place on the following enham." day, and intelligence of it was immediately conveyed to Lody Delville. After the funeral, Mr. Middleton went nutes;" and he left the room with his father's letter. down to Hastings, and Mr. Heartly set out on his mission.

On Mr. Heartly's arrival at Baden, he went to the house of a friend of his, an English merchant, resident there; late father, to do all in my pot er to effect a reconciliation from that gentleman, he learned every particular that he was desirous to know concerning Lord Delville, which may be thus compressed: That, on his lordship's first arrival, he was dissipated and extravagant, keeping open ther's last-his dying request." house for gentlemen, living in a constant routine of company, and playing high: but all this was an unnatural effort, his spirits were forced, and he was evidently but ill Mrs. Clermont was very expensive, and, in spite of all his handsome salary, he soon found himself involved in difficulties. He suddenly changed his mode, and ran at once into the opposite extreme; reduced his establishment, shut himself up, was never to be seen out but on business, or at court, or when he was met, unattended, on his long solitary rides, while his health seemed to become every day more precarious. All this did not suit Mrs. Clermont, and, in a very short time after the new system was established, she placed herself under the protection of a German prince, and disappeared. Two months since, Lord Delville had, by the advice of his physician, applied for a short leave of absence, and was now at Spa for the benefit of his health. The account of the earl's death had already reached Baden, and, no doubt, letters from his family, direct to Spa, had, before this, informed Lord Del- fully, to repress his emotion. "The countess appears ville of the melancholy event. On receiving this information of Hastings; I suppose she finds it gay and agreeville of the melancholy event. On receiving this information, Mr. Heartly made no delay in continuing his route able?" to Spa.

It was late in the evening when he arrived there at the she leads a very seeluded life." principal hotel, and, the following morning, after break. "Who are her most intimate fast, he proceeded, accompanied by a guide, to the house and, of course, none was made by her. She occasionally of Lord Delville, now Earl of Belmont: it was very small, received a kind note of inquiry from the earl, in which the and retired; a servant, in new mourning livery, opened the names of none of his family were ever mentioned, and, con- door; he gave in his card: the servant returned, and said, that he was desired to ask whether Mr. Heartly's visit Harriet had now reached her twenty-first year, and af- were on business, as the earl, as yet, received no visits of fairs stood in the position just described, when Mr. Mid-ceremony. Mr. Heartly replied, that his visit was on busidleton, while waiting one morning for his carriage, to take ness, and he was then shown up into a small stitting room, him down to Hastings, glanced his eye over a newspaper, scantily furnished: a gentleman, en robe de chambre, half and was struck by the following paragraph: "The Earl rose from a sofa, on which he was reclining, surrounded of Belmont was taken seriously ill, in the House of Peers, by magazines and newspapers. Mr. Heartly advanced, last evening; he was conveyed to his friend, Lord ——'s bowed, and took a scat, and then, for a moment, fixed his residence, without delay, and medical aid procured; we eyes carnestly on the invalid; he could scarcely believe are sorry to learn that his lordship is considered in great that he saw before him the gallant, gay, handsome young danger; his family were sent for from Twickenham." nobleman, he had met, under such peculiar circumstances, Mr. Middleton stept into his carriage, and ordered it to Lord but four years since: " I am sorry to see your lordship look-

A cool bow, and, " I think, sir; you said you had busi-

Mr. Middleton, and with difficulty said, "I am dying." and this letter from your father, the late earl." Lord Bel-He then turned to his valet, and by signs ordered him to mont's countenance changed, a vivid, but transient flush draw out his desk, which stood near, in its packing case; passed over it, and his hand trembled, as he received the the man opened it, and at the top lay a scaled letter, direct papers. He opened the note from Mr. Middleton; it ed to Lord Delville. The earl gave this to Mr. Middleton : merely contained these words: "Should the Earl of Bel-"Deliver it speedily;—my love to your dear daughter;—mont have any communication to make, on the subject of good bye, good bye?" he waved his hand impatiently, and the accompanying letter, he may make it freely and safely to the bearer, Mr. Heartly: Thomas Middleton." The He consulted with Mr. Heartly, and it was decided that, earl then, in his turn, fixed a scrutinizing look on Mr. after the earl's funeral had taken place, Mr. Heartly should Heartly: "Your name is familiar to me, and I-I believe

n

es ha

az

to

th

the

chi

fro

pov

Suc

Ha

no

Wor

or a

ing

appr

simp

have

The

ings

her i unior

with sir, s

will 1

hearts wife;

her w bestor

the far

Lo

" I had the honour of meeting your lordship at Twick-

"Yes,-yes,-I recollect :- excuse me for a few mi-

He was absent fully half-an-hour, and on his return traces of deep agitation were yet visible in his countenance. " Mr. Heartly, this letter is an earnest request from my with my wife, the daughter of your friend."

" Mr. Middleton and myself both presumed that it was so; and Providence has willed that it should be your fa-

"Even so," replied Lord Belmont tremulously, and

" Perhaps your lordship would wish for time to make your decision; if so, I am quite at your orders,—I am here without any other object in view."

"You are very good—very considerate: have you seen Lady Delville—the Countess I should now say lately 7

About a month since, I had that honour."

"Her health has been long re-established, I believe?" Quite so-no one ever recollects her ladyship looking so beaut- so well, as she does at present,"

Lord Belmont sighed: " And my little son?"

" O, he is quite a picture of health, and beauty, and happiness! He resembles your lordship very much, but his eyes are his mother's."

Another pause, during which the earl strove, success-

"She is fond of it; but in its gaicties she takes no share

" Who are her most intimate friends?"

" She has but one at Hastings-Mrs. Wilmot."

friendship of your countess."

Heartly took his leave.

has sacrificed his happiness more completely than I have done; domestic comfort, health, competency, reputation, have all been either destroyed or greatly injured. To talk right in the opinion of the world." of my regret would be folly; it is written, like the mark of Cain, upon my brow: to talk of my desire to have any of these blessings restored, would be equal folly. It seems that a glimpse of hope is opened to me by your mission, but it is so obscured by such deep shadows, and surrounded by so my difficulties, that I almost despair."

" How so, my lord ?"

"This letter comes from my father; his request at any

and be refused."

have never heard your name mentioned in her presence, to in her most intimate conversations with her father, since mont Castle is now vacant." the first advance."

" It may be so-but still, years have clapsed without the most trifling inquiry or mark of interest, without even child; without the slightest effort to redeem her husband from his errors; not a word of comfort, while oppressed by absence from all he loved, by unavailing regrets, by

Harriet, so gentle and humble as she was.

"Gentle and humble she is now, my lord-but she is no longer what you first beheld her, the inexperienced, happy girl; not the young and timid bride, with a new world opening to her-such a world! and without a friend or a guide to advise or direct her. Experience and suffer-ing have taught their usual bitter lesson, with more than their usual effect; they have taught her to know and to appreciate herself; they have left untouched the beautiful simplicity, purity, and tenderness of her heart, while they have unfolded the treasures of a mind of the first order. The Countess of Belmont knows what is due to her feelings as an injured wife, and to her dignity as a virtuous one; and I venture to say that if your lordship wait for her first advance-much as it may cost her-your reunion will never take place on this side of the grave,"

Lord Belmont made no reply, but sat for some minutes with his hand over his face; at length he said: "Well, sir, supposing that I yield this point, yet in what view will my conduct appear to the world? Bankrupt in the hearts of all others, I turn again to sue for that of my

"Ha, Mrs. Wilmot! I have met her, and heard of her fusing to avail yourself of the settlement made on you from the time you separated from your wife, is well "She is in all respects worthy of the confidence and known, and has been smiled at by the world you dread, as rather too chivalric for this money-grasping and money-"Well, Mr. Heartly! I will not ask you to an invalid's spending age. My lord, I do not mean to affect to underdinner; but, if you will call early in the evening, I shall value the opinion of the world; nay, I will do it the justice be most happy to see you." They shook hands, and Mr. to say, that, when the whole facts of the case are before it, its opinion is almost always correct; the misfortune is, " Mr. Heartly," said the earl, when the conversation that, collectively as well as individually, it is apt to judge was renewed in the evening, "I am aware that no man of the whole from a part only. The first object of a firstrate mind is to do what it believes to be right; the first object of a second-rate mind is to do what it believes to be

" Then I suppose you place me among the second-

rates?" said the earl smiling.

" My lord," replied Mr. Heartly, evading an answer to this delicate question, " I do not see what the world can say against an erring husband seeking the forgiveness of his wife; and surely no time can be more proper than the present; the recent death of your father, and his late injunction may be reasonably supposed sufficient to soften time, especially his last one, would be sacred to me-but the hearts of his family, and to lead them all to reconcilia-I have no intimation from my wife, and I may say indeed, tion and peace. In point of rank and wealth you stand as none from Mr. Middleton; I shall, therefore, probably ask you have always stood; upon her you have bestowed your coronet with all its dignities and advantages; she, on you, "My Lord, I do not pretend to know any thing what- has bestowed her wealth; in these mere worldly exchanges ever of the sentiments of your countess on the subject; I I conceive you to be equal, and, in all probability, the balance will ultimately be in your favour, when your expecand I believe that it has been never, or very rarely alluded tations from the East are realized. I believe, too, that Bel-

your departure: but there is one point on which I am very "Yes, its ten years' lease expired three months since: clear—that it is you, not your wife, who are bound to make it is now inhabited only by two or three grey-headed do-"Yes, its ten years' lease expired three months since: mestics, who keep the old place clean and aired, and its venerable avenues free from fallen leaves-but this is all."

A few days passed over, during which the earl seemed any communication-from her at least-concerning our to take a great partiality for his new acquaintance; each day brought them more and more together, until, at length, they scarcely separated. Mr. Heartly had ample opportunity of forming a just estimate of the husband of poverty, and ill-health! Women are not usually made of Harriet, and he deeply regretted, that a heart so well dissuch stern stuff, at least of all did I expect to find it in posed and affectionate, and a mind capable of better posed and affectionate, and a mind capable of better things, should have been so warped and misled. He had great hopes that both might be redeemed, but he could not conceal from himself that Lord Belmont's health was in the most precarious and even dangerous state; by it, an unfavourable re-action was produced on the mind; his judgment was weakened, his temper rendered irritable, his opinion indecisive, and his schemes wavering. The earl had requested Mr. Heartly to stay with him for a fort. night, and at the end of that time he promised to make up his mind on the delicate subject of his mission, which therefore ceased to be reverted to in the course of their conversations.

> The fortnight was near its close, when, very early one morning, Mr. Heartly was roused from his bed by a note from his lerdship: " Events of importance seldom come singly; I have great news to tell you-do not waste a minute."

On Mr. Heartly's arrival he found the earl in bed; he held up a large packet:

"Read it!" he exclaimed, and sunk back on his pillow, apparently exhausted with the force of his emotions. wife; and, oppressed with poverty, I kneel to ask her for Heartly stepped from the bed-room into the little sittingher wealth, and for all the comforts and benefits it will room, and anxiously removed an envelope; it continued two letters; one from his mother, the dowager, and the " My lord, you confound the opinion of the world with other from his agent; they informed the earl that his unthe fact itself; you and we know well that the fact will cle had died on his passage to Calcutta, but that the ship not be as you state it; your disinterested conduct in re- had brought on his effects and documents, among the latter his will, (a copy was stated to have been left at Cal- road to Belmont Castle. They reached it at nightfall, and, cutta,) by which he made his nephew sole heir to his vast in consequence of the order received by the steward from wealth.

turning and taking his hand.

suddenly changing his tone, he clasped his hands, and rais- spoke to them so kindly, looked so happy and yet so tearher forgiveness, and to bless my child !"

time Lord Behnont had alluded to the state of his health ; valid: "He is, I am sure," said Harriet, with that buoy careless about it.

land without delay, on the plea of extreme ill health, ac-siding in that neighbourhood, was engaged; and a physicompanied by certificates signed by the principal medical cian of great celebrity at Hastings had promised to attend practitioners of the Spa. Letters were written to the two as frequently as possible. countesses, and an order to the old steward at Belmont Castle; a communication was also made to Baden.

way assisted, soothed, and cheered his friend. The sur-prise, although, with the exception of his uncle's death, a should not move from Twickenham, until farther notice; most pleasurable one, was evidently too much for Lord however, they assembled in council on the subject, and that he should never reach England.

Harriet was seated at breakfast with her father, at rights, and of course knew nothing of the communication Hastings, when the servant who had been sent to the post- made to her. office returned. He brought three or four business-like eyes, and it was some minutes before she could collect of conduct necessary to be pursued on this occasion. power to open the letter; observing that her father was quite absorbed with his communications, she broke the seal in the hall, attended by her father and the servants, and, and read :-

" HARRIET! my wife! Can you forgive me! Can you believe, that, from the fatal moment in which I tore myself away, I have never known an instant's peace ?--that the images of my wife and child, such as I then beheld them, sleeping in their innocence, have never ceased to haunt and to reproach me? I have suffered, Harriet, in mind and in body, not perhaps more than I have deserved, but been better prepared." enough I trust to entitle me to your pity and forgiveness. Mourning over the yet warm ashes of my father, I beseech you, for the sake of our child-for your own sakemy Harriet, I beseech you not to reject my prayer! for the time will come, and shortly, when your kind and affectionate heart will grieve at the thought of having inflicted an additional, an unnecessary wound. In a few days 1 shall be at Belmont Castle ;-dare I hope that I may meet you there-you, and your little one !- God bless you its mistress, she does not enter it at all." both!

BELMONT."

tracted the attention of Mr. Middleton, and he rose just in present." time to receive in his arms the pale and insensible Harriet. Assistance was instantly procured, and the usual remedies " let us go to Dover to meet my brother there: we have no soon restored her; she embraced her father fervently, and authority from him to acknowledge this lady as the mistress calling for her child, shed tears of rapture over him, while Mr. Middleton perused the letter.

Lord Belmont, found fires lit, beds made, and as much pre-" I congratulate you, my lord," said Mr. Heartly, re-paration as could be expected on so short a notice. With what feelings of gratitude, veneration, and hope did the young Lord Belmont grasped his and said, "Now, my friend, countess pass through the massive gateways, and along I will do all that you wish; I will even throw myself on the magnifect avenues leading to her husband's lordly my knees to my injured, my deserted Harriet." Then residence! She shook hands with the old servants, and ing his eyes, exclaimed: "God grant me but life to receive ful, that their hearts were hers as soon as they beheld her. The following day was employed in making every Mr. Heartly was deeply affected, for this was the first possible arrangement, for the comfort of the expected inhe had always seemed absolutely ignorant of, or extremely ancy of hope peculiar to the young, " more depressed in reless about it.

An application was forwarded by that day's post to will soon restore him." The medical gentleman, who had Downing street, requesting permission to return to Eng. been accustomed to attend the Belmont family, while re-

The downger countess had received a note from her son, to say that he should be in England in a few days, Mr. Heartly despatched the official letters, and in every and that, when arrived there, she would hear again from Belmont's shattered nerves, and he seemed apprehensive decided on establishing themselves in Belmont Castle to receive him. They never once thought of Harriet and her

It was with some surprise and consternation, that, on looking letters, which he delivered to Mr. Middleton; he the second morning after her arrival, Harriet was apprised then presented one to the countess. The superscription of the approach of an arant courier, who, on being introwas written in a hasty, trembling, crooked hand, which duced, announced that the dowager and her two daughters she did not immediately recognise; she turned it, and would be at the castle in two or three hours, and that dinlooked at the seal,—the blood rushed to her face, then left ner was to be prepared for them. Harriet, with the concurit as white as marble, a film seemed to float before her rence of her father, soon made up her mind as to the line

> On the approach of the carriage, she stationed herself as soon as the ladies had alighted, she went forward to receeive them: they appeared struck with amazement at perceiving her.

" Madam," she said to the dowager, " I am most happy to have the honour of seeing you and my sisters-in-law at Belmont Castle; I only regret that you did not give me somewhat longer notice, that your apartments might have

The dowager looked much perplexed, and, at length stammered out: "We are-very much astonished-very much, indeed, to find you and your father here!"

"I hope, madam," said the young countess, drawing herself up, " that the surprise is at least a pleasurable

Lady Katherine stepped forward: "To cut the matter short," she cried, "unless my mother enter this castle as

" The mother of the Earl of Belmont," calmly replied Harriet, "is, or ought to be, the most welcome of all guests at Belmont Castle; but it is only as a guest that A struggling sigh and a slight rustling movement at even she can be received, when the wife of the earl is

" Then let us go," said Lady Katherine to her mother, of this castle; we have suffered enough already from the introduction of these low-born, uneducated, purse-proud That afternoon beheld them, with a small suite, on their people into our family; when not only now that he is commanded the hand of the daughter of the first peer of the with his weak and trembling hands broke the seal. realm. But we shall see," she continued, as they returned to the carriage, "whether the power of the lord of the castle be not superior to that of the lady."

colour rise, and his mild, calm eye fire with indignation; and happiness, I trust, are awaiting it also. Your mother but she caught him by the arm, and whispered: "For my and sisters were here a few days since, and I regret that sake, my father!" He allowed the appeal, and before the I could not prevail upon them to remain. God bless you, had quitted the hall.

Lord Belmont received, without delay, the permission he had requested to return to England, and immediately friend was near his side; "Thank God, I shall, at least, prepared for his journey. He easily induced Mr. Heartly die happy !- But she speaks of my mother and sisters; is to become his fellow-traveller, who the more readily agreed it not strange they should, under present circumstances, to his request, from observing that the earl was not in a have gone to Belmont, and still more strange that, being state to travel with servants only; watchful and judicious there, they should not have staid? I fear there has been care had now become indispensable, and the great comfort some dissension !" he derived from Mr. Heartly's unremitting attention, he felt exhausted a state, from rather a long and rough passage, and had taken some slight refreshment, Mr. Heartly went that Mr. Heartly landed first, in order to provide a sedan to the ladies to conduct them to the apartment. chair to carry him to the inn: he was rather surprised at the Earl of Belmont.

letter conveyed to him on board."

Mr. Heartly looked at the letter; it was sealed in black, vail on you to stay; this is all she says." and directed by a female hand, but he knew it was not Harriet's.

" From whom does this come?"

ladies, is waiting his arrival at the hotel."

"Very good," replid Mr. Heartly, "I will take care of the letter."

the dowager and her daughters.

" I do not mean," he said, as he returned her letter, "to alarm your ladyship unnecessarily; but the earl, your that the castle was occupied by your wife; we did not even son, is very ill-very ill indeed; he is not aware of your know that any communication had, of late, taken plage bebeing in Dover, and by no means expects to meet you tween you." here; and however great the pleasure of such a meeting may prove, it cannot fail to hurry and excite him, in his he had made towards a reconciliation, on receiving the present exhausted condition. I venture, therefore, to ad- intelligence of his uncle's bequest, and he showed them vise that he should be brought here, and have a night's the letter he had received that morning. "On the whole,

The invalid passed a tolerable night, and slept until rather late on the following morning. On awaking he found Mr. Heartly, as usual, seated by his bed-side.

short and easy way to travel now."

it appear still more so."

further part of the room, pretending to busy himself about Belmont. some packages there, while it was read. The earl kissed They VOL. XXVIII. JANUARY, 1836 .- 8.

wealthy, but at any time, the heir of Belmont might have the characters that had been strangers to him so long, and

" Welcome, my beloved husband, to your home, your child, and your wife! At Belmont you will find us with During this violent speech, Harriet saw her father's my father, all anxiously awaiting your return; and health carriage had driven from the door, the father and daughter and bring you safe to your affectionate HARRIET!"

" Heartly!" said Lord Belmont, and in a moment his

Mr. Heartly then told him of the actual presence of his mother and sisters in the hotel. The news surprised and and acknowledged most gratefully.

They arrived safely at Dover; but the earl was in so agitated, but did not displease him; and when he was drest,

" May I venture to suggest," said he to them, " that if being accosted by a servant in mourning livery, who beg- there be any topic of an unpleasant nature, on which you ged to know whether he were not travelling in the suite of might have thought it necessary to speak, you will avoid it for the present: his nervous irritability is very great, "I am a friend of the earl, and am travelling with and it must be the object of all to keep him as tranquil as possible. He has just received a most affectionate letter "Then, perhaps, sir, you will be so good as to get this from the countess, in which she mentions that you had been at Belmont, and regrets that she was not able to pre-

By this time they had reached the door of the apartment, and, on entering, the mother was so shocked by the appearance of her son, that all thoughts, except of his ill-" From the dowager countess, who, with the two young ness, were banished from her mind; poor Lady Charlotte wept, and even the well-nursed spleen of her sister was subdued for the time. Without appearing to notice their emotion, he received them most affectionately, and when While his servants were looking for a sedan chair, Mr. they were seated round him, slightly expressed his regret Heartly went to the hotel, and was soon in the presence of that they had not taken up their quarters at Belmont

Castle. " To tell you the truth, my dear son, we were not aware

Lord Belmont explained, in a few words, the advances rest and refreshment, before your presence is announced my dear mother, it will be better that you should remain to him."

my dear mother, it will be better that you should remain here for a day or two: I am certain of your then receiv-The ladies were much alarmed at hearing this account, ing an invitation from Harriet; this will be more gratifyand immediate gave Mr. Heartly carte blanche to act as he ing to your feelings, to hers, and to my own; so let us judged best.

He then struggled to converse cheerfully until his car riage was announced; but, when he took leave of them, he did so with so much more solemnity and tenderness "My kind friend," said the earl, "I feel much composed than the expected short separation appeared to warrant, and refreshed, and am anxious to get on; we have but a that Mr. Heartly felt convinced, however dexterously he had contrived to veil the truth from them, he himself saw "Short and easy as it is," replied Mr. Heartly, cheer-and felt it but too clearly. On being placed in the carfully, "I think I have a talisman about me, that will make riage, his powers, which had been taxed to the utmost appear still more so."

during this scene, appeared quite exhausted; he was conHe opened the shutters, and having put a letter into the stantly supported by Mr. Heartly, sunk into a sort of earl's hands, retired with his accustomed delicacy to the doze, and never spoke excepting to ask if they were near majestic towers; Lord Belmont roused himself as they [man; he received the sacrament; then taking the hands entered the gates, and looked eagerly on each side at every of Harriet and Mr. Heartly, he said, "I feel even now that well remembered spot; for it was here that he had passed I am no longer of this world—life is abbing fast: let this, his childhood.

They arrived just as the setting sun was gliding its

door of the library, in which Harriet had stationed herse! f, he became lethargic, and at five in the morning expired. being unwilling that their first meeting should take place in the presence of witnesses: there, he desired to be set down, and, leaning only on Mr. Middleton, entered the young and widowed countess bestowed her hand on Mr. room, the door of which Mr. Heartly immediately closed Heartly. The infant earl has become all that their most outside, and dismissed the servants.

the colour came to his lips, and the light to his eyes; she jointure. knelt by him; he threw his hand over her bright and tenderest emotion, while her warm tears fell fast on his world, and surrounded by all the enjoyments it can be-thin, pale cheeks. Not a word was spoken; it was a mo-stow, acknowledges, with humility and gratitude, her ment of feelings too highly wrought, and of too opposing great and numerous blessings. a nature for words; a moment of joy and of grief, of hope

When the first emotions had somewhat subsided, Mr. Middleton called the medical gentleman in attendance and such means were applied as soon restored the earl to comparative comfort and composure. His beautiful boy was then brought in, and for once he indulged in the over-Hall! and, most like, some of them will be coming in,

flowings of a parent's love.

The physician from Hastings arrived, and all was done that human means could do, to revert or to retard the patient tranquillity, and when, at last, laid in his bed, surrounded by every comfort that care and affection could bestow, he said to his friend: " Heartly do not look on me with that eye of pity: I am so happy!" He then good for somebody, one's quite sure." turned to Harriet, where she sat with his hand clasped in hers, struggling to suppress her agony; exertion and agitation had given to her cheek a fevered glow, and her eyes a restless brightness, which, though indicative of the most painful anxiety, were beautiful in themselves; she had thrown off the dress in which she had received her husband, and her eareless white wrapper and unbound hair, rather added to than diminished the effect. He looked at her tenderly and admiringly, then fervently exclaimed: ther really a good man?"

"O Harriet! Harriet! what a traitor have I been to myBoth the boys answered eagerly, "that papa was a very "O Harriet! Harriet! what a traitor have I been to myself! how have I crushed the fair wreath of happiness my good man." fate had woven!" He then lay for some time in thought; the opiate he had taken had evidently no effect in procuring rest, but his mind appeared to be particularly acute and active, and when he spoke, it was in a low, but clear and collected voice. He desired that the whole party, in. bought me." cluding the clergyman and solicitor, who had been sent for, and the medical gentlemen, with the head servants, might be assembled in the room. He then appointed Mr. Middleton and Mr. Heartly as guardians to his son, and fixed the jointure for his mother, an income for his sisters, and legacies for his servants; he gave, too, some directions concerning the management of the estate, and the clearance of the debts with which it was incumbered. These necessary arrangements he made with great cool-ness and precision; when concluded, he desired that all in whose family the incidents related occured, little should withdraw, excepting the family and the clergy- more than two years since.

my last act, prove how far above its sordid passions and Mr. Middleton came to the carriage door to receive petty jealousies I have already risen! Take her, my them, but he was also so utterly unprepared for the death-friend ! you have long loved her, disinterestedly, honouralike appearance of the earl, that his tongue could scarcely bly, hopelessly; be to her, and to my boy, what I ought utter his welcome. Lord Belmont shook his hand and to have been !- God bless you both!" He joined their pressed it to his lips, but did not speak. He was removed hands, and, with a deep sigh, sunk back on his pillow. from the carriage, and then borne through the hall to the A rapid and unfavourable change had already come on;

Two years after this melancholy and eventful night, the sanguine hopes could aspire to; and to their domestic cir-Harriet stood trembling with agitation; at the first cle have been added two lovely daughters. The settlement, glance she shricked, the next moment she received him originally made on Lord Delville, and which he so proalmost fainting in her arms. A sofa was near, and on perly relinquished, was, by the express desire of Harriet, that he was laid; in a minute or two he seemed to recover, continued for life to the dowager, in addition to her

The Countess of Belmont, supremely happy as a doughclustering tresses, and kissed her with the deepest and ter, a wife, and a mother, high in the estimation of the

From the Juvenile Forget Me Not, for 1836. THE ORANGE BOY.

BY MRS. HOFLAND

"Only to think of my being so busy to-day with the chimney-sweepers, and the family arrived last night at the for I know the two little gentlemem are stirring."

These words were uttered in lamentation by Sally Simpson, the wife of Mr. Talbot's* bailiff, to a neighimpending blow. Lord Belmont submitted himself with bour, as they stood together in the farm-yard, and were quickly followed by the addition,-" But 'tis no matter, seeing they have all got safe home, and his honour has already got into the justice-room, and my lady is doing

Her words were cut short by the arrival of two handsome boys, of about eight and six years of age, the sons of the master she had justly eulogised, and whom the good woman notwithstanding her bustle, was delighted to see. Before she had time to offer congratulation and welcome, the wretched and half-naked child who had just finished sweeping her chimney, rushed forward, and, addressing the elder in great trepidation, said, "Is your fa-

fit

ra aw

na

ade

it 1

to

. .

tha

in t

plic it b

" And is he a justice of the peace?"

"Oh yes, and a member for the county."

"Well, then, please to take me to him, that he may be good to me-my master has used me ill ever since he

"Bought you?" cried all his auditors.

"Yes! he gave two golden sovereigns for me to the man who took me from my own mother.'

These words awoke compassion in all, but the loud voice of the master, who had now disposed of his soot and was prepared to leave the place, startled them, and the boy's entreaty was reiterated in the very agony of terror. Sally felt confident "that no bad lad would dare appeal to his hon-geous, stood by him so closely that the brutal master could incident had he to relate of his later days; but good food, not seize his victim to inflict the punishment threatened cleanliness, and kindness apparently removed in turn for delay. Whilst the parties were thus situated, Mr. his sorrows also; he became the gayest and most grate-Talbot himself appeared, and the confusion of many voices ful of earthly beings, and exhibited a thousand tricks and subsided.

The extremes of human existence might be said to meet, as the miserable little sweep, tremblingly yet confidingly, stepped forward and looked up to the tall, handsome and all-powerful gentleman whose situation and appearance so strongly contrasted with his own, and who very employment excited. The boy soon ventured to say, "Please sir, master beats me and starves me cruelly."

The question "how came you by this boy?" drew forth the same account already given: "he had been bought from on board a collier, and he was an idle young dog, Nor wa who was growing saucy on his hands."

"Not saucy, but I can't help growing," said the child; "little master here can't help it, I dare say."

The young Talbots were very tall for their respective ages, and the words were spoken in a tone of such sorrowful deprecation as to touch the hearts of all. Proofs of ill usage were, indeed, soon displayed on his poor lean person, of a nature to justify Mr. Talbot in immediately depriving his master of a slave so illegally obtained: but when the man complained of his great loss, and that he had a large family to maintain, there was hesitation in Mr. Talbot's manner.

"Ask Jem, sir, if I a'nt a wife and five childers-he always speaks truth."

"Yes, he has five," said the boy; "that's why I be kept so thin, that I may get up the flues, for they be all bigger than me."

Mr. Talbot put money into the man's hand, but reproved his cruelty sternly, and commanded him to return immediately, thankful that he had escaped punishment.— He hastily withdrew; whilst Mr. Talbot shocked by the view of want and suffering presented, endeavoured to control his sense of suffering by saying, in a gay voice to his boys, "Well! now you have got your wish, what will you do with this Flibbertigibbet I wonder?"

"My clothes will fit him, I am sure," said Frank.

awoke her sincere compassion and good will, but imagi-dressed, was jumping and tumbling on the platform. that of his patron, and shown various articles found only thrown. in the houses of the great; but, with equal truth and sim-plicity he declared, "that he had never seen any thing like Flitter say to himself, "I can do that;" and when she saw it before, except when he swept chimneys at Castle How- him step forward and address the master of the show, and ard." No! all he could remember was, that he had a afterwards step behind the curtain, she was afraid he was very good mother, who was dressed in black and had a himself going to play over his tricks: so far from that he baby is her arms, that there was a maid Nelly and a returned soon, and said he "would go home directly, as he gardens with currants in it; also he had a soft bed and had many things to do;" and although she told him a was called little Jemmy.

our," and the two Talbots, touched with sincere pity for Even these recollections seemed well-nigh obliterated, a poor creature about their own age, and naturally courselless, perhaps, by time than hardship, for many a moving accomplishments to please his " young masters," so that his name of Flibbertigibbet was confirmed to him. He could climb trees like a squirrel, play tunes on nick-nackers, make whistles and willow bird-cages, crow like a cock, whistle like a linet; and, when sent to the school Mr. Talbot provided for his own dependants in the neighbourencouraged him to speak by the look of compassion his ing village, he learnt to read with such rapidity that the master was convinced he had formerly been instructed. and he said himself, " he thought that must be the case, for the letters seemed somehow like old acquaintance to

> Nor was this the only proof of early instruction he gave, for, when taught to say his prayers and taken to church, he behaved with the propriety of one accustomed to go thither. He continued to speak truth upon all occasions, and, notwithstanding the hilarity of his spirits and his love of laughing and making others laugh, he never failed to perform most punctually those light labours committed to his care. Indeed, he loved the animals around him both for their own sakes and those to whom they belonged; and was so desirous of proving his thankfulness that, if permitted, he would have swept the chimney of his honour, much as he detested and even dreaded the employ

When little Flitter (as Sally called him) had been thus happily situated something more than a year, his young patrons were removed to Eton: a circumstance very afflicting to him at the time, and even after his sorrow was past, as young sorrows do pass, it was observed that he ceased to find pleasure in play, or to practise his former tricks and drollery, but that, at every moment he could spare, he was poring over a book and a map of England lent to him by his kind schoolmaster, who said, "it would show him where he now lived and the places he must have travelled through when he came."

The Simpsons thought it "mighty proper young gentlemen should learn every thing, but as to poor people troubling their heads with maps as well as books, that "And my cap will do for him, and mamma will give would never do;" so in order to divert him from this pur-"And I," said Sally, "will give him a good washing and the calves, they took him as a great treat to the summer fair at York, first shewing him the minister and mer fair at York, first shewing him the minister and "You must do more, Sally; keep him with you, and other places most remarkable in that ancient and interestmake him a steady, good little boy, till we see what he is ing city. On going to the busy part of the town, Sally and fit for," said his kind benefactor, whose sons had already her young charge were attracted by an exhibition like Mr. ran off to secure the means of clothing the destitute boy. Gyngell's, where a theatrical performance was about to Dame Simpson's share in this labour of love not only take place, and in the meantime a young lad, very gaudily nation also. The man from whom he had been liberated Here William Simpson left them, having some business, admitted that he had been stolen, and she concluded that but promised to return: and here for a time, they were it must have been from some very superior home: in order very glad to stay, like the crowd around them, all of whom to try if he could quicken his recollection by the sight of seemed delighted with the young performer, into whose a spacious house and costly furniture, he was taken into cap abundance of half-pence and not a few sixpences were

As the tumbling went on, Sally had repeatedly heard neighbor "would see to every thing," he persisted in returning-for which she was serry, as she saw that his and he could not hear of any second good justice to deeyes were full of tears, and he twice returned to shake her liver him from thraldom; so he went on as well as he hand and say "goodbye."

her husband, when they found that the poor fellow had not length, he found that part of his bundle had been stolen, only performed all his duties, and left every thing in the and that the other boy was in many respects a bad associate, nicest order, but was gone, no one knew whither! On he determined to part from them so soon as he could obtain a looking into his little garret they found his slate, on which mere trifle, and, postponing his scheme of seeking home, to was written, "Dear friends, I am going to seek my mo-throw himself again on the pity of his late friends. "But

This assertion they did not exactly believe, for they had shall make me afraid to look his honour in the face. found that the acting man at the fair was leaving York that very night, and were convinced that Flitter's move- jured in mind, though often sorely tempted, alike by his ments were some way connected with his -not conceiving wants and his companions, who reproached him and ridiit possible that his love for his mother, whom he could not culed him. Unluckily they continued to go from one remember, was strong enough to tempt him away from so comfortable a home as they had provided him.

These honest people were not aware of the fact that, in proportion as the boy's health and strength had returned, the best he had ever witnessed, after the deductions of the his memory had been, to a certain degree, restored, though still very insufficiently for any positive purpose. He had been long brooding on the possibility of retracing his cess of a boy like himself as to age, and inferior in skill. All his conclusions, as arising from his recollections and his knowledge of the country, rushed upon his mind and he knew that from thence he could easily get into Linconquickened his resolutions. He felt sure that his mother shire: therefore he silently took his now reduced bundle, must live in some town or village near the Humber, from whence he had been inveigled on board a vessel to be traordinary severity, from after a time being unable to do what was required. It ran in his head that his last master said, "at the time he bought him that he was told by the former, little Jem had had a fever on board which like to meet the observation of any person engaged with would keep down his growth for years."

Naturally a most affectionate child, and every day perceiving, either from the children he mixed with at school or from his young masters, the happiness of having parents and relations, his heart yearned towards the distant mother and baby child still fondly recalled, and from the time when he lost sight of those who were more especially beloved, his thoughts had been employed on the possibility of seeking for them, especially when he was induced to conclude his mother was a widow and could not fail to be rendered wretched by losing him. His first effort to free himself from tyranny had been successful-who knew end and at the other his oranges, he sat out, but not withbut another to procure him natural relations might be equally so? It was true the journeyman had been his first prompter by talking about justices, and now he had no prompter but his own heart, and that said very frequently his conduct was fo lish and perhaps ungrateful.

Alas! poor Flibbertigibbet soon found that he had exchanged a life of case for one of labour, for which applause by no means repaid him, and the money for which alone he had forfeited his happiness was denied; the contents of his cap, though exceeding that of the other boy, to be the acquaintance of his whole life. Having done so, was seized by the owner of the show, and a scanty supper and straw bed was the reward of his exertion-which was not allowed to be made till he had travelled to the town of Leeds and was of course far from his late happy home

It is true he was told "that by and by he was to have a benefit" and that the "grown gentlemen lived on their freely given, and often was he permitted to share the bed benefits;" he had therefore nothing left for it but to be patient. of a lad like himself as he passed through the country. Besides he was so profitable that a sharp look-out was could, tumbling and hoping, sometimes rewarded by food What was her surprise, her sorrow-nor less that of or pence, sometimes neglected and derided. When, at never, never," said he, sobbing, "will I do one thing that

With this good resolution the poor boy continued unininland town to another, so that he remained as far as ever from the object of his pursuit: and, until they reached Sheffield, no benefit was given to him; and, although it was master were made, only eighteen shillings and ninepence were given to him.

This was, however, a large sum, and several of the comformer home, when the power of obtaining money for the pany sought to ease him of it by laying wagers, or playing purpose suddenly burst upon him at York, from the suc- at various games, but James was much too wise to be thus drawn in. Having sauntered round the town early, he had seen upon the canal a vessel bound to Howden, and shire: therefore he silently took his now reduced bundle, repaired to the quay, and, mingling with a body of graziers on board, happily escaped all observation, as he was made a cabin-boy, and that he had been treated with exhe would not think of leaving the troop.

To Hull the anxious wanderer dared not go, least his old master should spy him and reclaim him nor did he shipping, as he knew no hold could be so strong as that of a vessel, nor any tyranny so hopeless as that practised by its master: he therefore prepared to walk through the country as soon as he landed, and thought himself very happy in having an opportunity of purchasing a stock of oranges at Howden, because by the sale of them he would not only be able to maintain himself, but have a plausible reason for going into the back part of houses and gardens, -for he fancied he should recognise his mother's garden, as he used to have a part of it for his own.

to

no

ha

•on

WO

ing

WRS

J

wen

thro

were

Having got with his oranges a wallet, his clothes at one out casting a look of sorrow towards the Selby road, for that led towards the park where his benefactor lived. Having, however, accomplished so much, he hoped that more would be in his power; he rallied his spirits and tried to be manly.

When the poor boy reached Barton, remembering it only too well as the place where he had stopped with the sweep some time, he hastened to get thence into the villages which lie on the banks of the river, which he felt he found his spirits sink from the loneliness of his situation, and the sense of fear, and indeed shame, which at times would steal upon him. He had, however, much pleasure at times in the kindness of the people, for they are singularly hospitable in Lincolnshire to strangers in every rank of life; and many a slice of bread and basin of milk were

Indeed, his appearance was so respectable, his face and kept upon him, both by the manager and the other boy, hands being always clean, and his clothing, with the exo that he was for some time little more than a prisoner, ception of his shoes, still so decent, that he conveyed no other idea to the honest people who thus received him, but | that of pity from one so young who was cast on his own Speak, child! do you know your name?" resources; and so well did he dispose of his merchandise, "Oh, no! I wish I did. I only know I was called 'litthat he was frequently obliged to apply for the renewal the Jemmy!" of his stock to the larger towns; from which circumstance he made slow progress, and saw with dismay the days ing; and the maid coming to her assistance, said, "Tell shortening, and felt the cold blast of autumn blow cheerless-missis all you know, my boy, but be sure you tell truth."

If have nothing to tell besides, except that we had a

as high as Spalding, he determined to retrace his steps, as like this of yours." the impression was still more strong than ever upon his weary and foot-sore, he determined as evening was drawing on, to seek his former lodging, and not attempt selling his fruit till the following morning.

He was just about to place an orange in his wallet when a sweet voice called out to him, and the face of a darling, her comfort, her long-lost James."

that pretty thing !"

curly head and thought he had never seen any thing so grand to be his mother; the mother of a sweep, of a boy pretty in all his travels: and weary as he had felt just be that tumbled at fairs—that hawked oranges through the fore, he thought he could have gazed for an hour upon it. country." No person came near the door; but the child earnestly No person came near the door; but the child earnestly But Nelly now entered—gazed at him, and declared, reiterated her request, and James, stepping up to her, gave "she should know him among a thousand;—hesides, was her the orange: in doing so he perceived she was better he not the picture of his sister, and the very model of his love."

"Yes!" said he to himself, "Sally is a sweet name to so long for nothing." me; and now my face is set towards that Sally who was edly wandering here in vain."

Full of this resolution, in the morning he counted his bered her son with the dead. oranges, considered the possibility of paying for a passage that's him mother !"

voice of his little friend of last night; she had hold of the or his young patrons was the merrier. Enough to say,

"I believe, my good boy, you gave (not sold) my little in the gentleman who rescued him from want, cruelty, girl an orange last night; I must buy her a few more, and an early grave. and pay for that also."

"Not that," said the boy, blushing, as he offered her some of the finest.

The lady was not difficult to please: whilst choosing A Steam Voyage down the Danube; with Sketches of Hunher oranges, it struck her that giving the boy a breakfast would be her best way of rewarding his civility, and, having paid him, she asked him to return to her house,-" It was but a step from thence," she observed.

James carried the oranges after her, and entering she went forward with him into her kitchen, which was at the back of her parlour; on getting thither, the boy looked through the window, and instantly shrunk back, exclaiming, "Oh, dear! how strange I feel!"

The lady, seeing him turn very pale, asked him if he were well; to which he answered so sensibly, as if to account for his indisposition, that she enquired how old he was

"I wish I knew, madam, but indeed I do not."

"You are a fatherless child, I fear ?"

from my mother, which is all I know of myself."

"Stolen!" eried the lady; "stolen! when? where?-

The lady could not speak-she was on the point of faint-

After wandering thus for many weeks, and reaching maid Nelly, and there was a little baby, and a garden very

The girl shouted aloud, "O, it's all right! it was my mind that he was in the right direction, the dialect appeared sister Nelly that is married; little miss was at her house so familiar to his ears. On entering the town of Grimsby, last night when you seed her, but misses will faint away, -what shall I do? what shall I do?"

Her mistress did not faint; she burst into tears-she sank upon her knees-she tried to utter thanks to God she held out her arms to her son-she called him "her beautiful little girl was seen to peep over the half-door of Had he then indeed found his mother? were his wishes a very poor cottage, who said, "Please to give little Sally fulfilled, his hopes realised? alas! the poor boy could not believe it; far different and inferior as her situation was The boy looked wistfully at the fair round face and to the only lady he had ever known, yet she was surely too

But Nelly now entered-gazed at him, and declared, dressed than might have been expected, but it was her own father's picture?" As she spoke, the honest woman's beauty and confidence that had won him, together with voice, manner, nay, her prominent teeth, were all familiar her name of Sally -" for surely that was one he ought to to him, and, rushing to his mother's arms, he cried, "Oh, yes! I see it all; I am your son!-I have not wandered

But who can tell how much explanation was givenalways good to me, I will return to her, for I am undoubt what caresses were lavished? Who describe the emotions of a fond mother's heart, who for four long years had num-

We need not say that when Flibbertigibbet again made to Snaith or Selby, and made himself as respectable as he his appearance at E. Park, which was the day of Mr. Talcould in appearance, before he sallied forth to sell, as he bot's return thither, he was accompanied by his grateful now hoped, his last cargo. Scarcely had he set forward, mother, who felt as if she could have been eloquent in when a voice behind him cried out, "That's the good boy! thanks, though she only proved so in tears. It was a question whether old Sally Simpson or young Sally Harrison, Our orange boy naturally turned his head, for it was the his sister, was the happier person; or whether little James hand of a lady who quickened her steps to get up to him. that our wanderer has still a kind and approving patron

From the Edinburgh Review.

gary, Wallachia, Servia, and Turkey. By MICHAEL J. Quin, Author of a 'Visit to Spain.' 2 vols. 8vo. London: 1835.

THE patriotic exertions of Count Szechenyi have conferred upon Hungary the great benefit of steam navigation. Nothing was so much wanted by that fertile and extensive country, as an opening for her commerce into the Black Sea, and among the provinces themselves; and although the difficulties of the navigation in the lower part of the Danube present formidable obstacles to the completion of the design, these are yet in the course of being overcome, while the advantages of an easy and expeditious internal communication have been already secured. It is natural "I think I am, but God only knows! I was stolen for us, therefore, to feel great obligations to Mr Quin, who has given, in the volumes before us, an account of the first showed in treating controverted matters, and marked the description easily within his reach. love of liberty which seemed natural to him. It is very

Mr. Quin embarked at Posth, the chief city of Hungary, though not its seat of government, on the 24th September, for erecting a stone bridge over the Danube, to connect this city with the opposite one of Buda; and it is part of the proposal that the toll or pontage shall be levied indiscriminately on all. This is justly represented as an important step towards improving the Hungarian constitution-for the nobles there, as in most countries where the feudal aristocracy continues unreformed, are exempt from all direct datation, and even from customs and passage dues in the military districts. The government is indeed, in one respect, eminently a free one. The power of the crown is in theory limited more than in any country in Europe, we denuties, and the mode in which the national affairs were denuties, and the mode in which the national affairs were denuties, and the mode in which the national affairs were denuties, and the mode in which the national affairs were denuties, and the mode in which the national affairs were taxation. Against which aristocratic form of government, would certainly insist upon the restoration of the Hunnumber of the nobles. In fact, every person above the remark, that politics were by no means forbidden topics number of the nobles. In fact, every person above the rank of a day-labourer in the country, is noble—and many are of this class who labour for their daily bread. The in this country: they are in fact as freely spoken of as are of this class who labour for their daily bread. The in this country: they are in fact as freely spoken of as in France or England. No notice is ever taken by the authorities of this liberty of speech; I have heard even the authorities themselves discuss public questions without the slightest reserve. The freedom thus generally enjoyed must be founded only on custom, which cannot be changed, but upon a sense of inherent strength with which it might be dangerous to tamper.' sits in our House of Commons-in fact no man who -Pp. 35, 36, 37, tour that has been made in those parts since this important could aspire to a seat there—would in Hungary be other change took place; and although the rapidity with which than noble; for the nobility there would comprehend a he performed his voyage-a rapidity necessarily incident vast number more, and go a great way lower, than all perto the mode of conveyance—prevented him from collecting all, or nearly all, the information which it would deed, in another respect, our constitution is far more arisbe desirable to possess regarding the countries he tocratic than theirs; if by aristocracy he meant the prepassed through, we can yet venture to assure our readers ponderance of a limited number of the higher orders in that his book contains a variety of particulars hoth inter. any country. Aristocratic power with us is confined to esting and amusing; that it presents the picture of an four or five hundred families, who really do form an oligarable, well-instructed, and amiable mind; and that even chy, while in Hungary it belongs perhaps to forty or those who may be the most sensible of its deficiencies fifty thousand. We are now, moreover, speaking of our go-(none, we believe, are more likely to feel them than the vernment as it is since the change in 1831 and 1832, which modest author,) will bestow their time not unprofitable or put an end to the absolute supremacy before enjoyed by our unpleasingly in the perusal of it. Mr. Quin is already ad-nobles. The remarks which we have now made are invantageously known as the author of an able work respect. tended to supply what our author has omitted respecting ing his visit to Spain in 1823. Of this we spoke favoura-the Hungarian government. He gives little or no inforbly at the time of its publication; and although he seemed mation about it, which is the more to be regretted, as his then to labour under some bias of prejudice as to the con- intimacy with the most distinguished leader of the patristitutional cause, we did justice to the fairness which he otic party, Count Szechenyi, placed every thing of this

Our author has a variable success in his descriptions-for satisfactory to find that ten year's longer acquaintance with sometimes nothing can be more picturesque, because mankind has not deadened but animated the same noble lively and natural, but occasionally this is far from being sentiments: and we find throughout the present work an their character-as when he recounts how the Stars were ardent sympathy with his fellow-creatures, and zeal for shining in the blue ocean of the sky like so many islands the best interests of mankind, accompanied by the correlative of such dispositions,—a steady batred of oppression, horizon, between two of those beauteous worlds, and though and a determination fearlessly to speak the truth of the divested of half her light, flung a long pathway of silver highest that practice it.

In the steam-boat he found as his fellow-passengers 1834. A plan is mentioned by him as now in agitation, intelligent physician, proceeding to settle in one of the about a hundred Tyrolese emigrants, under the care of an mining districts of Lower Hungary. He also met a gentleman of figure and talents returning from the Diet, and of him we have the following particulars :-

> ni hi

. 1 an

ce

pe on wh in : hin ma mo the had had his !

or s ofte The and

wher been

the n

'Finding my companions at supper, I was very glad join them. They were in the midst of Hungarian in theory limited more than in any country in Europe, we cannot except England itself; for the victory is chosen by the Diet or parliament, jointly with the king; the right of taking arms against him used to be, till the middle of the last century, soleunly acknowledged by the sovereign in kept the table in roars of laughter. His features beamhis corronation oath, and he is not by law counted as king ed with benevolence, and I was not surprised afterwards his corronation oath, and he is not by law counted as king antil he is crowned;—although Joseph II. contrived to learn that, in his own country of Presburg, where he evade this crowning, as he also illegally removed the regalia has ample possessions, he is universally beloved. He to Vienna, and thereby threw the Hungarians into rebellion. But all the restrictions are in favour of the nobility; the inferior classes having little more consideration than they had in our own Magna Charta. It is indeed a singular circumstance that the two subjects forbidden to be discussed at the Diet, are the hereditary right of the house of Austria, and the exemption of the nobility from all the little and the exemption of the nobility from all the little and the exemption of the mobility from all the little and the exemption of the nobility from all the little and the we must, in fairness, set one important fact,-the vast garian constitution. I had more than once occasion to

The account of the Hungarian nobles, which he gives intelligence was on his swarthy weather-beaten cheek, on the authority of an English groom, settled as servant his voice was melody itself, and his diction eloquence. to one of them, we shall not extract, because we are quite 1—Pp. 17, 18, 19. to one of them, we shall not extract, because we are quite; confident our author has been grossly deceived by his in-formant. It is enough to state that this description answers to a country wholly without police, and in which rapine and violence, to property as to person, prevails universally, with as little check from the laws as in the heart of the American woods, or the African deserts. Now, whatever may be said of the Austrian yoke in so many amongst his new acquaintances as if he had known other respects, this, at least, has always been confessed, that in return for its oppressions, and indeed its extinction of all political rights, it does confer upon its subjects the inestimable blessings of a strict though mild, quiet and regular police. Not to mention that we in vain search the narratives of other travellers, for any thing like the account here given by Mr. Quin. The most singular, and indeed mysterious personage whom he fell in with in his whole tour is thus described:—

'He was from Moldavia. He had been in the Russian service during the late war with Turkey, but in what capacity I could never satisfactorily discover. suspect he was a spy. He spoke German, French, and Italian, fluently. He wore a blue frock-coat, which probably had served him during the said war, as it could boast of only a part of one button, and two very unequal skirts, remaining in any thing like decent condi-tion. The rest of the garment was covered with grease. A pair of old black stuff trowsers patched at the knees, in a most unworkman-like manner, rent and not patch-ed in other parts indescribable, and vilely tattered at the extremities, together with a ghost of a black waistcoat, a cast-off military cap, and wretched boots, offered an apology for a better suit, which he said he had at home. His shirt was also in the list of absentees! He had lost the half of one of his thumbs, the other was wrapped in a bandage. He had not shaved for three weeks—he certainly could not have washed either his hands or his face for three months, and a comb had probably not passed through his hair for three years To crown his personal peculiarities, he had a very red nose, on the top of which was perched a pair of specta-

'Nevertheless, with all these strong objections against him—so strong, that I wonder my friend Captain Cozier had not thrown him overboard—there was something about this man which seemed to have actually fascinated a rather genteel youth, who was constantly at his side, and to have already secured him the devotion of a mis-cellaneous group of Austrian soldiers and their wives, pedlars, and artisans, who occupied mats and sheepskins on deck. With the sailors he was quite a favourite. He whistled well, he sung well, and passed off every thing in a "devil-may-care" kind of a way, which gained him admirers. A charlatan at a French fair—a romance reader at the mole of Naples—could not possess more power over his audience than was exercised over these simulations by this Moldavian advantage. these simpletons by this Moldavian adventurer. He had a commonplace-book in his bosom—for his pockets had all vanished-from which he occasionally read to his followers scraps of poetry of his own composition, or selected from the works of celebrated German writers. These readings he interspersed with comments often so droll, that he set the whole deck in a roar.— Then he would relate some of his accidents by flood and field, or describe his travels, in the course of which he mentioned the most extraordinary scenes in the really did not know her own instrument in the hands of world, which had occurred to him at Constantinople, Bucharest, Prague, Vienna, Petersburg, Paris, Berlin, Madrid, Gibraltar, Venice, every where but London, had been thrown open, and was besieged by a numerous where he had the modesty to confess he had never yet group of savage-looking figures, wrapped in their cloaks been. His eye, when lighted up by the excitement of and large hats, who stood staring in upon our musician, the moment, was singularly brilliant, the flush of fine as if they fully participated in the priests opinion of them a hundred years. He treated the company to a history of his travels, which he extended on this occa-sion to Grand Cairo. His audience seemed at a loss to know where Grand Cairo was, until the priest enlightend them by declaring that it was in Asia. "In Asia!' exclaimed the Moldavian, with indescribable disdain,—"no such thing; Grand Cairo is in Africa." The governor was in raptures at this decided triumph over the clergyman, who, in order to restore his character, inveigled the poet into a theological controversy. to my surprise, and to the great chagrin of the priest, and boundles joy of the governor, the Moldavian proved himself quite as well read in theology as he was in ge-ography: he repeatedly convicted the priest of entire ignorance of the works with which he had pretended to be most fimiliar, and so merciless was he in following up his conquest, by challenging the divine on the more abstruce points of doctrine, that the latter literally felt obliged to decamp from the field. The governor shouted with excessive mirth, and ordered another bottle, which he compelled the poet to drink in addition to his own.'—P. 98, 99.

Some days elapsed of the voyage, and the party had arrived at Dwinich, where the Moldavian routed a priest in the following fashion:—

But his performances did not end here-for a guitar had been produced, on which a lady was going to play—the mysterious stranger asked permission to look at it, 'and swept his mutilated fingers over the strings with the skill of a professor.'

'The priest looked amazed. After preluding in a singularly graceful manner which captivated the Swinicheans, the tatterdemalion, clearing his voice with a fresh bottle of wine, which was voted to him by common accord, treated us to "Di tanti palpiti," not only with great taste, but in one of the best tenor voices I ever The priest exclaimed that he knew not what to think of this fellow, unless he was the devil, for that not only were his talents and knowledge universal, but of a degree of excellence in every thing that left him without a rival.

'The lady was quite ashamed to touch the guitar after the poet; nevertheless she was induced to favour the company with two or three Wallachian songs, which, after the splendid performances we had just heard, lost all the effect they might otherwise have produced. One of the young men, jealous of the musical character of Swinich, next took up the guitar, but after vexing the chords with a long series of humdrum tinklings, which he would fain persuade us were Servian melodies, he was reluctantly compelled, by the unanimious voice of the company, to resign the instrument to our Mephis-topheles, who showed himself, still more even than before, a perfect master of the art, and that too of the very best school. Italian, German, Hungarian, and Moldavian airs followed each other in rapid succession, and in the most admirable style. The fair owner of the guitar remarked, with a charming simplicity, that she really did not know her own instrument in the hands of his unearthly character. And in truth, when I looked at this Moldavian—remembered how he had amused his companions on the deck of the steamer by his anecdotes, his poetry, and his dramatic declamations; the variety of information which he afforded to myself durantees.

Let us pause for a moment to consider how near a parallel we have at home to one part of this proceeding. ing the course of the day; his undoubted acquaintance with many countries, though he sometimes indulged in exaggeration on that subject; the wandering life he had led; the offices, sometimes of trust, and responsi-bility, and peril, which he had fulfilled; his various acquirements in science, history, and the fine arts; and, to crown all, his musical powers, which were of the very first order; and his ragged, unshaven, filthy ap-pearance—I could not help feeling that there was a unravelment of the mystery that surrounded his fortunes.

At Orsova our author made acquaintance with the noble resolved to open the navigation of the Danube by means not so easy, by very civilly following in his wake. of steam-boats, then recently brought into use. He made vourable reception, and the successful accomplishment of Prince followed this sound advice, and is now a member. extending its scale greatly, and intrusting the execution of made in this direction. extending its scale greatly, and infrusting the execution.

The disabled state of the finances is, after all, the most further prosecuted, and the assent of the Diet was not asked to its prayer. We mention this anecdote as highly creditable to the skill of Metternich, and as placing him in a to the Diet becomes inevitable, and no grants can be exceeded to the skill of Metternich, and as placing him in a to the Diet becomes inevitable, and no grants can be exceeded to the skill of Metternich, and as placing him in a to the Diet becomes inevitable. But for this the reserved in the skill of the skil most advantageous contrast whith those rulers who never pected without equivalents. But for this the progress of parallel we have at home to one part of this proceeding, though not to the result. When the friends of Education began their labours thirty years ago, suppose the high church party had possessed in England the same sway which they so anxiously desire to have, and which the Metternichs have at Vienna, and even at Presburg, they would have summoned before them the chief educators of the people, and forbidden them to proceed. When told, as they would probably have been, in Count Szechenyi's might have procured for him the dangerous honours of a magician. — Pp. 100, 103. meuh if they would have adopted the project. We rather The reader will probably share in the disappointment think they would have endeavoured to stifle it. We are pretty which we have experienced at losing sight of this strange sure they never would have given it all the aid in their power personage, without any further account of him, or any if they had undertaken it. We are almost sure they would have starved it in the nursing, if not changed it. We are quite sure they would not have intrusted it to the hands of those who and excellent person whom we have more than once men- had put them in motion, and compelled them to rouse their tioned, Count Szechenyi. He is one of the most considera- sluggish energies, in the fear of worse happening. But so ble magnets of Hungary, and devotes himself with un- far 'their conduct has resembled the crafty Austrians'. speakable ardour, but also with a judicious zeal, to the im- When they were well assured that nothing could stop the provement of his country. He is connected in some de-current, they fell in with its movement, in hopes of being gree with a very different personage, Prince Metternich; able to guide its course. When they saw that, 'at all his brother being married to a sister of the Princess, and events, the Danube could not be long without steamboats. this accident has proved favourable to his enlightened pro- they fitted out one of their own ;-hoping gently to jostle the jects. Many years ago, and he is now only forty-four, he Count's out of the way, and ended, when they found that

It is not, however, in regard to steam alone that the himself master of the whole subject of steam navigation, alarms of the Prince were excited. A club was established coming over to England repeatedly in prosecution of his at Pesth upon the London plan, and to it belonged the mag-plans. He then obtained the names of many distinguished nats and the deputies in general; in short, all the upper individuals as subscribers to a joint stock company, and he classes of society. The name was unpleasant to genuine ordered three engines from Mr. Watt of Soho, with whom he is in constant correspondence. For these, boats were periodical works, as well as all foreign newspapers, were built at Trieste, and the undertakers presented a petition received there; political conversation on every topic was to the Diet for its sanction to their scheme. Now, as soon held; and lectures on subjects of science and the arts were as it was considered that the Diet would in all likelihood delivered. The Count was again summoned to attend the accede to this prayer, the farsighted Metternich began to Prince; and the latter, after full explanations had been reflect that this was a new kind of process; that the Diet given, decided that this club required some control. 'Come had not before been appealed to on such purely Hungarian among us,' said the Count, 'and give us a liberal subscrip-questions; that the popularity which would attend its fat ju li wu

of

Ti

nip

COL

for atte

the

desc

the i

one all,

ware had i right the d

here

of th

to wi

and a lars (tion, contri enume

is to b VOL

the project, would redound not only to the honour of the Another improvement, however, seems to be beyond the Count and his patriotic friends, but to the glory, and there-reach of remedial measures-or even of such palliatives fore to the influence of the Diet; and that of course this as we have been contemplating. A newspaper was estabwould not be the last popular and useful act of the same lished at Pesth, and in the Hungarian language—that party and the same body ;-bis legitimate and conservative language which the tyrannical though reforming Joseph Highness was pleased to send for the Count and ask an II. had put down by preclamation. An Academy of explanation of these unheard-of proceedings—proceedings sciences and letters has also been founded, and the Trans-which did not come from any of the known officers of the actions, published quarterly, contain papers by judicious state, nor in any way originate with the Imperial Government, and yet had for their object the improvement of the the general improvement. This time, no summons could Imperial dominions. The Count's answer was admirable, and it was decisive. 'If you desire that the Diet should not adopt the petition, do it yourselves; for the Danube at Metternich and his master would probably give their right all events cannot be long without steam-boats.' This was hand to have such a precious instrument of legitimate quite enough. The Prince, whatever faults he may have, government, they are well aware how hopeless it is to atis no dunce. He took up the plan, nay improved upon it, tempt obtaining it from the Diet, and no effort has been reform would be slow, though we are far from doubting doubt is, namely, poll-tax, matrimony-tax, church-taxes, that it would be sure, and in the end effectual. This will mill, distillery, and corn taxes; tithe of grain, of beehives, accelerate its arrival by half a century, and put to flight all and of wine, and compulsory service to men in office. the preventive projects of the Austrian statesmen.

The following statement of distances on the Danube may be useful to the reader. It was drawn up by the Count. We should observe, what Mr. Quin must be aware of (though not a very accurate geographer, for he places Montcenis between Genoa and Turin) (ii. 320), that Regensburg is commonly called, except in Germany, Ratis-

		Germ		on Miles.
Post Post france to Possession			Part.	Total.
From Exchingen to Regeneburg			30	50
- Regensburg to Vicona		ir.	30	100
- Vienna to Peath	6		40	140
- Peath to Peterwardein			60	900
- Peterwardein to Orseva			40	240
- Orsova to Galacz			100	340
- Galacz to the black Sea			25	365
If we add to these items the distance mouth of the Danube to Constanting				3
Black Sea, which is seventy German miles .			70	C. P. L.
then the total distance from Eschingen to Con- stantinople will be four hundred and thirty-five
German miles or about one thousand nine hundred and fifty-eight miles of English admeasurement.				435

'As the voyage by steam, however, can only be made from Presburg to Constantinople, the distance is reduced to about fourteen hundred and forty English works on the Danube are completed, might be easily traversed in eight days and nights. At present, the journey over land from Vienna to Constantinople cannot be made in the ordinary mode of travelling within less than three weeks. The new route by the Danube will exhibit, therefore, one of the most important tri-umphs over time which the steam-engine has yet ac-complished. —P. 152.

the document which he is publishing, our author (i. 153) the Widin the refresh the speech as delivered at 'the first Assembly of other august solemnities of the same class in the feudal the States'—whereas the speech repeatedly alludes to the former Assemblies of the same kind, and mentions this as one of the usual ones, as not being a meeting of the States at the balance in the Turcoman's favour. wards to be convened. He speaks of a code of laws which had been four years in preparation; he presents the people with an organic statute or constitution which the property of the property with an organic statute or constitution, which defines the rights of the Prince, limits his power, and prescribes also the duties of the people. To this, he as well as they are

VOL. XXVIII. JANUARY, 1836 .- 9

All these the Prince abolishes; and even for the services on public works, the Government is to pay. The only burden left by the Diet, is the repair of roads and bridges.

Count Szechenyi, who was proceeding on a visit to Hussein Pacha, at Widin, joined our author on his voyage down the Danube. The shoals were so inconvenient, so frequently left the vessel aground, that the navigation must plainly be assisted by some works; and, indeed, in one or two places, will probably have to be carried across necks of land by canals. Hussein's appointment at Widin was owing to the jealousy of his enemies at court, after he had successfully defended Shumla against the Russians in the campaign of 1828. The presentation offered nothing very remarkable; but we cannot help thinking that a Florentine physician of the Pasha is somewhat harshly dealt with, as well as his master, when our author sets him down for one who 'would never refuse the secret exercise of his skill against the enemy of his employer for an adequate consideration;'-and this merely from his ill-look; though it is added, that 'after feeling as if they could read in his countenance a volume of crime, they learnt subsequently from their quarantine companions that their suspicions were by no means unfounded.' We really must take leave to doubt if this be the kind of evidence miles; which when the steam-boat establishment and on which so atrocious a charge should be allowed to rest; and Mr. Quin must bear in mind that his book, though without mentioning the doctors name, yet describes him quite as clearly as if it did, and that it will be in all probability known both in Italy and Turkey. The bad favour in which the faculty at Widin was with the party, did not, we observe, prevent our author from taking the disguise of the Count's Physician, when it was necessary for him to be part of the suite in order to his presentation. Not, Our author, in the course of his voyage, introduces a apparently, having had much converse with Court's, he very interesting document—the speech of Prince Milosh seems greatly surprised, and even disappointed, with the of Servia, to the General Assembly last February, on ac dulness of the ceremonial and the want of agreeable conceding to the prayer of the Servians for a constitution. versation. Why the proverbial taciturnity of the Turks The Assembly is not a representative body at all, but consists of all the land-owners and other persons of note in the their princes than is to be found on ceremonials of recountry; and from the Prince's allusion to the expense of ception among our own in the west of Europe, it would the meeting, and the difficulty of often coming together not be easy to conjecture. So far our lot is like his, that for want of forage, it is plain that many thousands must we can only speak by report of such high matters and be gathered together on these occasions. With a great in high places; but according to all we have heard, there attention to the subject, and as if he had really never read seems nothing peculiarly dull in the following sketch of he felt it incumbent on him to pay his respects to the pacha; that he was a nobleman of Hungary appointed by the Emperor of Austria to direct the improvements to swear. That financial difficulties have been at work which were necessary to facilitate the navigation of here also, is quite apparent, for one of the main parts of the proposal is a new scheme of taxation; according Sea, whence they might then proceed to Stamboul. The of the proposal is a new scheme of taxation; according to which there is to be one tax substituted for all others, and alone to be levied—in the proportion of six dollars (or we presume a pound), for each of the population, and this to be levied according to the income of the contributors, by the elders of each district. The Prince enumerates the imposts, in room of which his income tax is to be substituted; and sufficiently hateful the groupe no you. XXVIII. JANUARY, 1836.—9 who had been so long engaged in hostilities; but Hussein cut it short by the maxim, that it was always better

was really embarrassing.
'The assigned period for the generation of another idea having been fully accomplished, the packa deliver-The Count confirmed the justness of this remark. Silence again resumed her wand, and we were all spellbound. In the mean while, pipes, with splendid amber mouthpieces, were brought by the attendants, and ber mouthpieces, were brought by the attendants, and ber mouthpieces. The mean while, another set of domestics came round with a japanned tray, on which sweetmeats were served in glasses. But as it would be necessary for us to use silver spoons, which were on the tray, and silver is supposed to be a conductor of the plague, onquarantine friends interposed and service. much to my annoyance, as beside the sweetmeats were arranged glasses of sherbet. Hussein smiled, not pleased, however, at the scrupulousness of our guards, which he must have felt as a sort of imputation upon his country.

'Small china coffee-cups were then brought in upon a gold tray; they were turned down, with silver filagree cups placed over each. Coffee was next produced in a japanned pot, and the tray and coffee-pot having been japanned pot, and the tray and coffee-pot having been placed on the floor by the attendants, one of them presented a cup to our chief officer, who removing it from its silver case, filled it with the fragrant beverage, and placed it in the Count's hand. In this way Mr. Tasner and I were also served. The pacha and his son took some sherbet. This ceremony being concluded, the pacha enquired whether the steam-boat was going to Stamboul. The Count replied that the steam navigation so far was not vet completed, but that when another tion so far was not yet completed, but that when another boat, which was daily expected from Trieste, should arrive at Galacz, it would be possible to make the voy-age from Presburg to Stamboul in eight days. This age from Presburg to Stamboul in eight days. intelligence produced an exclamation of surprise from Hussein. His officers and domestics held up their hands in amazement. But it was clear that Hussein was no friend to this sort of expedition, which he evidently thought predicted no good for Turkey.— Pp. 181, 184.

Proceeding on their voyage, they struck on a sand siderably beyond its means bank; and our author becoming impatient, left the steamboat and the Count for a Zante boat, which having less draught of water, easily passed along, and took him to Rutschutz, which is between two and three hundred miles from the mouth of the Danube. From thence he came across the Balkan mountains, on horseback, to Constantinople.

Constantinople has been often described, but never much better than in the following lines:

as well as of the European banks of the Bosphorus, I Portugal and the Algarves. must say that they very much exceeded any description employed in conjecturing how this oppressive silence twas next to be broken.

'At length, the pacha having exhausted his pipe, ensured if the Emperor was much beloved in Hungary. The Count answered in the affirmative, adding that it was impossible for any man to know the Emperor without esteeming him for his great personal virtues. An effort was then made to prolong the conversation by an allusion to the relations of peace which were now happily established between the Turks and the Hungarians, who had been so long engaged in hostilities; but Husbronze doors, and snow-white marble steps; the tow-ering Turkish ships of war, anchored off the arsenal; the merchants brigs of all nations, sailing up or down for men to be at peace with each other than at was the waves; the innumerable boats bent on business or This truism having been pronounced with great self-complacency, and submitted on all hands, a second quarter of an hour elapsed in solemn taciturnity, which of the Turk, the Albanian, the Greek, the Tartar, the wild mountaineer from Caucasus, the slave from Cir-cassia, the horse-dealer from Arabia, the silk and car-

> any difficulty in providing an ambassador in the Levant with a trustworthy interpreter from home, or rather in training one or two of our diplomatic agents to a knowledge of the language! With all our belief, however, in the various resources of England, we could wish the several pages of rant left out which our author devotes to the enumeration of English glories. Among these is introduced, somewhat drolly (were not the subject so serious), our civilizing Africa by putting an end to 'that unhallowed trade' which he seems to forget, we were for upwards of a century the greatest protectors of, in all its foulest abominations.

> From Constantinople he made an excursion to Vourla, where he was carried by a frigate to Napoli. He then visited Athens and Corinth, and several other parts of the Greek dominions, and was presented to King Otho, of whom he speaks in very favourable terms. The cutting through the Isthmus of Corinth he represents as by no means a work of great magnitude; there being only two miles of plain and two of monntain and rock to cut. The latter, however, seems of such height as to require tunneling; and we presume the resources of the new kingdom are far removed from any extensive operation of that kind. The estimate of half a million sterling, though assuredly below the truth, would probably be found con-

ar

Eu

ing

me

tak

thou

Con

He came from Greece to Corfu, and thence to Trieste, from which he went to Venice, Rome, and Naples. The rapidity of his journey left him little opportunity of gathering information at any of those places; but the reader will find a brief account of the grand mass celebrated on Christmas day, by the Pope himself, in St. Peter's. We have not room for more than a page or two, in which, together with his holiness, 'the servant of servants,' a very well-known son of the church and ornament of legitimacy makes his appearance,-none other than ' Much as I had heard of the beauties of the Asiatic the conservative of conservatives, the Don Miguel, late of

I had ever read, or any panorama I had ever seen of the Pope was borne to the great altar in his chair them. The ever-changing character of the hills, that of state, attended by a host of cardinals and bishops and the representatives and many members of all the regular orders of the church. The variety, and elegance, and splendour of ecclesiastical costumes thus brought together, produced a most imposing effect. The gorgeous vestments of his Holiness in his jewelled tiara—the mitres and crosiers, and mantles of the bishops, the red robes of the cardinals, formed a remarkable contrast with the poor Carmelite's white garb of flannel, and his ruder sandal. The Swiss papal guards, in their antique dress, covered over on the breast and back by the steel cuirass, with a hat turned up on one side and decorated by a ruby drooping plume on the other, reminded one of the days of the crusades; while the newest fashions of Paris and Lonius and the remarkable contrast with the poor Carmelite's white garb distinct. Here he could listen to no Count Szechenyi, as there were none found to remonstrate. Accordingly breast and back by the steel cuirass, with a hat turned up on one side and decorated by a ruby drooping plume on the other, reminded one of the days of the crusades; while the newest fashions of Paris and Lonius and the poor Carmelite's white garb distinct the could listen to no Count Szechenyi, as there were none found to remonstrate. Accordingly breast and back by the steel cuirass, with a hat turned to be a positive country as the could listen to no Count Szechenyi, as there were none found to remonstrate. Accordingly breast and back by the Steel cuirass, with a hat turned to be a positive country as the country and the country as the country as the country and the country as the country and the country as the don, crowding the tribunes in another quarter, gave Sicilian princes,—his courtiers, and his professors a different charm to the scene substituting (when the remarkably handsome man, had his character not been sovereign may think fit to consult them about. If this somewhere in his narrative, though we cannot lay our hand on the passage. This may extenuate his panegyries new favours at his hands. upon the Papal services to Rome, to antiquities and the arts,-services which he considers (II. 286) no secular to Turin, Geneva, Paris, and home, princes with families to provide for could have rendered. Has he never heard of the Miracles of St. Peter-a name given proverbially of the splendid mansions and other in-dications of princely fortunes, amassed by various succesand the key of the treasure to his descendants.

crusades; while the newest fashions of Paris and Lon-liberal desires, gave himself up to the appointed rulers of eye turned downward from that airy dome) real beauty little reason to dread the Milanese and Venetian clamour 'Amongst the remarkable personages who were present at this great festival, I observed Don Miguel, the descended to give them in April 1815—a great charter to ex-usurper of the throne of Portugal. He was in a tribune on the left hand of the Papal throne, and appeared to attract general attention. He was dressed in blue uniform, decorated with some orders, obtained I know not how, or where, or when, as there has been scarcely any period in that prince's life when he merited, in my judgment, any such distinctions. He looked, however, extremely well—indeed, I should have added, even a remarkably handsome man, had his character not been sowereign may think fit to consult them about. If this tainted by his proceedings in the Peninsula. His moral constitution has any thing of liberty in it, why should he physiognomy detracted not a little from his external appearance, and his devotion was somewhat too sanctified to be sincere.'—Pp. 275, 276.

This moral constitution has any thing of liberty in it, why should he physiognomy detracted not a first of new demands? But if indeed it is a mere mockery—perhaps the most daring insult ever offered to a high spirited, though conquered people—then indeed we a high spirited, though conquered people-then indeed we From the enthusiasm with which our author comme. can imagine his dread of any other Italian state possesmorates Catholic ecremonies, we presume he belongs to sing a representative government; but we are at a loss to that communion; indeed we rather think this appears conceive how they who have not indignantly risen against his former bounty, should be suspected of asking any

From Naples our author came by sea to Genoa, thence

[From an article in the Quarterly Review upon the same work we copy the conclusion.]

The political chapters of Mr. Quin's work are, however, sors of the Fisherman, and bequeathed to their natural enriched with one feature of the most important and in-sons or other near relations? The very circumstance of teresting nature. He has somehow obtained, and printed, their being elective, and having no means of transmitting for our benefit, a full copy-of the treaty of Unkiar Sketo their favourites any thing but what they can save out lessi-which, by the bye, means the 'King's Stairs,' and of their stewardship, has always been held a cause of ex. not (as he says) the 'Giant's Mountain.' By this treaty of tortion beyond what a prince has, who leaves the sceptre defensive alliance, the two high contracting parties engage to afford to each other 'mutual materiel succours.' But The present King of Naples, according to Mr. Quin, the separate article now exhibited states, that the Emperor was disposed to give his people a constitution; and this of all the Russias, wishing to spare the Sublime Porte the article formed the topic of conversation at Court. The charges and embarrassments which would result on its young monarch to his immortal honour, had resolved to part from the grant of such 'materiel succours,' is willing assemble a Parliament of his dominions, both Sicily and to waive such succours, and, in conformity with the prin-Naples, with powers of legislation. He had intended to ciple of reciprocity, is contented that, in lieu thereof, 'the reform the system of jurisprudence, the very worst in Sublime Porte shall limit its action in favour of the Im-Europe; and to appoint a ministry of able men, excluding the faineans, who have hitherto administered and mis-nelles; that is to say, not to permit any foreign ship of managed the affairs of the state. But here we again war to enter it under any pretext whatsoever.' The meet, at the end of our adventures, a certain prince whom treaty, in fact, had been neither more nor less than a we saw something of at their commencement. We have plausible pretext for the secret article. 'One party,' says taken our departure with Mr. Quin from Presburg—accompanied him to Pesth—dropt down the Danube with the other a pound of powder; but for the pound of powder and the present to such that the other appears to several to such that the powder is the present the powder. him to Widin—flown across the Balkan on fleet and sure powder both parties subsequently agree in secret to subthough lean steeds—sojourned among plague-patients at stitute the key of the Dardanelles. It gives the auto-Constantinople—traversed the Morea—coasted the Adria crat the power, whenever he may choose to quarrel with tie—travelled over Italy, down to nearly the heel of the any nation, of saying to the Porte, 'I do not want your boot; and lo, here, as at Presburg, Prince Metternich powder, but, in lieu of it, you must shut the Dardanelles starts up, in the same office, of foreseeing risk to legitiaguinst my enemies.' We entirely concur with Mr.

Quin, that every hour this separate secret article is al-|rope, but the intellect of its diplomatists, as compared with lowed to exist, it inflicts an outrage on the law, and, those of other countries-is preparing. Let us, in the on what is higher than the law-the honour of all other first place, turn our attention to the Beltic. nations of men.

to be degraded among the nations by the necessary conse-Finland to Behring's Strait-from the German Ocean to the days of Catharine II.?

us with such deep alarm in the late and present con- a foot of territory, nor any trade in that quarter that calls dition of his country—and of France too. But if the for her interference or protection. Count Nesselrode, disapproving of that transaction, and rely, we are told, as far back as December, 1834,notifying that his government would act as if it had never taken place; and finally, that a similar note was addressed to the same quarter by the French minister, to wich the Russia in the Black Sea, where she has put ticentyto the same quarter by the French minister, to wich the five skips of the line on the stocks, and intends infollowing epigrammatic reply was returned—'Russia will creasing her fleet there to sixty sail of different at as if these notes had never been written.' We believe sizes. Workmen are employed night and day in adding all this is true; but the affair cannot end thus. The process case Mr. Onin the second Alexander to the fortifications of Sevastopol.' phrase,' says Mr. Quin, 'that escaped Alexander, when he called the Dardanelles the key of my house, is pregnant with a truth that becomes every day more apparent.

occupation of both shores of the Gulf of Finland, the England, in 1809, consented not to lead her men-of- eastern coast of the Gulf of Bothnia, and the eastern war up the Dardanelles; but this was only that she coast of the Baltic as far as Tilsit, Russia has nothing to might furnish no pretext for those of Russia coming disturb her along the whole of these shores. Prussia, on down. England never admitted the principle of exclusion. While the whole of the coasts of the Black Sea frigate at Potsdam, a present from our King William; were Turkish, then indeed the Porte might do what she and she is moreover her ally. The harmless state of Denchose with her own; but from the moment that another mark has a few ships of the line, one of which is occapower gained a footing in that sea, and moreover erec-sionally put into commission. Those of Sweden-imted arsenals and constructed navies there, it became impoverished Sweden—have long been rotting in harbour.

perative on England to acquire the right of passage, if But that is nothing: it is well understood that some great she had it not before. In the midst of European strug-change is at hand in Sweden: a very powerful party in gles for a temporary object, she allowed the right, but that once lofty nation are desirous of uniting their counthe recognised right, to lie dormant. But the time for try to the great neighbouring empire; and it is boldly af-talking of rights has passed away. The Turkish na firmed that old Bernadotte (mirabile dictu!) is not averse tion, by all the means that men possess for rendering from the plan. Perhaps, he may be well aware that the their thoughts intelligible, invoke the protecting and in amiable and accomplished Prince Gustavus Vasa, the legivigorating presence of the squadron of Great Britain; timate heir of the ancient monarchs of Sweden, has many but Russia holds before us the parchment of a deed done secret friends who only wait for a fit opportunity to hoist in darkness; a parchment powerful as a talisman-but, his standard on the soil ennobled by the valour and virtues like that, only powerful through the ignorance and credulity of his ancestors-and the shrewd old Frenchman may think it politic, since the succession of his own throne is Thus, however, does the Muscovite step by step go on so doubtful, to secure, at all events, to young Oscar the steadily, quietly and surely; and if Prussia and Austria quiet enjoyment of the vice-royalty of Sweden, when it be weak enough to look on in the expectation of a share shall become a province of Russia. Should this happen, in the spoil, while our own once-glorious name continues Russia would have a line of sca-coast from the Gulf of quences of internal feud and faction, why should Russia the Pacific. For what purpose, then, does Russia keep cease to go on in the same style-until the cross has sup-in commission so large a fleet in the Baltic as eighteen planted the crescent on the dome of Saint Sophia-the sail of the line and as many frigates, which she paraded favourite object never for a moment lost sight of since last summer fully manned and well equipped? She has no enemy at home-she has no foreign possessions to We can well believe that the crafty ministers of the protect-she has no interests in the Mediterranean that Czar contemplate with the highest delight all that fills require a single ship-she has neither port, nor island, nor recent proceedings of the Autocrat will not awaken Eu- Turning our attention to the Black Sea-although every rope at large from her slumbers, ere the incorporation of possible caution is used for concealment of what is there Turkey is completed, Europe may as well continue to going on, it is nevertheless well known that, for some time slumber on ;-for we may be well assured that the posses- past, the most active operations have been in progress presion of Turkey would speedily lead to the sacrifice of an paratory for some hostile movement: she has no enemy other and another victim at the shrine of inordinate am-there that can touch her-she is in possession of all the bition. England and France, however, at all events will shores of that close sea except where her humbled ally not, we trust, be found to have lost all sense of honour still keeps a few leagues on the southern coasts—she has and wisdom as respects a question to which a myriad of internal intrigues are but as dust in the balance. It behoves that sea; yet warlike preparations are making with the them, we think to take immediate and effective measures utmost activity. We have seen a sketch of the works to compel the Muscovite to nullify this surreptitious and of which are constructing round the naval arsenal of Seva-fensive treaty. We are told, indeed, that Lord Ponsonby stopol, and which when finished will completely protect it was instructed to remonstrate against this proceeding at against any force ever likely to be brought against it. the Porte; that Lord Palmerston also addressed a note to From private information, on which we are disposed to

t

d

0

P

st

aı w

Ci

W

ch

th an

W

of

tee

qu tru ter

From another correspondent we learn that-

'All the docks in the Black Sea are in great activity; Let us for a moment bring under view what this gigan- a great number of naval officers arrive daily from the tic power—gigantic as to the physical force of numbers, ports of the Baltic at Sevastopol over land; and since but still more fearful by its intellectual superiority—not the summer (of 1834) no less than 12,000 men have the intellect of its people, as compared with those of Eubeen constantly employed in rendering the position of this fortress impregnable. They are also increasing to 'disarm?' Imagine Lord Durham—another Æschines the number of their steam-vessels. They expect six addressing another Philip—requesting Nicholas to Disfrom England, armed and manned by Englishmen, who arm! No, we must play our game, and strive to win

To enable Russia to carry on her operations unseen, and without being under the necessity of making applica-tion for supplies to any other state, that might create sus-signals to unmoor, her million of soldiers the word to picion, her provinces adjacent to the Black Sea furnish march; if they wait patiently it is to make more sure. abundance of the required materials—timber, iron, copper, Ask the Emperor for any proof of his moderation, his and cordage may be procured at small cost and almost to generosity, or his 'condescension'—any pledge, any guaany extent; and when ships are brought down to the Sea rantee, on any point, and you will receive a gracious reof Marmora or the Dardanelles, she will find no difficulty ply. You may receive, as 'proofs of his imperial condein getting them manned from the islands of the archiscension,' a few firmans for the passage of the Dardanelles, pelago, by some of those amiable Greeks whose trade as or even a commercial treaty with Persia, or a shorter quapirates and pilots has at length nearly been destroyed. rantine on the Danube; but all these advantages will be The Greeks, indeed, have a bond of union with the Russacrificed if the word disarm is only whispered. sians in their common religion; and good pay will not be wanting in so vital a service, whenever the crisis may ar-of his travels. He has some entertaining chapters on his rive—not of contesting for the supremacy of the Black ride across the Balkan—on Adrianople and Constantino-Sea, which they already have—the wanton affair of Na-ple—on Smyrna—on Athens—on the Ionian Islands varine gave them that; but for the far nobler object of and their late governor, Lord Nugent, whose administraambition—the supremacy in the Mediterranean! Ten years tion is highly lauded—and, finally, on Venice, Rome, and ago all this would have appeared a chimera; but friends Naples. But these regions have been so often described and foes have unfortunately alike contributed to realize the of late years, and most of them by such able writers, that audacious projects of Catharine; and unless Turkey should we may without disrespect pass over the results of Mr. regain her independence through the aid of England and Quin's rapid progress homewards. It appears from various France, which we think they are bound to give, so as to passages, that he is a Roman Catholic, and from many be enabled to oppose an effective barrier to the passage of more that he is rather a keen Whig; but still we are bound a Russian fleet through the Bosphorus and the Darda- to say, that he deserves the title, in its true and best sense, nelles, we may ere long see the full completion of those of a liberal traveller-and we therefore hope to here more long contemplated designs. It is not altogether concealed news of him in this capacity. that the anxious wish of the Russians is to be released from their imprisonment in the Black Sea-and who doubts that this, once accomplished, would open a new era to Russia, to the development of her internal resources, and the vast extension of her foreign influence?

This release can only follow the occupation of the Dardanelles-that is, the acquisition of an advanced position that renders her invulnerable, and which gives her in addition an immense empire, men, treasures, materials, and what did you do then? a fleet. One hundred sail will be ready a month after the occupation to issue from the straits. What then would happen it is not difficult to foresee. Greece thrown into utter confusion-the puny monarchy of the Bavarian boy destroyed—the imbecile government dissolved—the Ionian and grandfather's leg was broke. Islands insulted and plundered-the Levant trade cut up, and for a time annihilated. France, equally unprepared with ourselves, would be pretty much in the same predi and another a blanket; and one brought us a chair and cament,

We see all this and much more coming; time is all that is required for the consummation; time wears on—yet two or three things of our own: it was, besides, a special what are we doing—what is to be done? Lord Durham fine season, and even in those misfortunes we had much is gone to St. Petersburg-what can he do there that will to be thankful for. change the progress of events? It has been whispered that the emperor was to be requested to disarm-modest and amiable assurance! Imagine the yell of laughter that the house to build up again. would arise from the Sclavonic millions if they were told

* The fleet of an ally peaceably at anchor in the bay thought. Thank God! at that time I was not an ailing of Navarin, consisting of three sail of the line and nine-woman; I was able to work, and every body was ready teen frigates, was attacked by ten sail of the line and ten frigates, led on by three admirals; and the cruel quackish and gasconading phrase into utter des. had the right use of his leg again, was not much worse truction, was rewarded as a victory! The high charactor for his hurt; I was soon able to leave him to the care of ter and renown of the British navy were not gained by the three biggest children and to go out washing and doing such victories as this.

are well paid, and hired for three years. One has alternated by way of Lisbon and Malta, the "Peter the Great," Captain Fox.

No, we must play our game, and strive to win it—not ask our antagonist to remove his pieces from the board. Russia plays for conquest; her existence, perhaps the Great," Captain Fox. voluntarily at first, but irrevocably now, is involved in her success. The northern hordes sigh for Asia Minor, the

We cannot afford to follow Mr. Quin through the rest

From the Juvenile Forget-Me-Not, for 1836. THE GRANDMOTHER.

BY MARY BOWITT.

Child .- And when the house was burnt, grandmother,

Grandmother .- Took shelter in the barn, and were right thankful that our lives were spared, and that a roof was left to cover us.

Child .- But all the furniture was burnt, and the heds :

Grandmother.-But there was plenty of good clean straw in the barn; and one neighbour lent us a mattrass, another a table; many a one spared us a pan or a kettle, a candle-tick or an earthen pot, till we could get together fine season, and even in those misfortunes we had much

Child .- But grandfather could not work; and there were five children; and there was the doctor to pay; and

Grandmother .- Sure enough! yet, after the first shock of the misfortune, we did better than one might have to give me a job. Your grandfather, through the blessing which they were able to make, magnified in had the right use of his leg again, was not much worse day's work as usual; and many was the time I brought

Child,-And then the children had the small-pox.

what a frightful malady it was, and how many died among in, what with twenty pounds the squire lent us, and by raised, and the roof on, before the hard weather set in.

Child.-But it was then, grandmother, that you got the rheumatism so bad, that makes you so lame.

Grandmother .- Ay, to be sure, we got into the house ther could begin to work.

Child .- But he could not dig as he used to do?

Grandmother .- Why no: he took to weaving; and fingers, he could not get much, yet there's nothing a man cannot do if he's bent on doing it, nor a woman either, so before the spring was over he got fall journeyman's wages; and then soon after, as it happened, poor old John Mudge died, why he fell into his business as pat as could be, and weaving was a good trade then. There was not a farmer's wife in all the country but had a wheel going, may-be two or three, and there was a power of yarn spun, both of linen and woollen, which it was soon thought nobody could weave into cloth like your grandfather. I'll warrant you there's bed and table linen of his weaving in every decent family twenty miles round, though it's twenty years since he died: poor man! ay, and his weaving will error. In serving his party, he was continually offending be remembered through this generation.

Child .- And that was the way grandfather came to be Grandmother .- That it was! And it was a good day's work for him when he first took the shuttle between his fingers. We got our debts all paid off before three years were over, and then we were able to lay something by for our children, or may-be help a poor neighbour. But, ments to individuals he was warm but unsteady; and when now finish the chapter; you left off where the prophet sat by the Brook Cherith, and the ravins fed him.

Child.-I will, grandmother.

From the Edinburgh Review.

Memoirs of Lord Bolingbroke. By George Wingrove COOKE, Esq. 2 vols. 8vo. London: 1835.

THE fate of Lord Bolingbroke affords a signal instance of the instability of fortune, and precariousness of fame, Few persons have experienced greater or more sudden vicissitudes. From the height of power in England, with the fairest prospects before him, he was reduced in a few months to the condition of an attainted exile. In one short, year he was Secretary of State to Queen Anne, and Secretary of State to the Pretender. At his first visit to Paris, he was courted as the saviour of Franco-the arbiter and The style of his best works is vehement and spirited;

home more than a day's wages, for every body was kind pacificator of Europe. During his second residence in to us,—the farmers' wives often sent us a little bag of that capital, he was constrained to avail himself of the meal, or a cutting of bacon, or a pitcher of milk, and the meanest and vilest agents to obtain a clandestine interbutcher sent us a Sunday's dinner for seven weeks- course with the government of a country he had rescued all the time your grandfather was as one may say, help-from destruction. His early ambition had been gratified by a rapidity of elevation beyond the ordinary lot of statesmen. His riper years were passed in penury and banish-Grandmother .- But by the time they were all down ment; and when restored to competence and home, he your grandfather was well enough, though he could not was destined to waste the remainder of his life in ineffecwork, to take care of them as they lay on the straw he tual struggles to regain the station he had lost-embittered had just risen from; he was a kind handy man, and the by disappointments and mortifications, which his proud and children all did well, which was a great mercy, seeing ambitious spirit was ill able to endure. After toiling for years in the service of the party he had espoused, it was the neighbors that same season. Then, before winter set hinted to him that the greatest kindness he could do them was to go back into exile, because his presence in England making over a bit of common allotment that had come to was an insuperable bar to their success. His varied, and us, and with the help of our neighbours, we got the house on the whole unfortunate, career shows how necessary it is for public men to possess moral character, as well as ability of conduct and intellectual endowments.

Bolingbroke was a man of brilliant parts, with much quickness and penetration, and extraordinary powers of before the walls were dry, and I fell ill of a rheumatic application and capacity for business. He had accomplishfever that kept me down fourteen weeks; but by that ments and attainments, that rendered him the delight and time the children were all well again, and your grandfa- ornament of society; and possessed warm and generous affections, that endeared him to his private friends. But with these merits and qualities, he had defects which more than counterbalanced them. Bold, decided, and unscruthough at first, to be sure, seeing it was a new trade to his pulous in the means he used, he was better fitted to achieve a single object, than to pursue and bring to a successful issue a course of policy that required time for its accomplishment. Under an appearance of openness and frankness, which disarmed suspicion, he concealed a dissimulation and want of sincerity, that, when once detected, destroyed all future confidence in his character. At the commencement of his political career, he found the Tories the most powerful body in the state; and though he despised their narrow prejudices and exploded doctrines, ambition led him to attach himself to their party. Having taken this false step at his outset in life, he was never able to extricate himself from the consequences of his first and doing violence to their opinions. In combating for them, he borrowed his weapons from their adversaries; and in serving and plotting for the Pretender, he vindicated the Revolution. To injure the Whigs, he went beyond them in the popular principles they professed; and to over-turn the Ministry of Wulpole, he scrupled not to sacrifice the whole dynasty of the Stuarts. In his political attachprovoked, his resentment was implacable. After having been the bosom friend of Oxford, he came at length to loathe and detest him with a bitterness of hatred seldom to be found any where but in the quarrels of theologians. After having sacrificed his fortune and station in the service of the Pretender, he sat down deliberately to expose to ridicule and contempt the character, the party, and the cause of the man he had so recently served. He had been provoked, it is true, to this course by the intolerable usage he had received from the Pretender and his court; and to his resentment, and to the hopes he indulged of entire forgiveness in England, we are indebted for the wittiest, the most lively, and most finished of his works. But his 'Letter to Sir William Windham' did more harm to the Jacobites, than service to its author. He was suffered to languish for several years in exile, and when permitted to return, he was carefully excluded from those paths of ambition he was still desirous to tread.

W gy ?way Buffo of the

vier.

hi ad

dre

has

ple W

800

beli

pro

hap

libe

ed | brig

priv

turr

holy

atter

brok

business are admirable—clear, short and precise; and I have thought that a few sketches of incidents in the where argument is requisite, plain and convincing. His correspondence with his private friends is easy, playful, usually accounted a continual hardship, and is certainly not at the world and its vanities, and a pretended love for ru-its enjoyments, arising as well from its rustic amusements ral retreats and occupations, the farthest possible from his and its athletic exercises as from the wild adventures enpartisan-a master in the arts of insinuation and sar-danger; and sometimes, again, equally ludicrous and uncasm. They abound in animated and splendid passages, comfortable. and contain many sound constitutional truths, which are now trite and common, but which had never been so clearly wilds of the West; and often, with a faithful dog for a stated, nor so well expressed before. But his applications pillow, have the roar of the winds through the branches of of his general principles to his own times are more plausi- the trees above me, and the howlings of the wolves in the ble than just; and neither his facts nor his representations distance, been the music that lulled me to repose. Wolves of character are to be trusted without examination. He are ugly customers, especially when prowling around in seems to have studied history only to pervert it to party packs and pressed by hunger. They are a surley, unsocial, purposes. But with all their defects, the political disquisi- and untameable animal; and, under even the most favourations of Bolingbroke deserve to be read and studied by every ble circumstances, rarely associating together, unless comone who desires to understand and trace the constitutional history of his country. Though professing to the last his defence; and for the most part living singly and unprofitaadherence to the Tories, adversity and reflection had made bly, like bachelors-forming no attachments, and showing him a thorough convert to the great principles of liberty, no kindness to any one. But, whether alone or in troops, which he seemed to have abjured in his youth. His other books, most of them now forgotten, show extensive read- loss, braving every danger, and facing certain destruction. ing, but knowledge more diversified than accurate, and powers of reasoning more ingenious and specious than the stoutest bull-dog being no match for him; and not only pled politician, a firmsy reasoner, and a superficial declaimer.

Particular in Siving names—once had occasion to try the Whigs, Tories, parsons, and even players, have joined in experiment. It was in the early settlement of what is scoffing at and decrying him. The Whigs have pursued called the Salmon River County—deriving its name from his memory with acrimony for his sacrifice of the national an impetuous stream which flows into Lake Ontario, from faith and honour at the peace of Utrecht; and from the the elevated table-land about midway between Old Fort belief they firmly entertained of the criminal designs Stanwix and Sackett's Harbour. It is a cold and cheerprojected by him and his colleagues to bring back an un- less country, mostly covered-and ever will be-with happy race, the inveterate enemies of the religion and spruce and hemlocks—the darkest and coldest of the liberties of their country. Churchmen, who have regard-evergreens. The owls, it is said, have been known to ed him at one time as the most splendid champion, and weep in flying over this region. I do not vouch for this brighest ornament of their party, and had overlooked his fact, however; but I am free to declare that the white private frailties in consideration of his zeal in their service, man made a mistake in robbing it from the moose-deer turned against him with rancorous hostility when they and the beavers. But to return from this digression. discovered that he had never believed nor respected the holy doctrines they profess. So universal has been the clamour against him, that his present biographer is the first who has undertaken to write an extended Life, or to Strong. Now, Sophia was not so coarse a girl as I have attempt a vindication of the once celebrated Lord Bolingbroke.

From the Forget-Me-Not, for 1836.

LIFE IN THE WOODS.

BY WILLIAM L. STONE, ESQ.

"Yonder is the wolf." Are these thy bears?"
"So looks the panther."
SHAKESPEARE.

gy?-a wolf, or a bear, or a catamount, for instance, by way of a Forget Me Not? Not, however, that I shall at path a few rods in advance, wheeled, facing him in platoon, tempt your edification by a formal treatise, concocted from and raised a howl which was equivalent to sounding a ca-Buffon, Lacepede, or the still more scientific descriptions of the animals to be introduced to your acquaintance, with the odds were too decidedly against him to allow of his classification, genius and species, after the manner of Cu-moving forward. The enemy, however, advanced upon vier. But, since tales of ghosts, and love, and murder, him, though with commendable caution, and it was evi-

but he is apt to be diffuse and declamatory. His letters of have become stale, and the Indians have been "used up," and affectionate; but spoiled by an affectation of disgust unattended by its discomforts and its perils. But still it has thoughts. His political writings are the works of a skilful countered, sometimes of real and at others of imaginary

Many of my early days were passed in the glorious pelled through hunger, or for offensive war, or the common The clouded black wolf of America is the most ferocious, have women and children, but men fallen victims to his After having been for half a century the admiration or rapacity. Still, like most other animals, if you look them dread of his contemporaries, Bolingbroke, since his death, sharply in the eye, they may be kept at hay. A friend has been pointed at by the hand of scorn as an unprinci-

My friend Seymour had "been keeping company," according to the border phraseology in such cases, with his sweetheart-a country damsel, whose name was Sophia seen, even in an elegant drawing-room: a large rock-maple fire blazed upon the spacious hearth; all was warm and cheerful within, and cold and checrless without; and the consequence was that Seymour staid rather late. Indeed, when he took his departure, it was "odds with morning which was which." His home was more than three miles distant, and the road a bridle-path through the thick-set forest. The snow was deep, and but little trodden; he nevertheless proceeded homeward with reasonable expedition, until he arrived about midway of the forest. moon darted her silver beams through the leafless branches of the trees, and the frost sparkled upon the snow, as though What say you, Mr. Editor to a few passages of Zoolo it had just rained a shower of diamonds. All at once, a pack of half a dozen large grey wolves bounced into the valry charge from the bugle. Seymour was unarmed, and dent that his only safety lay in retreat; and yet he dared without a rival-at least in that part of the country. It woods on the same puth by which he had entered. Of and the adventure. woods on the same path by which he had entered. Or and the attempt to wheel about and fly with greater rapidity than he could march without the use of his eyes kept out rather later than usual at a winter dance, and was in directing his footsteps; but, the moment he attempted to turn, his enemies darted forward with a bound, and he was compelled to face back again and look them dead in the woods, bounding which stood a descreted and dispidated to the woods, bounding which stood a descreted and dispidated to the woods, bounding which stood a descreted and dispidated to the woods, bounding which stood a descreted and dispidated to the woods, bounding which stood a descreted and dispidated to the woods, bounding which stood a descreted and dispidated to the woods, bounding which stood a descreted and dispidated to the woods, bounding which stood a descreted and dispidated to the woods, bounding which stood a descreted and dispidated to the woods. of her brother, which supplied the omission of a pane of rhapsody of the poet:glass, in the window, the fair Sophia, like a generous yet] prudent maiden, thrust her head, without removing the the particulars of her lover's speedy and rather unlooked. Solomon for return. She then unbarred the portals; and Seymour did not again depart until Aurora, with her rosy fingers, had opened wide the gates of the East.

But the mishap of Seymour was less unpleasant than was that of another in the circle of my quondam border friends. I allude to a young man of some parts whose, lacked in its graces. The expense of the fiddler, however, tate and welcome to their prisoner. formed a serious item in the reckoning; and as my friend | Speaking of wolves reminds me of bears—as the man rolens, Castor should learn to play it. The scheme was acquaintance, except at the museums. Though less fero-speedily executed, and Castor soon became a fiddler—cious than the grizzle bear, and less formidable than the not turn his back upon the foe, as a much more experienc- was a marvellous improvement in the social condition of ed soldier might have been justified in doing. His only the neighbourhood—but no improvement in the husbandry method therefore, was to obey, literally, the order of an of Castor's farm; and it is believed that he scarcely felled Irish militia captain, and advance backwards out of the a tree afterwards. But I am forgetting alike the wolves

the eye. Colonel Crockett might perhaps have looked log hut, he was set upon by a large pack of welves from them out of countenance, and beaten them off in this all directions, like a swarm of Cossacks upon a straggling way; but Seymour had a very common blue eye, and he platoon of Napoleon's grenadiers. He rushed with all could do no more then keep them at bay within a few possible speed into the hovel, the door of which was wide yards, while he slowly retraced his steps to the rude log open to receive him; but possitively refused to be shut to domicile of his sweet-heart's father. She had retired, keep out the foe, who now pressed so closely upon him, after covering the two last brands in the embers, and just filling the air with their howlings, that he was obliged to sunk into a sweet slumber, dreaming, doubtless, either of spring upon a beam to prevent being torn to pieces. But milking the cows, or of the future lord of her hopes, when the wolves, sorely pressed for a breakfast, were not slow in the latter knocked at the door, and, like a discomfited climbing up the logs after him, and he would, most asknight from the wars, pressed till breathless by his pur-suredly have formed their morning's banquet, but for a sucre, claimed a refuge in the castle. Displacing the hat bright thought. He had somewhere seen the hackneyed

"Music hath charms to sooth the savage breast"well-ruffled nightcap, through the sash, and soon learned or, perhaps, he had heard repeated the passage from Prior's

> " Often our seers and poets have confest That music's force can tame the furious breast: Can make the wolf or foaming boar restrain His rage—the lion drop his crested mane, Attentive to the song."

fi

t

o ni

ar w be

m

ta

ro

ab

no

th

the

the

eu

the

alb

kn

ces

egn it s

the

in t cou of l

Thus beleaguered, he determined to try the effect of the name was John Castor. Poor fellow !-he was killed at concord of sweet sounds upon their unsophisticated ears, the battle of Queenston, under the gallant Van Renssellaer. whereupon he struck up the brisk tune of Yankee Doodle Like many a brave private, who win the battles while on his New Holland fiddle. The effect was magical. the officers run away with the credit, his name was not The party of Chateaubriand were not more successful in emblazoned on the published scroll of fame, though his charming the rattlesnake with a flute at Niagara. The body was found lying with as much dignity as the best of wolves were no longer bristling and barking with rage, them upon the cold bed of glory. The case was this:- and ready to devour him, but became as silent and attenwe had no professor of music, or, in plainer phraseology, no tive as so many Scotsmen at the ballad of Robin Adair, fiddler in the settlement. Whenever, "in the course of But, poor Castor! He would much rather have fiddled human events," therefore, it was thought advisable to get for forty contra-dances than a single party of wolves, since up a sleigh-ride, to end with a dance, or to celebrate the no sooner did he cease to play than they recommenced fourth of July with extraordinary demonstrations of glad-hostilities. The weather was cold, and his fingers were ness, we were obliged to send to Fort Stanwix, or even to too much benumbed to allow him to traverse the strings. Whitestown, forty miles and upwards, to procure an artist But, no matter: his unwelcome audience were inexorable, of the cat-gut; and these gentlemen of strings and sym- and he was obliged either to allow himself to be eaten, or phonies would not plunge thus far into the wilderness— to keep on fiddling. I have heard mention of the weari-crossing feaming terrents, and diving into mounds of snow ness of the fiddler's elbow; but never did elbow ache like -for nothing. Nor were they exactly Paganinis when John Castor's, on that morning; and what added to his they did come. But that has nothing to do with my story perplexity was, the giving way of his instrument; cat-gut if they wore; and they probably fiddled as well as their and horse-hair will not last for ever, and string after string rustic pupils danced, for, in good sooth, our best group of had snapt asunder, until the bass was the last remaining dancers could never have been tripping in the mind's eye and the wolves, began to manifest less satisfaction for the of Milton, when he wrote of the "light fantastic toe." one grum note, so "long drawn out," but not "in linked Cotillions and waltzes had nover been heard of at Salmon sweetness." Just at this interesting crisis, however, my old River at that day; but Scotch reels and contra-dances were friend Seymour, with his ox-team, and his yet more athexecuted with tolerable accuracy-the happy swains and letic brother, appeared being on their way to the saw-mill; damsels making up in strength of movement what they and the wolves thereupon made a retreat-equally precipi-

Castor was believed to have a pretty considerable supply says in the story of the gun. There are several varieties of of music in his soul, it was proposed that the circle should this animal; but the American black bear is the only species purchase an instrument by subscription and that, nolens with which I have had the honour of forming any particular white bear of the North, the black bear is nevertheless an much rejoiced at seeing Mr. Sleeper before, albeit he was unpleasant travelling companion for a man who is alone a very kind and estimable neighbour. in the woods, and unarmed. Under such circumstances, it is well to be cautious about what the fancy would call lounging along at that rate, when you see a fellow chriscoming up to the scratch. Never in the course of my back- tian in such a kettle of fish as this?" wood's experience did I hear of any thing escaping from the hug of Bruin uninjured but once, excepting the sawmill and the hot tea kettle, as related by Captain Kotzebue. guess you ought to have your lodging for nothing if you've In these two affairs, Bruin found himself roughly handled. stood up agin the tree all night." The other instance to which I refer was something like the following:

Among the earliest settlers in the wilds of Salmon River was a Vermontese, by the name of Dobson-a large, resolute, and athletic man. Returning one evening from a fruitless hant after his vagrant cows, which according to custom in the new countries, had been turned into the woods to procure their own subsistence from the rank herbage of the early summer, just before emerging from the forest in the clearing of his neighbour, the late Mr. Joseph Sleeper, be saw a large bear descending from a lofty sycamore, where he had been in quest, probably, of honey .-A bear ascends a tree much more expertly than he descends it—being obliged to come down stern foremost. My friend Dobson did not very well like to be joined in his evening walk by such a companion, and, without reflecting what he should do with the "varmint" afterwards, he body, and just before he reached the ground, seized him firmly by both his fore paws. Bruin growled and gnashed his tusks but he soon ascertained that his paws were in his tusks but he soon ascertained that his paws were in the grasp of paws equally iron-strung with his own. Nor could be use his hinder claws to disembowed his antagonist, as the manner of the bear is, inasmuch as the trunk of the tree was between them. But Dobson's predicament, as he was endowed with rather the most reason, was the was endowed with rather the most reason, was the could no more assail the bear than the rounded by his wife and children at the supper table, to as he went, with as much apparent indifference as the say nothing of the gloomy prospect for the night. Still, other had shown when coming to his relief. as Joe Sleeper's house was not far distant, he hoped to be able to call him to his assistance. But his lungs, though his cries. In vain he raved, and called, and threatened. none of the weakest, were unequal to the task; and, all boson walked on and disappeared, leaving his friend as though he hallooed and bawled the livelong night, making and a prospect for his breakfast as himself had had for his the woods and the welkin ring again, he succeeded no sad a prospect for his breakfast as himself had had for his the vasty deep. It was a wearisome night for Dobson; such a game of hold-fast he had never been engaged in before. Bruin, too, was probably somewhat worsied, al. lesson no was teaching the before the pupil, and when he thought the latter would willingly though he could not describe his sensations in Englishknown his dissatisfaction-that is to say, he growled incessantly. But, there was no let-go in the case, and Dobson was therefore under the necessity of holding fast, until son was therefore under the necessity of holding fast, until real breach of friendship ensued, and indeed the two bor-derers became afterwards better friends and neighbours the bear's paws and his own had grown together.

As daylight returned, and the smoke from Mr. Sleeper's chimney began to curl up gracefully, though rather dimly, the Indian mentioned by Sir John Franklin, I have ever in the distance, Dobson again repeated his cries for suc-been disposed to treat them with marked civility. "Oh, cour; and his heart was soon gladdened by the appearance bear?" exclaimed the Indian, when a huge one—(the Inof his worthy but inactive neighbour, who had at last dian was unarmed at the time)-came and seated himself been attracted by the voice of the impatient sufferer, bear-ing an axe upon his shoulder. Dobson had never been so had the highest respect for you and your relations, and vol. XXVIII. JANUARY, 1836.—10

"Why don't you make haste, Mr. Sleeper, and not be

"I vam! Is that you, Mr. Dobson, up a tree there!And was it you I hearn hallooing so last night? I

"It's no joke, though, I can tell you, Mr. Joe Sleeper; and, if you had hold of the paws of the black varmint all night, it strikes me you'd think you'd paid dear enough for it. But, if you heard me calling for help in the night, why did'nt you come and see what was the trouble."

"Oh, I was jest going tired to bed, after laying up logfence all day, and I thought I'd wait till morning, and come out bright and cirly. But if I'd known 'twas you-

"Known 'twas me!" replied Dobson, bitterly-"you knew 'twas somebody who had flesh and blood too good for these plaguy black varmints, though; and you knew there's been a smart sprinkle of bears about the settlemen all the spring !"

"Well, do'nt be in a huff, Tommy. It's never too late to do good. So, hold tight now, and don't let the 'tarnal crittur get loose, while I split his head open."

"No, no," said Dobson. "After holding the beast here all night, I think I ought to have the satisfaction of killing ran up to the tree on the opposite side from the animal's him. So, you just take hold of his paws here, and I will take the axe and let a streak of daylight into his skull worse yet. He could no more assail the bear than the been clenched for so many hours, were soon brandishing bear could assail him. Nor could be venture to let go of the axe, and be apparently made all preparations for giving thim, since the presumption was that Bruin would not the deadly blow—and deadly it would have been had be make him a very gracious return for thus unceremoniously taking him by the hand. The twilight was fast deepening into darkness, and his position was far less comfortable of struck—since, like the sons of Zeruiah, Dobson needed to strike but once. But, to the surprise of Sleeper, he did not strike to once and to his further constraint. Dobson as were than it otherwise would have been at the same hour, sur-rounded by his wife and children at the supper table, to

It was now Sleeeper's turn to make the forest vocal with sapper. Hour after hour passed away, and Sleeper still better than did Glendower of old, in calling spirits from found himself at bo-peep with Sir Bruin. In the course of the afternoon, however, when Dobson supposed that the lesson he was teaching had been thoroughly learned by forget his resentment for the sake of succour, the sturdy albeit he took the regular John Bu!l method of making Yankee returned, and by a single blow relieved both bear and man from their troubles in the same instant. Sleeper thought rather hard of Dobson for some time; but no than before.

I had never any particular liking for bears, and, like being shot at, nor are they remarkably prone to forgive bears disappeared, and I pursued my morning journey—injuries. My meditations on the delights of solitude not a particle slower from the incident. were not, therefore, of the most pleasing description .behind until I arrived safe at my father's domicile.

and the occasion. The road, which was of ordinary suit of his prey, that few animals can escape him. lengthened gothic archway of fresh and beautiful verdure. lion.

never killed any of them except through necessity. Golelad in deep mourning. The centre figure being the largest, away, good bear, and let me alone, and I promise not to the three might readily have been taken for a mother molest you?" I recollect feeling once, when about fif and her two daughters. But who could they be? I teen years old, very much like this unarmed Indian. My knew every family in the settlement, and there had been father had a field of corn of some half a dozen acres, em- no death in the place for many months-consequently bosomed entirely in the wilderness, a mile or more from there were neither mourning widows nor orphans in the the house. Among other good things, bears are exceed-township. And how came these defenceless females thus ingly fond of corn, when the car is in the milk; and at alone in the wild woods? It seemed a mystery; and yet the proper season, it was believed, from the ravages, that it was no mistake, for there they stood before me. I was some maranders of the grizzly tribe had been amongst it. now approaching within a few rods, and preparing for a My father kept an old Queen Anne musket in the house, salutation; when suddenly the melancholy trio relieved and it was determined that I should put the weapon in me from the trouble of making any especial inquiries reorder, load it heavily, and sally forth upon the watch for specting either themselves or their history. For in the intruders. It was a bright moonlight night in Sepsame instant they all fell from their upright posture upon tember. The corn waved gently in the breeze; the stars their hands or paws, and bounded off into the woods—in glittered in the azure firmanent; and a deep and profound the shape of the largest lady-bear, with her two well grown stillness reigned in the forest. I got along pretty com-fortably with the first hour's watch. But, as midnight turned her head round, and gave a horrible growl, exhiwas stealing slowly along, strange fancies crept over me. biting a set of tusks and teeth, of which, in connexion with I must see a bear, of course. I must fire upon him.— her claws I should have been much more apprehensive than Should I plant the ball in the right spot, it would be well. I was had I not been on horseback. My horse pricked up If not, it might not be so well; for bears are not fond of his ears, and reared and plunged for a moment; but the

Talking of bears reminds me of panthers. The Ameri-Every rustle of the lenf and every scream of the owl can panther—the puma of Cuvier—is the most ferecious startled me more than I should have been willing then to and dangerous animal that infests the North American confess. By and by, the sudden crash of a stick and the forests. There was "a smart chance" of them, as they bound of some heavy animal sent a stream of ice to my say in Missouri, thirty years ago, on the head waters of heart. My hat was lifted up by my hair; and, bear or no the Delaware and Susquehanna, and back to Lake Ontabear, I fled from the corn-field, casting not a solitary look rio and the St. Lawrence. But, like the poor Indians, they have mostly been driven from their own territories My next adventure brought me into closer proximity deeper into the wilderness. The panther is a beautiful with a family of these wood-demons. It was on a clear animal in form, of untameable ferocity, and insatiable in Sunday morning in June. For the special edification of its thirst for blood. Nothing can inspire a border settlea few families, who had clustered together at the distance ment with greater terror, save the war-whoop of the Inof four miles from the principal settlement of the town-ship, the minister on that day was to perform divine ser-screaming in the neighbourhood. The Ishmaelite of the vice in this remote neighbourhood; and I had determined forest, he makes war upon every thing; and, such is his to wend my way thither to church. I was well mounted, swiftness of movement, and the agility with which he and rode off in fine spirits, chastened however by the day climbs the trees, and springs from one to another in purwidth, lay through a deep forest the whole distance; and panther is, perhaps, the most treacherous of the cat tribe, the trees, of primitive growth and gigantic altitude, almost fierce, rapacious, and cruel, and entirely destitute of those interlocked their branches above, forming as it were a noble traits which have been sometimes awarded to the

Here and there the sun darted his temperate morning rays

Between the bear and the panther a war of exterminathrough the interstices of the tree-tops, relieving the pention has been waged almost from the period of their resive and shadowy light at intervals, and enlivening a scene lease from the ark of Ararat. I have in my mind an in-which was as sylvan as the most passionate admirer of soli-cident in point, said to have been witnessed by a hunter. tude could have desired. Added to all which was the music of distant waters, and of a thousand birds, as they came upon it in the absence of the old one, and destroyed twittered from spray to spray above, and poured forth her young. Bruin very well knew that for this invasion their sweetest melodies.—" hymning their Creator's praise." of a private dwelling, and the murderous deed committed Nothing can be more beautiful-except "them things in therein, he should be compelled to fight. The panther England what wear caps and aprons, as the Cornish foot-would soon return, and be upon his track; and, as well man said to Captain Head, when gazing upon a glorious might an alderman think of waddling away from an antelandscape among the Andes—than such a scene as this. lope as a clumsy bear from such a feline pursuer as this. "The woods are God's temples," says the poet; and most beautiful temples they are, when clothed in the bright and at retreat; but, like a skilful general, forthwith set about tender foliage of May and June, canopied with living securing the most advantageous position for a battle,—verdure, and carpeted with myriads of wild flowers, fill-ing the air with a richer fragrance than incense, and Crossing a deep ravine from the direction of the panther's enlivened by sweeter melodies than mortal voices can sing. lair, Bruin took a deliberate survey of the ground, and at Trotting briskly along, when about mid-way of the forest, length perched himself high on the opposite bank, be-and having a straight prospect of half a mile or more in neath a shelving rock, and so completely covered in his view, I was surprised by ospying at some distance ahead, position that he could only be attacked in front. Here standing by the side of the road, three females, apparently he raised bimself upon his haunches, and calmly waited

hi ca th th

wit A

inle the

still keeping his position, though with the loss of an eye. The panther rallied; selecting a new starting point; and, bristling fiercely, sprang again, and was received in the same undaunted manner. The attack and defence, with wild screams and surly growls, was continued for some time, until at length the panther succeeded in planting her talons so deeply in the body of the bear as to prevent another separation until the contest should be decided.-The hug was now mutually desperate, and the conflict terrible. The blood streamed from each: now the jaw of the one was in the mouth of the other, while their claws were fearfully lacerating the sides of both. At length the bear lost his balance, and the combatants rolled over each other into the bed of the ravine, where the contest was continued for an hour. When all became still, the hunter found both monsters lying in what was literally a dead embrace.

But this is not the panther story, which I sat down to write.

Among the emigrants of "the universal Yankee nation," who had sought to increase their domains, and better their fortunes among the wilds I am describing, was a man of the name of Roger Bacon, an illustrious name in the annals of England, but now, for the first time, recorded in those of Salmon River. That he was as learned as the monk of Ilchester I need not affirm; and that he was not as wise will appear in the sequel. He was, however, an honest, worthy man-a bachelor by the way, somewhere kindness, nor the witchery, nor the beauty, of Yankee moody temperament-fond of solitude-and had emigrathis court." He purchased a fine farm upon the broad interval of the river-with a sufficient portion of upland-better adapted to the purpose of a garden than the upland, and the prospect of looking out upon a broad level so inviting, that he was not to be diverted from his design. And, besides, the site he had chosen was upwards of a mile from the river, and was moreover elevated like an island, some three or four feet above the general surface of the alluvial plain; so that he was quite sure so small a now become so distinct as to enable him to recognise the river could never rise so high, nor spread so wide. "Ne- cry of a panther! Should the furious animal scent him ver mind," said his neighbours, " you will find it out in in the air, his fate was too certain to be helped by insurthe spring, if the river don't run off t'other way."

the onset. It was not long before the screams of the bereaved It so happened that the snow fell to an extraordinary depth panther were heard, and she presently made her ap-during the ensuing winter, and the month of March was pearance upon the opposite verge of the ravine. Her so cold that the sun had but little power upon it. The coneyes glared upon Bruin, who, nothing daunted, looked sequence was that, instead of gradually disappearing, the fiercely back upon her. At length, maddened with rage, whole body of snow was left to melt suddenly beneath a the panther sprang with unerring precision upon the warm April rain, by reason of which the river was swolbear, but was received by a blow from one of his tremen. len to an extent never before witnessed by the settlers. dous paws, which knocked her back into the valley-Bruin The snow had fallen so deep that but little intercourse was kept up among the scattered inhabitants during the winter, and Mr. Bacon had lived almost as secluded as a bear in a hollow tree-perhaps his nearest neighbour.

> During the warm rain just mentioned, which poured like a deluge from the clouds upon the materials for another deluge below, the solitary had observed the rapid dissolution of the snow and the corresponding rise of the river, but he still thought himself secure, and retired to his lonely bed soon after sundown, with his usual composure and unconcern. Before midnight, however, he was startled from his slumbers by the cracking of trees and the sush of waters. He sprang from his couch, and found himself leg-deep in water upon his own floor! There was no time for his toilet; it was evident that not a moment should be lost; and, what was still worse, it was too dark to make his escape, even if the flood would admit of it. His only course of safety, therefore, was to climb the trees nearest to his house, and await the dawn of the morning yet many long and wearisome hours distant.

Notwithstanding the depth and force of the water, he succeeded in reaching and ascending the trees, and seated himself with tolerable security among its branches. But it was a dismal night. The unseasonable cold bath he had taken was no addition to his comfort, while, from the roar of the waters and the occasional crash of trees, it was evident that the icy fetters of the river had been broken up, and that the freshet, with increasing volume, was sweeping onward with tramendous power and velocity. on the wrong side of forty, upon whose heart neither the The next cake of ice moreover might, in its irresistible course, bear away the tree which was his own supporter! lasses had ever made the least impression. He was of a His mind was not very imaginative, otherwise his sufferings might have been a hundred-fold greater than they ed alone—with the apparent resolution, from the location were. Still his situation was sufficiently critical and pain-he made, that "no woman should come within a mile of ful. The longest night, however, must have an end, and his court." He purchased a fine farm were the bread in day at length dawned upon the sleepless eyes of Roger Bacon. But the darkness disappeared only to show him the whole covered with a noble forest, the trees of which were as tall as almost to compel you to look up twice to eyes had ever rested. One of the first objects discerned, on the approach of light, was the destruction of his house, It was late in the summer when Bacon entered upon this new premises, so that he only had time to erect a log in its furious current, the logs of which it was composed cabin, and to cut down the timber of a few acres, before floating promiscuously away. He next saw the whole valthe commencement of winter. Contrary to the advice of ley of the river a waste of waters, rushing onwards with the earlier settlers, he persisted in building his house upon a mighty impulse, and bearing upon their surface huge the flats. He was admonished of the hazard he was runcakes of ice, with broken timber and decayed trunks of ning in the event of a heavy freshet in the spring, but to trees, now whirling in eddies, and now borne onward

Nor was this all that was unpleasant in his situation. But the worthy emigrant had no idea of the quantity of its cries, the animal must be rapidly approaching him; snow that falls in that region, or of the magnitude of the and the flood which was sweeping beneath him afforded flood which would follow its rapid dissolution in the spring, no protection in the emergency, since the panther could travel by springing from tree to tree, almost as well as the striking incidents of a tour, intermingled with indivi-upon the ground. At length he saw the shaking of the dual portraiture and historical episodes. Hence, perhaps, limb with a cat-like watch, and evidently measuring the be fittingly introduced into the pages of a work like the distance to his intended prey, preparatory to the last Oriental Annual. of terror, and in the next instant the grasp of the claws returns to Bombay,—with an account of which and of its gave way, and he fell with a howl of horror into the torrent, yet rushing onward with increasing velocity. The monster clung for a moment to a broken limb upon which most novel part of the work-the games of the Mysore. he stuck; but he was soon drawn beneath the surge, and Here is a gladiatorial exhibition, quite in a classical way. borne away among the ice and driftwood, to trouble honest yeomen, living in single blessedness-alone in the woods

mark the precarious condition in which the fereshot had and clothed with short trowsers, which barely covered his probably found their solitary neighbour; and, after the ice hips, and extended half way down the thighs. The instruand broken timber had so far passed away as to render it ment which he wielded in his right hand was a heavy safe to put forth a canoe, he was relieved from his peril-blade, something like the coulter of a plough, about two ous situation.

THE ORIENTAL ANNUAL.

were chiefly devoted to the Presidencies of Madras and struck with a force and effect truly astounding.

"The present volume nominally embraces Bom."

"The champion who now presented himself before the bay; and completes the first series of a work which is un. Rajah was about to be opposed to a tiger which he volunrivalled in its class, for the permanent interest and instruct teered to encounter almost naked, and armed only with tive character of its matter, for the unity and completeness the weapon I have just described. He was rather tall, with of its design, for the clearness and strength of its compo- a slight figure, but his chest was deep, his arms long and sition, as well as for the splendour of its illustrations and muscular. His legs were thin, yet the action of the musof its more mechanical adornment. In the present, as in cles was perceptible with every movement; whilst the the former publications, the matter of Mr. Caunter's de. freedom of his gait and the few contortions he performed scriptive account is not a tour, but the impressions and preparatory to the hazardous enterprise in which he was limbs of a tree at no great distance-and, what a situa- the peculiar character of his Annual. It has the reality of tion for a man of sensibility—a mighty chaos of waters be a mere book of travels without its dryness, and some of neath, whirling yet more angrily along, from the huge the spirit of fiction without its untruth. Subjecting the masses of ice and fragments of timber borne upon their manner of the volume before us to the same test as the troubled current, and into which it was certain death to matter, there appears to be a very considerable improve-plunge, with the almost inevitable prospect of becoming ment. The style has more of spirit and freedom, the authe breakfast of a panther if he remained! Another ther has acquired a greater command over his materials, scream close upon him: another tree was shaken, and yet and some of them are of a bolder kind than the responsi-another! another moment of yet deeper interest passed; bility of his new situation allowed Mr. Caunter at first to and he saw indistinctly the body of an animal. Again it sprang, and again. The dreadful crisis had now arrived; something of the craft of the writer. The assault of Sefor, at the distance of not more than forty yards, he saw ringapatam, from Mill, and the history of the Angrias, in full view a huge panther crouching upon an enormous though interesting in themselves, have too little novelty to bound. His large, green eyes, flashing with rage, glared It has been stated, that, for the sake of regularity, the hideously upon him, while, as he uttered a hoarse and fright subject of the volume is nominally Bombay. The city itful growl, his blood-red mouth disclosed a set of fanga any self, however, claims but a small portion of attention. The thing but inviting to a poor mortal, expecting in the next first chapter opens with the voyage of our author from Benmoment to be within them. Bacon grasped the limbs by gal to Madras; during which the vessel was overtaken by which he was holding with convulsive energy. The fero- a hurricane, of which there is a graphic description. cious animal uttered another dreadful yell, his hair bristled, Passing silently over the course of his former route, save he drew his back up into a curve, and commenced the when a character or circumstance worth notice is met rapid and tremendous shake of his tail—the unerring sig-with, our tourist conducts us to Madura, the celebrated nal for the final leap—his burning eye-balls glowing yet seat of Hindoo science and learning in the palmy days of more fiercely. He made the leap with the swiftness and the East. After lingering among these melancholy monprecision of an arrow; but, by a tremendous effort, Bacon uments of departed greatness, giving an account of the succeeded in giving the branch upon which the panther literature which was studied at Madura, and telling some caught such a sudden shaking exactly at the right instant, anecdotes of the professors and princes who flourished there; as to prevent his making a secure lodgment of his talons. Mr. Caunter proceeds to Seringapatam. From the fever-The monster attempted to recover, but could touch no breeding city he crosses the Ghants, in his progress towards branch of the tree with his hindmost feet; and he was the coast of Malabar; and halting in the territory of the late thus suspended for a moment by his claws and hung Coorg Rajah, is entertained by him with the utmost magnidangling in the air, at full length, over the wild abyss of ficence,—the native gymnastics, combats of wild beasts, waters. But Bacon continued shaking the limb, and it juggling of an extraordinary excellence, and other exhibits. was soon evident by the giving way that the terrible ani-tions, being displayed for his amusement. Quitting the mal could sustain himself by his talons but a few seconds court of this prince, he embarked at Cochin for Muscat on longer. The panther himself now raised a piercing cry the Persian Gulf; and driven thence by the excessive heat,

ti

C

th

st

re

ne

er tig

to m he

gr

der

aha

act

890

tibl

Th

pre

bea

by him

reci

stou ence

its h

the :

at h

mal'

tired

P (thou

Our quotations come from what strikes us as being the

A MAN AND TIGER COMBAT.

"The next scene was of a far more awful character. A In the course of the day, the neighbours began to re-man entered the arena armed only with a Coorg knife, feet long, and full three inches wide, gradually diminishing towards the handle, with which it formed a right angle. The knife is used with dexterity by the Coorgs; being swung round in the hand before the blow is inflicted, and THE two former volumes of this elegant yet solid Annual then brought into contact with the object intended to be

The expression of countenance was absolutely sublime probably than Greece. when he gave the signal for the tiger to be let loose; it through one of the intervals. it with a slow but firm step. The tiger roused itself and "A good deal of skill is displayed in these combats, and encounter. As soon as the savage creature was within a few rupees. his reach, he brought down the ponderous weapon upon tired amid the loud acclamations of the spectators."

about to engage, showed that he possessed uncomm a between a lion and a buffalo, let us take an account of the activity, combined with no ordinary degree of strength, style of boxing, more ancient than the Olympic games or

"A pair of native Mysore boxers then appeared before was the very concentration of moral energy—the index of the Rajah to exhibit their skill in an art practised upwards a high and settled resolution. His body glistened with the of two thousand years ago in Europe, and perhaps even oil which had been rubbed over it in order to promote the before that period in Asia. These boxers are called Jetelasticity of his limbs. He raised his arm for several moties, from their instruments, a sort of coustur, with which ments above his head when he made the motion to admit the right hand is armed. It is made of a buffalo horn, the enemy into the arena. The bars of a large cage were with four sharp projections like knuckles. There is a fifth, instantly lifted from above; and a huge royal tiger sprang near the little finger, of greater prominence than the rest. forward and stood before the Coorg, waving his tail slowly These horny knobs are very sharp; and a blow inflicted backward and forward, creeting the hair upon it, and ut by this instrument, if delivered with the full force of a tering a suppressed howl. The animal first looked at the muscular man, would cleave open a man's skull; but as it man, then at the court were the Rajah and his court were is placed upon the fingers between the lower joints and the seated to see the sports, but did not appear at all easy in main knuckles of the hand, the fingers passing through a its present state of freedom: it was evidently confounded narrow opening below the knobs just large enough to receive at the novelty of its position. After a short survey, it turn-them when the fist is doubled, and the instrument thus ed suddenly round and bounded into its cage; from which secured, the power of hitting is considerably lessened. A the keepers, who stood above, beyond the reach of mischief, heavy blow would probably dislocate the finger of the tried to force it, but in vain. The bars were then dropped, striker, from the awkward position of the weapon, which and several crackers fastened to its tail, which projected does not cover the knuckles, but, as I have said, is fixed immediately between them and the finger-joints. The mode " A lighted match was put into the hand of the Coorg, of hitting is by a sharp perpendicular cut, which instantly the bars were again raised, and the crackers ignited. The makes an incision, and lays the fiesh open to the bone, tiger now darted into the arena with a terrible yell; and The Jetties are never allowed to strike below the head; while the crackers were exploding, it leaped, turned, and but wrestling forms the principal feature of their contests, writhed as if in a state of frantic excitement. It at length which are decided more by their skill in this art than by crouched in a corner, gnarling as a cat does when alarm- the use of the creustus; that being a mere accessory ed. Meanwhile its retreat had been cut off by securing though in truth the most formidable one, as the parties are the cage. During the explosion of the crackers, the Coorg frequently so disfigured in these encounters, that, when stood watching his enemy, and at length advanced towards they are over, scarcely a feature remains perfect.

retreated, the fur on its back being erect, and its tail apparently dilated to twice the usual size. It was not at all blow is struck; the combatants being very dexterons in disposed to commence hostilities, but its resolute foe was not to be evaded. Fixing his eyes intently upon the deadly weapon with which their right hands are armed. They creature, he advanced with the same measured step, the tiger retreating as before, but still presenting his front than the generality of Hindoos. They are a distinct caste to his enemy. The Coorg now stopped suddenly: then and their profession is traced as far back as the remotest moving slowly backward, the tiger raised itself to its full height, curved its back to the necessary segment for a exhibit yearly at the great festival of the Duperah, when spring, and lashed his tail, evidently meditating mischief.

The man continued to retire; and so soon as he was at so their prince. They are much feared by the peaceable in their prince. great a distance that the fixed expression of his eyes was habitants of the neighbourhood in which they dwell, no longer distinguishable, the ferocious brute made a sudden bound forward, crouched, and sprung with a short, the circumstance of their possessing the means of inflictsharp growl. Its adversary, fully prepared for this, leaped ing summary chastisement upon aggressors, forces a kind actively on one side, and as the tiger reached the ground, of constrained outward respect from those around them, swung round his heavy knife and brought it with irresis- who inwardly despise both their caste and their occupatible force upon the animal's hind leg, just above the joint tion, which in every country is a degraded one. The The bone was instantly severed, and the tiger effectually prevented from making a second spring. The wounded beast roared; but turning suddenly to the Coorg, who had obtained by the vanquisher falls far short of the punishby this time retired several yards, advanced fiercely upon ment received, still, such is the stimulus imparted by the him, his wounded leg hanging loose in the skin, showing mere ambition of obtaining the approbation of the prince, that it was broken. The tiger, now excited to a pitch of that these men will occasionally undergo an almost increreckless rage, rushed forward upon its adversary, who dible degree of infliction merely to gain his smile, accomstood with his heavy knife upraised, calmly awaiting the panied with the trifling though more substantial reward of "The two Jetties who now entered the arena were its head with a force which nothing could resist, laid open young men of fine forms, about the middle height, neither the skull from ear to ear, and the vanquished foe fell dead very robust nor very muscular, but with frames remarksat his feet. He then coolly wiped the knife on the ani- ble for compactness and admirable proportion. Their atmal's hide made a dignified salaam to the Rajah, and retitudes were imposing, and they exhibited a natural grace and apparent refinement altogether different from those Passing over the Hindoo quarter-staff and wrestling, persons who pursue occupations of a similar character in (though both are graphically described,) as well as a battle Europe. They approached each other, holding up and their position with great activity, in order to draw attention from the meditated point of attack; but their eyes were mutually fixed upon each other with a keen and intense expression nothing could divert. Several blows, struck with the rapidity of lightning, were as successfully parried; and it was difficult to guess upon which side the advantage was likely to turn, so equally did they appear to be matched. Every now and then, they mutually produced a short clapping noise, by striking the palm of the left hand upon the muscle of the right arm. This was frequently repeated; and although several minutes elapsed before any decisive blow was struck, yet it was by no means uninteresting to see the activity which they displayed, and the fine muscular development of their wellproportioned limbs, as they moved before each other with the intense earnestness of men seeking to obtain superiority in manual skill.

An opportunity was at length afforded to one of the combatants, who, rushing upon his adversary, hit him a smart blow upon the cheek, laying it open to the bone. The wounded man suddenly stooped and lifted his adversary in the air; when he received another blow upon the crown from his cœustus, which in a moment covered his neck and shoulders with blood. He, however, succeeded in throwing his man; who, in rising received in his turn a gash on the temple, that again sent him backward. The rapidity with which he sprang upon his legs was surprising. Both the men now closed, and planted several successful blows; by which they were shortly so disfigured that it made me quite sick to behold them; when the Rajah, at the anxious solicitation of one of the company, in which we all eagerly united, gave the signal for them to desist. They were both liberally rewarded for the skill and courage they had shown; with which they were so well satisfied, that one of them said he should be very happy to receive a similar punishment every day, if it were to be followed by a similar recompense."

The various feats of juggling with which the games concluded are the most singular we have met with; displaying a dexterity of hand and flexibility of muscle before which the performance of all our " professors" fade Away.

From the Spectator.

SLAVERY IN THE UNITED STATES.

For some months past the American newspapers have teemed with accounts of outrages committed on the advocates of the abolition of slavery, and of meetings in different parts of the Southern States for the purpose of protesting, in the most vehement language, against any interference with the Save population. The following extract from the American correspondent of the Times shows the intensity of this bitter feeling against the Abo-litionists, and that it is not confined to the country south have his choice out of millions of acres of fertile land in a of the Potomac.

" Mr. Thompson, who was sent hither as a missionary to preach immediate emancipation, was expected in the to preach immediate emancipation, was expected in the city of New York a few days since from New England, Carolinas. In Jameica, the Black be he free or a slave, on his way to Pittsburg, in Pennsylvania. As soon as his anticipated arrival became public, printed hand-bills were posted at the corners of the streets announcing the fact; and arrangements were made to seize him, as it seems to us, in the late experiment of emancipation, tar and feather him, and drive him out of the city. It is a matter of great doubt whether the civil authority the free States of America on the terminiation of their ap-

crossing their left arms, and putting themselves into posi-|would have been competent to his protection. Fortutions for the strife. They shortly separated making vari-ous motions with the left hand, and frequently shifting if he did, it was privately, and he must have left the city without the populace discovering it. Until the present excitement subsides, it is very doubtful whether there is a city in the United States in which the people would permit him to address them. He is now literally skulking through the non-slave-holding states and in other portions of the country is considered, and if taken, would be treated, as an outlaw. That such a state of things should exist among intelligent men, and in a land of laws is deeply to be deplored.

> It is deeply to be deplored; but it is also a matter of regret that the question of American Slavery is so imperfectly understood by the Abolitionists on both sides of the Atlantic. Hence it happens that men with the purest and most benevolent intentions act in a manner which is morally certain to augment the sufferings of the slaves; while, if it does not retard, it cannot hasten by an hour

It is supposed by many, that because the British Legislature has taken measures for the ultimate abolition of Negro Slavery in her Colonies, the Congress of the United States could do the same. But Congress has no right, by the constitution of the country, to interfere with the internal management of the slave population in any of the States. To abolish slavery, therefore, in America, the whole of the slave-holding States must concur. there is not the least chance or probability of their concurrence being obtained, for generations yet to come, is manifest to those whose feelings allow them to consider dispassionately the circumstances in which the Southern planters are placed.

ti

th

te

me

be

and em

and

abo 1

time

then

Won

ers a

they use c

to si with ignor

poor o

above

tensiv Black

may l

in Ch

a gene We

They are the owners of a soil whose most profitable produce can only be raised and prepared for sale in a climate and by a process most trying to the health: this is more especially the case with regard to rice and sugar. No human being, unless compelled, will do the necessary work of a slave in Louisiana, South Carolina, or even in Virginia or Georgia. Men in Europe are forced to follow unhealthy employments in order to get bread; but this is not the case in America, where every freeman can obtain abundance of the necessaries of life with a moderate expenditure of labour. Supposing, therefore, that all the slaves in America were to be changed into freemen, it would be as certain as any thing in this world can be, that they would, with one accord, quit the Southern planta-tions for the more congenial climate and comparative case of Ohio, or some other of the Northern and Western free States.

What, then, would become of their late masters ?-Absolute ruin would be their portion, and a desolation would overspread their property. Not so, we may be told: they might convert their cotton, rice, and sugar fields into fields of corn, the cultivation of which is not so detrimental to health. But, supposing that the soil would allow of this change, who would be found to labour under a temperate and healthy climate, at the price of a few shillings per acre, and become a proprietor himself? No human being, be he black or white.

must work for hire or starve. There are no vast, fertile, unappropriated prairies in Jamaica; and the principle risk, prenticeship. This danger is, however, remote, compared to say, that all hopes of putting an end to Negro slavery with that which would threaten the American planter in America are illusory, until, by the increase of populawere his slaves to be set at liberty.

tion of labour which would arise from emancipating the vate his property by the aid of hired workmen. Blacks, that the proprietors in the Southern United States | Under these circumstances, it is much worse than useprive the planter of his slaves, is to devote him to ruin.

emancipation is to be dreaded above all things, being rendered slavery all but a necessary evil on the other side equivalent in his case to a reduction to pauperism; but of the Atlantic. What we wish is to moderate the ignounless he has read England and America, in which the rant zeal of the Abolitionists; to point out to them the notions as to the prime cause of the state of things which mean while, to remind them that the immediate conse-American of acquiring fertile land at a nominal price.

For the reasons above given, it is idle to expect that the slave-owners will of their own free-will emancipate the Negroes. But it may be said that the Eastern, Northern, and Western States may, in defiance of the Southern people, effect the abolition of slavery, or that of the Negroes themselves may conquer freedom in a servile war.

terprising and industrious men of the North have not gross a violation of the Pasha's promised protection. about the last thing that can happen in this world.

a general insurrection, and still less of such an insurrect to request that the punishment might be remitted, and to tion succeeding, were it to be attempted.

tion, the augmented value of land, and consequent plenty It is because they are fully aware of the utter destitu- and cheapness of labour, the planter may be able to culti-

never will consent to the abolition of slavery-never, that less to preach emancipation doctrines in the United States. is, until the whole of North America shall be peopled, the The efforts of the Missionaries only irritate the masters, price of land be indefinitely raised, and the market fully and add to the sufferings of the slaves. None can be stocked with labour. Until this shall be the case, to de-more sensible than ourselves of the horrors of slavery; ive the planter of his slaves, is to devote him to ruin.

We have said that the American planter is aware of his that impolitic system of disposing of land which from the situation. He certainly is firmly convinced that Negro earliest periods of American history to our own times, has view we have briefly indicated is fully developed and un-ruin to the American slave-owner which must result from answerably supported, we suspect that he has but vague the (impossible) success of their mission; and, in the compels him to be a slave-holder,-that being nothing quences of their exertions, though undoubtedly well inmore nor less than the facility possessed by every free tended, must be to render the condition of the Negro incomparably more wretched.

> From Dr. Hogg's visit to Damascus and Jerusalem. DISCIPLINE OF IBRAHIM'S ARMY.

One evening, at Jaffa, as I returned from a solitary walk on the shore, I remarked, on passing a barrack, an To this we reply, in the first place, that the propensity Egyptian soldier, who hastily withdrew from an upper of East, North, and West America, greatly depends upon window. In a few moments he reappeared, and with an that of the South. Cut off the exports of tobacco, cotton, air indicating rather contemptuous insult than mischiesugar, and rice, and what becomes of the foreign trade vous intention, threw two large stones, which fell at my of the country, its shipping and its revenue? Besides, feet. This outrage I could only resent by a menacing there is scarcely a village in the South in which the engesture; but resolved to complain to the authorities of so established some store or warehouse for the sale of import. Consul took up the affair warmly, assuring me that I ed goods or home manufactures. The existence of this should obtain justice; for he had himself with much satis-profitable traffic depends altogether upon the maintenance faction lately witnessed the punishment of three soldiers of the present state of things. But supposing that the who had been detected trespassing in his garden outside motives which influence all the rest of mankind were to the walls. Accompanied by the consular dragoman, I inbe without force among the hitherto cautious Yankees stantly sought the military commander, was received with and traders of the North, and that in the fury of their attentive civility, coffee and pipes were brought in, and my emancipating zeal they were to undertake a crusade complaint made with the usual formalities. A sergeant, against the planters, what would be the result? Why, promptly despatched to ascertain the offender, returned that searcely a soul would escape from the rifles, dirks, in a few minutes with a procession into the hall. First and swamps of the South. Such a crusade, however, is appeared two athletic men, bearing large sticks, then a soldier, with a countenance evidently disturbed by appre-It is not impossible that the Negroes may at some future hension. Two others followed, carrying a chain, attached time rise in rebellion against their masters. The contest to a pole, and a few stragglers brought up the rear. The would be dreadful, but the result scarcely doubtful;-even process was summary; the dragoman, at my request, exalthough the White inhabitants of the South were left to plaining to me sentence by sentence what passed. The themselves, instead of being aided, as they unquestionably culprit made his salaam; and in reply to the question why would be, by their Northern fellow citizens, The Southern he threw the stones, simply stated that having found them ers are not an effeminate, cowardly race. Quite the reverse : on the floor, he had hurled them from the window without they are vigilant, intrepid, active, and accustomed to the observing that any one was passing below. No further to sixty being regularly enrolled in the militia. And his mouth, coolly pronounced "Give him fifty." The solwith whom would they have to contend? With the most dier, without a word, laid himself on the floor, kicked off ignorant, degraded, and imbecile beings in existence- his shoes, and in a moment his feet were firmly fixed in a poor creatures whom oppression has reduced to a state little loop made in the chain by the two soldiers who held it. above that of the brutes that perish. The idea of an ex-Sleeves were instantly tucked up and the stick raised; but tensively organized and secret combination among the ere it fell I sprung from the divan, and placing myself Blacks is absurd. In separate towns a few conspiritors before the criminal, exclaimed "La, la!" ("No, no!") may league together and excite alarm, as they have done waving my hand to arrest the blow. I then desired the in Charleston more than once; but there is no chance of dragoman to thank the commandant for his promptitude, m succeeding, were it to be attempted.

assure him that the only object of my appeal was answered;

We recur, then, to our first point; and do not hesitate for the soldiers, aware that Frank travellers were protected

this disagreeable affair was satisfactory to the soldiers; for smiles, and taib, taib (good, good,) greeted me on every

ACRE AFTER THE SIEGE.

Acre, of less extent than we had anticipated, and occuroof from entire destruction.

Near the magnificent mosque built by the atrocious Jezzar, a bandsome fountain, within a sort of Chinese pavil- were replaced by the second. ion, protected by a beautiful grating of bronze, has happily escaped. Here a flight of steps leads into a court, surrounded by a half-demolished cloister, resting on small columns of coloured marble. variegated, had been shaded with groups of palm and plane tree, and two richly-ornamented fountains were buried if the use of such chairs, confined to the nursery in Enbeneath the fragments of handsome domes. The interior, gland, was common here. To my great surprise, I was richly lined with compartments of coloured marble, was surmounted with a spacious and lofty cupola, everywhere shivered and perforated. It was gaudily painted, decorated with Arabic inscriptions, and still sustained by fractured portions of a beautiful colonnade. On one side, near a gallery, stood a high pulpit of Cipolino marble, and the rich mosaic floor, cruelly mutilated and strewed with book covers, was heaped with broken masses of porphyry and granite, among which lay an enormous bronze crescent that had fallen from the summit of the dome. Shot and shells had here made fearful havoc; the books had been carried off as a trophy, and the court without was converted into a military station.

THE FAR-FAMED EGYPTIAN ALMES.

So much has been said of the extraordinary peformances of the Almés, or public dancers, who are always summoned to enliven with their exhibitions the festivities with which both Turkish and Levantine families celebrate marriages, baptisms, and other happy events that lead to the their mother's example. At length the father, who had assembling of their friends, that we gladly took advantage hitherto borne the principal burden of conversation, seemed of an offer made us to witness their skill. On this occasion, a corps de ballet consisted of four female dancers, whose agile evolutions were regulated by an orchestra, dulging in the same soothing exercise, the impression upon composed of three male performers, seated on the ground, the strangers was quite astounding. The lady, who had composed of three male performers, seated on the ground, the strangers was quite astounding. The lady, who had One of these played the dulcimer, the second a sort of hardly recovered from the effects of her voyage, began to violin with a single string, and the third a small tambourine grow dizzy, and to think with dismay of what she had inlaid with mother-of-pearl. The personal appearance of suffered on board; while her young companions, highly the ladies was any thing but attractive; and their gaudy entertained with so novel a scene, had great difficulty to and bespangled finery such as would have equally suited restrain their mirth. They gladly made their visit as by the Egyptian government, would now be convinced that performers of a similar class in the front of a booth at they were entitled to respect. The officer, without mov-Bartholomew Fair. They were variously and curiously ing a muscle, replied, "If you wish him to be punished, dressed, two of them only being natives of Egypt. One there is the offender; if you are satisfied, let him go." On had her hair arranged behind in long plaits, and to the leaving the barrack, I perceived that the termination of extremities of these a considerable number of small gold coin were attached; while others had rows of these coins arranged round their foreheads or suspended in their ears. side, although the worthy Consul shook his head when he Their eyelashes were blackened with antimony and their heard the tale, fearing that such unprecedented elemency might tend to diminish European importance.

nails stained with henna. The capacious trousers of one might tend to diminish European importance. with spangles, and the waist of this lady was encircled with a solid Cashmere shawl. Their necks and wrists were loaded with heavy metallic necklaces and bracelets, pying a projection of land, with the sea enclosing a third to which, in one instance, massive anklets were superadded. of its circuit, is now a dreary, uninhabited waste-a mel. The ballet was commenced by a dancer whose steps were ancholy picture of devastation and ruin. Closely besieged slow and little varied, but in the movement of whose arms for five months and twenty-one days, during which time there was occasionally something graceful as she raised upwards of thirty-five thousand shells were thrown into them over her head to strike together a pair of cymbals the town, not a single habitation has escaped uninjured, that she held in her hands. Another soon joined her, and Whole streets are blocked up with half-demolished houses, proceeded in the same monotonous style; but the dance and others are filled to the first story with fractured rem | quickly degenerated into a species of revolting pantomime. nants of roofs and floors. Every door and window has an exhibition of looks and gestures without grace or been torn down and consumed for fuel, shattered arches clegance, and such as long habit alone could allow in any an exhibition of looks and gestures without grace or and tottering walls still seem to menace destruction, and country to be tolerated. The tambourine player occasionnarrow passages through heaps of rubbish afford the only ally assisted the instruments with his voice, and some of access to various parts of the town. One of the principal his notes were not unmeledious; but his affected tones of bazaars it would be dangerous to enter; and another of tenderness were accompanied with so much grimace as spacious dimensions, has only been saved by an arched often to produce a ludicrous effect. The whole scene excited only a feeling of pity and disgust, and we quitted it before the first set of dancers, fatigued by their exertions,

AMERICANS AT MALTA.

In Malta I had remarked large arm-chairs, furnished The pavement, richly with rockers, in two different drawing-rooms, and one also in a shop that I casually entered, which led me to inquire informed that the custom of using rocking chairs had been imported from America; and a lady, to whom the adventure occurred, greatly entertained me by relating the effect produced on herself and her daughters by the first sight of a family rocking scene.

This lady, soon after her arrival had occasion to return a visit to an American family, recently settled here. The party visited consisted of a father, mother, and three grown-up young people, all somewhat of a tall, spare make, with that sort of primitive mien which seems to characterize the inhabitants of some of the States. The visiters took their places on a sofa in the drawing-room, and the family arranged themselves opposite, according to their seniority, in arm-chairs. When the first civilities had passed, and conversation had begun to flag, the lady of the starched, proceeded with much composure to rock herself in her chair. The young people—their civil speeches concluded-with an easy unconcern, one by one, followed seated, in rather an awful semicircle, and all gently in-

th wi

tin

ity of the party by an involuntary laugh.

A HIGHLAND MARTINET.

ancient national characteristics. Here, as elsewhere, he is some idea of what Virginia was, and what was expected distinguished by a lofty, independent bearing, that-almost from it in the days of the virgin queen after whom it amounts in appearance, but in appearance only, to an inso- was named; but we dare say few Europeans know much lent insubordination; and he not unfrequently exhibits a about its present springs-or summers, or winters either somewhat arrogant assumption of knowing exactly his To such, this book will be full of information though a duty and a dogged determination not to overstep it a sin- great deal of it can be of but very small use on this side gle inch.

haps?" replied the outraged Esculapian, "or don't know powers and facilities. your duty?" "Know ye!" said Sandy, with a look of ineffable disdain; " I know ye weel enou,' and know my duty too; and that is to salute the uniform of the service; inherit the propensities and follow the fashions of their but if folk choose to come here without the regulation cap, forefathers. In America, as here, there is an overwhelm-they need no' look for the compliment fro' the like o' me," ing impulse to travel; rest is torment, restlessness plea-

ILLNESS AT SEA IN MAN AND BRUTE.

The complicated miseries of an illness at sea can only be estimated by those who have unfortunately experienced quainted with the author than from us; and we accordappropriated to its special use; and this is so nicely calculated, that the wretched sufferer is in every body's way, objects to occupy their attention, seem to allow a portion and, first the White Sulphur, are situated :of the ordinary charities of human nature to become dorother nuisance.

ment, in a space that hardly allows them to move, their Terence hath it." animosity is directed against those deprived, by debility, of the power of self-defence. One of these miserable victims let out to-day upon deck as a relief from incessant which, inter alia, have given so much offence to certain persecution, instantly flew into the sea, as if resolutely of the natives, though from their own countryman the bent upon self-destruction. A boat was immediately low-evil habit is proven to exist; and we may exclaim with ered, our live stock not being abundant; but its apparent Shakspeare, (see his tragedy of Pizarro, passim!) design had succeeded so well, that before it could be taken up its sufferings had come to a close.

From the Literary Gazette.

This amusing little volume is worth a "Tanner," or even half a dollar; and we are much obliged to our friend the springs of the which lege : VOL. MEVIIS. JANUARY, 1836 .- 11.

short as was consistent with the customary forms, heartily in Philadelphia for sending us a jeu d'esprit across the rejoiced to make their escape without disturbing the grav- Atlantic, to enliven our own dull London time; and, whether by tickling or Nicklin, afford us the curiosity of a laugh. Persons well read in olden history and geography, and even those who have peeped into Mr. Mar-The Highlander, wherever he serves, still maintains his tin's comprehensive work on British Colonies, may have of the water. That is, there is only slight probability of This has recently been exemplified in a ludicrous occur- their seeking autumnal recreation among the Tuckahoes rence that took place here. A medical officer not very or Quo'hees, at the White Sulphur, Sweet, Salt Sulphur, popular in the regiment observed one day, on quitting the Red Sulphur, Grey Sulphur, Hot, Cold, or Warm Springs military hospital, that a Highlander on duty did not give of the mountains of Virginia, so long as Gravesend, Marhim the customary salute. The doctor stood still, looking gate, Ramsgate, Worthing, Bourne, Dover, Hastings, fiercely at the sentinel, as well to remind him of his ne-Learnington, Cheltenham, Bath, Matlock, Harrogate, or glect as to afford him an opportunity of repairing his Ballybunnian (oh, if they knew Ballybunnian, what remissness. "What for d'ye look at me?" said Sandy, crowds would go there !) offer them fair resort, and every with an oblique toss of the head and a sarcastic wrinkling sort of bathing and drinking; or, at least, till team and of the upper lip and nose. "You don't know me, per-rail roads have "progressed" into still more extraordinary

Still, it is satisfactory to see how the descendants of English parentage in a distant land, and a different clime, sure. And the minor manifestation of this inherent disposition is developed in trips to watering places, just as with ourselves. But our readers will be made better acthem. Every portion of space on board is necessarily ingly proceed to his lucubrations, to which a good map of Virginia is prefixed.

From Philadelphia he departs, on the 13th of August, and thus feels acutely the embarrassment of his involun- and journeys by Baltimore, Washington, Charlottesville, tary helplessness. The imprisoned inmates of a loaded and Staunton, (famed, as all Virginia seems to be, for vessel, ill at ease, perhaps, themselves with few external fried chickens), to the mountain tops, where the baths,

"We vapoured (he tells us at setting out) across the mant. Scarcely a word or look of spmpathy is bestowed Peninsula in an hour, and were paddled down the Chesa-upon the invalid; "few and far between" are the inquiries peake in the Carroll of Carrollton—a spacious, rapid, and how he fares; and it seems as if the customary restraints very clean boat. An excellent practice obtains in this of civilized society alone saved him from being trampled boat: one or two servants are constantly employed in upon by every passing foot, or thrown overboard, like any wiping up the extract of tobacco, with which our southern friends are wont to describe parabolic curves in every di-I now quite understand the feeling that impels our rection; touching which singular custom, the refined wretched fowls in the hencoop to harass and drive from Trollope has some pertinent remarks. This is done by their food such of their companions as droop and hang the the servants with a view of keeping the skirts of the ladies wing. Rendered furious by the irksomeness of confine clear of this great offence; and-ne quid nigh Miss, as

> A pun worthy of the miseries of human life; and a passage rather confirmatory of the Trollopean remarks

" 'Tis true, 'ti 'spittiful, 'ti 'spittiful 'tis true."

At Baltimore, the author proceeds to tell us he "stept from the steam-boat into the coach for Washington. The Letters descriptive of the Virginia Springs, the Roads lead road is very bad, and will grow worse, and is expected to ing thereto, and the Doings thereat. Collected, Corrected, Annotated, and Edited by Peregrine Prolix. 18mo. pp. 99. Philadelphia, 1835. Tanner.

From Staunton you go over the hills and far away to

sides of stone masonry, and the bottom of large loose rounded pebbles. It is covered with a wooden building, having a large opening in the middle of the roof to admit spitting, and swearing." air and light. The water in the bath always exhibits a temperature of ninety-six degrees, according to the scale of Fahrenheit, and is so pellucid, that you scarcely see it upon first entering the bath-house. There is a small room at each side of the bath with a little fire, to undress and redress by. There are stone steps leading from these rooms to the bottom of the bath; but by far the best way, is to plunge in head foremost, as you are then instantly transferred to the comfortable element, and are out of your pains in a moment, as the boys say. The water is five feet deep for the gentlemen and four for the ladies. The two sexes bathe alternately; spaces of two hours each being allotted, from 6 A. M. to 10 P. M. You may take three baths a day without injury. To bathe comfortably, you should have a large cotton morninggown of a Cashmere shawl pattern lined with crimson, a fancy Greek cap, Turkish slippers, and a pair of loose pantaloons; a garb that will not consume much time in doffing and donning. Stay in the bath fifteen minutes, using very little exercise whilst in the water. As soon as you come out, hurry to your cabin, wrap yourself in a dry night-gown, go to bed, cover up warm, go to sleep, get into a fine perspiration, grow cool by degrees, wake up in half an hour, dress and go to dinner with what appetite you have. This process, except the dinner, may be repeated twice a day with great profit and pleasure, and on one occasion, breakfast or supper can take the place of dinner. At this comfortable, well-kept, and agreeable establishment, the charge is eight dollars per week, or one and a half per diem; and half price for sergive comfort and satisfaction to the visiters. * * *
The means of amusement at the Warm Springs consist three weoden balls of different sizes, not round; and the Warm Spring Mountain to walk or ride up and down, higher, dive deeper, and come out drier, than all creation Every visiter should ascend to the top of the mountain, besides; and from the south, nullifiers, union men, politiwhich can be reached in half an hour on horsebock; and cal economists, and statesmen; and from all quarters, whence may be seen a sublime mountain view consist- functionaries of all ranks, ex-candidates for all functions, and, like the worshippers of Juggernaut, the votaries of Nobody at the public table is expected to drink or pay for pleasure are willing to be crushed to death, obtain to a any wine or other liquous he does not want; and any body

"Besides the large house, there are five or six rows of chance of laying their offerings on the shrine that fishion buts (Virginice cabins), some built of logs and mud, and has set up in this happy valley. The water has the pleasome of brick and mortar. Most of them contain two sant flavour of a half-boiled, half-spoiled egg, is very Finall rooms, in one of which is generally a fire-place, clear, and not cold enough to please the taste of a Phila-When we arrived, the establishment was rather full, and delphia cockney. The spring is covered with a hand-Mr. Fry stowed one of us in a small room in the hotel, some dome, supported on columns, and is contained in an and the other two in the most ancient log cabin on the octagonal marble case, about seven feet long, five feet promises, consoling us by the observation that Mr. Jef. wide, and four and a half feet deep, the bottom being ferson had formerly spent three weeks in the self-same formed of the rock from which the water gushes. It is mud edifice; at the same time hinting (which was the very beautiful and tempting, and cures the following dismost solid part of the consolation) that the next day he cases, according to popular belief:-yellow jaundice, could translate us into a better residence. The place de. white swelling, blue devils, and black plague; searlet fever, rives its name from an abundant spring of limpid water, yetlow fever, spotted fever, and fever of every kind and containing a small quantity of sulphurretted hydrogen, colour; hydrocephalus, hydrothorax, hydrocele, and hydroand emitting bubbles of nitrogen, which flows through an phobia, hypochondria, and hypocrisy; dyspepsia, diarrhoa, octagonal bath thirty-eight feet in diameter, having the diabetes, and die-of-any-thing; gout, gormandising, and grogging; liver complaint, cholic, stone, gravel, and all other diseases and bad habits, except chewing, smoking,

The Spring, which can work these wonders and remove such diseases as blue devils, hypocrisy, die-of-any-thing, and all, with the exceptions already excepted, is thus analysed; and we would recommend an English imitation of so portential a medicament to our manufacturers of mineral waters (it would surely sell well at 15s. per dozen

in quarts, and 8s. 6d. in pint bottles.)

"It contains sulphurretted hydrogen, nitrogen, and oxygen; sulphate, carbonate, and muriate of lime, sulphate of magnesia, and a very strong infusion of fashion. latter being an animal substance, its quantity cannot be precisely ascertained; it is supposed, however, to be gradually increasing, and no doubt contributes greatly to the efficacy of the water. When submitted to the ordeal of analysis, it vanishes in smoke. This celebrated spring bursts forth in an elevated valley, situated on the western side of the main Allegheny ridge, and its precious waters flow towards the Gulf of Mexico; whilst the Sweet Spring, distant only eight miles in a direct line, sends its abundant stream towards the Atlantic Ocean.

With regard to the locale we learn-" The cabins are in general comfortable and the bedding clean; some suspicion of fleas I confess to, but I detected no bugs, which are perhaps kept away by the nature of the water, for

Virgil says, in the fifth book of his Georgies,

" Fætidum in aqua non gaudet sulphurea bedbug;" which being translated into the Virginia vernacular, means, 'the stinking chinch does not like sulphur-water.' The last words of the above-quoted hexameter I take to be an ancient Latin neuter indeclinable noun." But "the vants and horses. If you want fire in your room you greatest charm of this place is the delightful society which have it for asking, and in truth every effort is used to is drawn together in every agreeable variety by its health restoring spring. From the east you have consolidationists, tariffites, and philanthropists; from the middle, proof a bagatelle-table entirely used up, a ten-pin alley with fessors, chemical analysts, and letter writers; from the west, orators, and gentlemen who can squat lower, jump ing of parallel mountain ridges, one beyond the other as and the gay, young, agreeable, and handsome of both far as the eye can each, like a dark green sea of giant sexes, who come to the White Sulphur to see and to be billows, instantly stricken solid by nature's magic wand, seen, to chat, laugh, and dance, and to throw each his pebble on the great heap of the general enjoyment. The "We arrived at the White Sulphur at 11 P. M. and customs here are very liberal towards the guests. A good. found it overflowing with company, humming like a bec-hive. This is the great lion of the Virginia mountains; every evening, free to all the boarders, without charge.

th

can have fire enough in his cabin to roast an ox, by say- I do pray for his return," she added, fervently; and then ing, with Horace, 'Boy (meaning old uncle Duncan,) lowering her voice, continued, "and I pray that it may be fetch me some wood;" 'Puer, pone lignum super foco.' quickly, when I see how ill and pale mamma looks." Uncle Duncan is a highly respectable yellow character, with a hawk's eye and an eagle's nose, and perhaps of the ing up to her sister and placing her rosy lips close to her imperial blood of Powhatan, who makes his bivouac ear; "I do not think mamma looks ill-see how pink her among the trees on the hill in the rear of the Alabama check is now, and how her eyes brighten while she reads Row, under a slantindicular shed, lighted up most roman-papa's letter." Emily sighed heavily, and Ellen crept to tically by a large watch-fire; and if you want any thing, her mother, and nestling her head in her lap, and twining you have only to open your postern and screech, Duncan! her arm round the thin wrist which rested on Mrs. Allan's oh, Duncan !

in being able to clear up one class from the author's future explanations.

"Talking of rice, do you know why rice is like nullifi- mamma?" grow in South Carolina. No, ladies and gentlemen, that God, he is well and happy !-- as happy as he can be away is not the reason. Do you give it up? It is because it is from his family. He has already bought for you, Robert, a sovereign and bloodless remedy for attacks on the con- a most beautiful lathe, and all the tools you desired for stitution."

It is not for us, seeing that our circulation is by no means confined to Scotland or limited to Scotsmen, though nothing shall ever make me unhappy when once papa we have the pleasure to delight both the country at large and multitudes of its sons in every quarter of the globeit is not for us, we repeat, to conduct our friends to all and books, far superior to any that can as yet be procured the other sulphur baths with which the writer brings us here." acquainted: if they possess a wish to know more, let them buy the book, or go to Virginia and see for themselves; grateful I am for his remembering me, when he had so and if they do, they may, perhaps, find (as the author did) many, many things to think of ?" in the manufactories at Harper's Ferry, "that ingenious Yankee lathe which (he says) turns gun-stocks and shoe- of human life, and the vanity of human wishes, do not, I lasts; but if it cannot make betters stocks than those I hope, go so far as dear Robert, and say that nothing shall saw, It would have been better had it turned to its last ever make you unhappy when papa comes home?" before it came to Harper's Ferry."

round corners, or for the nascent schoolmaster, of whom and her colour deepened; she felt a sensation of suffocahe also tells us that he knew nothing but rifle practice, tion in her throat, and, unable to restrain her feelings, hid and was consequently, the very man to teach the young her face in her mother's bosom, and wept bitterly. Robert idea how to shoot, and at last let his pupils have Harper's looked sad and serious, and Ellen cried outright, from

From the Juvenile Forget-Me-Not. PAPA'S LETTER.

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

"A letter from papa! a real letter, paper and pen and all! A real letter from dear papa in England, to his lit-tle ones at Philadelphia!" The incident I am about to relate, I should inform my little readers, took place in Philadelphia.- "What a treat !- how happy we all are ! nothing in the world could make us more happy."

"Yes, Ellen," replied the eldest girl, "there is some-thing would make us more happy."
"More happy!" repeated Ellen.

"I wonder what he will bring me from London," said Robert, who being the boy, and the only boy of the family,

was, I fear, somewhat selfish.

may be sure papa will bring to us whatever will be most but Emily entreated them to be calm, and, in humble useful for each to possess; above all, he will bring back that imitation of that mother whom she so tenderly loved, and affection which, while it protects, guides and blesses us. whose fortitude she endeavoured to possess, she procured

"I do not think manna looks ill," said little Ellen, stealknee, waited with much patience till she had finished.

As our readers cannot be familiar with the various de-scriptions of persons above enumerated; and as we can joyfully, "tell me every word." Mrs. Allan folded Ellen tell little or nothing about them ourselves, we rejoice much to her bosom, and, while she pressed her lips on her fair brow, Ellen felt one or two tears fall upon her cheek; her little heart saddened, and she whispered, "Are you ill, mamma?" Mrs. Allan made no reply. "Is papa ill, cation? To be sure, cry several voices, because they both mamma?" "No, dearest," answored her mother, "thank your workshop."

Robert jumped up in cestacy. "Oh, how happy I am!

comes home."

" For you, Emily, he has purchased a piano, and pencils, Emily's quick eye brightened, and she said, "How very

"But you, Emily, knowing something of the uncertainty

While Mrs. Allan pronounced these words, she looked Nevertheless, guns so stocked might do for shooting seriously at her daughter: Emily perfectly understood her, Ferry stocks if they did not themselves turn out to be sweet childish sympathy, because her sister was so full of sorrow.

"My dearest Emmy," said Mrs. Allan, "I expected more fortitude from you. I see you understand, that, from your dear papa's protracted absence, the probability is that when he returns you will have no mother. You, my beloved children, being constantly with me, are not sensible of the decay by which it has pleased God to warn me of approaching death; but I feel it. I have prayed to the Almighty fervently in the night-time, and in the early morning's watch, that I might be spared a little, little longer-at least until his return: but it is in vain; it is not God's will that I look upon my husband again in this world. And his will be done! Emily, my first dear child, say with me, 'His will be done!' My Robert, you must not look so resolute, even while the tears are running down your cheeks; bend your own inclinations to the mandate "Yes, more happy—papa himself. Only fancy how of the Lord, and say, 'His will be done?' It is an early happy and how grateful to God we shall be when he retrial, but it will be sanctified to your good; it will teach you the vanity of human wishes, and I pray that it may make you all more and more united: Emily is old enough -" but poor Mrs. Allan's feelings had exhausted her strength, and she fainted on her daughter's shoulder. Ro-Emily, the eldest daughter, smiled and replied, "You bert and Ellen began to scream and wring their hands; was a beautiful trait in Emily's character, the steadiness without screaming; I have nursed my brother through the with which she laboured to attain the most useful ac- whooping-cough, and my sister in the measles." quirement in the world, a command over self. How many paused, and her colour rose, and her voice faltered. "I persons have I seen actually useless members of society, have attended my mother for several months nearly night from a want of what is called presence of mind; how and day, when I feared-believed-that God would take many girls will stand still and scream, instead of render-her from us, that my father would return to a desolate home! ing assistance; how many will shrink from the sight of a and now, when a chance, a blessed chance, a more than a patient and cheerful temper, and an affection for, and we shall see; the first part of your proposition is wise, beautiful fruits and flowers of the world; but let her, like chamber. the bee, gather honey from them all, and let the honey be rerected Ellen's ardent temper; so that, instead of being a nance. torment, she became a blessing to all around her: and, above all, to observe the command she obtained over her-fortitude, if you trust me to-morrow, will not fail?" inself,-how she learnt to restrain her tears when her mo-quired Emily. ther spoke of dying; how she bent her own desires to the and mid-day, "Thy will be done!"

Her mother continued growing worse and worse; and danger was imminent, when perhaps it was over. at last endured so much pain that the physician began to doubt that her complaint was consumption: he was not by any means wedded to his own opinion, and suggested the propriety of having additional advice. In the meantime letters again arrived from England, and one in particular to Emily from her father, directing who it was he wished to be consulted, and conjuring her to watch over her mother till his return, which would be immediate. When the "new doctor," as little Ellen called him, arrived, he said at once that the physician had been at first mistaken, but now was in the right,—that the complaint was not consumption,—and that Mrs. Allan might yet be restored to her family if she would submit to an operation; this the poor sufferer immediately consented to, but added, that as Mr. Allan was about to return so much sooner than she had dared to expect, she would wait for his arrival. "I should not," she added, "have strength to support it if not attended by some relative, some one on whose hand I might grasp and feel that a relative was with me."

"Mamma!" exclaimed Emily, "dear mamma, do not put it off; delay will only confirm this horrid disease will neither scream nor faint—trust me, I have seen you must know my Madelaine: if it be possible, your mother practise fortitude too frequently not to know its advan. I think you may be trusted."

old, and yet you talk of being present at an operation if you agree, you will not repent having granted my re-which I would hardly suffer my junior pupils to attend!" quest."

"That is a very extraordinary little graid, drawing "That is a very extraordinary little girl." said the new which I would hardly suffer my junior pupils to attend!"

(* I am fourteen, sir," replied the little maid, drawing

the necessary restoratives and laid her on a couch. It herself up to her full height! "I have had five teeth drawn wound, instead of endeavouring to bind it up, and so re-lieve the sufferings of their fellow-creatures! so very little of my age, I cannot have strength and firm-Women would do well to remember—nor can the truth be impressed upon them at too early an age-that all the and not much relieved by the doctor's patting her head, brilliant accomplishments, all the solid information, all the and then placing his hand under her chin so as to turn learning in the world, are nothing worth, in comparison to upwards her blushing face, saying, "Well, my little maid, perseverance in, the moral and domestic duties of life no time can be lost, no time must be lost; to-morrow I Home ought to be the temple of a virtuous female: will see Mrs. Allan; she will not, for the sake of such dear she may leave it occasionally, and be happy amid the ties, trifle with her life." Soon afterwards he left the

Now, every body in the world knows that no young laserved for her own dwelling, be it a palace or a cottage. dy in her teens likes to be patted on the head. I have No one felt and acted upon this principle more than Mrs. seen little girls of twelve turn up their noses at it, but to Allan; and neither the precept nor the example was lost "miss in their teens," it savours somewhat of an insult: upon Emily. It was really extraordinary to see the pa- whether Emily Allan did or did not so look upon it, I cantience and the wisdom of a girl who had just entered her not pretend to say; but this I know, that before the "new fourteenth year; how she watched by her mother's sick-doctor" descended to the hall, a light small hand rested on bed; how she checked her brother's selfishness, and di- his arm, and soft blue eyes were uplifted to his counte-

"Doctor, can I do any thing to convince you that my

"My dear, you are really a very surprising little perwill of the Almighty; and how truly and fervently she son, but I would not trust one of my junior pupils to atsaid and felt, in the morning and the evening, at midnight tend a patient under such circumstances, lest he might shrink or tremble, and so lead the patient to suppose the

"Sir," she persisted, "I know mamma well, and I know that if I were with her, her desire to set me an example of fortitude would conquer her feelings of pain, and enable her to support her sufferings better; and I also know that her tenderness for my feelings will prompt her to wish me away, though you can imagine how, as she is far from her own relatives, she would naturally desire to have, as she said, some support in her hour of trial." The doctor looked astgnished. "Put my resolution, sir, to any test you please: draw one, two, or three teeth-I will not flinch, they will grow again; I would part with this arm if you would let me hold mamma's hands to-morrow!"

" You are so earnest, so affectionate, ma petite," replied the gentleman, "that, though I have no inclination to draw your teeth, I would trust you; but it was only last week that one of my pupils got so nervous, while assisting me in an operation upon a woman, that she was near losing her life from his inability to perform his duty."

"Sir," exclaimed Emily, seizing his hand, "She was not his mother !" The worthy man was touched, for he trust to me, I will stay with you, I will hold your hand, I said, "Go, you are a good child, a very good child; you

"Shall I tell mamma so, sir?" "You may, but mind The new doctor was a tall, thin, pale Frenchman, not I am not quite certain; do not say what I have not saidquite so polite as Frenchmen are in general, and a little do not add to it," "I have been taught, sir, that an exsarcastic. "Ma foi! modemoiselle," he said, "you are aggeration is only a shabby untruth," replied Emily. "We very heroic; why, let me see, you cannot be twelve years will pray for strength; and, dear, dear sir, I am sure,

" That is a very extraordinary little girl," said the new doctor to the physician who had previously attended Mrs. 100 much sorrow that I will never build too much on any

" She is, indeed; her mother has so well inculcated the benefits arising from self-possession, that I have been astonished at the fortitude she so systematically practises. She is worthy, in that respect, to be a descendant of the red Indians."

of snuff,"-" O! we shall see!"

Have any of my young friends seen a dear and tender parent on the edge-the very brink of the grave?-have they watched day by day her hand grow more thin, her cheek more pale ?-have they heard the blessed words of firmly believing in the wisdom of her Father, her heavenly Father, who gives her strength to support her sufferings, his mercy?—have they ever gathered for her sweet flow-bours, and well entitled to be partners in his fame. ers, and then thought that, even as the perfume and beauty was departing from those flowers, was she whom they loved fading from the earth? Have they experienced all hand, and that nothing short of a miracle could save her from the grave, has hope suddenly burst upon themhave they heard the blessed sound,-" She may yet created?

Emily, entered Mrs. Allan's room the next morning. by details of the two hours' agony.

really unable to ask how his mother was.

When Emily recovered, what think you she saw on a chair by her bedside? "A letter from papa?" Noprise ?"

" I can assure you, sir, said the French doctor to Mr. Allan, " if that young lady was a young gentleman, he ought to be brought up to be a physician; I wish you joy, sir, of your children !"

The thanksgiving in that house was great! "And tion, would publish it in extenso—it is serious and im now," said Robert, "I may be happy; but I have seen portant.

thing."

" Except the goodness of God," interrupted Emily; and, indeed, we can never build too much on that; for, whether in joy or sorrow, it is never failing."

" You are always wise, Emily," said Ellen.

" No," she replied. My heart is so full that I could "O! exclaimed the Frenchman, taking a huge pinch weep and dance, and all for joy-pure, pure joy. Do you know that in less than a week, our new doctor says, mamma will be able to listen to the tone of my piano?"

From the Quarterly Review.

WE wish that Mr. Washington Irving, or some other comfort from her lips ?-have they observed how she adequate pen, would give us an 'American Plutarch.' We clings to them with all a mother's tenderness; and yet, mean succinct and readable lives of the founders of their republic. There were amongst them one or two great, and a dozen very eminent men, fellow-soldiers and colleagues commits them to his protracting care, in full reliance on of Washington, well fitted to be the assistants of his lasevere mortification-we have long since learned to think it no injury-which their success inflicted upon this country, has prevented us from doing them full justice. this, and then, when they believed that the time was at English writers could hardly be expected to feel, or the English public to have partaken in, much interest as to the characters of their victorious antagonists. The French care only about themselves, and the rest of the Western live "—ean they remember the sensations that sound continent had too little personal or political motives to pay much attention to these Transatlantic worthies; and we If they cannot, imagination can hardly portray what think we may venture to say, that Washington and Mr. Allan's children experienced, when the new doctor, Franklin are alone in possession of that European reputaand their old friend and physician, closely followed by tion which many others-though not, we admit, in so I high a degree-appear to us to deserve. The lives that will not harrow up either my reader's feelings, or my own, have been published in America are too volumnious for general use. We can neither afford money nor time for Suffice it, that Emily was so far mistress of herself as the cumbrous biographics of such distant acquaintance. to be declared the best girl in Philadelphia. From the One or two octavo volumes, comprising Washington, position in which she was placed, she could only see her Montgomery, Lee, Armstrong, Franklin, Hancock, Jay, mother's face, which she had bathed with strong perfumes, and watched every varying tint with so much judgment, John Adams, Jefferson, and Madison, containing an act that to see her child's calmness sustained Mrs. Allen through the whole. When it was all over, when the as- partial summary of their principles and opinions, would surance came upon her that there was every probability of be not merely popular amongst us, but permanently useful her beloved parent's recovery, when her aid was no longer and instructive. The grave has now closed over all the necessary, when, through the influence of a powerful nar- men who have any pretensions to enter into such a work; cotic, that dear mother had fallen into a heavy sleep, the and the passions, partialities, and prejudices which their French doctor, who for many hours never left the room, living conduct had excited, are now pretty well extincarried the little heroine in a complete state of exhaustion guished,-nearly as much so as they are likely to be for to her chamber, where Ellen, with her face buried in two or three generations to come,—while there is still cushions, was praying on her knees for her dear mamalive enough of personal interest and of traditionary anecma; and sturdy Robert, his lips white and trembling, was dote to enable an author to give to his historical pictures the additional charm of individual portraits. This suggestion is made in the most friendly feeling towards our Transatlantic brethren-dead and alive-in whose honour you little pale girl, guess: "A present from papa?" No and fame we take, as is natural and just, a strong family guess, Miss Rosy-lips, again.-Well, I am sure that interest; and most happy should we be to have contributsage litte maid in the corner will surely make it out; can ed, even in so humble a degree as by the expression of a you tell? "No, ma'am." Then you all give it up? wish, to a work which, if adequately executed, must tend It was Para Himself! what think you of that as a sur. to advance the combined fame, and to reconcile the partial differences, of that great class of mankind whom we may designate by the common name of the British re c.

We wish that Mr. Sparks, who has published extracts from Gouverneur Morris's diary during his residence in Paris in the early part of the French Revolu-

From the Amulet for 1836.

THE DROWNED FISHERMAN.

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

along that portion of the coast which contracts into the like an hour-Waterford river, there are a number of scattered cottages picturesque sea-shore-more wild, perhaps, than beautiful, would turn the tide-and the luck !-- an hour ! during a long summer-evening, from the time when the sun to stop it with a hat!" abates his fierceness until the moon has fairly risen upon the waters, nothing more delightful than to row-now in, now out, now under the hanging rocks, now close upon the silver-sanded bays, where thousands of many-coloured shells form the most beautiful Mosaic beneath the transparent waters. So deep is the tranquillity of land and sea the shadow of the Irish coast; that the lovely village of Templemore smiling on the brink of the Waterford river, was inhabited by the "savage cut-throats," which it is the delight of a peculiar party to denominate the suffering peasantry of a land who for centuries have "laughed and laboured" upon worse food and worse treatment, than we in rich and happy England, bestow upon our dogs-oh, it makes my heart ache, and my blood boil, when I think of what I have seen, and contrast it with what I hear; when I remember that whether priest-ridden or law-ridden, the heads of either party have been fanatics or worse-but what have I to do with this? I love the green turf of my native country, I laugh at its follies, I weep over its sorrows and grieve for its crimes; ah! a woman's smiles and a woman's tears are alike useless—but what have you, gentle reader to do with that? I have never entered upon, and boat, became annoyed at her obstinacy. do not wish to enter upon, any subject that trenches on the my dear English friends for the virtues and domestic a fearful presentiment. privations of my humble countrywomen; and I have endeavoured to show to Irish people how their besetting Browne to his son, "sure she's enough to set a man mad, sins of carelessness and inconsiderateness might be correct and her's the help that's as good as five-she has such ed-corrected without much trouble, and with great advan- a knowledge of setting every thing straight. Kate" he tage to themselves; as far as Ireland is concerned I have exclaimed to his wife no ambition beyond what I have stated, and having so said, I will tell my story :

"And what 'ud ail the boat but to do? Sure she's in her eye?" done, ay, and done a dale for us, this ten years; and as to the hole, Jemmy 'ill plug his hat into it, or stick in a piece looking kindly towards his wife at the same time; "them of sail-cloth, and what 'nd ail her then, but sail, God bless her !- like a swan or a curlew, as she always does !"

" Dermot-Dermot, darling! listen to me for one't!"

Browne, while his keen blue eye twinkled with that mix- Benje, between you and I, as handsome a husband, and as ture of wit and humour so truly Irish, "Faith, my dear, fine, ay, and for the matter of that, as good a boy for I'll accommodate you in any way I can, for I'll listen to a son as woman's heart could wish, and yet the tears are you one't for three speakings-come, out with it, and in her eyes, and the corners of her mouth drawn as far don't stand twisting your face that was one't so purty as down as if she did nothing but sup sorrow all her to win the heart and hand of the handsomest man in the life." Benjamin, the fisher's only child, made no reply; parish, and that is—myself, Dermot Browne at your and, after a moment's pause, his father looked at him and sarvice, Mistress Kate Browne, madam! Don't keep said, "Why, boy, you look as much cast down as your lengthening your face to the length of a herring-net, but mother-stay on shore and good luck to you!" out with it !- out with it !- at onc't !"

"Dermot, I've got the box of tools quite convenient; throuble she's in, by letting you go by yourself; I wish brought it with me to the shore, and the last time I was in Waterford I brought all sortings of nails, large and small; and there's plenty of board in the shed—and Dermot, mend the hole, and God bless you!—sure its the sore heart I'd have when you'd be on the wather, to think that In the immediate neighbourhood of Duncannon Fort' any harm would happen you-it won't take you any thing

"An hour! God bless the woman, why a body would standing either singly or in small clusters along a wild and think you had never been a fisherman's wife! An hour Why, the although the infinite number of creeks, and bays, and herrings out yonder would miss my company if I waited; overhanging rocks, vary the prospect at every hundred and all for what? To go to the trouble of nailing a bit yards; and I know nothing more delightful than to row o' boord on a mite of a hole, when it will be just as easy

"But not as safe, Dermot!"

"Be asy with your safety! You're always touching on that; -ay, will it, and as safe too; havn't I done it before?-Why turn up every one of the boats along the shore, and I'll bet you the cod I mean to catch against a during these happy hours, that travellers wound find it difficult to believe they were really floating beneath Michael Michael with the word of the difficult to believe they were really floating beneath Michael with the word of the wo Micban's go without a mast—barring a gag of a gate-post that he pulled out of Lavery's field? I'm sure Michael Murphy's craft is bang full of dowshy boles like a riddle: and a good noggin he won on that, for he betted Lanty Moore that at the present time the keel of his boat had more holes in it than Lanty's English sieve which he had winnowing corn; and sure enough he won; for the holes in the sieve were all stopped up with the dirt! Lend a hand, old girl, and help me and the boy to shove her off!" He continued appealing to his wife, "What!-you won't? Why thin, Kate agra, what ails ye ?-I've been your true and faithful husband next Candlemas will be seventeen years, and you never refused me a hand's turn before!" Still Kate Browne moved not; and her husband, using, with his eldest son, considerable exertion to push off the

Kate saw, but, contrary to her usual habit, heeded not. political grievances of Ireland: I can only pray-which I She stood, with folded arms and tearful eyes, surveying the do with all my heart and soul!—that times may mend, proceedings, without possessing the power of putting a and speedily. I have endeavoured to win the suffrages of stop to preparations, of the termination of which she had

"Why, thin, look at your mother, Benje!" exclaimed

"Let her alone, father dear," interrupted the boy, "let her alone, and don't vex her more, don't ye see there's a tear

a li

E

"And how can I help that?" expostulated the father, women are ever so hard to manage, and manage as ye will, ye can't find 'em out ;-there's the sun shining above her head, the waters dancing and capering, like jewels, at "Faith," replied Dermot to his better balf, Kate her feet, the herrings crying 'Come, and catch me,' and

"No, father, that I won't! I'll not put more to the

from my heart the boat was mended, if it would make

"I never meddle or make with her house, or land busi- let you come down to my cabin to-night, when the grands nous; hasn't she got a back-door for the cabin ?- a sty for are all in bed, I'll be for ever obliged to her; Browne and the poor pig?-a chancy dish for the pratees, and a white the boy are out to sea, and there's something over me tha table-cloth she stay at home and mind them, and let me and the down, a lannan,—and then you can hem the neckerchief—cobble alone?" Benjamin loved the wild and careless before morning." spirit of his father better than the prudence and forethought of his mother; yet did he not forget that the very ar already taken the place of tears, for she loved Mrs. rangements and luxuries to which his father alluded were Browne's cottage almost better than her own; "I will solely the effects of her care and industry.

fisherman as be pushed off his dangerous craft with a fifteen! broken oar, "Won't you say, God speed me and the boy ?"

in his arms, whispered-

pink, that grew within her reach.

granny's cures, and a few shells to keep the childre asy,' said Statia-pulling her sea-pinks to pieces at the same

"And what does the granny cure with these ?" inquired Mrs. Browne.

"Sorra a know I know," replied the girl, blushing still girl.

put under your pillow last Holy-eve night?"

"Ah, thin, Mistress Browne, ma'am, let me alone about the yarrow-sure it was only out of innocent mirth maybe-maybe you'd show me how you mend nets-I things at all, at all."

fisherman's wife. Statia made no reply. "I can tell you," him." she continued; "because though you neither spoke nor laughed that blessed night, my poor girl, after you placed the yarrow under your pillow-still you did not dream of Benje Browne. Stacy, Stacy, I mind the time myself -its only human natur, darling.

Statia Byrne flung her handful of sea-pinks upon the shingles, and passed the back of her hand across her eyes, easy about them-what, then, ails you to-night?

for they were filled with tears.

pointing to the flowers that the sea-breeze was scattering darling, it's a fine thing to have the religion to turn to far and wide.

earding wool, so she'll want me now."

"Good bye, Statia-but stop child; Benje desired me to put you in mind, that you promised to hem the necker-"Don't bother about the boat, boy," replied Browne, chief for him; and tell your mother, jewel, that if she'll for saints'-days and bonfire nights ?-can't I dou't care to be quite alone this blessed night: so come

"I will, I will," said the maiden, with whom smiles had and I've learnt a new song; oh, I shall be so happy!" "Won't you say, God speed me, Kate?" inquired the and she danced up the cliffs with all the light gaiety of

The fisherman's wife set her house in order and then The woman clasped her hands suddenly and fervently commenced mending her husband's nets. It would have together, and dropping on her knees without moving from been evident to any observer, that her mind was ill at the spot on which she had been standing, uttered a few case, for instead of pursuing her occupation with her usual earnest words of supplication for their safety. Benjamin steadiness, she frequently suffered the hard meshes to drop sprang on the shingles, and raising his mother affectionately from her bony fingers, and the wooden needle to lie idle on her lap. She would rise and peer from her small win-"Keep a good heart, we will back with such bouncing dow, or more frequently still from the open door, into the fish, before morning, any how; and mother, darling, if you heavens, but there was no cause for disquiet in their aspect see Statia Byrne, here is the neckerchief she promised to -the moon was in her full, calm glory; and the stars hem for me; tell her not to forget her promise." The bright, glittering, and countless, waited round her throne kisses Mrs. Browne bestowed on her son were mingled as handmaids silently attending upon their mistress. She with tears. She watched the boat until it had dwindled could see the reflection of the moonbeams on the far-away to a small speek on the horizon. As she turned to ascend the cliff, she saw the round laughing face of Statia Byrne catch the murmur of the ocean, so profound was its peer from behind a rock, and withdraw itself instantly on repose: and yet Kate continued restless and feverish.being perceived. She called to her; and after a little time Benjamin was her only surviving child-although five Statia came blushing, and smiling, and lingering by the others had called her mother-and, indeed, while he was way to pluck every sprig of samphire, every root of sea- absent from her, she felt that undefined, but perfectly natural, dread which steals over a sensitive mind for the "I just came down to gather a few bits of herbs for the welfare of a beloved object, whenever the one is separated from the other.

It was a great relief to her spirits when she heard the light foot of Statia Byrne on her threshold, and she felt new-sprung hope within her heart when she looked into the bright eyes and observed the full smile of the joyous more deeply.

"They're all a-bed, and the baby went off to sleep with"Maybe," continued Mrs. Browne, gravely, "maybe out an hushow! and mother says, as your all alone by Stacy honey, there's a charm in them like the yarrow you yourself, I might stay with you all night, Mrs. Browne, and so I will, if you please-and I've brought my needle; and-I'll hem the handkerchief, if you please-and then, I did it, and no harm; and, any way, I've no belief in such should so like to mend Mister Browne's herring net; he gave mother (God bless him!) as many herrings last year "And why do you disbelieve them?" inquired the as lasted all Lent!-I'm sure we can never forget it to "Pray for him then, Stacy-pray on your bended knees for Dermot and Benjamin Browne this night."

"Why so I will," rejoined the girl-astonished at the woman's earnestness of manner-" but the night is fine, when, if a spell worked contrary, I'd disbelieve it directly the sky is blue, the waters clear as chryshtal; they've been out many a night when the winds do be blowing the waves into the sky, and I've wondered to see you heart-

"God knows!" replied Kate Browne, with a heavy "You have thrown away the granny's pinks," said Kate, sigh, "I think I'll go over my bades a bit; ough, Stacy when our heart turns against every thing else." Kate "An, thin, let me alone Mistress Browne dear!" ex. sprinkled herself with holy water out of a small chalice, elaimed the girl. "And good bye, for the present, ma'am; and knelt kown, with a "decket" of beads in her hands, I'm sure the child 'ill be woke before this, and mother is to "say her prayers;" almost unwittingly, she repeated them aloud, but they had, in a degree, lost their soothing power, and she mingled the anxieties of earth with her ness, and putting her lips close to the ear of the fainting petitions, not to heaven but to its inhabitants; her "mingled girl, whispered..." HE IS DEAD!"

yarn" ran thus :-

open the door, agra, and listen, myself thinks the wind's her face-and she was alone, quite alone in the fisherman's rising-'now, and in the hour'-the cat! avourneen, don't cottage; at first, she thought she had fearfully dreamed you see the cat at the herring-tub, bad luck to that cat !- but the realities around her recalled her to herself; she 'now, and in the hour of death?" There was a long flew to the same cliff where, the evening before, unconpause, and she continued murmuring her petitions, and scious of the strong affection which bound her almost speaking aloud her anxieties, while Statia went on hemming childish heart to her young lover, she had watched his the handkerchief; at last she looked up at her young departure; and looking down on the beach, her painful companion and inquired, "Where did I leave off, my vision was truly realized—Dermot Browne was leaddarling, was it at 'Virgin most powerful,' or at 'Queen of ing his wife from a group of perso 's who were bearing Confessors?"

" I did not hear," replied the industrious maiden.

"Lord defend us, you startle the very life out of me!" ejaculated the girl, devoutly crossing herself.

"But what did you hear, Stacy?"

off."

forgive me, I am a poor sinful thing; quite full of sin; I herself upon her neck and sobbed as if her heart would must give up the prayers for to-night, I can't steady my break; the fisherman's wife held her from her, and parting heart to them, good nor bad; there! finish your work and her hair from off her brow, said, we'll go to bed, jewel-it is, as you say, a beautiful night, thanks be to God for his mercies! and I ought to have your face, avourneen; and though, my darlint, you did not more faith."

Long did they both remain awake during that calm him often since." moonlight; the fisherman's wife muttering prayers and fears, and raising her eyes to the little window which lay, she could catch a view of the distant sea—at last found it harder quitting you than his own mother, who she fell off iuto a deep, deep sleep. But Statia, though nursed him a baby at her breast; but whisht, darlint, free from all anxiety as to the fate of the absent, could don't I love you better for that now? Sure every thingnot close her eyes—poor girl! her young imagination had let alone every one that he regarded—that his regard only passed a gulf of years, and she was thinking, that rested on, is more to me than silver or goold, or the wealth perhaps she might be to the young fisher what Kate of the whole world! Didn't the bright eyes of his spirit how handsome; and how happy she should be to mend come here for Mistress Byrne, ma'am, is, that as you have his nets, and watch the return of his boat from the so many childre, (and God keep them to you!) maybe highest cliff that "toppled o'er the deep." The grey you'd spare Statia to bind my heart from breaking, and let morning was stealing on the night, yet still Kate slept her bide entirely with us we have prosperity enough, and still Statia Byrne continued with her eyes fixed on for when the Lord takes one thing away, why he gives the window, creating -not castles but -nets, and boats, another -blessed be his hely name! And sure, since the and cottages in the air; when, suddenly, before the win-dow stood Benjamin Browne—she had not seen his shadow carefulness, stopping every hole in every fisherman's boat pass—she had heard no step—no voice—no sound; nor —when he's ashore the hammer and nails is never out did she see a figure, but there was his face almost pressed of his hand. Let her be to me as my own child, Mistress to the glass-his long uncurled hair hung down either Byrne, and you'll have a consolation that will never lave cheek-and his eyes were fixed on her with a cold, un-you, no! not on your death-bed. Sure you'll see her suddenly paralyzed—she could not move—she tried to very day the sun rises—let her bide with me, for I am suddenly paralyzed—she could not move—she tried to very desolate!"

Speak, to call Mrs. Browne who still slept heavily, heavier

The mother, as she looked round upon seven rosy, healthy than before—she could make no sound-still her lover children, felt, that indeed her neighbour was desolate, and gazed-gazed on. And what occurred to her (for she after- in a voice hoarse with emotion, she said, wards declared, she never for a moment, was deprived of "Statia may go, and take our blessing with her if she consciousness) as most strange was, that though the room likes!" within was dark, and his head obscured the window, still she could see his features (to use her own expressive phrase) they knew they should see their sister daily; but the "Clear like wax;" while as he gazed, their beautiful form maiden was firm in her resolve, and that night greeted, as assumed the long, pale hue of death—by a sudden effort a father, the father of him whom her young heart had she closed her eyes, but only for a brief, brief moment loved with an entireness of affection which the heart can When she re-opened them, he was gone-and she only look- know but once. ed upon the grey mingling of sea and sky; trembling and sterror-strick in she at last succeeded in awakening her compleasant to see how perfectly her simple life is an illustrapanien. Mrs. Browne heard her story with apparent calmidian of the pathetic exclamation of the jewish damsel

It was long, long before Statia recovered from her "Holy Mary, mother of God, pray for un'-Statia, swoon, for when she did, the morning sun was shining on the corpse of the young fishermar to the shore; in the distance could be seen the keel of the doomed boat floating "Hear what?" exclaimed Kate Browne, starting off her upwards, while crowds of sea-birds overhead screamed the youth's funeral dirge!

It might be about two months after this occurrencewhich plunged the warm-hearted people of the neighbouring villages into deep sorrow-that Kate Browne visited "Nothing. I told you I did not hear where you left the cottage of Statia Browne; it was the first time the bereaved mother had entered any cottage, save her own, "Ough! ay, ay!" exclaimed Mrs. Browne, "God since "her trouble." As soon as Statia saw her, she flung

"Sorrow has worked with you, and left his mark upon drame of him that's gone last Holy-eve, you've dreamed of

The poor girl wept still more bit rly.

"You must have been very dear, very dear entirely, to opened at the foot of her bed, and from which, as she him," continued Kate Browne, "for his blessed spirit was to the old; and she thought how good he was-and look from the heavens on you my jewel? And what I'm

Many little voices wept aloud in that cottage, although

"Thy people, shall be my people, and thy God my hastily on. "I do not half like that man's appearance," God!" She manages admirably between her "two said I. "Nor do I," answered Brooks; "there is somemothers," as she calls them, so that the one may not thing peculiarly forbidding about him." No more was be jealous of the other: but though she has had many said. We continued walking half an hour longer, when suitors for her hand, she has never forgotten—the drowned the sun went down, leaving us in darkness. But the obfisherman!

From the Porget-Me-Not, for 1836.

A NIGHT NEAR MONTE VIDEO.

BY A MODERN PYTHAGOREAN.

[The incidents recorded in the following narrative are strictly true. They were related to me by a naval officer, lately deceased, and himself the hero of the story, which was drawn up by me at his particular request.]

require to be heightened by the aid of fancy.

we filled our bags in the course of a few hours.

This unexpected luck suspended our operations, and, as the evening was fast coming on, 'e felt the necessity communicated my suspicions to Brooks that all was not of arriving at Monte Video before we should be overtaken right: he, however, did not participate in them, and by darkness-no pleasant event in a country to whose treated what had just occurred as a matter of no imporroads we were entire strangers, more especially as tance. We continued moving on, and a second time we had reason to believe that they were infested during came up to the horse, which we again found walking the night by banditti. Impressed with these feelings, we slowly. We passed it, and kept in advance for perhaps made the best of our way towards the city, hoping to fifty yards, when all at once it set off, as before, at the reach it by sunset. In this country, lying as it does be-gallop, bounded past us-heavily laden as it was-like an tween the tropics, there is little or no twilight. Dark- arrow; and away it thundered through the darkness, till ness succeeds almost instantly to light. When the sun's the tramp of its echoing hoofs died away in the distance, disk disappears, he has done with us, and in ten minutes and ceased to be heard. Now was I satisfied that there there is as little trace of his existence as if he did not ex- was foul play in the wind; but Brooks still remained unist at all.

bags and fowling-pieces, the latter of which, in case of lookout, and went more deliberately forward with our danger, we took the precaution to keep charged, we met pieces cocked. with a tall, swarthy man, in the costume of a serjeant.-I would caution you against going farther. The sun will our situation. be down immediately, and the roads are not safe after nightfall." We thanked him for his civility, but neverthe- involved in profound darkness. The road, at each side, less proceeded on our way, while he took the opposite di- was lined with huge trees, whose branches, meeting overhead called after us; and on turning round to see what he and in solitude, we held our lonely way. Not the slightest wanted, he asked if we were French or English. My sound was heard, except the occasional croaking of a stray companion replied that we were English, when the man's frog, or the fluttering above us of a solitary bat. The countenance darkened: he looked at us sternly, then walked silence was dreadful, and the darkness was equal to VOL. XXVIII. JANUARY, 1836.—12.

scurity, though great, was not so strong as altogether to hide near objects: the massy foliage of the trees, the outlines of cattle, browsing upon the road-side, and the huts, which here and there loomed against the darkness, were more or less visible. We held our way through the gloom quickly, but with caution, fearful of no danger, yet keeping a look-out in case of the worst, and fully prepared to give any person who courted a hostile meeting a cordial reception in the shape of a volley of small shot.

In a few minutes, the solemn silence of the night It was in the year 18-, when the frigate to which I was broken by the sound of a horse's feet at some distance belonged was stationed off Monte Video, that the follow-behind. We paused, and a white horse flew past us, at a ing events took place. I shall state them simply, and good and round pace, bearing two men upon its back .without any attempt at embelishment, convinced that the One of them-him who rode in front-I recognized as plain facts will speak for themselves, and that they do not our old friend, the serjeant. He had exchanged his cocked hat for a foraging cap, and his long coat for a short The captain had given permission to a brother officer, jacket: but this disguise did not conceal him from our obwhom I shall denominate Brooks, and myself to enjoy a servation. We were a good deal surprised at so rapid a few day's sport on shore. Taking advantage of this leave metamorphosis; but, without taking any particular notice we furnished ourselves each with a fowling-piece and a of it, we went forward, and, in about five minutes more, game-bag, and sallied forth on our expedition, intending to came up to the horse and its riders. The animal was pass the night in the city, and to amuse ourselves in the now walking slowly, and we passed it: then, as it same way daily till the period of our leave had expired, touched by the whip or spur, it shot ahead of us again Being both good shots, and falling in with plenty of game, the swarthy rider in front apparently eyeing us steadily as he swept by.

The whole business was exceedingly strange; and I tat all.

convinced, holding to his first opinion that nothing need

While moving smartly along, under the load of our be apprehended. In case of the worst, we kept a sharp

Continuing our route for some time longer, we came up, He was strongly and, indeed, handsomely made, but his for a third time, to the white horse, which we found tied expression of countenance was peculiar and ferocious. - to a gate upon the road-side. His riders had dismounted, He had enormous black whiskers, long, sweeping mus- and gone, Heavens knows whither! We hailed them taches, and dark, penetrating, demon-looking eyes. On aloud, but received no answer. Brooks now admitted that meeting, he saluted us with a civility rather at variance we had got into a dangerous position, but we were young. with his forbidding air; and I took the opportunity of determined, and tolerably well armed. Our enemies (supasking him, in Spanish, if we were on the road to Monte posing the men to be such) were but two in number, and Video. "Gentlemen," said he, in the same language, "at it would be hard, indeed, if we could not give them a hard your present rate of travelling, you will be there in an fight for it, were they inclined to assail us. Such was the hour and a half; but, in the unsettled state of the country, reasoning with which we endeavoured to veil the perils of

We now proceeded with great cautien, and were soon in the centre, entirely covered it with dense masses of foliage, Scarcely, however, had we gone ten yards, when he and formed an umbrageous canopy, under which in silence

the silence-ebon, black, impenetrable. Obscurity pressed as I could, with the fell fiend in human shape close at my lanx by which we were encompassed. The entrance into keep more than six or seven feet in advance. Hades was not more lonely, nor even the dismal valley of the Shadow of Death. Still, we went forward, but not without anxiety, speaking in whispers, keeping close to each other, and grasping our firelocks with cold but deadly resolution.

Onward we went for about a quarter of a mile through this gloomy tract, when we arrived at a streamlet, that ran rippling and murmuring gently along the road. At this stream. We paused for a moment, to ascertain, if possible, our latitude, and were just on the point of walking through the rivulet, when, from a thicket to the left, the figure of a tall man suddenly emerged. His hand was upraised-a bright object flashed above it-and, rushing impetuously upon Brooks, he plunged the weapon into his back. " M-, look to yourself!" were the only words uttered by my unfortunate friend; and, wheeling round, he levelled his piece at the assassin. Miserable to relate !it flashed in the pan. I saw no more of this direful tragedy, for almost at the same moment, and before I could lend the slighest assistance to Brooks, a man on the opposite side of the road rushed upon my myself.

So rapid was this assault, and so totally unlooked for, that I had no time to raise the gun to my shoulder and take a proper aim. I did succeed, however, in firing it; and, by the savage yell set up by the miscreant, I knew it must have taken effect somewhere. Wounded as he was, he did not fall: he only staggered back for an instant, but recovered himself immediately, rushed forward and buried his stiletto horizontally in the fleshy part of my shoulder. Fortunately, I caught his hand as he was drawing the weapon to repeat the blow, and, closing with him, a desperate struggle ensued between us, which terminated in the wretch falling heavily upon his back in the middle of the rivulet. I fell upon him, and most fortunately got my knee upon the hand which held the accursed instrument of destruction, and thus prevented him from using it. Still he resisted desperately, nor was it till I grasped him by the throat with both hands, and nearly strangled him from a small cottage, at the door of which I knocked, and by dint of superior strength, that I could master this desby dint of superior strength, that I could master this destween the other assessin and my ill-starred friend-the rible appearance I cut-pale, bloody, wet, without hat, groans of poor Brooks, as he received stroke after and the clothes almost torn off my back—she started in stroke of the fatal dagger-his faint attempts at grappling terror, and uttering a scream, retreated, followed by me, with his Herculean antagonist-and, last of all, the deathrible-more horrible than even the fate which every in. the wall I observed four other weapons of the same kind. stant threatened to overtake myself!

my condition, with such an opponent, I nimbly sprung alarmed. aside, escaped the meditated blow, and darted off, with all upon us like a nightmare, and stifled the very principle heels. He was one of the swiftest men I ever met with, of light within the sombre atmosphere of that woody plan nor with all my best efforts could I shake him off, or

In this way we continued for fully a quarter of a mile, my pursuer rather gaining upon me than falling behind, when an accident occurred, which, at first sight, seemed to scat my doom, but which proved, in reality, the cause of my salvation. I came to a spot where there was a break or irregularity in the road, and being unprepared for such an occurrence, fell on all fours. The force of the blow, while it did not stun, was sufficient to disencumber me of point the wood on each side opened, and so much light the bag, the strap of which was either broken by the conbut away went the bag and all its contents. Most fortunately, the cause that brought me to the ground had the same effect upon my enemy; he fell flat upon his face: the shock for a few seconds stunned him, and, before he could recover himself and again give chace, I was so far in advance as to render all farther attempts on his part fruitless. I continued running till I was out of breath; then sank down upon the road-side, overcome with horror, fatigue, and the loss of blood.

> What now was to be done? To return and assist Brooks in my miscrable state, with two armed ruffians between us, must have been madness. That he was murdered I did not doubt: but, were it even possible that he might still survive, what could I, unaided, effect for his rescue? On recovering a little from the confusion into which this rapid succession of startling and terrific events had thrown me, I found that I had nearly lost the use of my left arm: the blood streamed from the wound down the coat-sleeve, literally drenching the arm in gore. What was to be done? To remain in my present position was perilous; to return, the risk was still greater. Maddened by a sense of personal danger, and perhaps by the still stronger motive of obtaining summary vengeance upon the murderers, I hurried forward towards Monte Video, which I calculated I should be able to reach in half an hour.

I had not got far on the road when, about two hundred vards to the left, I observed the glimmering of a light.-For this I instantly made, and found that it proceeded perate ruffian. During the progress of the fearful struggle, more frightful figure I never saw; and I dare say she had a I could hear the unequal conflict raging close at hand beinto the interior of the cottage. Here I found four sarattle in his throat, and the plash of his body as it tumbled vage-looking men scated round a table, drinking. One of into the shallow water of the rivulet. It was horrible, her. them had a gun between his knees, and standing against which I supposed to belong to the rest of the party, On Exhausted, I rose from the struggle; but had scarcely seeing me, they sprang abruptly upon their feet: the man got upon my feet when the assassin, who had now left who had the gun beside him laid hold of it with both Brooks, rushed towards me, and struck out with his wea. hands, and the three others made for their weapons. I had pon. Seeing the absolute usclessness of contending, in evidently startled them, and they looked irritated and

However, there was no time for many words, or much my might, in the direction of Monte Video. He followed, minute observation. I told them at once what had occurat full speed; and, encumbered as I was with the game, I red, and offered to reward them liberally if vey would found it no easy matter to keep ahead of him, although I come along with me, and lend what assistance they could may safely say that, at this time, I was one of the swiftest to my unhappy friend. They refused to move. I entreated runners in England. To remove the encumbrance would them: they only gave surly answers, and desired me to have taken time, and time to me was every thing. I was begone. I offered them any reasonable sum they might thus obliged to make the best of it, and held on as rapidly demand for their trouble—three hundred, six hundred, took me behind the cottage, into a long, narrow strip of diabolical vow into effect. garden-ground apparently stocked with kitchen vegetables. Here he desired me to wait for an instant, till he procured him surpassed even itself, and glowed with an ardour of a light. I did so; but happening by mere chance, to look ierocity which could hardly be paralleled, except in the into a back window of the cottage which opened into the bosom of a fiend. To clude the search that was immegarden, I saw the whole party, each man with his musket, diately made after him, and the punishment which would advancing steadily to the door. It instantly occurred to have followed such villany, we learned some weeks afterme that I had got into a den of murderers.

the cottage, their stealthy pace, and, ill-concealed whispers, the proper one), a half-savage tribe inhabiting the mounconfirmed my suspicions. There was not an instant to lose. I rushed down the garden, as if the legions of Sa. tan were at my heels: cleared with one desperate leap, the wicker railing which encompassed it; and flew onward, springing over the inclosure, and two more while in the field tribute to his honoured memory. immediately beyond it. Crack, crack, crack, went their pieces. I heard the balls whizzing past me: they seemed within an inch of my ears: yet, strange to say, I escaped them all. The darkness here stood me in good A Narrative of Events previous to, and at the time of, the stead. Had it been otherwise, I must have been riddled with shot from the hands of those desperately unerring

Escaped from the shot, I had yet another danger to overcome; for I heard behind me the footsteps of several persons, as in keen pursuit. For one instant I ventured to look back, and saw, in the gloom, the black forms of four individuals moving swiftly over the ground, in the the exertions I made were tremendous. I had, it is true, no bag of game to encumber me, as on the former occatique: still, my efforts were incredible. The last remnant ran with the speed of desperation.

Well did my limbs do their duty; nobly did they sus-than alive. Having taken some refreshment, and had my wounds chanced to be present, I communicated what had happened to the authorities of the town, who instantly ordered a party of solidiers to proceed to the scene of the unable, after my severe fatigues, to go on foot.

He was quite dead, his body having been pierced with four- what it may, sugar, coffee, or cocon, has allotted to him. teen desperate wounds, one of which had transfixed the the contents of my fowling-piece, was terribly lacerated, free,—that they might go and sit down softly, with food, and still bleeding. - The wretch, in truth, was in the ago- clothes, sick nurses, doctors, and medicine (an article the nies of death, writhing with pain and horror: he died in negroes lay a great stress upon,) all ready for them to take and, at last, a thousand dollars. My offers were vain: I the course of an hour after we saw him. We learned was ordered to be gone, and not give them farther trouble. from him that his associate in crime was the serjeant At this moment, I observed him who seemed to be the jahoon we originally met with. He gave us to underchief of the party nod ominously to one of his fellows, stand that this man, having lost his brother, many years who left the cottage along with me, for the purpose of before, in the attack upon Monte Video by the British showing me, as he said, the nearest cut to the public road, troops under General Auchmuty, had sworn to murder But, instead of doing this-instead of desiring me to every Englishman he could lay his hands upon: and but proceed straightforward from the door, as I had come-he too successfully, in this instance at least, did he carry his

The savage vindictiveness of the Spanish character in wards that he had left the country, and had gone among The advance of the band, as they turned the corner of the Artiglias, or Artesias (I forget which appellation is

The body of my much respected and admirable friend was removed from the spot of the murder, and conveyed to Monte Videe, where it was honorably interred, the offiwith the speed of lightning. The bloodhounds, mean. to Monte Videe, where it was honorably interred, the offi-while, were not idle: one shot was fred at me as I was cers of his vessel and all the British and other foreign running down the garden, another, as I was in the act of residents attending the funeral, and paying the last sad apprehentled insurrection of 1823, in the island of Trinidad.

From the Amu'et, for 1836.

BY C. E.

"Les vrais evenemens de la vie, sont quelquefois heancoup plus in-royable que ceux que l'imagination presente a l'esprit."—L'Abbe Preput.

No one who resided in the island of Trinidad, towards same direction as myself. To escape this new danger, the end of the year 1823, will easily, if ever, forget the awful sensations, and heart-rending alarms, of that fearful ime. The period I allude to was that previous to and at sion; but I was faint from loss of blood and previous fa- the time of the apprehended insurrection, which then threatened complete annihilation to the comparatively few of my fast-fading strength was taxed to its utmost, and I white inhabitants. For many successive years the negroes had conducted themselves so quietly, so well, and seemed so happy, that the shock of the anticipated insurrection tian me in this race of life and death. By dint of exer-came like a thunderbolt on most people; and when, at tions almost superhuman, my pursuers were beat to a length, no doubt remained even in the minds of the most stand-still. I shot ahead of them as a greyhound might sanguine, of the approaching serious event, and the attempt do before a flock of wolves, and took refuge in a wood, about to be made on the lives and properties of the whites, where I remained till the dawn, when I ventured out, the impression it produced, was of that appalling nature, and arrived by a circuitous route at Monte Video, more dead which words are almost incapable of conveying any adequate idea of.

With few exceptions, the negroes had all kind and indressed by an English surgeon, who very opportunciy dulgent masters; they had no want unsupplied, no requisite for comfort withheld, every article of food and clothing was provided for them in the most liberal manner, and it was only the idle and worthless who did not possess many rencounter. I accompanied them on horseback, being little luxuries and enjoyments, which were the fruits of the profits they gained from the culture of the grounds-Poor Brooks we found lying with his face in the rivulet, or very large garden which every negro on an estate, be it

The negroes, in all that the legislature of Great Britain heart. About six yards from him lay the assassin by were doing for them, had but one abstract idea of the whom I had been attacked: his thigh, which had received whole affair; that Massa King George had made them had no right to do so, and that they were denied their li-lalarming state of affairs, and some looked as though they

her last moments, "Oh, Liberte, que de forfaits on com- far less to dismiss from our minds thrilling apprehensions met on ton nom?" For the word liberty, to these igno- for our father's life. Every moment he was out of our rant, misguided creatures, was like an ignis fatuus, leading sight, seemed an age of soul-harrowing dreads-rendered them on to the commission of crimes hitherto unthought more painful from each of us striving to conceal our fears of, seeming as if it had awakened anew in them all those from the other; we dared not have given way to our feel savage propensities, and that unrelenting cruelty, which, if ings; it was a time when fortitude and self-command not entirely extinguished in their hearts, were at least were imperatively called for from us; and had we venturtemporarily lulled.

hasty and rash opinions, and then adhere to them with the duties we were obliged to perform both to ourselves and them, a fire of revenge was kindled in their breasts, with every exertion, it was scarcely possible to make su-

total ruin of every soul connected with them.

ent estates in our immediate neighbourhood, so very un. situation of the poorest man in Great Britain. like their usual jocose and lively habits, that, almost uncrept into our minds. We next remarked that they hardly rumours which reached us. It seemed as if a spirit of coldcult to obtain, even at the exorbitant rate they demanded the middle of October, and only awaited a favourable opfrom us. But nothing more powerfully convinced us that portunity to show its ruthless rage. son e crisis was impending, than the cessation of their dances and other amusements; for it is a common saying in were left in a state of great alarm, from the gentlemen evening dance and mirth, they are about some mischief.

was so light from the enormous number of them required with us, but now we were alone; in terror for ourselves, even in a very small establishment, we found the same dis- in fevered anxiety for them. It was a beautiful morning position. Latterly, they would do nothing for us after six when they left us; but nature spread her charms before o'clock in the evening; where they went we knew not-us in vain, and the beauty of the visible world fell with a we only knew that the kitchen, and other servants' offices, sickening sense on our aching spirits; we were absorbed were abandoned after the hour. We saw a decided sullenbut in those beloved objects. One of them had an old sunk into that ominous stillness, that perceptible lull, so out of any occurrence; and it can be better imagined than awful to those who watch its hourly progression, ignorant expressed what our feelings were, when on his riding as to whether the termination is to be life or death; which down the range where the field gang were hoeing canes, may be said to operate upon our moral nature, as in the they began to sing, the moment he passed them, the folevent of an approaching storm, physical nature betokens lowing uncouth lines :it by those indubitable signs which instinct has taught even the animal creation to guard against; when the bird flies to her nest in the thicket-the wild beast to pace up and down his lair, and all to hide themselves in safety and shelter. "Coming events cast their shadows before, the attentive surveillance, which anxiety and fear induced which for some time they continued literally yelling forth. in us, made us fully aware, that before long, there must be an open rupture.

Nor were the struggles to appear unconcerned, and as if we feared nothing, less painful than the actual terror of they were peaceable enough; towards evening, the overattack; one enjoyment we were however forced to dist user came up to assure us we had no present cause for tinue—our delightful walks in the evening; for as ladies alarm; but our hearts were too full of dread to be reaswe were in everlasting dread, when we walked alone, lest we should meet any suspicious-looking negro, who made as tremble lest he might be a disguised spy of the irritated or leave as suited their volatile fancies. They imagined that their masters were keeping them employed when they estate we lived upon, remained silent, as regarded the would, if they dared, assure us of their fidelity. Still it Truly did the unfortunate Madame Roland exclaim, in was utterly impossible for us not to feel the utmost alarm, ed to express the hundredth part of what we felt, it would Negroes, in common with most uneducated people, form have been impossible for us to continue the daily routine of greatest tenacity; therefore, when these poor infatuated others. Every day was but an aggravated repetition of beings became convinced in their own minds that their the previous one; the negroes increasing in their dogged proprietors were illegally withholding their freedom from moroseness, and unmoved in their laziness, so that at last, which, had it not been fortunately smothered ere it burst gar,—danger gathering in darker folds around us—while forth into the wild flames of rebellion, must have been the those whose presence would have been a comfort and protection to us were called away by other duties. Every time It was about the beginning of September that there was they went out, our fears rose lest they should never return observed a silence and reserve in the negroes of the differ. to us alive; and during that time we all envied the secure

Terrifying as were the realities of our situation, they known to ourselves, apprehensions of approaching danger, were increased almost daily from the various reports and ever brought us any thing to sell, and that what we might blooded massacre was hovering above and around us. The require from them, in the way of Indian corn for poultry, smothered animosity of the negroes to their kind and often vegetables, fruit, or fowls, was unwillingly given, and diffi-

In the latter end of October, the ladies of our family the West Indies, that when negroes refrain from their being called into Port-of-Spain on business. During the days they were away, we suffered much from absolute Gradually, too, we perceived a manifest unwillingness terror. Even the time when we looked hourly for insurin them to work; and in our house-servants, whose labour rection was not so agonizing as this; for then they were ness-a dark brooding, which, to us, who understood the grey horse, called Brigadier, on which he was riding that negro character, angured ill for the future, and, at last, all morning. Negroes are extremely ready in making a song

" Massa ride da old grey horse, Brigadier, Brigadier, oh, ho! oh, ho! Neger hope Massa go broke he neck, Before he go a Port a 'Pain.'' (Port-of-Spain.)

It was like most of their songs, more a kind of chorus than any thing else, but, rude as it was, God knows it sounded like a death-knell in our ears. During that day, sured by any one. In the absence of the gentlemen we agreed to sleep all in the same room. We usually had a young negro girl to sleep in the house, in case of any thing being required; and that evening she lay down, as in common, on her mattrass on the floor of an outer room, as in as possible to alarm us, but we could perceive they thought the West Indies, there are no servants' rooms attached to things fully as bad in the town as in the country. They the houses. As soon as she thought we were fast asleep, had not returned an hour, when all the runaways came up she got, opened the door, and let in several men. In a back to their duties, though they were far from performing moment we heard the murmur of voices in the hall, which them either well or willingly. was only separated from the bed-room we were in by thin At last, just one day before the expected crisis, his exstealthily out of the house.

The relief we felt when they left the house is quite be- others, infuriated almost to madness. yond my description; I can only imagine our feelings like night's Bacchanalian orgies, we rose.

On going into the dining-room the first thing that met man on the estate. our eyes was a liquor-case, made of tulip-wood, wrenched to clean the house, and prepare breakfast, and after wait- that night-therefore it may be imagined what was the one came. We then went to the kitchen-the cook was them were in the midst of danger; who watched the slowly not there—no fire lit—neither door or windows opened, passing hours of that awful night, and as they marked the but, fortunately, the key in the former. We next tried last red glow of the sun fade away on the clear horizon, the boy's pantry, it was, if possible, a confusion worse knew not if another sun was to rise upon them. Many of confounded;"-the door open, the debris of the yesterday's them had heard the insurrection hinted at, as daily prodinner, the knives, silver spoons, glasses, jugs, plates, and gressing; some doubtless had seen the change of disposidishes, all scattered indiscriminately on the earthen floor, tion among the negroes, but still with the confiding hoping At length, it became obvious that they all had run away; nature of woman, they never thought to have witnessed and on our return to the house we found S—— had followed their example. At another time, we might have sense of coming evil, they had endeavoured to soar beyond laughed at this, but all merriment was quenched. During the fearfully impressing atmosphere of their own senses. that day and night, none of them returned to us. We But now alas! all the horrors and dread of death and got dinner and tea for ourselves the best way we could, danger were around them; and bitterly did they taste of but towards evening we began to fear a repetition of last the agonizing fears and anxieties, so harrowing to the night's scene. The overseer paid us a visit; and on hear- hearts of women. ing how all the servants had deserted us, agreed with us One lady, whom we had some acquaintance with, as that it would be useless to attempt any punishment when their estate was adjoining ours, was left in a dreadful situthey returned, as now they only did what pleased them ation. Her husband was forced to leave her to join the hailed the morning light with a degree of transport, none eight years old. She afterwards told us, that from sunset can fancy, except those who have been placed under simi- to sunrise, she kept walking up and down the room, her lar circumstances. In the afternoon we had the delight of mind filled with two thoughts, her husband's and chil.

boards, through the crevices of which we could distinguish cellency, the governor (then Sir Ralph Woodford) got in-(for they had a candle) three of the very worst negroes. formation of the insurrection being expected to take place We all knew we had no earthly resource but to remain as on the following day, Sunday, the second of November, still as death; we did not venture even to whisper, fearful immediate and prompt measures were instantly taken for that if they thought us awake, they might murder us. the suppression of the revolt; or in the event of that being We soon heard the clatter of glasses and decanters; and found impossible, that the inhabitants might at least be then, as the drink began to operate, the voices got louder prepared for, and protected in any disturbance, as far as and louder, songs began among them, and ended in the was possible. Orders were issued for the assembling of strange, fearful howl of savages, that sunk into our very all the militia; and on their coming to St. Ann's (the hearts. Hours are very early in the West Indies, and we government house,) to receive directions, parties of them had retired to bed,-though Heaven knows, not to rest, were desired to patrol the different roads leading out of about nine o'clock; let any female of a nervous, gentle town. But in the country no such protection could be mind, imagine what our sufferings were through that granted; those who were on distant estates, were forced dreary night of unexampled terror, which seemed as if to resign themselves to whatever might happen; for had a day would never break. About half-past four we heard serious revolt taken place on any estate, resistance would them rise from the deep slumber into which the potations have been out of the question. Even supposing a few of they had swallowed threw them, and one by one slip the good negroes had sided with their master, they would have been as mere cyphers against perhaps hundreds of

In this season of alarm, none were more to be comthose of a person suddenly saved from immediate death. miserated than the ladies, deprived of their husbands (all We at once determined to take no notice of it, as it could of whom were obliged to join their respective regiments in only serve to exasperate them still more. S- the young the militia,) at the hour of greatest danger, they were left negro girl, got up, opened the shutters, cleared away the defenceless-often alone, among the very people they knew glasses and buttles: and when we thought we had given were attempting their lives. As every white man was inher time enough to have removed all relics of the last cluded in the general muster, the wives and daughters of the planters, were in many cases left without a single white

It was on the first of November, that open preparations open, the lid broken; four case bottles, each holding more were made in prospective view to the insurrection, which than two quarts of spirits, empty; and all the other things, we had every reason to fear, would break forth on the which were in one division, scattered and mixed together morrow: if indeed we were destined to see another day, in such a mélange of confusion that they were entirely as there was much apprehension that they might make choice of the night to rise in. It has been already men-At last we began to wonder none of the servants came tioned, that the militia were ordered to be under arms, all ing a long time, we called them-rung for them, but no state of mind of the females, who knew those dearest to militia; and there she was, on an estate nearly ten miles That night was a tranquil one, but we could not sleep; from Port of Spain; alone, utterly unprotected, with her every noise of the slightest description startled us; and we five children; the eldest of whom, was little more than seeing the gentlemen return safe to us. They said as little dren's safety. "That night," said the unfortunate lady to rushed into my mind."

Another lady, whose husband was likewise obliged to or fear she might be in. leave her destitute of any protection, sat up all that fearful effect on them, that they were both ill; and one died in another day. consequence of it. Therefore she too was left alone. The time, they let all the horses and mules out of the pens, or distant negro houses, their general accompaniment to stables; and then came up and told her, "dat all da horses dancing; the stillness and silence was so perfect, so unand da mules ran away in da bush, and dey no know where interrupted, that we trembled for what it portended. for find dem."

knowing the loss it would be to her husband, if the whole horses and mules of the estate escaped to the woods and savannahs, she looked at her informants, and calmly said, "Very well, you go out and look for them immediately, they cannot be far away yet." In a short time they reand look for them; and do not attempt to come back without them, for you know very well where they are." At two in the morning they brought them all back safe; this of us stirred across the threshold of the door; we sat in is only one instance of the various ways in which they mute terror, sometimes half dozing after our night's tried to vex and annoy their proprietors.

who held a very high official situation, and who had hith. no disturbance of the least description among our necrto been deservedly beloved by every one, found himself groes. Generally speaking they were a remarkably so insecure in town, that he came out to take refuge with good gang; most of them were sincerely attached to us; us, at the earnest request of his wife and family. It gave and there were only two or three whose influence, we us a double shock; and proved to us the excited state of feared, might operate on the rest. During the forenoon. the negroes, when we found that one so endeared to all many of the good negroes, who had behaved with great who knew him, for his bland, mild, and conciliating man-fidelity, came up to see us; thinking, I suppose, that ners, should be forced to such an expedient.

At this period we owed much, and felt very grateful ussure us. to Sir Ralph Woodford, who, in consideration of one of the gentlemen of our family being a very old soldier, had gentleman who seemed to feel a good deal of apprehenthe kindness to permit him to remain with us. During sion, lest the fearfully excited state of the negroes on the night of the first of November, he and our friend sat some estates might influence those on other plantations up with their loaded guns before them. Any thing in the who were inclined to behave well, to follow their example, way of defending or barricading the house, was impossi. He had been up all night, patrolling the roads; and told ble; as in the West Indies, the dwelling houses are of us, that, in passing the bottom of the avenue of an estate such slight materials, that the least strength a man chose near St. Joseph's, which was a short distance from us, to exert would burst open any door. Windows, we had in the moonlight, he saw the driver sharpening his cutlass none; for the only way of admitting light into our rooms on the grindstone. He said to him, "Andrew, what are was through apertures cut in the walls (which are but you sharpening your cutlass for at this time on a Saturcommon boards nailed together), and shutters fitted in, day night?" The negro gave him an horrific scowl, and which open by means of hinges at the top, and a kind of then, with a fiend-like laugh, said carelessly "For cut my wooden lever to raise them from the bottom. Even if Misses' trout (throat) to-morrow morning." we had been able to fortify our house in any way, it is That night was but a repetition of the preceding; and probable, if the negroes had attacked it and found we we had many anxieties lest, on the following morning had used means of desence, that they would unhesitatingly (Monday the 3d), when they were summoned to their have set fire to it.

and motionless, the ready-primed fire-arms on the table; day morning, a young friend came out to see us. He while sometimes in the midst of the interchange of a brought intelligence from those of our family in town us, "I shall never, never forget; it was passed in one un. whisper, we would stop suddenly short, if we heard the ceasing prayer, that my husband might be saved, and my least noise. We scarcely dared to look at each other; children unburt. From night till morning, I never sat the same dreads and fearful forebodings were absorbing down: it was the only relief to agitated nature, to keep in us all; for, united to the sensations no one could repress constant motion; and as I now and then looked on my at such a moment, we had the recollection that our fasleeping children, the thought, have they still a father? mily was divided; one member of it was then residing in Port-of-Spain, and we knew not what state of danger

At last day dawned; and surely never did any feel the night, holding her little boy, an infant of three years old, bliss of "God's fair light" more than we did, when we in her arms. On their estate they had two white men, saw it gleaming through the crevices of the house; at besides an overseer, but they were all ordered to join the length when we cautiously opened the door, and looked militis. These white men were labourers who had very on the sun shining in all this tropical glory, and flinging lately come out; and the exertion of riding about both day his rays on the green savannahs and tree-crowned bills, and night, during these three days of horror, took such an we did indeed thank God that we were spared to light of

Throughout the night all had been quiet-more than negroes on the estate, were not much to be depended on; usually so—for there had been no dance; and we almost and by way of annoying their kind mistress at such a missed the deep bonning of the negro drum from the

This lady was gifted with a singularly firm mind, and, from town with a packet of cake; this was only a ruse on About ten o'clock in the morning, a messenger arrived the part of a friend in town, to be able to send us a note with more security. It informed us, that they were all safe, but had been terribly alarmed during the night; for, joined to all the sad realities, the negro women were turned, saying, "Misses, dey no dere at all, all gone away their fertile and terrified imagination, doubtless added not continually coming in, bringing fearful reports, to which a little exaggeration.

All that day was one of overpowering suspense; none vigils, and then starting from our troubled sleep, like Towards the evening of the first of November, a friend one who wakes after a terrific dream. Still there was their peaceably paying us a visit, would contribute to re-

ol

ing

in fou

na

In the early part of the forenoon, we had a visit from a labour, it might produce an outbreak. But, on the bell The events of that night left an impression on our ringing, they went to work, neither willingly nor good-minds, that we can never forget. There we sat, still temperedly, but without resistance. Early on the Mon-

a complete panic on the Sunday.

about church time, the negroes began to assemble in large is they would have said, "We defy you all." They re- out as far as the Tacaragua river. mained there during the whole day; firm in their dogged sullenness; but in that state of half-smothered rage and proved that the plot had been a deep and long-laid one; disappointment, that had the smallest offence been offered and that although none but negroes appeared ostensibly to one of them, the event would have been instant and in the matter, there must have been some people of indiscriminating bloodshed.

What materially contributed to render the negroes insolent and overbearing, was the knowledge they had been made. that no ammunition, of any kind or description, was allowed to the militia; their bayonets being the only though the negroes went to work quietly, much of the defence government permitted them-a strange order to be reserve and constraint which had at first attracted our issued at such a time; and, especially, when the mutinous attention, remained; and it was a long time before our negroes had not been ill-used by their masters, was, that destruction. During all this period, it is only truth to as soon as the militia were called upon by Sir Ralph say, that the women were the most unruly and unmanage-Woodford, all the coloured people, and all the negro able; frequently running away, or, at other times, doing soldiers belonging to the black disbanded regiments (of their work very determinedly ill, using saucy language, offered to join the militia.

things had been in; for, though we were in the midst of far that we felt no present alarm; but, then, in the it, we knew little beyond what was passing on the estate uneducated state of the negroes, in whom so much of There was no doubt left in the mind of any body, that savage life remains, and which is so readily called into the insurrection at Demerara had tempted the Negroes action, we could never depend on them for any thing like in Trinidad to a similar attempt. And it was certain steadiness. The children of impulse, they act merely that others than negroes had been concerned in it,-the from its dictates, without the least reference either to plot was too well-organized, every thing was too cleverly the past, or future. We were sorry-nay, grieved and managed, to have been the mere suggestions, and hastily mortified-to find, that although civil to us, that was dezvous of the rebellious, and where all the preparations have no longer any feelings in common to both of for hostility were carried on, in fact the head-quarters us!" It was a sad, a depressing change, especially to of the whole, was Naparium, a small sea-port on the those bent on doing good; and whose efforts to win them coast, about thirty miles from Port-of-Spain. What from the ways of savages to gradual civilization had met proved it, without a shadow of doubt, was, that many of with as much success as could reasonably have been the uniforms of the insurgents (which had been procured expected. how or when no one knew) were dug up there. They were made of coarse grey cloth, with bright green facings, tracting events, that a very shrewd and intelligent negro the attempt at insurrection was.

morning of the 2nd of November every road leading out of Port of Spain was found strewed thickly and regularly and, finding his situation very uncomfortable, he wished soith colonial money. The coins were not laid down, as to be sold off the estate. As such a request is never reif by accident, here and there; nor were they laid spar- used, his wish was immediately complied with, and he ingly; on the contrary, they were strewn thickly, and in a regular track. On examination they were all facture; but to negroes, who scarcely know brass from island where so strict a surveillance was maintained evening when we were talking about it, and asking him over every thing; and, moreover, how that money could if he suspected it before it was generally expected! He that they were quite well and safe, though there had been have been spread on the roads in the systematic way it was (for it was literally spread, it was in such profusion). From him we learnt, that, on the Sunday morning, unobserved by all the militia under arms that night: no one man could have done it; both from the weight of the groups and bodies in the Square, and different public money, and the great distances it was found from town. places. They committed no outrage attempted no vio- All the way as far as St. Joseph's seven miles from town. lence but stood with their arms folded, and in carnest the road was cevered with it; and it was said (although converse, eyeing the militia with that insolent cooleess as it is not vouched for as a certainty) that pieces were found

> The circumstances of the money and the uniforms superior and deeply calculating minds prompting and in secret inciting them, by whom all these arrangements had

For many days a good deal of alarm prevailed; for, negroes were well provided with ammunition of every kind. Seelings of security returned. We were always in dread One circumstance which proved that the bulk of the of son e fresh outbreak, and of their rushing on to our which there were many), immediately and voluntarily and abuse of a kind that baffles all description.

By degrees, however, the excitement and angry feel-By degrees we began to learn more of the actual state ings against their masters imperceptibly died away, in so digested plans, of comparative savages. There was a all. They no longer would listen to any advice, how-method and arrangement of no ordinary mind displayed ever gently given, or kindly meant. We lamented, also, in all the concealments, and long-sustained lull. The disturbances were first traced to an estate in the faindly links, which had previously existed between the quarter of Diego Martin; the negroes on which did not masters and the negroes were, if not broken, greatly generally bear a good character; but the principal ren-weakened. It seemed as if they could have said, "We

It was about three or four months after these dis-This showed how determined, and how well-prepared, man came on the estate. He had belonged to the one in Diego Martin Valley, were the negroes had been found Another very remarkable occurence was, that, on the much implicated in the insurrection. It was, though perhaps unjustly, thought that he had been concerned in it;

was placed upon the estate where we lived.

All we ever saw of him impressed us with the idea that found to be false, and looked like Birmingham manu-he was far too sensible a man to have joined in such a plan; his conduct was always extremely correct and regold, or tin from silver, they of course would appear spectful. When we got a little acquainted with him, we as valuable as sterling gold. What surprized every ventured to ask him a few questions about the affair, one was, how that quantity of base money could have He seemed shocked at the idea of being suspected of been landed, unknown to any of the authorities, in an aiding in it, and indignantly repelled the charge. One said, for some lettle time he had; "for, oh, Misses," con-littled with fears for the lives of some beloved beings—tinued he, "me sure dat dey going to do someting very where they may enjoy, what see could not then, peaceful bad, when dey kill a cock." "Kill a cock." "we ex-" dreams and slumbers light." claimed. "Yes, Misses," said he, "dey kill one cock, and put de blood on de drum head, and den dey beat de this happy season, all the exhibitation and gladness of drum, and shout very bad; and when me see dat, me spirit which in future years may enable them to look back know for sure dat dey do someting bad too much."

Probably, this was some African custom, betokening war or rebellion, the meaning of which he was acquainted with. Christmas of 1823.

At last, we had the satisfaction of seeing our people return to their gay, joyous dances, under the trees, in the bright moonlight. The white inhabitants became reasbright moonlight. quently, the tone of manners was taken.

uprightness, and mildness

nized terror, we had now fully participated in; and to Elliott by himself. I did not go out. Sir Robert and Rosuch a height as rendered it impossible for us ever to gers took the right path, and saw the brute in a thick crase it from our memories. Even at this distance of thorny jungle at about nine yards' distance. Sir Robert time, the 2nd of November never comes round without all turned round to Rogers, and asked, in a whisper, if he the awful sensations, and dreary remembrances of that should fire. At that moment the brute rushed out in the terrible time, rising up vividly in our minds.

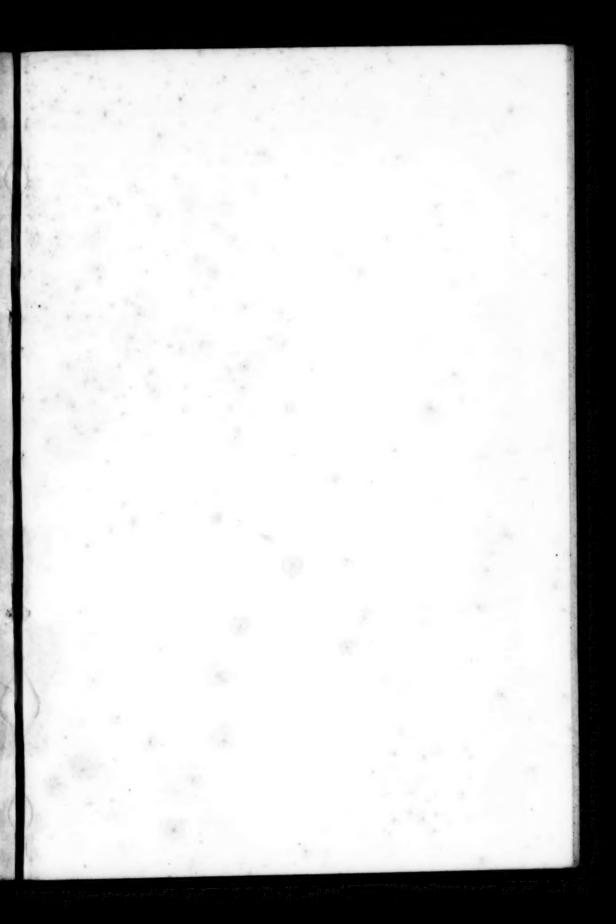

gotten; from the way in which these horrors surrounded four yards of him, received the contents of Sir Robert's us, entering into our homes and hearts-creating in us an rifle (seven to the pound) in his forehead. Rogers fired incessant gloomy anticipation of the future. The Christ-both barrels almost at the same instant, but only succeeded mas that followed the intended insurrection was of a less in turning him; and leaving him with a slight headsch happy nature, both to master and negro, than any we We had the Nedahs there, armed with their bows and arever witnessed either before or since; and well do we re- rows. They are more like monkeys than men, and are member, when we sat all together, on the Christmas night dressed au naturel. They were horribly frightened when of 1823, and listened to the occasional sound of the I approached them on my gray horse, as they had never drum, as it echoed from the negro houses through the seen one before. Their dance was very curious per-train of feelings and associations that have been called if by magic, with their limbs quivering, as if in the last up, even by the detail of these scenes; the perusal of agony. We had archery for prizes, and remarkably good which, if containing little of interest, may at least bring practice the Chingalese made of it; much better then the to the hearts of our fair countrywomen during this season Nadahs, but the latter excel at a running shot, and, I am of social family intercourse, the conviction of how emi- told, bring down their deer very often. nently blessed they are in dwelling in a land of peace and tremely healthy, and we are as gay as possible. The pear on it as a verdant spot in the waste of life; and may none of them ever feel the like fears and dreads we endured the

CEYLON.

The following is an extract of a letter from Ceylon, dated sured, and for the time, danger was past. Social meet. May 4, 1835 :- Since I last wrote to you we paid our ings of a few families re-commenced in the country; and, long-promised visit to Alipoot, and were delighted with in town, the evening conversaziones of so truly delightful our trip. We remained four clear days there, and had a kind in Port-of-Spain were renewed. There were assplendid sport. Our party consisted of Sir R. W. Horton, sembled some literary men; ladies, whose graces, and accomplishments would have done credit to our British meand myself. The first day 11 elephants were bagged, the tropolis, although a few of them had never even been out second 9, the third 8, and the fourth 4, and one young one of the island; while in this society was found that easy taken alive, besides one shot the first day by a nigger. Of reunion of talent and ability which reflected honour on the above, Rogers shot 16, Elliott 6, Kelson 5, Mann 4, those then at the head of society, and from whom, conse- and his Excellency 3. I was the only one who could not claim a tail. I never saw such a splendid country-dif-With this last remark, we may well allude to His Ex- ferent from any thing I had ever seen in Ceylon, and quite cellency Sir Ralph Woodford, and the late Chief Judge, like an English park on an immense scale. If we saw the Honourable Ashton Warner; both of whom were one elephant, we saw, on a low calculation, 200, but Roendowed with singularly culivated and refined minds. A gers says 500. We had four different breakfast bungavery few years after these events, the island had the misfortune to be deprived of the services of these truly were out each day at daylight, and hunted and shot our estimable men; first, by the death of Sir Ralph Woodford, way to one of the breakfast places, attended by an army which took place on board of ship, in his voyage home of bowmen. The numbers of spotted deer were quite infor the recovery of his health in 1828; and, lastly, in that credible-I could have no conception of it. We had faof the Chief Judge, who expired in 1830, leaving behind mous galloping after them with greyhounds. Rogers and him a character distinguished for unvarying benevolence, myself rode down six, including two bucks, in one hour and a half. His Excellency had a narrow escape with his So passed this fearful period of dread and exhausting life, being furiously charged by a rogue elephant, near a snxiety; but not with it passed away the remembrance of place called Dahagony. There had been a Moor man all we, in common with others, endured both before and killed, a day or two before our arrival, by an elephant, at after that season of alarm-when we felt, by the expe- the village of Kattaboowa, and the people requested Rogers rience of every hour, how immeasurably wide is the dif- to go out and shoot him, as the beast was quite close to ference between mere rumours of danger and the absolute the bungalow. Accordingly out sailed Sir Robert and presence of it. This, in all the racking varieties of ago-Rogers in one direction, Mann and Kelson in another, and most furious way you can imagine, bearing everything be-Such circumstances are of a nature not easily to be for- fore him, right down on his Excellency; and when within pasture and distant hill, that we felt not a little anxiety as feetly savage. They tossed and rolled themselves about to whether it was the signal of mirth or murder. Perhaps there are few, who can readily conceive the all of a sudden, every one of them were on their backs, as security; in a land where they may gather round their fishery has enriched the treasury to the amount of 40,0001," happy Christmas firesides; without one ache in a heart — Times Newspaper.

AUTHOR OF THE POLITICAL REGISTER.

Prom the Quartedy Roview. Dr. Mayen's Voyaus nound the World.—Reise um die Erde, ausgeführt auf dem koniglich Preusaischen See-kandlungs-Schiffe Prinzess Louise, commandirt von Capitain W. Wendt, in den Jahren 1830, 1831, und 1832. Von Dr. F. J. F. Meyen. 2 vols. 4to. Berlin. 1834.

WE quite agree with Boswell, that 'one is carried away e general, grand, and indistinct notion of a voyage round the world. Let Johnson talk as he will, there is a misty vastness about such enterprises, a sense of the marvellous and dangerous inextricably mixed up with them, that delights and expands the mind, even though, particularly since the recent multiplication of circumnavigators, we may not be well able to justify our impressions to ourselves by any rational hope of fresh and really valuable discovery. But a voyage round the world by a Gerbefore us; which is the work of a scientific gentleman, of from which it clearly and satisfactorily appears that the competent intelligence, commissioned to accompany a yearly imports are 32 4.5 millions of pounds; and the ex-Prussian expedition in the double capacity of surgeon and ports and home consumption-324 millions!! naturalist.

'Twice already' (says he in his Preface) 'had the royal Prussian flag circumnavigated the globe, before I had the happiness to be attached to a trading expedi-tion, undertaken, chiefly with a view to South America and China, by orders of the Royal Merchant-Marine. The splendid ship which was destined for this adventure has the honour to bear the august name of Princess Louisa, having been christened after her Royal Highhess the youngest daughter of his Majesty our King, by marriage the Princess Frederick of the Netherlands. Once already had this ship successfully circumnavigated the earth, and wherever we touched she was received as a familiar guest.

The politeness with which this gentleman speaks of the ship which had the honour to bear the august name of experience in proof of this doctrine, and the practice con-a Prussian princess, &c., bears no very distant analogy to that of the Frenchman (mentioned by Miss Edgeworth) apparent experience of mariners, and recommend pure who talks of the earthquake that had the honour to be noticed by the Royal Society:' but it is only on very rare occasions that Dr. Meyen indulges in this style.

'Although' (he continues) ' the object of our expedi-tion was quite different from that of voyages of scientific discovery, still, through the gracious favour of his Majesty the King, many opportunities have been afford-ed me of visiting places which had remained more or less unknown to the scientific public; I therefore consider it a duty to communicate a detailed report. I have divided my materials into a personal narrative and a scientific department; the former occupies the two volumes which I now publish: the other will appear hereafter.'

He begins with his departure from Berlin: the following are his reflections on that occasion

'On July the 28th, 1830, at nine o'clock in the even-ing, we left Berlin, attended by the good wishes of relations, friends, and acquaintances. It is not easy to sketch the leave-taking on beginning a journey of such extent as we contemplated. The hope of seeing the paradisiacal regions of the world—of mounting the heaven-aspiring Cordilleras, with their mighty sum-mits and volcanoes—of seeing the natives of the South Sea in their state of nature—of visiting the farstretch-Princess Louiss came off Dover, which with a fair wind VOL. XXVIII. FEBRUARY, 1836 .- 13

ing country of the Chinese, rich in singularities of all kinds; all these are thoughts which so vividly engage the heated fancy of a young man who has devoted himself to the study of nature, that it is not until the moment of departure, not until the hour of leave-taking, that he becomes sensible of the difficulty of separating himself from the circle of ordinary resort, of tearing himself away from all with which he is connected by the ties of blood of friendship and of tenderness. of blood, of friendship, and of tenderness. In such of blood, of friendship, and of tenderness. In such moments, forebodings arise in the soul of man, from which he cannot guard himself. We quitted home, and, by an unlucky accident, received no letters during the whole period of the voyage; and what revolutions, what national calamities, had been in the interval en-dangering the peace of Europe!

Notwithwithstanding our traveller's vivid expectations from the New World, he devotes several pages to objects, man differs materially from a voyage round the world by now familiar to most of us, in the Old; as the badness of an Englishman: they see with different eyes, and refer to the road between Berlin and Hamburgh—the beauty different standards of comparison, so that the same objects (which he greatly exaggerates) of the suburban villas on which have begun to grow wearisome in the descriptions the banks of the Elbe-and the attachment (which he of our own countrymen, may strike again with all the in- unduly depreciates) of the citizens of Hamburgh to the terest of novelty when placed in the point of view taken official costume, wigs, lace-collars, and so forth, of their by a foreigner. The truth of this observation will appear forefathers. He has also inserted a tabular view of the from the passages we are about to quote from the book coffee trade of Hamburgh and Altona, from 1815 to 1829;

At the mouth of the Elbe, off Cuxhaven, they stop totake in water; a highly important ceremony, upon which Dr. Meyen avails himself of the opportunity to expatiate:-

Although every one who has been long at a time on shipboard knows the value of good water, it must not-withstanding be observed, that messieurs the captains, in taking in water, set to work with singularly little care. The health of the whole crew, on an expedition of this extent, is dependent on the quality of the pro-visions and water; if these be good, the people can re-sist even the worst climate for a much longer period than otherwise. In the ports of North Germany, however, there prevails a prejudice, that pure spring water keeps good, on sea voyages, a much shorter time than river water; the captains constantly adduce their own spring water as preferable: the truth is, that only for convenience' sake, have mariners adopted the rule of taking the water which lies nearest at hand : in other words, they are reluctant to sacrifice a single hour to words, they are reluctant to sacrince a single nour to such objects, although a great and salutary enjoyment might be thereby preserved for the whole crew, during the melancholy time they are to pass in open sea. At some places, particularly in tropical countries, we were compelled during our voyage to take in spring water, and it was precisely this which kept the best and longest. But it is hard to cure seamen of their prejudices; no-where do ingrained habits hold out longer than amongst them. On the many plans which have been recommended to them for preserving and purifying the water, in case of necessity, they bestow no attention what-ever; nay, these remain absolutely unknown to the greater part of the very class for whose benefit they have been suggested. The keeping of water in iron casks has long been practised in the English navy, and is proved to be highly advantageous; to all appearance, however, there is not, at the present moment, a single ship in the whole German marine that makes use of iron water-casks.

particularly attracted to the extraordinary phenomena presented by the shooting-stars of the south; which, according to Humboldt, often drag after them a tail of twelve or fifteen seconds in length. Dr. Meyen says, that as he was once riding at the foot of the Cordilleras, a common shooting-star fell so deep, that it remained for some time visible between him and the shade of the mountains.

Soon after leaving the Canaries they began to fall in with large masses of the weeds which so much surprised and confounded Columbus and his crew. Our author says that he has examined many thousands of them, and is convinced that Alexander von Humboldt errs in supposing them to be plants originally growing at the bottom of the sea, and detached by fish or the motion of the waves. They have evidently unfolded their young buds swimming, and thrown out roots and leaves, but both of the the shark much as Lord John Russell leads the present same quality, in all directions.'

Amongst a host of other strange animals, they here also began to meet with some of those species of Physalia, the pungent influence of whose touch was alluded to in our late article on Bennett's Wanderings. But the German has an anecdote on this head, even more remarkable than any of our countryman's :-

'How dangerous this singular animal can become to men may be learnt from an incident which our friend Captain Wendt related to us. It was during the first voyage of the Princess Louisa round the world that in neighbourhood of the equator a particularly large and beautiful sea blister passed the ship; a young sailor, of distinguished courage and great hardihood, sprang naked into the sea to catch the animal; he drew near to and seized it, when instantly the creature grasped the naked body of the swimmer with its three-feet-long suckers. The young man, extremely frightened, pro-bably also feeling at the same time the burning pain animal was torn from him and his skin rubbed ciean, but the pain and cutaneous inflammation became so violent, that a fever, accompanied by delirium, followhad belonged, had been recently enught; for want of a better occupation, therefore, it acted as guide to the ship tion; the lofty mountains which glance out in the back-ground of the town and are still hovered with their a future opportunity to describe.' We turn at once to the habits of this fish, and that here again our German gives range—all these things combined make this scene under us more distinct details than we had been able to gather a tropical sky one of the most beautiful in the world." from Mr. Bennett:

'The pilot swims constantly in front of the shark; we ourselves have seen three instances in which the we disserves have seen three instances in which the sea-angel [query, we visited in company, in order to witness with our devil?] neared the ship, the pilot swam close to the own eyes this traffic so disgraceful to humanity. We snout or near one of the breast-fins of the animal; sometimes he darted rapidly forwards or sidewards as if look-their shops; they were quite naked down to the middle, ing for something, and constantly went back again to which was girt with a small piece of cloth; the hair of might easily have been reached in two; and they after the shark: When we threw overboard a piece of bacon wards met with considerable delay and danger in beating fastened on a great hook, the shark was about twenty down the Channel. Their first point of destination on paces from the ship. With the quickness of lightning the leaving it was the Canary Isles, where their attention was pilot came up, smelt at the dainty, and instantly swam back again to the shark, swimming many times round his snout and splashing, as if giving him exact infor-mation as to the bacon. The shark now began to put himself in motion, the pilot showing him the way, and in a moment he was fast upon the hook. Once we watched a pilot for many days who kept constantly swimming close before the keel of the ship. The sailors say, as of a thing well known and familiar, that such a fish so situated has lost his shark, and is seeking another. Upon a later occasion, we observed two pilots in sedu-lous attendance on a blue shark, which we caught in the Chinese Sea. It seems probable that the pilot feeds on the shark's excrement, keeps his company for that purpose, and directs his operations solely from this selfish view.

> From what is here said, it seems that the pilot-fish leads Opposition-upon similar principles, with similar expectations, and, we hope and trust, with a similar result.

> Neither must we omit to mention the sailing-fish, of which Dr. Meyen records a peculiarity which has escaped Mr. Bennett, and which we do not remember to have seen recorded elsewhere. He says that this fish can protrude its mouth in the form of a cylinder, draw it back again, and change it into an clongated shape. On approaching the Brazils, they discover the Abrolhosbank by the thermometer, although, half an hour after the first change in the temperature of the water was remarked, a line of 390 feet was thrown, and no bottom found. They anchor in the bay of Rio Janeiro, and watch impatiently for an oppor-

'During the night a little breeze sprung up, by aid of which the ship was brought farther into the bay, within full view of the town. We thought the night would never end-we could hardly make up our minds to wait over his whole body, cried for help, and was only just for morning to revel in the aspect of this favoured able to reach the side of the ship, to be drawn up. The spot. The day appeared at last, but the whole coast was covered with the thickest mists: only the summits of the highest mountains emerged, and, with their dark low- green, were illumined by the rising sun; by degrees The the veil of mist began to rise more and more, and one ed, and doubts were entertained of his recovery. The young man, saved for once, did not evade his destiny; grown too bold from hardihood, he afterwards fell from the mast, and found a wretched death.' covered with the most beautiful vegetation; in the middle, little hilly islands rise out of the dark-green water, Dolphins, too, gambolled round the ship, flying-fish on whose heights stand proud palm trees; and more skimmed across it, and our acquaintance the pilot-fish kept than a league in breadth stretches the fair city of Rio, swimming directly before the keel, 'apparently attending on the south bankof the bay. The innumerable churches to show us the way, (says Dr. Meyen,) just as it is wont of the town with their towers; the magnificent conto wait upon the shark. Probably the shark, to which it vents, which are built upon the points of the nearest mountains, and with their white colours stand out to a future opportunity to describe.' We turn at once to the primæval woods, and the mountains on the west of the passage in which this promise is fulfilled, the rather that bay, which are known under the name of the Orange we believe naturalists are still in doubt as to the peculiar and Star mountains, and lift them terrace-like in their

> In Rio itself the slave-trade presents one of the most striking and startling sights to the traveller:-

> 'The bazaar of the slave-dealers was the first place

Nay, maidens were there who had been seared with the themselves possess cows. cruel brand upon the breast! In consequence of the dirt in which they are obliged to live on board the slaveflour, the poor creatures acquire a most lamentable appearance. Their skin is marked by scorbutic disease, which first appearing in the shape of a small breakingout, spreads more and more, and forms small ulcers. which soon eat into the surrounding flesh. Through hunger and misery the dark colour of their skin has lost its fullness and gloss; the white spot-like eruptions, the ulcers, the shaven head, with the dull gaping look, really convert them into beings whom, after the first impression, we would not willingly suppose to have been born of the same race with ourselves. When sold, the negroes are examined just as we examine animals. To prevent them from having a lazy down-cast look, it is customary to give them stimulating things to eat, as capsicum, ginger, even tobacco; or they are compelled to be lively on the instant by boxes on the ears, kicks in the ribs, and ill-treatment of every kind. The owner of one of these slave-shops advances to meet a stranger with extraordinary friendliness, offers him his hand, and assures him of the goodness of his wares. He forthwith compels some of the unfortunates to stand up, and, stick in hand, makes them show off their agility. But if these disgusting man-merchants see that you are only visiting their dens from curiosity, they become coarsely insolent; they begin to tail against foreigners, particularly Englishmen, who, they say, meddle with their affairs, and rob them of their rightful deserts only to enrich in order to witness this ungenerous behaviour in birds:

Long before day-break, and during the whole day, thousands and thousands of slaves may be seen wandering about seeking for work; the market places, as well as the port, are filled with them, and one can hardly tross, also, is brought under strong suspicion by an ineimove a step without being addressed by them. These dent related by Dr. Meyen. On opening the stomach of slaves are obliged to provide their own sustenance, and one, caught near Magellan's Straits, he found in it the neck bring their master a certain sum of money per day; if and halt-skull of another albatross; the bird had evidently they do not, they are flogged; but if they earn more, they may keep it for themselves, and pay it on some other day, when they have not been able to get enough. At the time of our stay, we ourselves saw slaves bring their masters a Prussian dollar a-day. Many masters send their slaves to daily work in the neighbouring.

The first place at which they touch after weathering. quarries; others, and not a few, send them forth in The first place at which they touch after weathering quest of insects, and this is the reason why the finest Cape Horn is Valparaiso in Chili; a town containing insects are so cheap at Rio de Janeiro. A man who has about 20,000 inhabitants. The following observations on acquired a certain degree of skill may catch from five certain natural phenomena of this region, and some custo six hundred beetles in the course of a day close to toms of the inhabitants, appear worthy of quotation: the town. The trade in insects is properly regarded as very profitable, as while we were there they fetched six milreis [about 13s. English] the hundred. The finer sort of beetles are now a general object of search; in surprising is it that, towards mid-day, the water of the

the head was for the most part shaved off; and as they easional marriages at will; he tears children from their sat in rows upon small benches, or cowered down upon parents, and sells husband and wife so that they may the earth, their whole aspect and bearing could not fail possibly never meet again. Even the milk of the neto make one shudder. Those who were thus exposed gresses is used as an article of merchandise, and sold were for the most part children; almost all were mark-fror the milk of cows; for this reason milk is never ed with the hot iron, and generally on the noblest parts.

This is a frightful description; but we must not dwell ships, but more particularly in consequence of the bad upon it at present. The great subject to which it refers imprisonment, consisting of salt meat, bacon, and bean shall, on an early occasion, engage our deliberate atten-

> Dr. Meyen speaks in the highest terms of the beauty of the Brizilian ladies. But their minds can hardly correspond with their person, as they are not taught reading and writing for fear of their engaging in love-adventures, for which, it is said, they have great natural aptitude,-The consequence is, that they ordinarily pass their whole mornings in rubbing their teeth with orange peel, or having thei. hair dressed by their negresses.

> On leaving Rio, our travellers made directly for Cape Horn, which they weathered with difficulty. Amongst the many birds and fishes whose peculiarities struck them on this part of the voyage, the dolphins and albatrosses appear to have attracted particular notice :-

One afternoon, we struck a dolphin with the harpoon; he bled a great deal, but escaped; soon after-wards we saw at the side of the ship, at a little distance, a whole drove of these fishes, who fell in a body on the wounded one. What may have been the cause of this struggle? Were they contending for the blood of their comrade? We subsequently, on the Cordillers. a similar observation with regard to birds.

There was no necessity for travelling to the Cordilleras for the rooks and crows of our country, and we suppose of the doctor's fatherland also, make a point of attacking their wounded comrades in the same manner. The alba-

The first place at which they touch after weathering

deed, ladies in Europe are beginning to ornament their bay suddenly begins to ran, whilst close at hand it still dresses with them to a degree which threatens the entire extirpation of the race. The so-called diamond-beetle was much in request for breast-pins for gentlenamen, and fetched as much as six plastres. [about 30.s] and a cooling breeze, which seems to rise in the snow 'The thirst for gain has struck out other ways, to regions of the Andes, refreshes exhausted nature.—arrive more rapidly at the end. Humanity will scarcely Nothing then equals the beauty of a summer night at believe me when I say that negresses are sometimes Valparaiso; its repose only broken by the uniform and believe me when I say that negresses are sometimes Valparaiso; its repose only broken by the uniform and monotonous beating of the waves against the shore, and monotonous beating of the breakers, which sometimes reverance same bought for the express purpose of bearing children; by the foaming of the breakers, which sometimes reverance same pregnant is worth fifty piastres [10t.] berates in the distance. At this hour, the residents, young and old, come forth from their houses, to enjoy som of the mother, and sold for between thirty and forty piastres [6t. and 8t.]. The master of the slaves does precisely as he likes; he makes and dissolves these or-usual uncovered, appear, adorned with fragrance-breath-modern fashion, and had large silk kerchiefs for heading flowers, in all their finery. Strangely, but to a dress: they were smoking their cigars and dinking mate, European ever pleasingly, the loud music comes echothe tea of Paraguay. One of them was lying on a bed is not until past midnight that the breeze grows cooler, penitent Magdalen invited us to rest upon her bed,-and then begins a light formation of clouds, which tomorning at Valparaiso the sky is always thickly clouded, such as we in our northern seas are perhaps never for-tunate enough to behold. Then the little fishingboats move slowly round; out of which it is customary to fish with hooks. With the descent of the mist all the cloudiness of the atmosphere disappears, and now of natural phenomena recommences. This was the case at Valparaiso when we were there, namely, in January and in March; the winter is probably different, namely, in June, July and August; but the necessary observations as to this season are still wanting.

A description of the effects of some of the principal earthquakes is subjoined. The English public, however, have been sufficiently familiarised with these by the striking sketches of Mrs. Calcott and Sir Francis Head; we shall, therefore, limit ourselves to a single paragraph upon this

At present, as during our stay in the province of Santiago, certain minor earthquakes are regularly repeated every two or three weeks. A general alarm then seizes the inhabitants, and all desert their houses with loud cries of "Misericordia! Misericordia! il tiembla." Some months afterwards we found ourselves in the northern part of Chili, in the Partido de Copiapó, in a country where earthquakes rank amongst the most ordinary phenomena. Here the inhabitants were fami-liar with this dreadful curse; they sometimes remained the whole night within doors, whilst the houses were rocking and the trees waving to and fro. To such a degree can man accustom himself to the greatest danger!

Whilst Chili preserved her connexion with Spain, Valparaiso, was considered as the first commercial place on the whole west coast of America, but 'in consequence of the revolution' (says Dr. Meyen) 'the country has grown amiable nation is often sketched in the most offensive poor, all the great and opulent houses have disappeared, manner, in return for the many tokens of hospitality and it will, in all likelihood, be long before this beautiful and richly-gifted land recovers its prosperity again.'

Whilst the ship was lying off Valparaiso, they made a Whilst the ship was lying off Valparaiso, they made a object of attack, and often even individually named, party to visit Santiago, a city of Chili, containing about whereby succeeding travellers have suffered great dissixty thousand inhabitants. Although a great many advantages, for already has the fashion disappeared of writers have preceded Dr. Meyen in describing it, we shall admitting every stranger of condition into the circle of presently quote a few of his remarks. But we are first the best families without the formality of a direct intempted to copy a family picture sketched by him upon troduction. The ladies dread the stiff Englishman, who cannot enter into the spirit of their manners, and the way:-

ing from the foreign vessels of war across the deep, and in the attitude of the penitent Magdalen, but she seemed the depth of night proves unable to lure the inhabitants to us more intrancingly beautiful than Magdalen was to rest. Till long after midnight the finest fruits and ever painted. Four broad beds stood in the single room, other provisions are exposed for sale in the market- and all were occupied by men and women, who were other provisions are exposed for safe in the market and an were occupied by an and the place; and there too the people live often only in tents, reposing themselves, although they had certainly done closed on two or three sides, whilst the lights burn free-nothing all the forenoon. With the exception of a ly in the open air, and are hardly stirred by the wind. It single bench there was no seat in the room, and the and then begins a light formation of clouds, which to-wards morning increases more and more. Early in the morning at Valparaiso the sky is always thickly clouded, men. To amuse herself at our expense, our beautiful and about six o'clock, A. M. a dense fog comes on, which companion brought out her little pet which had been towards seven o'clock often descends in such masses, lying under the coverlid; it was a cuy (lepus minimus towards seven o'clock often descends in such masses, lying under the coverlid; it was a cuy (lepus minimus that there is a downright rain for twenty or thirty minutes. The water of the bay is at the same time quite to purchase it, but it was not to be had for money. On tranquil, and the surface of a chrystalline brightness, several other occasions we endeavoured to make a barner has a we in our northern seas are nerhoes never for gain for little domestic animals of the sort, but the women would never part with them, although in many instances the money would have been extremely convenient.

' Here, as often during our sojourn in South America, the sun begins to grow warm, till again towards noon it chanced to us to mix for a considerable time with a the cooler air of the sea sets in, and the daily course family circle, without finding out the men and women family circle, without finding out the men and women

> As they are proceeding across the arid plain of Mapocho, a strange mode of refreshing a tired horse presents

> Not a breath of air was stirring, and no living thing was to be seen; nature was sunk into a complete calm, even vegetation was dead, and the fruitful plain resembled a burnt-up loamy bottom; only moveable images, produced by unequal refraction, animated the glowing level. The very horses flagged and would no longer proceed at full gallop, (the ordinary pace at Chili,) whereupon one of the natives came up, and with his great knife made several cuts in the parched throats of the animals, so that a large quantity of blood flowed.— The fellow believed that the horses would acquire new spirit from such a depletion!

Dr. Meyen prefaces his observations on the inhabitants of Chili with some sensible hints to travellers, not to be over-ready in drawing conclusions from the particular usages of strangers, with whose general habits and notions they are little acquainted; and he speaks we regret to say, with peculiar reference to our own countrymen:

It is greatly to be regretted, that the numerous English travellers, who, in the hope of wealth, have lately visited these countries, and for the most part returned disappointed, should publish their journals, in which this and friendly reception which assuredly they have inva-riably experienced, when they did not exhibit too much arrogance. The women have been made the peculiar admitting every stranger of condition into the circle of makes them a subject of merriment so soon as he is out At the foot of the mountain (Cuesto del Prado) lies of the room. He considers himself distinguished, when the post-house of Prado, at which we alighted. We he receives a bunch of flowers from a lady, though, in there found a very numerous family, who received us fact, this sort of courtesy is designed merely as a help with as much kindness as if we had been old acquaint- to conversation. The Englishman calls the people saces. The pretty women were in fine clothes of the dirty, because a bason of water goes round after dinner, dence on which they wish to live with their guests.'

pean public.

'They rise early, and the ladies immediately hurry off to mass, arrayed in black silk with long black veils. They are attended by female servants, bearing fine cushions for their mistresses to kneel upon. After mas they take chocolate, coffee, or China tea; maté, or Paraguay tea, being now entirely banished from the houses of the higher class. The men, who appear to trouble themselves very little about mass, usually employ the time devoted by the women to religious observances in strolling through the streets and market-places. During the forenoon, the ladies pay visits in their carriages; little two-wheeled coaches with glass windows, drawn by two mules, the coachman being seated upon one. Men and women never ride together in these carriages, which, indeed, are intended for women exclusively As the heat increases with the advancing day, all life and action disappear from the streets, and by the afternoon all business is quite over. Two o'clock is the ordinary hour of dinner, which is soon ready, for the mode of living is singularly moderate; soon after dinner comes the siesta, which commonly lasts till six. During this time, a stillness, like that of death, reigns through the uniform streets of the city, which are heated to an extraordinary temperature by the unintermitting rays of the sun. All the shops are closed, and there is no one to speak to; none but curious strangers, and soldiers upon guard, are to be seen in the squares. Nothing less than an earthquake would be powerful enough to rouse the inhabitants of this town from the lethargy into which they fall, not so much perhaps from the intolerable heat as from habit. During our stay such an earthquake took place about three o'clock in the afternoon. Misericordia! Un temblor! Un temblor! resounded on all sides, and the inhabitants hurried out of their houses, often in the most laughable attire, for they had been surprised in the midst of their sleep. As the heat abates, the houses re-open, the shopkeepers expose their goods, and the squares are again filled with work-men. The bustle re-commences, the people stream towards the churches, and the promonades are filled; but on a sudden, as the sun sets, the bell calls to prayer, and heads are bared and all is still. Thousands and thousands of people, on horseback and in carriages, all huddled up together, as they chance to be confounded in the crowd, are instally prostrated by the sound of this bell, as by catalepsy, and turn their thoughts to their common Creator. With alternating pauses an harmonious ringing of bells sounds from the different towers, admirably arranged with a view to effect, until the striking of the clock sets the mass again in motion. Then the noise redoubles, as if to overtake what has been lost in the preceding moments. Buenas noches! buenas noches! is the salutation then exchanged amongst acquintance.

Their mode of visiting, with the exception of the extreme lateness of the hour, appears excellently adapted to attain the chief objects of society.

'In the evening, from nine to ten o'clock, family risits are paid, and these last till long after midnight.

and the whole company, men and women, dip their Particular invitations are not the fashion here; any one hands in it by turns, although these good people intend once presented to the family by a friend of the house nothing further than to indicate the footing of confias he chooses, and go away again if he does not find The old custom, not yet quite obsolete in England, of amusement in the circle which he happens to meet, without its being taken ill. When the rooms are lighted, and the doors open, it is a sign that the family are warned our countrymen against so rash a conclusion as at home and receive visits. The gentleman of the the last. In reality, after reading Dr. Meyen's sketch of house, however is rarely of the party; we have been the existing state of manners in Santiago, we are led to for weeks in the habit of going in and out of houses doubt whether the inhabitants of this remote region have without ever becoming acquainted with their masters, not much reason to complain of the partial and discolour-the ladies are splendidly dressed, and adorned with ed representations of them hitherto afforded to the Euroa conversation begins, which is particularly remarkable for witty allusions and plays on words, whilst music, singing, and dancing by single pairs at a time, help to pass away the night; new guests are constantly coming m, and others departing to join a second or third company. People here assemble only for amusement, and not eating and drinking, which in many other countries is the principal matter; but some preserved fruit is com-monly offered, which here and over the whole west coast of South America is so renowned under the name of dulce. It is usual to take only a few teaspoonfuls and then a glass of water. In houses of distinction the dulce is handed round in small crystal saucers; in inferior houses one vessel goes round, and each guest helps himself in his turn. Frequently at these evening meetings the ladies have flowers brought to them, and, with a taste and elegance peculiar to themselves, form them a tase and elegance peculiar to themselves, form them into little bouquets, which they present to the gentlemen; but this, as I have already said, is meant merely as an invitation to converse. Most commonly the ladies sit still and exhibit their skill in the management of the fan, which they learn to use with an adroitness and grace such as no one assuredly could match in our country. From their earliest youth the management of the fan is the daily study of the young women of Santiago.

> We are very far from undervaluing the importance of an art which formerly engaged the thoughts of no less a person than Addison;* but we doubt the expediency of making it the study of a life, and we fear from what follows that in other respects the education of the Chilian ladies has been much neglected.

'The Chilian ladies, equally with the Peruvian, are liable to some degree of censure for surrendering themselves too unreservedly to their natural passion for dress. This makes them forget their other duties, and I have conversed with many a worthy father of a family who has broken out into the bitterest complaints A Chilian woman, even of the middle wears nothing but silk stockings, with silk shoes so very thin that they cannot last beyond a few days; church-going dress consists of velvet, silk, and lace ; she wears the largest and costliest French tortoise-shell combs in her hair, often two or even three of them at a time, merely for the sake of show. She walks about at home in the finest China silk kerchiefs, and lies with them upon the carpets. It is not merely that domestic happiness is so frequently disturbed, and many a ma-trimonial union prevented because the necessary means are wanting to the men; we may even regard this folly as a cause powerful enough to bring about the ruin of the state, unless effective means can be found of counteracting its extravagance. Good, that is, practical girl-schools, of the European kind, should be established; not such as the celebrated institution of Mora at Santiago, which, in my opinion, promotes the very thing which should be as much as possible repressed. 'It is well worth remarking, that it is only since the easting-off of the Spanish yoke that this luxury in dress | The most memorable of their expeditions in Peru was openly, although it is tacitly disapproved by all, for the traveller during the ascent. The symptoms are depossibly in no country are the men so completely under the traveller during the dominion of the women (I do not exactly say under scribed as follows: the dominion of their wives) as in Chili : this, however,

[&]quot;See 'The Spectator,' No. CII.

What is here said of the Chilian ladies is not altogether women; who have learnt, indeed, to put some slight re diency. In fact, there is in these days nothing very uncommon in hearing a young lady openly avow that a carriage and opera-box are in her opinion downright necessaries of life; and every season brings about marriages, solely determined by such base considerations, the probable results of which need not be particularly dwelt upon. bable results of which need not be particularly dwelt upon until the symptoms grew milder from repose, and we In other particulars, too the parallel holds good. We fear were able to descend slowly. there can be little doubt that the most celebrated of those bylon of ours, and its suburbs, are schools more likely to pamper than repress a taste for the prevailing vanities.

Dr. Meyen and some of his comrades make an excursion to the volcano of Maipu. The most singular phenomenon presented by this volcano is the extraordinary illumination which proceeds from it during the night. This was witnessed by our travellers, but they confess themselves unable to say why Maipu should differ in this respect from all other known volcanoes in the world.

The next place they visit after leaving Santiago is Capiapo, a town most bountifully endowed by nature with all that can make it delightful as a residence, with only one slight drawback upon its advantages. Earthquakes are of such constant occurrence, that it is customary to build the houses of the lightest and least durable materials and construction, as it is never certain that the usufruct will termed the superb mountains (corberge) of the Cordilast above a month.

They next repair to Arica in Peru, where one of the first objects that strike them is a wonderful draught of the bay, and were received amidst the joyful accla-soil) is farmed by an Englishman.

has taken such exclusive poscession of the women; one to the mountains; a service of considerable danger, on but no one in this country day to speak against it account of a complaint which almost invariably attacks

'We were tormented with a burning thirst which no is a natural consequence of their beauty and charming drink was able to assuage; a slice of water-melon which we had brought with us was the only thing we could relish, whilst our people ate garlick and drank spirits, maininapplicable to certain classes at least of our own country-effects of the journey. We kept on ascending till two women; who have learnt, indeed, to put some slight re o'clock in the afternoon. We were already near the straint on their passion for dress, but have so habituated little ridge which extends W. S. W. from the summit themselves to the indulence of many contracts. themselves to the indulgence of sundry even more expen-of the mountain (the volcano of Arequipa,) and we sive tastes, as to make marriage, in too many instances, could even distinguish the little stones upon the summuch less a matter of mutual inclination than of expe. mit, when our strength at once abandoned us, and we were overtaken by the disease, sorocco. The nervous feverishness under which we had suffered from the first had been gradually becoming worse and worse; our breathing became more and more oppressed; fainting, sickness, giddiness, and bleeding at the nose came on; and in this condition we lay a considerable time,

This complaint, we believe, is common to all mountainestablishments for young ladies,' which grace this huge Ba- ons regions, being the result partly of the exertion used in ascending, and partly of the rarefied state of the air; but it is nowhere so fatal as in Peru. 'It is a well-known fact (says Garcilasso de la Vegu) that the Adelantado Don Diego de Almagro, on his march towards Chili, when, as is probable, he was led by his guides over the highest plain of Tacora, lost more than 10,000 Indians, 153 Spaniards, and a number of horses, who all fell a sacrifice to hunger, thirst, and this disease. The soldiers on that memorable expedition built themselves walls of the dead bodies of their comrades, merely to protect themselves against the drying effect of the wind."

Dr. Meyen's description of the first view of the mountains is in his best manner.'

leras from the principal range, and runs along the coast, is an equally elevated sand-waste, showing no sign of rocks nor of any description of living animal throughout. On the western boundary of the waste, close by Tambo, there is some of that trachyte which is found "Measureless shoals of little fishes had come into at Arequipa, but farther on you have nothing but sand. the bay, and were received unidst the joyful acclamations of the people. Old and young, men and women, all were standing half naked in the water, for us. When we had reached the table-land, which baling out the fish with great baskets, buckets, and pans. The number of fish was so great, that with every retreating wave several thousands were left upon the strand, and were picked up by quite little upon the strand, and were picked up by quite little children.

From Arica, as usual, they make excursions into the interior, their peculiar point of attraction in the present instance being Tacaa, a region principally remarks for the ugliness of the women, and the singular passion for riding which prevails amongst all orders of the inhabitants. According to Dr. Meyen, they are in the saddle from morning to night; the very beggar invariably accosts

The appearance was so peculiar, that we were led to be-Uniform as this waste might appear, we visited few refrom morning to night; the very beggar invariably accests. The appearance was so peculiar, that we were led to beyou mounted upon his ass. Our author is at considerable pains to furnish statistical information as to the mining districts of Peru. The general result is, that since the revolution they are all upon the decline. The new governments are not rich enough to supply the requisite machinery for working them, and the only mine at work at Puno (which ranks next to Potosi in metallic richness of the considerable pains to furnish statistical information as to the mining nearer to us, and on it a reflection of the Cordilleras, chain, which lay eastwards of us. But in proportion as the sun rose above the horizon of the Cordilleras, the sun rose above the horizon of the Cordilleras, the same time, and the only mine at work at length appeared unbroken chains of mountains stretching all along the coast, and bounding the great Pampa soil) is farmed by an Englishman. on the west.

varies from twenty to seventy paces, and their height from seven to fifteen feet. On their external convex side their decline is very small; on the inner concave, on the contrary, it is from seventy to eighty degrees. The surface on the external side is shaped like waves. Thousands and thousands of these hillocks cover the plain as far as the eye can reach, and, what is most singular, no little heap, where a hillock of the kind may be beginning to accumulate, is to be seen; all have a north-westerly direction; only in the middle of the Pampa there is a range of from 100 to 200 paces long, where these circles gradually turn, and at last open enwhere these circles gradually turn, and at last open en-tirely towards the west, but beyond this point they re-sume their old direction. There is no doubt that a constantly prevailing wind, blowing continually in one and the same direction, has caused this singular pheand the same direction, has caused this singular phenomenon; and the formation of new heaps so soon as all the loose sand had been blown together. The sand which still covers the plain is much coarser and not so which still covers the plain is much coarser and not so easy to move, but still it is a phenomenon meriting particular attention that no new heaps are formed. Can the climate have changed?—does the wind which caused these formations blow no longer?

What adds considerably to the difficulty of accounting for these phenomena, is the circumstance that the old Spanish writers say nothing of them. The only writer, indeed, who has ever mentioned them at all is General them under nearly two-thirds of that sum. Miller, and he but passingly alludes to them. The General, however, speaks also of clouds of flying pillars of sand much resembling those which Bruce observed on the deserts of Africa.

Nautical readers will probably like to read Dr. Meyen's observations on one of those sudden changes to which the South American seas are frequently exposed. We believe South American seas are frequently exposed. We believe old articles of dress; money, Spanish silver money, was this subject was first brought under consideration by Capthe only thing for which these poor creatures were now tain Hall.

'It is known that on the cast of North Chili, as well as along the whole coast of Peru, an undulating movewas perfectly still, seen waves thirty or forty feet high. It is known that on the west coast of South America the ebb and flood are very trifling, and at a short distance from the land quite invisible, so that even at the full of the moon this phenomenon of the rolling sea, as it is called in those countries, cannot be ascribed to the tide. It has been attributed to the influence of the moon, and it is maintained that it only occurs at the full of the moon. But, in opposition to this theory, we can assert that this rolling, and in truth with the greatest violence, as for example in the harbour of Capiapó, took place during the last quarter, from which it may be concluded that the full moon is not the cause of it: on concluded that the fail moon is not the cause of it: on the whole, we are of opinion that the great flow of cold water, which sets in from the south-west, and touches the Peruvian coast in the breadth of Arequipa, must be regarded as the cause of this rolling of the sea.'

We have not room for any extracts from Dr. Meyen's very curious and instructive chapter on Lima and its environs. On quitting the Peruvian coast, our voyagers repair to the Sandwich Isles, where all seems altered for the worst.

'But still more remarkable, and indeed quite peculiar in its way, is the surface of this sand-waste. Every-waste the sand is collected in great regular sickleshaped heaps, standing at different distances from each ship had visited this beautiful island once before. Soon other, and uniformly ranged with their concave sides afterwards we received a visit from Kuakini, the pre-to the north-west. The circumference of these heaps sent governor of the island Oahu, who has thought fit to assume the name of John Adams. The giant size and unshapely figure of this man astonished as exceedingly at first; his body is so large and so unmanageable, that he cannot remain standing for a moment at a time, but is obliged to sit down, or at least lean against something. He was not able to climb up the side of the ship, but was obliged to be drawn up by means of a rope wound round his waist. When at last he had set foot on deck, he looked round with the greatest indifference and spoke next to nothing; the huge and marked face, with its dark red coarse skin and thick protruding lips, its frightfully broad nose and great bloodshot eyes, gave the man a hideous aspect.

'We had been lying more than an hour at anchor; the merchants had left us, and the governor had returnproach the vessel until we had hailed it repeatedly. The two Indians brought cocoanuts and water-melons, which they spread out on our deck, and offered for sale; they were quite naked down to the marro, the small piece of cloth wound round their loins; but not a little were we surprised when they demanded the exorbitant price of three Prussian dollars (9s.) for three water-melons and seven cocoa-nuts, and refused to part with not as yet set foot upon the land; we still knew but little of the doings of the missionaries who then oppressed these blessed islands, but already, from this unprecedented dearness of provisions, were we led to the conclusion that things must have undergone a sad alteration in the Sandwich group. There was no lenger any talk of buying for nails or bits of iron, nor of exchanges for allowed to deal.

Subsequent inquiry proved the above conclusion to be as along the whole coast of Feru, an undulating move-ment of the sea frequently takes place, without any one being able to discover the cause; we ourselves have been lying during the night, and in the most complete calm, in the harbour of Capiapó, when the ship rocked so violently that we all found it intolerable. At other places, even south of Arica, we have, when the wind places, even south of Arica, we have, when the wind if we except a single insinuation to the effect that 'very inverse particular times and the same ways thinks on the same and the same ways are controlled to the same ways and the same ways are same as the same ways are same same as the same ways are same ways are same as the same ways a just; almost every thing had certainly deteriorated, and injurious reports were current as to the illness of King Kanike-aouli's sister, who was living at Mani in the house of a missionary.' However, it may be as well to state that the honour of our English missions is by no means affected by Dr. Meyan's complaints, the persons arraigned by him being exclusively North Americans.

On the occasion of the first visit of the Princess Louisu to the Sandwich Isles, the king had sent a mantle of fea-thers as a present to his royal brother at Berlin. This courtesy was now repaid with interest :-

'The chest with the presents was now brought into the saloon, and opened before the assembly. Captain Wendt and I endeavoured to arrange the things in a certain degree of order, with the view of producing a greater effect. The assembly expressed much astonishment at the number of presents, but Kanike-aouli, seaf-ed upon the bench, held back so much at first, that we could not but consider his conduct as affected. The cast-iron statutes, amongst which were those of Fred-erick II., Alexander I., Napoleon, Blücher, &c. excited the liveliest delight; above all was that of Frederick II. admired, the king causing it to be brought to him that destined for Kanike-aouli's consort, was a very fine bon-net adorned with artificial flowers. This particularly exwithstanding her gigantic bulk, is possessed of her own share of charms. Kinau caused the hat to be placed share of charms. Kinau caused the nat to be purposely send forth into the world upon her head, and was generally admired in it. The punished with less severity; let those which they utter wished them to be put on, which threw us into the unconsciously be entirely forgiven to them!

'The same evening, Captain Wendt and I paid a fastening the latter, as we were obliged to brace the a chair in the open court-yard, surrounded by more lady's neck tight; and yet, in comparison with the than a hundred of his servants and soldiers, whose duty others, she is by no means coarsely, but finely and elegantly formed.

'Kanike-aouli was entreated to put on the uniform, secretary Halilei, in the adjoining room; but on hearing a cry, "The missionaries are coming!" he as quickly self. Kaa-humana, the queen-mother, sat still and them. downcast; she could hardly conceal her disgust and pretended to be ill; two servants stood beside her, and were obliged to be constantly blowing fresh air towards 1831, and arrived off the coast of China, on the 14th her. A stick, with a mouth-harmonica, which we had Jan. 1832. Nothing worth relating occurred upon the presented to John Adams, the governor, struck the old way. At this point, the regular course of the narrative lady's fancy to such a degree that she took possession is interrupted to introduce a visit paid by Dr. Meyen of it, and forthwith, in the middle of the whole assem- and some others of the crew to the Phillippine group, bly, made an essay of her musical talents upon it.

'It was a very hot day, and as we had been nearly four hours uninterruptedly engaged in the ceremony, we were suffering much from thirst. Some foreign merchants who were present gave the young king a with nonerpleted viceous. It seems that hint that he should offer us something to drink; but with unparalleled vigour. he answered that the missionaries had forbidden him.'

severity amongst the islanders. A false report had spread tely, we could only sleep during some hours of the that Boki, the former governor of Oahu, who was absent night, for soon after midnight the crowing of the on a voyage, had suddenly returned. It was traced to a fighting-cocks began; and so soon as one raises his on a voyage, had suddenly returned. It was traced to a nghting-cocks began; and so soon as one raises me poor Indian, who had no apparent interest in spreading it, and, according to Dr. Meyen, was evidently insane. He was, notwithstanding, doomed to suffer as if he had been amongst the inhabitants of these islands. There is no house without at least three or four fightingwilfully guilty of the most beinous of crimes.

was executed on this poor wretch in the streets of Honoruru; with his arms and breast tied to the hinder stantly looking at each other, and at every bit of part of a cart, he was compelled to follow it. On the cart sat an officer with a cane in his hand, and everywhere, when the cart halted, which was likewise drawn other prepared for battle, but they are tied so firmly be indians, the offices of the victim was re-precised. by Indians, the offence of the victim was re-proclaimed that it is impossible for them to come to blows. When by the officer. The feet of the criminal were then tied the islander takes a walk through the village, he has to the wheels of the cart, and each time a new storm always his favourite cock under his arm, and, gene of blows was showered upon him; we averted our eyes rally, whenever two meet on the public way, they infrom this scene of misery, after once looking at the stantly set their birds a-fighting. At Manilla, close to man, whose back was quite covered with blood, and the promenade, a circus has been built for the express

he might examine it more closely. The decorations whom they were even then assailing anew; an old of a military uniform, the hat with feathers, and parti-fellow, with white hair and a long, snow-white beard, of a military uniform, the hat with feathers, and particularly the sword, seemed to please exceedingly. A rich saddle and bridle were immediately placed upon a horse, and excited high admiration; but most of all, the splended painting of his Majesty the King of Prussia, and that of Prince Blücher which Kanike-aouli had formerly expressed a desire to see, delighted him. The drawings of the different kinds of troops composing the representation of the maked soldiers of the governor, who commonly had their wives with them, carrying their Prussian army next went the round of the assembly, muskets in one hand, and supporting a naked child with among the loudest acclamations. Amongst the presents the other. With so well disposed a people, standing among the loudest acclamations. Amongst the presents the other. With so well disposed a people, standing upon the lowest step of cultivation, the extremes uninet adorned with artificial flowers. This particularly ex-cited the curiosity of the young Qeen Kinau, who, not-ted themselves to be sacrificed by their priests to their gods; they now suffer themselves to be flogged to death for an unintentional lie. May those lies which the The missionaries purposely send forth into the world be is she punished with less severity; let those which they utter greatest embarrassmet, since the bracelets and the neck-lace, although made of an unusual size, did not fit. It was only with the greatest trouble that we succeeded in Honoruru as his residence. We found him seated on it was to entertain his excellency by their conversation. It was a splendid evening; the moon shone so bright, and the air was so mild, that full often did we envy the which he immediately did, with the assistance of his inhabitants of these islands such a dwelling place. This kind of evening entertainment, such as John ing a cry, "The missionaries are coming!" he as quickly Adams was then enjoying, is in general use amongst took it off again. When he returned to the saloon, and the aristocracy of the Sandwich Islands. Soon after saw Kinau with the ornaments, he immediately desired supper the people collect around their patron; they lie saw kinau with the ornaments, he immediately desired supper the people collect around their parton; they he her to take them off, as they were not intended for her, one was she to have any part of them. She cheved shorten the long evenings by their talk. Singing and upon the instant, and did as he desired without so much dancing, as well as all lively expressions of joy, have, as a cross look. The fine linen, the silk stuffs, the articles for the toilet and other purposes, excited the envy since the proselyte-makers, through the weakness of of the ladies present, for Kanike-aculi kept all for himan old queen, introduced the new regime amongst

> They left the Sandwich islands on the 22d July, which took place at a subsequent period; and the resources and customs of these islands are described with our author's usual fullness and accuracy. It seems that

We remained the whole day at the village of Certain violations of truth are punished with singular making excursions in the neighbourhood; unfortuna-'One morning the punishment for this pretended lie some distance from one another, tied by one foot

There is a peculiar kind of bird-nest abounding on the Philippine islands, which is in high request amongst the Chinese gourmands. Mr. Trelawney, in his 'Adventures of a younger Son,' tells us that the price of a moderate cargo is occasionally immense, and relates an amusing story of an ignorant English captain, who threw overboard Dr. Meyen thus explains the precise composition of this luxury :-

'The weed which composes this branch of commerce is the Spharococcus cartilagineus var. setaceus aq. which is found in great abundance in this part of India. It is eaten by the bird (Hirundo esculents) which builds the nests in question, and is used in the preparation of its precious nest. The swallow eats the fresh weeds and permits them to soften for some time in its stomach, after which it throws up the mass, now converted into a jelly, and sticks it together to form the nest. The nests, which are subsequently smeared over with dirt and feathers, are brought in their raw state to China, where they are cleaned in immense warehouses built for that purpose, and then exposed for sale. These so-celebrated Indian nests are, therefore, hardly anything more than the softened Spharococcus cartilagineus which we have brought with us from the Chinese seas, and their effect is no other than that of fine jelly. In the preparation of these nests such a number of fine stimulants are generally added, that they of right occupy the first rank amongst relishes at the tables of the Chinese. The Japanese had long ago discovered that these costly bird-nests are nothing more than softened sea-weed, and now prepare the substance itself in an artist-like manner.'

Some of our own epicures may be glad to learn that the Spharacoccus crispus, which Dr. Meyen thinks would serve just as well for the composition of this luxury, is to be few passages illustrative of the Chinese mode of living, them. Besides these, the whole table was covered with which our author enjoyed some favourable opportunities little cups and plates, which were ranged with great chant Mowqua, and an invitation to dinner along with it; their notes of invitation are much larger than those filled with elegantly-raised three and four cornered pyin use amongst us, and written on extremely beautiful ramids, composed of little bits of pheasants, large geese, red paper. Mowqua is one of the youngest Hongists; he is in the possession of the white knob upon the cap, which, as it struck us, is of ivory, and betokens the fifth rank of Mandarins. About half-past six in the evening we presented ourselves at this aldermanic dinner, as the occupied a particular field. We here recognized a kind English call it; servants with large lanterns preceded us, and quantities of cotton were provided to fortify the space before the door, and the whole entrance, were filled with attendants; Chinese lanterns were burning on all sides, and the most startling music welcomed our arrival.

Vol. EXVIII. FERRUARY, 1836.—14.

purpose, in which regular fights take place three days; 'As the guests entered, they were saluted by the host in the week; thither the people are to be seen repairing and his son, and amidst a profusion of compliments confrom the vicinity of the town, and from the provinces, ducted quite up to the chairs in the reception-room.—
all carrying their cocks under their arms. Not until The attire of these rich Chinese on the evening in sunset do they retire home, and many then carry their question was extraordinarily splendid: young Mowqua dead cocks in their hands, who have either fallen honourably in battle, or been killed by their owners for fined by a beautiful silk sash, a cloak of the costliest furs. They kept their velvet caps with knobs constantly upon their heads; the magnificient tufts of these men, of singular strength and length, gave them a dig-nified mien. The guests seated themselves upon the chairs, which were ranged in two long and straight rows; and tea was immediately offered in large cups, each with a little shallow saucer, serving as a lid, and the whole standing upon a plate of silver or gold. It is well known that the Chinese, like the Japanese, drink enough of them to have made the fortune of his family. their tea without either sugar, milk, or rum-[who do take rum with their tea?—not surely the Germans]; they throw some tea into the cup and pour boiling water over it; so soon as it has stood a short time they scoop up the clear liquid into the saucer-lid, and drink it as hot as possible. As the tea thus used by the Chinese consists of entire leaves, and is not broken up, the extract is perfectly limpid.

> · Amongst the furniture which adorned the saloon of this rich merchant were two large lanterns of horn; they were full three feet high and two feet and a half broad, yet nowhere could we see any trace of a joining. We also remarked that Mowqua possessed a large Eng-lish plate of looking-glass, which is much superior to the Chinese, but he desired not to attract attention by the use of European articles, and had therefore caused the plate to be fixed in an ordinary and very clumsy Chinese frame. In a large adjoining room was the whole instrumental music, with several eminent singers, who kept playing during the whole feast, and performed a kind of opera; the noise they made was positively horrible, but the Chinese took no notice of it; only when the entertainment paused for a moment they listened to the singing, and had commonly a joke to laugh at or an observation to make.

'Presently the dinner began: we were conducted into another room, and took our places at little fourcornered tables, each meant for six persons. The tables were placed together in the form of a half-circle, and the side towards the centre remained unoccupied. At just as well for the composition of this luxury, is to be found in large quantities on the western and northern coasts of Great Britain.

China has been so very frequently described that we large quantities on the membrane one sat, were hung with scarlet drapery, beautifully worked in embroidery of China has been so very frequently described that we despair of attracting attention to Dr. Meyen's general account of it, though we must do him the justice to say that many of his details are new. We shall merely extract a little baskets, with beautiful flowers stuck between rew passages illustrative of the Chinese mode of living, them. Besides these, the whole table was covered with which our author enjoyed some favourable opportunities of studying:—

'A few days before our departure from Canton we found at our house a visiting card from the Hong merchant Mowqua, and an invitation to dinner along with their notes of invitation are much larger than them. Besides these, the whole rows of little passage with great precision, and contained fruits, preserves, confectione-ry, slices of bread and butter, with small birds cold, and hundreds of other things. An extraordinary degree of found at our house a visiting card from the Hong merchant Mowqua, and an invitation to dinner along with the same the rest were whole rows of little passage.

VOL REVIII. PERRUARY, 1836 .- 14.

began with the dessert.

By way of cover, three small cups are placed before each seat; the first on the left hand is filled with soy, which the Chinese add to almost every sort of food: the second serves for the ordinary eating; and in the third is a little spoon of porcelain for the soups. In front of these three cups, which are ranged in a line, more than it did us; yet full six hours were we obliged lie the two round little chop-sticks, which, in rich to sit at it, and many hundreds of dishes were served houses, are made of ivory. It is extremely difficult for strangers to get at their food with these sticks, and the Chinese were amused with our unskilfulness; one was overheard to whisper, "Here are wise Europeans for you; they cannot so much as eat properly." Mr. Lind-say understood him perfectly. Instead of napkins small three-cornered pieces of paper are placed near the covers; these are ornamented with stripes of red pa-

with large silver cans, and help every body to this nec-pole many dozens of rats, which are drawn quite clean, tar; which, principally on account of its heat, begins and, like pigs in our country, when they have been very soon to operate. The Chinese, in drinking wine, observe nearly the same rules as the English; —We through the hind legs. These rows of rats look very presume the doctor had studied our English modes of nice, but they are only eaten by the poor. wine-bibbing at one of the sailors' pot-houses in Dover |- they challenge to drink, then hold the cup with The dog-eaters, we have somewhere read, are regarded by turn the inside of the cup towards the person with whom of luxury in the streets, gather round him in crowds, and they are drinking, and show that they have drained often attack him with fury. every drop. On one occasion, when I did not wish to drink off a whole cup, my Chinese friend held his own constantly before me, and kept making signs till I had finished mine. Samtachu is in general of an insipid ing even the semblance of novelty has been left for later teste. They have the semblance of novelty has been left for later teste. side of the best brandy.

'So soon as the first division of the dinner, consisting possibly of sixty ragouts, was over, the soups appeared; these were placed in small bowls, in the middle of the table, and every man ate, with his little porcelain spoon, out of the dish. In this way, five, or six

'Napoleon's sitting-room is at present a stable; and different soups were served in succession, and between them various other things were placed before the guests

which we were enabled to rest ourselves, so as to begin scribed it.' with fresh vigour. After several courses, five small tables were placed outside of the half-circle of the original tables; these were completely covered with roasted pork and birds of all sorts. Then ten cooks came into the room, clothed all alike and very tastefully, so strenuously insisted on the living man's incarnation, and began carving the roasts. Two placed themselves would not volunteer to defray any part of the cost of such before each table, and commenced, with long knives, to an establishment.

After making but a short stay in China, one is accus-sever the hard roasted skin of all these viands, which tomed to see daily and hourly that the Chinese conduct was done most skilfully. Other servants, who stood in all their arrangements in a different style and manner front of the tables, received the little bits, into which from ourselves; it was thus also with the repast, for we all these roasts were cut, upon small plates, and then began with the dessert.

At the end of the whole meal, the cooks came again into the room, and returned thanks for the honour which had been done them in being permitted to cater for the illustri-ous company. I shall here close the description of this In dinner, which perhaps has wearied the indulgent reader ne, more than it did us; yet full six hours were we obliged

> The streets of Canton are not above five feet or five feet and a half wide, yet all sorts of cookery are constantly going on in them; and among the articles enumerated are some which we had never before heard of as embraced even by the unscrupulous Chinese cuisine, or the are ornamented with stripes of real per, and are used by the Chinese to wipe their hands.

'The dinner began by the host's inviting us to eat of the finer dishes; whilst we were eating them, the large square before the factories, a number of birds are kept calling our attention to the flavour or rarity of this acept cating our attention to the havour or rarty of this daily exposed for sale which amongst us have not yet or that thing: and the mode of eating was to convey gained much repute for flavour; among others, hawks, the food to the mouth, with the two sticks, out of the lowls, eagles, and storks. To a European, nothing can dish; for a small bowl was the largest vessel placed have a more laughable effect than to see the Chinese upon the table during the entertainment. The Chinese arrive with a carrying-pole supporting two birdcages place no cloths upon the table, but instead, as soon as which contain dogs and cats instead of birds. A small the course is finished, the whole board is removed, and thin sort of spaniel appeared to us to be most in request; a new surface, as it were, with fresh things, is served. They are obscured to the course was removed another small these they are obscured to waste the first course was removed another small these they are obscured to the course was the first course was removed another. As soon as the first course was removed, another small when they are brought to market, whilst the cats make cup was added to each cover; this was used for drink- a dreadful squalling, as if conscious of their fate. The ing hot samtschu, a fermented liquor made of rice, flosh of these last, when they are well fed, is much which at a Chinese table supplies the place of wine, esteemed in China, and they are often seen on the tables and which is always served boiling; servants walk round of the rich. Other Chinese bring upon their carrying-both hands, and, after wishing each other health and all living animals of that order with unmitigated abborhappiness, drink it off at a draught; whereupon they rence. They are said to nose a man addicted to this kind taste; they have, however, a great many kinds of it, travellers to glean. He is very angry with us because which are constantly changed at the tables of the rich, part of the villa in which Napoleon died is now occupied and I tasted one variety which might be placed along as an alchouse; but he might have reflected, that this is in fact a compliment to the celebrity of his hero, more especially as he tells us that he himself found it very comforta-

in a garden which he himself laid out before his win-dow, the English sheep thrive and fatten so well that in little cupe; amongst the rest, pastry, prepared in they are set apart for the table of the governor. The many ways, articles of confectionery, and strong chicken-hashes.

The governor of the different grand-divisions of the dinner, the island occupies it at present; the best proof that tea was handed round and tobacco smoked; during the air there is not so unhealthy as the emperor de-

We suppose Dr. Meyen would wish us to keep up Long-for his forthcoming volumes, a great quantity of curious any of them :- "I thank you, mamma; you are very kind time to see it in an English dress.

From the Amulet, for 1836.

A LETTER TO THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.

ventures to address you, in hopes that you will aid her his mellow voice. There was a cadence in it that often with your advice and assistance in earning a little profit brought tears into my eyes; for William was a good boy, for the support of her orphan family, whose plaintive cries for bread every day wring her heart. Alas! I once thought duty; so that all his actions and words became him, and that heart was rendered callous for ever, and dead to the sat on him with the most beautiful effect. thrilling ties of natural affection; for the hand of the Lord has been laid heavily upon me, and I weened that my burden was greater than female heart could bear. But, ever blessed be the Divine Goodness that, in my greatest extremity, sent resignation to my aid-humble and heavenly resignation to his holy will; and from that moment they would not have done. But girls should never go a my energies were restored, and my fondness for the remaining objects of my love redoubled.

What I desire of you, Sir, is, that as you appear to be deeply interested in the periodical literature of both kingdoms, you will try to procure me some remuneration for such little simple tales and moral essays as I am able to write. Even the least acknowledgment will be gratefully I was only laughed to scorn by all but William Brand, received; for what else can a poor widow do, who was not bred to any manual employment. I have only once in my life been paid for an article of my own writing; and never can I forget the thrilling pleasure I experienced when I opened the franked letter, and found the liberal enclosure. If there can be any such things conceived as pange of delight, I may have been said to have experienced the boys in search of plover and lark nests, and the girls them that night. I did not only shed tears, but I wept of heather bells and other flowers of the waste, when I outright, and I hugged my two little girls, and kissed them, and said to them, that they should not now want bread or clothes, though their mother should toil night and chirping in the most vehement style. It was joined

Alas! many a rebuff have I since that time experinced. with a coldly civil answer from the editor; and, when my hopes were high, and not a sixpence in my pocket, these returns were hard to bear. Among others, I sent you two pieces, one in prose, and one in verse, for Mr. Black. come out of the bush, something like a rat, with a short wood; but you never returned me any answer or acknowledgement whatever, which was rather ungracious: though I have heard a different account of you, and, it being from your friend Sir C. Sharpe's advice that I apply to you, I straight towards me, small as it was, I liked its looks very hope you will not neglect me altogether, as you did for. ill, and beginning to think I was too long there, I rose merly.

My first must be a tale of Juvenile delight, of love, of pain, and sorrow; for how can I tell any tale before that which lies nearest my heart?

My father was a farmer, and once accounted wealthy, efore the wealth of the British farmer began to melt from his grasp. We were bred at the village school, along with fluttering, chattering, and screaming; and while they peltthe vicar's family, and some others; but between our two families the greatest harmony subsisted. We drank tea together every Saturday and every Sanday, and joined in all the same rambles and amusements as if we had been one family. William Brand, the vicar's second son, and I, and nipped it with such energy that the creature was com-

In conclusion, we think it right to add, that although Dr. |disdain, and answering with sauciness, to the amusement Meyen has professedly reserved his scientific discoveries of all present; even pretty William laughed as heartily as botanical, zoological, and geological information is contain and very officious; and, pardon me, if I think rather too ed in the two now before us. The work when completed ready at proposing certain wives and certain husbands for will, we have no doubt, be generally considered as a valua- certain young people. Should you require another husble addition to the German library; and we hope in due band, you may chuse for yourself; which, I assure you, I intend to do."

But, for all this coquetry, I liked well to have William by my side, from which he was seldom wanting. When we read together in the Bible, the language was far more sublime to my ear, and the historics more interesting, when read verse about with him. Nor was the Gospel of Sn:-A poor widow from your sister kingdom humbly Jesus ever so sweet and affecting as when pronounced by had a deep feeling of religion, and a strong sense of moral

Whenever we went a flower gathering, nutting, or birdnesting, William and I went in fellowship, there being no girls in the two families of the same age with me; and, if there had, I don't think I would have gone with them, for William brought always the best things to me, which bird-nesting with boys, for the latter will not desist from plundering; and it not only grieves the gentle spirit of the ormer that they cannot prevent it, but causes them often to regard their brethren and friends with a sort of abhorrence as monsters of inhumanity. I know that many a sore heart and bitter tear these doings cost me, for which whose heart shared in all my sympathies. There are very few good boys. They are a set of bullying, fighting, hard-headed, and still harder-hearted, reavers, which renders a real amiable and manly boy quite a treasure,

I remember being one day out on Beckwith common the boys in search of plover and lark nests, and the girls unluckily perceived a very important bird fluttering round a bush of heath, and making a terrible uproar, chattering by another of the same species; and the two made such a work there, as if their lives depended on something which was in that bush leaving it. I durst not go to see what it was, for I was afraid it would be an adder, but kept where I was at a distance, and at length I saw a creature tail. The two birds tormented it terribly, so that it was obliged to sit down and watch them, often flying at them and trying to catch them. At length it came cowering straight towards me, small as it was, I liked its looks very hastily and took to my heels,

But the battle now assumed a more serious aspect. The animal came to a heap of grey stones, where there was a set themselves to oppose with all their might. They placed themselves together in the mouth of the whole, ed so furiously at the creature's eyes and nose, that for the space of several minutes, they kept it at bay. And, when sundry times it got its head into the hole, the male bird, as a last resource, seized it by the tail with his bill. being of an age, our parents spake to us jocularly of being pelled to disengage itself from the hole and fly at its as-married; at which I pretended to be highly offended, sailant. Never was there an entry more strenuously depouting and turning up my little nose with the greatest fended. The whole vigour of the two distressed parents was exerted without flinching; and had not the male bird ment at what the boys were doing to their sister. "What suffered some injury (for I saw the creature bring feathers is it? What is it?" cried be. "Off hands instantly, and off him,) I am persuaded the spoliator would have been [tell me what is the matter."

them. They waylaid him, turned him, and pelted him ble to him." with stones, till they soon compelled him to relinquish his My brothers went away rather out of countenance, sayprey, and then pursued him till be took earth. I asked ing they did not want to hear any more of the minister's them what he was, and they said he was a capital accazel, sermon. William and I watched the nestlings till their of its hard and early fate, I shed some tears of genuine did lest the boys or the weazel should find them again. grief over it. My brothers laughed at me, and said, they grief over it. My brothers laughed at me, and said, they wondered how I could grieve for the death of an useless together. They should go to the nut-wood together, for atone-chatter.

and tossed it up in the air to a great height; it flew a deared to them. space, and then, falling, tumbled over—a poor, helpless, I shall relate another story of bird-nesting, which I inexperienced object, but instead of pitying, they fell a never shall forget as an instance of maternal devotion and pelting at it with stones. I screamed violently, and tried heroism without a parallel. I was constantly on the look cruelty.

the remnant of the nestlings, I screamed, wept, and told terribly lacerated. them that they should tear me is pieces before they should get another of the birds to murder out of mere wantoness, he cut a strong sapling, took it in his teeth, and once more Finding they could not prevail without hurting me, they clomb the tree. The hawk had all this while been wheeling clung to the grey stones, and screamed without any inter-mission or mitigation of voice, till, at length, William but his hat to strike with the first time, but now the blows Brand came running to my assistance in utter astonish-

"Oh, nothing at all," cried they; "but only that Alice It however, at last, succeeded in its enterprize, entered is the greatest fool that ever was born." I showed him the hole, and suddenly returned, bearing a fine full-grown the two victims; told him how the parent birds had fought nestling in its mouth, which was fluttering and crying for the lives of their young, and the wonton cruelty of my most pitcously. My philanthropy was aroused to the high-brothers; and I shall never forget the glow on his counteest pitch by this incident, and all my fears of the voracious nance as he reprimanded and shamed them out of their plunderer vanished. I could have seized it with my little ruthless intent. "I could not have believed that you delicate hands, and wrung its neck about. I pursued it would have hurt your sister's feelings by such an act of with all my speed, acceaning as if my own life had been sharneless barbarity," said he; "you say, "What signifies at stake, while the parent birds assisted me well, by hat the life of a stone-chatter?" But it was her estimate that rassing the little wretch, and impeding its flight. My two ought to have made it valuable in your eyes. And you brothers, Edward and John, who were nearest to me, came should remember that these are all God's creatures; that running to my assistance; to whom, in breathless agony, a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without his knowledge; I pointed out the aggressor. It was a grand business for and for every act of wilful depravity you shall be answere-

With a juyful heart I ran to the released captive, lifted it persecutors were out of sight; we then lifted them, and and placed it in my bosom, but it was in the threes of carried them carefully to a distance, where we watched death, and died amid my caresses; and, when I thought them till we saw the dam come and feed them. This we the boys are a sort of protection. I have seen them batter Without the least hesitation, but as a natural conse off an impertment clown with stones, and make a boisterquence, I led them to the little crevice where the desper our bull-dog glad to take to his heels that he might escape rate battle took place; where, on raising a stone or two, with life. In both these instances, I felt that we girls we soon came to other four fine nestlings. Never did I would have been very helpless creatures. There is noththink but that the boys would again cover them carefully ing that I know of so dangerous as the united attack of a up, bless them, and leave them to the kind parents who set of resolute boys; there is no possibility either of cluding had fought so gallantly for them. There was no such them or overpowering them; and the more danger to humane project in their heads. They took one of them, themselves, the more in proportion is such an assault ento hinder them; but they laughed still the more, and, out for birds' nests, though all that I wanted was the taking aim time about, they continued throwing at it till pleasure of knowing where they were, and visiting them they killed it. When I saw it fluttering and trying in every good day. But there was a small blue hawk which vain to get away from them, and then falling over, gasp-for years had wrought great devastation among my fea-ing, and dying, I thought my heart would burst. I had thered songsters, and which I wished by all means to be never witnessed a deed of such enormity, and I remember revenged on. At length, after unwearied attention to the I wondered that some visible judgment was not poured on course he pursued through the air with his prey; and folthe heads of these ruthless murderers, and destroyers or lowing in the direction still farther and farther on, I disdomestic happiness. Even the two bereaved parents, who covered the nest. Joyfully did I hasten home with the had fought so bravely against their first invaders, now sat information to my brothers. Edward and John both went at a melancholy distance, uttering now and then a hopeless with me. The tree was difficult to climb, and overhung a chirp as if astonished at a deed which had no motive but precipice. John ventured, and reached the nest; but the uelty.

dam met him at a yard's distance, attacking his hands
Yet it was a game of the highest zest for the boys, and face without mercy. He got so near as to perceive Away they ran for another to get a fair batter at it, as that there were young ones half feathered in the nest; but, they said; but there I was beforehand with them; and with all his exertion, he could not get hold of one of them, throwing myself above the few grey stones that covered and was obliged to return with his right hand and his nose tried to reason me out of my resolution by insinuating round and round in air, and with a laughing yell promany bad things against the general character of the claiming her victory over poor John. Whenever she saw stone-chat; but to none of these would I listen. Then him begin again to ascend the tree, she slighted upon the they set seriously to work to remove me by force; but I nest, and, meeting him at the cleft below it, attacked him times in his face with a maternal scream of despair; but, [ill. You say, it is a fine island; that may be: but there's their nest without fire-arms. The last sight that I saw of ting quit of a son. I think, for the little while a man has her living, she was gasping and hanging her wings, and to live he might contrive to do so at home. I'll tell you John's next blow felled her dead. She died on the side of what I have resolved, Willie, for I do not like to part with the nest next to the intruder, and during the struggle never you: you have long been the same to me as one of my deserted her post one inch. She was a small bluish bird, own; and, if you will stay at home, I will stock the farm with large black eyes. My brothers called her a merlin, of Benton for you, put in the first year's crop for a begin-which others disputed. The young were all kept and ning; and as your father has a more numerous family tamed, and turned out docile and the prettiest birds I ever than me, and not a great deal more to give them, I'll ask saw. There was a majesty in their large black eyes, and no security but your honour." the greater their danger the roll of those grew always the more proud and independent.

gether; by constant fellowship and reciprocal acts of kind- my head on his bosom and wept. ness, endeared to one another; and, owing to the jokes ness, endeared to one another; and, owing to the jokes "Alice! Alice!—behave yourself, girl. What means and insinuations of our parents, I think, as far back as I all this flummery? I cannot bear it." I looked up, and hearts were made for one another.

liam was destined for a mercantile life; but the first year I tell you! Why will you cause an old man to play the illness, and brought home to his father. It was then that myself!" I first felt how dear he was to my young heart. His own I always loved my father with my whole heart and soul fear of infection; but all their efforts could not keep me but, oh, how I admired his manly generosity that night.

away. I sat by his bed the whole day, and let his nurse There was no word said about me. No such hint as, "If sleep. I held the wine and water to his parched lips, you wed my Alice, I will do so and so." That was left wept over him, and read portions of Scripture daily, and to follow, or not to follow, as circumstances suited. the service for a bed of sickness. Often would be take The result may be anticipated by any one; but these lips, and feebly whisper, "Heaven bless you, dear Alice!" even remember them, for they passed over like a brilliant My heart was wrung almost beyond sufferance, for I dream. The them, for they passed over like a brilliant My heart was wrung almost beyond sufferance, for I dream. The intense eagerness of William to succeed in thought him dying, and the purpose of my soul was not this farming speculation, so generously conferred, ruined to tarry behind him. How gladly would I have suffered all. He began his improvements on the most brilliant suns of reason.

much as possible. At length a sort of desperate situation brought in both our parents to heavy losses. Mine in par we were too young and too modest for that. But there volved him, was more than his gentle spirit could bear. was no occasion for it; for every look, every word, every The privations, the miseries, that now hedged me in on action, bespoke how dear we were to one another. For every side, were indeed grievous, yet the Lord in his kind-me, when the day of his departure drew near, I wept day and night. My parents took alarm, for well they knew husband, than whom a more affectionate never lived, even the cause; and my father, who was a true English farmer before the prime of life, broken in heart and constitution, in kindness of heart and honest frankness of disposition, hasting to an untimely grave. Two helpless infants on invited William by himself to take a family dinner with us my hand, and all of us dependent only on the bounty of before he set out on his destination.

it would not do. My father took his ale heartily, but brought to the verge of ruin, never remitted his attentions William almost none; and, at length, it so chancing that for a day; and, when my husband's effects were sold, and we three being left together, my father after blowing his the proceeds parted among his creditors, my father renose, began the following speech, "Why, Willie, lad, do turned me the whole of his reversion. His last meeting you know that I don't much like this going away of with William I never shall forget. He came to our lowly your's to that plaguy tobacco place. It is a bad spot, and cottage to see him, and, with the tear in his sunken eye, for all the blows that John aimed at her, she never thought never any body comes home from it, man. I have never of flying. Had the male been present, who was doubtless yet known a man who went to reside there come home out on a foraging expedition, no boy could have reaved again. I don't much like this, Willie. It's too like get-

I could stand this no longer, for my heart was bursting with gratitude for this disinterested generosity of my dear But these youthful reminiscences have drawn me from father. I sprang from my seat, clasped my arms around my tale. In this way, was William and I bred up to-remember, we both had a sort of vague feeling that our the tear was forcing itself slowly over his honest cheek, while William was at his other knee, pressing his hand His elder brother having studied for the church, Wil- between both his own. "Give over, children; give over, he went into a counting-house he was seized with a severe child? Dang it, I was trying to gratify nobody but family were debarred from entering his apartment for for he ruled his family by sheer affection and kindness;

my hand, and press it to his burning brow, then to his days of delirious joy it is painful to recapitulate. I cannot and died for him!—so sanguine are the feelings of the and expensive scale: and the accommodation afforded by youthful bosom, before being ripened by the showers and the banks at that period had no bounds. Before the soil could produce adequate returns, the banks were extermi-The mercantile world having been at this time com-nated, their notes were of no avail, and the farmers found pletely paralyzed, poor William, after a slow recovery, themselves involved in inextricable ruin. My husband, my could find no situation for the space of two years; and poor William, was amongst the first that fell. Though he though he tried all that he could to improve his mind, told me nothing, I saw, by his wan check, and the fond and fit himself for any situation, yet he was heartless and and rueful looks which he sometimes fixed on our children cast down, and even took care to shun my presence as that matters were far from being right. He failed, and was offered him in the island of Tobago, which he reck-ticular; which, I am sure, broke my dear William's heart. lessly accepted, and then we met every day to talk of our After that, he never held up his head again. The thoughts separation, and deplore our lot. We never talked of love, of my father's affection, and the way in which he had in-those whom he had deeply injured. It was a heart-break-We made great efforts to be cheerful that afternoon, but ing condition to be placed in, but my poor old father, now you will be a weary distance from us, should you be taken tried to speak words of comfort and hope. Alas! it was too apparent they were both hasting to the same bourne! But after all, confidence is the soul of battle. That Both felt it; and, although seemingly unawares, their conversation turned again and again to the country beyond the the charge will be successful. In the whole course of my grave. I never saw my father so much affected as when military career I never saw two bodies of any size cross he blessed William, and took farewell of him. He was bayonets. I have heard that such a thing occurred at the conscious it was for ever. I wept over both their deathbeds on the same week, and they lie buried side by side in than I have yet seen to make me believe it. Before such the little church-yard of the priory of St. John.

its painful descriptions, in order to suit it to some of the stand still, another of equal size will not come up to it.

From the Albion

Twenty Years in Retirement. By the Author of Twelve Years' Military Adventure.

PRITISH MODE OF FIGHTING,

Although we islanders have been satisfied from our in fancy that one Englishman is equal to two Frenchmen, foreigners, who are not convinced of the fact by such early impressions, may, and no doubt do often, ask (themselves at least, if not others) how it is that the English soldier beats all the world? The true reason is, that he combines the principles of both attack and defence. If in position, he does not wait the shock of his enemy; but when the latter arrives within distance, he instinctively pounces upon him with a strength and velocity which his astonished opponnent, out of breath perhaps, and weakened by the steady fire of the British ranks, has not the power to with stand. Another reason for the superiority of the British infantry is their mode of attack in line, which, I believe, is peculiar to our army. I know of no other that has adopted it. Since the invention of gunpowder the formation in column has lost its chief power. It is peculiarly exposed to the effect of artillery; and, when opposed to a line, it eannot possibly return a fire by any means equal to that which is directed against it. It is, besides, wholly dependent on the few men which compose its front; and if these turn tail, it is all over with the column. The Duke of Wellington's mode of resisting the attacks was this; he doubled up the batallion in their front, placed one on each flank, and then when the fire from the artillery and the line had produced its effect, he charged the co dumn simultaneously in front and flank. This managuvre has invariably proved successful.

In ordinary cases the assailants have the advantage in the open field; first because they are generally able to bring to bear on one point a larger force than the defendants have to oppose it; and next, because the circumstance of their being the attacking force gives them confidence, and vice versa. But on the British system of defence the superiority of force is more than compensated by the advantage of ground, by the fire of well-placed batteries, as well as of the line itself, the freshness of the defenders, and the exhausted state of the assailants, while confidence, as long as he is well commanded, is never wanting to the British soldier.

USES OF CONFIDENCE.

Here I may remark that courage and activity, unless combined, are of little avail in military matters. Activity without courage will only make a man run away the faster; and courage cannot be brought properly to bear with-out activity. The two qualities are to each other as the heroine of my story—lively, laughing, careless, Juliweight and velocity in mechanics.

a collision takes place, one side always gives way: and I I have been obliged to curtail this little narrative of all hold it as a maxim in warfare that, if one body will only juvenile periodicals; where, should it appear, I will in my next subscribe myself,

Your obliged,

ALICE BRAND.

Any one who has seen a charge by the best troops will be convinced of this fact. Before the assailing body arrives within twenty paces of their enemy, it will be found to be divided into three parts: the first composed of your rash, dare-devil fellows who outstrip their companions; the next, of your steady hands, who will do their duty and no more; and the last of those who would stay behind if they could. They are, in fact, something like a pack of hounds in full cry. The foremost dogs do as much mischief by overrunning the scent as the hindmost by lagging. Fear is the most powerful of human passions, and is more evinced than the world generally supposes. We hear of armies and corps "covering themselves with glory;" but we seldom hear of their covering themselves from the fire of the enemy. Yet doubtless any man who has seen much service has observed more of fear than of courage -witness the difficulty often experienced in getting men from under cover into an exposed situation. What stooping, and bobbing, and running back! Indeed I have seen a great deal more to make me ashamed of my species than proud of it. Individuals may be found, certainly, in whom fear seems scarcely to exist; but in bodies it is al-ways very apparent. It is not, however, your harebrained fellow who is the most courageous. I have observed that those who have the least thought of danger generally display the most fear when the danger comes upon them. That man is the best prepared to do his duty who has given the subject the most thought; and I myself have found that the actual presence of danger was less distressing than the anticipation of it.

the stil

age

out

per

en tak

bee

art

to

are

to

the

to

the

cra

ane

pa

a-v

pas

of

the

BOT

ye

of

" n

pre

Nu

bla

it v

up.

wa

ser

to

"I

she

chi

WB

wh

me

From he Forget-Me-Not, for 1836.

JULIANA; OR PROPHECIES COME TRUE.

A PRAGMENT OF EVERY DAY LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF " SKETCHES OF A SEA-PORT TOWN."

" Sprezzo fasto e la belta E al fine scelse per se L'innocenza e la bonta."

CENERENTOLA.

"Let not the honourable gentleman prophecy," said in the House one night-" it is a dangerous expenditure of mind."

But the relations of Juliana Albany had never heard -'s sarcastic warning-or, having heard it, perhaps they plumed themselves upon leving mind enough for the regulation of their own conterns, and some besides to spare for prophecy; perhaps, having heard, they did not believe it, for certain it is that never was infant heralded into the world with more " I wonders" and " You'll sees" -never child more educated upon proverbs and prognostications-never young lady launched into life with more ana Albany!

111 JULIANA

to her husband, as he nedded over his newspaper, " what are we to do with our girls?"

"Advertise that the Albany stock is to be sold, in eighths, to the best bidder.-Come now, I must finish this debatethe girls can wait till it be done." Mr. Albany was ready to cry at her husband's impenetrability.

than any of her predecessors. All concerned about her her charitable grand-aunts told her, as constantly as she cradle, and the very nurse, who in general has pride in was sent to spend a long, dreary, dutiful day in their patand partiality for all babies, declared that she was a "poor, tern-house, (and this was often-Mrs. Albany was "so puny little thing"-and three great-aunts, who never came glad to get her out of the way")-that she was sure to be a-visiting save on "family occasions," as they were called, a dwarf. The child fully believed them—yet, though passed her from hand to hand with sour looks and a source vague feelings of mortification did cross her mind, when prognostication—that " she would be horribly ugly"—one she looked at the growing forms and bright complexions of them even saw far enough into the future to foretell of her sisters, (for some children come early to the power that she would be "short of capacity." Now, the Albany of drawing comparisons), and though, in particular she children had all of them hitherto been remarkable for per. wept a whole day, seized with a sudden horror at having sonal beauty.- "Never mind, ma'am," said an old blunt seen a caravan drawn past the avenue gates, with the nicservant, who had been domesticated in the house for many years, and, by some passing word let fall, caught that her mistress was dismayed at the idea of having the symmetry and look at the Dwarf"—though these things, I say, trough the flock disturbed by one less fair than the rest—bled her with a passing and keen trouble, she was, on the "never mind, ma'am," said this Christian comforter; " I whole, the happiest of all the Albany children-tossed about promise you she won't live long to trouble nobody."

it was a certainty that she must be crooked if she grew be always a sight," he now would say—"but she is a up. As a baby, she had cried incessantly—Mr. Albany will leave her a legacy—as she is so much with them—sereaming of children (even his own) was a nuisance not to be foreign. "The that shift are not she will be always a sight," he now would say—"but she is a happy little thing—and I hope that our aunts, Mrs. Albany, was a humorist—a man of musical ear—to whom the sereaming of children (even his own) was a nuisance not be foreign. to be forgiven. "Take that child away," he would say __ old maids." "I cannot bear to hear her. What a temper she will have, poor little thing!" Mrs. Albany had always been talked reply; "we cannot expect the luck of getting them all of as a foolishly indulgent mother—this time, however, married." she was resolved not to "spare the rod and spoil the was yet ulive—just alive and no more—"Such an ex-stars of a summer night," (so said a drawing-room poet); pense as the child is in medical attendance?" Mrs. Al-while their poor mother, now past offering any assistance bany would say to her neighbours-"well, I am no Crosto her fate, was fain to exchange the estate in which she sus-and must save it in her education. She must learn had loved to hear herself called a that young-looking pretty what she can, and how she can; I cannot afford both woman," for the cares and responsibilities of chaperonage medicine and masters"—and, as she finished this charming —to attend balls in which she could not take an active motherly speech, she turned to a glass to arrange a bunch part—to manage and manœuvre conquests for others, and of fuchsias in her still rich hair, which had been brought not herself. And she did plan, and manage and manage. her from Paris-"a real bargain-no wearing English ver her seven beauties in succession with consummate flowers-so horridly coarse!"

Poor child!—she began by disappointing the hopes of and cast out in their childhood. This it is which gives both parents in her sex. Seven girls already!—and Mr. its charm to that sweetness of all sweet fairy tales—and Mrs. Albany people of by no means East Indian wealth—it may be supposed how they hoped and prayed that the new comer should be a boy. The mother, too, was amazement of her envious sisters and the eclipsing of their still young and pretty, (she had been married at the unripe carefully planned splendour—not the mysterious vanishing age of sixteen) and looked with dismay at the lengthening of her finery when the clock struck twelve—nor yet the deline of daughters, each of which would have to be "brought lightful pertinacity of the little glass slipper in refusing to out" in her turn. She regarded the coming days of cha- fit any foot save the right one-it is not these incidents in peronage with horror; fears of needy young men, and themselves, fascinating though they be, which make us feel envious dowagers—and visions of matronly hats and card such a loving faith in the tale—ay, a faith, even in these tables "out of the way of the dancers"-" cast their days of scorn and unbelief-it is the idea that higher powshadows before," and distressed her in her sleep. Had it ers look down upon the "desolate and oppressed"—that been only one, or even two daughters, she could have good angels are working to deliver those whom man rearmed herself with reason and philosophy-but eight!- foses to aid-it is the pure and holy moral of the fable in it was too much !- " Mr. Albany, my dear," she would say which we delight-and which many a child, crouching over the fire, and perhaps tyrannized over and neglected, like poor Cinderella, has felt without knowing it!

> But what have we to do with digressions into fairy land, when a tale is to be told? Let us return to it.

Four more years passed away. Juliana Albany was In another point of view, my heroine was less welcome still puny-still plain-and so very short of her age, that without regard or indulgence, and expecting none-gleaning Juliana did, however, live on—"a poor, puny thing," as up odd knowledge, no one knew how—with the sweetest Nurse had called her, with a sallow complexion and huge black eyes—and a form so slender, even to fragility, that

"Never mind, my love," his philosophical wife would

Time went on-and the Misses Albany began to grow Two-three-four years passed away-and Juliana up, and to come out one by one, "shy and lovely as the wers—so horridly coarse!"

skill. Agatha, the eldest, who was foolish to the utmost Well—it is a happy and consoling superstition (if reason forbid us seriously to enroll it among the articles of dancing, and a peculiarly graceful twist of her ringlets; our belief,) to trust that a peculiar Providence watches Kate, the second—"lively kitty," as her mother would call over and cherishes those who are unnaturally neglected her, when any body was within hearing—was intended was true that a sarcastic neighbour had said on hearing proach, and had been driven about with as little remorse as this well-worn remark—" Ay, free enough in all conscience; her prototype in the fairy-tale. a few liberties are nothing in her way;" but Mrs. Albany had not heard the mot, and cried up her sweet Phæbe's To match a classic model when perfectly at rest. tising by the hour together !- what music-chairs, with ties; she was exact, scrupulous, punctual to a fault; and, she had said it was a pleasure." Mrs. Albany had not you will be an old maid to a certainty!" waited for the close of her remark, delivered sotto roce to a gentleman present-"a pleasure to get the thing over."

endowed with beauty." Mrs. Albany had begun by being self up in his own mansion and brooding over his loss sunny hair-but I have summed up her perfections-she so there was nothing for it but keeping them as much in and most unpleasant, they were, strange to say, the seven marry the duet!-Juliana was to go to her grand-aunts: Misses Albany still, at the time when the eighth, the for- they were about to move to Worcester, for the sake of the gotten Cinderella of the family, was beginning to shoot gentility of the place, and she was a notable packer of china pass the Rubicon, so important to young ladies, and come no one else could. up, and when the time approached that she, too, should and nick-knacks, and could keep the old ladies quiet, when then called home again, to be drudge and cipher among her a general chorus of "Charming!" "Handsome!" "Desisters; our little maiden, it must be whispered, in spite lightful!" "So gentlemanly!" and other exclamations—of, or because of, all this unkindly training, was in heart Juliana meanwhile went quietly into the inner drawing-and understanding worth the whole of them put together! room to pack up an old guitar—almost her only possessing the state of the

to charm by her high spirits; and her artless rattling She was gentle and affectionate, for she had been taught gaiety was deemed particularly suitable to exhibit to very the real value of kindness; observant, for she had been young officers and country squires, more burdened with compelled to discover every thing for herself; cheerful, acres than brains-to such men as "had a confounded for she required no luxuries; modest and self-postponing horror of blue women." Pheebe drew wonderfully well - she was sure to be, when from her youth upwards she sketched from nature with amazing freedom of hand. It had heard little save the language of command and re-

She was not very beautiful-if it be beauty's test

simple tastes, her aversion to society, far and near, and, in Neither had she been ever allowed any of the advantages accepting an invitation for her, would smile and hesitate, of dress, and had been merely permitted, as it were, to and say-"If we can tempt Phobe." She was laid out glean her dancing and music from her sisters' lessons; for the benefit of the studious. Clara and Caroline, twins, in short, she was "poor Juliana!" But she was sincere were to make their way to matrimony by their music—and kind-hearted, and, as for beauty—Time has sometimes "just of a height—the nicest duct imaginable;" and much cosmetics and clixirs, as well as corrosives! It must be had the family endured to bring this to pass:-what prac-confessed, however, that she, too, had her own peculiariunright, uneasy backs, always in the way, especially of whenever she was summoned by the skill of her fingers the very weary !-what torturing of tuneful voices !- or wits to repair some blunder of her sisters', caused by Masters, however, had achieved wonders; and, it was told their opposite habits, they would cry with one accord, in triumph, "that they had sung with Mrs. Salmon, and even while profiting by her assistance-"O poor Juliana!

Great was the commotion in Albany Hall-Lord Great Martha, the sixth of this bevy of fair maidens-whose ford coming on a visit! coming alone, too, for he had parbeauty, I should have said, was of that evanescent nature, ticularly begged that no one might be asked to meet him which passes away with early youth-Martha was scien- -was ever such a piece of good luck? Mr. Albany had tific, the mistress of more dogies than it would be either known his father at College, and, when he had died sudsafe or amusing to enumerate. She was the delight and denly, and the heir was summoned home from the continent patroness of all wandering lecturers, and her name was to attend the funeral, what was simpler than that he should noised abroad as one who had a sincere thirst for know- ask him-almost a stranger in his own county-to come ledge, "very remarkable in a lady so young and so richly over for a while to Albany Hall, instead of shutting himsuspicious of this line; but ever after a certain Dr. Von (for he was one of the heirs who do not forget the deceased Puffenhausen had brought a letter of introduction to Mar-parent in the noble inheritance.) Nevertheles, simple as tha from some equally great man in London, and had all this was, Mrs. Albany exalted it into an act of the looked over her collection of fossils, much to his own pro- highest paternal affection. "Such a father!" said she, fit, (so he declared), even Mrs. Albany began to think that with tears in her eyes, to every one of her daughters in learning was not "better than houses and lands," but that turn, save the forgotten Juliana. When the visit drew it might possibly be bartered for those useful commodities, near, however, she was seized with a misgiving-there Jemima-to conclude this weary catalogue and come to were so many among which to choose! "Lively Kitty" our heroine—was the beauty of the family par excellence, accordingly was despatched to a neighbouring town, on a and did infinite credit to the hints she had received on the visit to a lady, whose house was always full of red-coate grace of certain attitudes, and how deep blue eyes were Martha permitted to join a party on a geological tour in best brought into play. At home or abroad, in church or South Wales. Mrs. Albany had an instinct that his lordin a ball-room, she was always sitting for a picture; now ship would not like fun, and might be frightened with dreamily bending over a book on her knee, (she had a fee- science. Clara and Caroline were also felt to be rather in ble propensity for poetry), now tossing up a child with the the way, but three attempts to dispose of them for the time grace of a Ballatrice, now looking out of a window at being to a lady going to Cheltenham, who had expressed a that precise spot where the sunshine fell brightest on her wish for some lively young companions, had proved abortive; was a beauty, and nothing more. Such were the seven the back-ground as was possible-unless Lord Gresford Misses Albany; and what was startling, unintelligible, should prove fond of music, and, even then, he could not

Well, the day came; Lord Gresford arrived to a late Left entirely to herself, to learn or to refrain from learn-dinner, with such an establishment of luggage as promised ing, just as she pleased; sent away for weeks at one a long visit. Happy Mrs. Albany! It has been malitime to that dull prison, the house of her grand-aunts, clously whispered that, when dinner was over, the mother who were too grand to visit in so mixed a neighbourhood; and her five daughters burst into the drawing-room with

un

lo he te se th de will tal of sec of

sion. It had been discarded by all her sisters—but she And when its late at evening, ere his steed is in the stall, I think of all the dismat things that ever did befall—to get up at five o'clock the next morning—it was bitter, So all the pain is laid on me—Alas! that I were fair! bleak, January weather—to be sent away. She did not know why, but she felt unusally dull at the thoughts of The homely things thou showest me, they make my heart so sore! leaving home; meanwhile such an eager parley as this was going on round the drawing-room fire.

"Your myrtle green dress in the morning, Agatha—it

So here's my last, last, look on thee—Yot, would but I were fair!

makes you look so delicate."

derham ball?"

"If I mistake not," said sweet Phæbe, " he would preroom, and so," sighed she, " I am sure should I!"

Jemima was arranging her hair at the mirror-in such have you open the piano for the world. You can work at singer would let out her voice a little more."

your embroidery."

of sisterly affection, for some person to care for her; and Caroline with all their grand Italian ducts!" Betimes in scarcely knowing what she did, she just touched the cords the morning she was despatched, through a deep snow, on of the old instrument-while her heart was far away- her desolate journey. and murmured out rather than sung what her musical sisters would contemptuously call "one of her linsey-woolsey ballads." This was

THE HAND MAIDEN'S LAMENT.

O would that I were fair, Mirror!—O would that I were fair! From day-dawn until sunset, it is my only core—When I feak upon my hollow checks, and this pale faded hair, I weep till I am weary quite—"Alsa, that I were fair!"

For beauty is a blessed gift, whatever the degree; And, were it mine, the rest might have all money-bags for me— I've heard them preach that to the poor it is a griserious sourc; But, though the Priest tells always true—I would that I were fair!

In yonder walnut gallery, there hang in gilded frames. Full fifty pictures, at the least, of nobles and their dames, With lips like twin red cherries, so ripe and feash they glow, And keen dark eyes that follow me, whichever way I go; it is my chiefest holiday to look and linger there—And yet it always makes me sad—O would but I were fair!

And, when my day's work's over, and, through the evening gloof I see the swan-like ladies walk down the long gilded rooms— I crouch aside till they go by, like a poor, frightened hare; And yet their pride becomes them well—Alas! that I were fair!

And when their brother's in the court with hound and merry horn, And the young men allgo out with him to hunt the deer at morn, He'll speak so stein and look so dark, if he knows that I am there, And flown, if but my shadow pass—I would that I were fair!

Pve heard old Nurse and t' other maids a pretty tale admire,
Of one who sate all lonesome in the ashes by the fire;
Till a Pasry came and helped her, and brought her rich array,
And a King's son needs must marry her, for all the rest could say:
I think upon that story, till my fate I scarce can bear,
Por the good old times are past and gone—O would that I were fair

He little thinks how oft I've watched beside him as he slept, And a token his proud lady lust warm in my bosom kept, And twesty times a morn I pray before that lock of hair! ! O would that I were that lady !-O would that I were fair! VOL. XXVIII. PERRUARY, 1836.-15

Just as Juliana was ending her ballad, scarcely conscious "Yes, mamma-shall we take him with us to the Con-that she had been singing, there was a sudden pause in the gossip by the drawing-room fire.

"Hush, Juliana! what a noise you are making! Hush, fer a quiet ramble in the park to the glare of a public this moment! they are coming up stairs, and Lord Gresford can't abide music!"

"O my dear Mrs. Albany! who can have maligned me an attitude as Titian would have loved to paint. Un-so cruelly ?" said that nobleman, issuing from the inner luckily, the gentleman lingered in the dining-room, and the grace was lost!

drawing-room, which he had entered unperceived by another door. "I am almost a fanatico! What a charm-"No music to-night, Clara and Caroline-I would not ing ballad that was !- though I longed to beg that the

" You do like music, Lord Gresford! Clara! Caroline! Meanwhile, the neglected girl was in the inner drawing-open the piano immediately—you know I can't bear to see room, seated on a low ottoman, before the dull red fire, and it shut—O my lord! not that you should trouble yourself! lost in a reverie; of late she had begun to feel the pain of -find some duets-Italian or German, my lord, do you her situation as severely, as, of old, she had drunk with prefer?—I flatter myself you will be pleased with my terror at the thoughts of being a dwarf. Every one little girls. Mrs. Salmon said——." But Lord Gresford, seemed so happy and so hopeful, (she heeded not why) in who was an unluckily absent man, was looking around as the next room ! and she was to be banished to the cold, or-lif for something he could not find. Juliana did not make derly, severe, household of two old women, in which she her appearance in the drawing-room again-she was so was little more than an upper servant, without any one to ashamed of herself: "to think of his stealing in and heartake thought of her pleasure. She longed for the comfort ing her nonsensical ballad-when there were Clara and

> Time went on, and matters proceeded most satisfactorily; but Lord Gresford was the quietest of the quiet-the shyest of the shy: and though he was obviously struck with Jemima's beauty, he came and went, and went and came, and still he spoke not. The young ladies began to think him a bore; they were obliged to be so orderly and genteel whenever he paid a visit at Albany! And after lively Kitty returned from her visit (it was necessary to recall her, to prevent her running away with a young ensign who had not sixpence in the world), and, in her elegant phraseology, had declared him to be "such a stick of a beau" it required a stedfast contemplation of the glories of Gresford Manor -its lawns and its lakes-its plantations and its pineries -and its drawing-rooms and ante-drawing-rooms-it required frequent meditations on its owner's services of gold plate, said to be among the finest in the kingdom-on the value of the family jewels—and undisputed perfection of his equipages—it required all these, and more such comfortable reflections, I say, to make the Albany damsels consider his presence other than as a nuisance.

> "A pretty amusing husband you will have, Mima," said lively Kitty, one evening, (when the girls were sitting over. the fire of that same treacherous inner drawing-room)-"he said six words at dinner; just these: 'Will-you-take—some—wine?' and 'Yes?" She could mimic his peculiar tone admirably.

"O, Kitty, don't for Heaven's sake-do n't kill me with laughing! especially as I shall have to give it up, if -you know what-happens. O dear, he is a bore! and ometimes I can hardly keep from yawning in his face. I will have one or other of you always with me."

" And such fun we will have, Mima !- Hush !- did you

all parties, far and near, in this way-poor little thing !- of her's can and will make an heiress of her." they'll turn her head, and she'll set up for a wit next !- ha ! ha!

"And a beauty, Kitty! ha! ha! ha!"

"And she sings at parties," cried Clara and Caroline, in a breath: "sings to that old twangling guitar of her's-Colonel Ross heard her-ha! ha! ha!

logue. On the next morning, Lord Gresford was called her, before I well knew what I was about; and she-Gad away from Albany Hall by sudden and pressing business -he returned thither no more.

Months passed away-a year-and Juliana was still at Worcester. Her selfish mother would have fain cut short the only happy time she had ever known-but her father was more kindly. "No, Mrs. Albany-she shall lowing day; for Kitty had only heard the troth, in the rustay with my aunts, as long as they wish-she seems contented and enjoying herself, and they will doubtless provide for her handsomely. Have we not girls enough at home?"

"How broad you are, Mr. Albany !- as if my daughters were not an ornament and blessing to any house!"

"I know who pays the milliner's bills," replied he, drily and decidedly. "Remember, I will not have Juliana sent for!" So at Worcester Juliana remained.

one of the best houses in that pleasant city, at which all that was rich and gay and aristocratic in the neighbour-when she was in a thoughtful mood—and, as her mind had developed itself rapidly during the time when she colonels and captains, a Right Honorable or two-eards had been living a life merely of pleasure and indulgence, in one room, chess in another, dancing in a third, in a fourth, a supper splendid enough to deserve a separate and systematic chronicle—a marquee upon the lawn, with co-loured lamps and a band of music—in short, it was the fete of the Worcester season. But veteran whist-players left their whist-tables, and the gay tent was deserted, and the her, silent, nervous, and blushing, (for there are yet men dance stood still, and a crowd came eagerly thronging in who can blush). He had taken a tremendously bold step from the supper-room—to listen to a ballad sung by the

could give me! You know I can't bear any thing public banies yet?" Lord Gresford started at the name, and walked away.

"At all events," replied the first speaker, "they have in his possession!

not taught him to leave off blushing. There he goes Brereton—I never saw such a fellow—he can't stand a word person," said he, while she rose quietly, yet little surprised, of raillery."

"Nay-if he be really smitten

"Smitten !-why, so is every body !-she's as fascinat ing a girl as I ever saw !—lady-like, clever, and not too have been, "Oh, my lord, you have no occasion to intro-clever—and thoroughly unaffected. Not a bit of the Al-duce yourself—no one that has seen Lord Gresford bany about her—you may be sure she has been the drudge of the family. I have seen the beauty and the wit, and, ing, and wondered what had brought him there. by Jove, I'd as soon marry a wax doll as the one, or a Judy out of a puppet-show as the other—such airs and vulgarity finding that he did not speak, and thinking he might be —you can't conceive any thing so detestable, Brereton."

"No-there was nobody!" said Jemima, "Mamma'st "Can't I?" replied his friend, drily. "I've seen the so busy over Juliana's letter-to think of our old aunts' geologist, and been coursed through her fossils-and I taking such a gay fit, in their dotage-It's the Worcester, have heard the musicians. Ah? you don't know the Alair, I suppose-balls, concerts, and oratorios-nothing but banics, I assure you, unless you have been hammered at by visiting! Heighe! I should not mind going to stay with Miss Martha, or tortured by 'Giorno d'orror,' from the flat and the sharp, as we used to call them. "I expect Juliana will die," said Kitty, "if she goes to be introduced to this one. They say those old great-aunts

"Thank you, I know her already-an heiress!-O, then that's the reason, is it, why she refused Sir Leonard Cochrane?"

"Refused !- By George !- and an Albany-Come, I won't believe that !"

"It is true, though-and, what is more, Brereton, she The laughing chorus rose high. Kitty had been right: did me the same honour the other night. We had been some one had heard the commencement of this choice dia- ralsing together, and I had said something very queer to -I can scarcely find in my heart to be angry yet-she did it so prettily—so sorry all the time, and blushed so-and she was as firm as a rock."

Juliana was dressed earlier than her aunts on the folmour of the "parties, far and near," at Worcester-and they were engaged to dine out. She went down to the library-a pleasant room it was, with the softest of easy chairs, and a latticed window, in which was set a rare china bottle full of choice flowers, some of which she had worn in her hair on the previous evening-and, to pass the time of waiting-(and, by the way, there is no tax upon human patience greater than abiding the determination of the toilette of a lazy and unpunctual person)took up her guitar, and began to sing the " Una volta" Spring came on. There was a large May-day party at from La Cenerentola. It was strange how she always involuntarily recurred to the music of that fascinating opera, such moods had become of frequent occurrence.

velvet fauteuil at her feet, and Lord Gresford stood before for a person so bashful as himself. Your bashful people despised Cinderella of her seven sisters—the neglected always do the most impudent things!—And he was further puzzled and thrown out by comparing the elegant, ther puzzled and thrown out by comparing the elegant, intelligent-looking girl, who sate before him, in a rich yet "No, no—not to-night!" whispered a gentleman to his intelligent-looking girl, who sate before him, in a rich yet simple evening dress—the belle of the ball-room—with friend. "Not in the midst of this mob, for any thing you the little brown shabby, neelected girl, who had been so the little. brown, shabby, neglected girl, who had been so I will call to-morrow, and introduce myself-if I choose," coolly thrust into the corner, at his first visit to Albany; "What, Gresford! have you not had enough of the Al- and whom, to say the truth, he should have quite forgotten, save for her artless singing of that old ballad. Time, as we said a while ago, has cosmetics, as well as corrosives, in his possession!

> "Really, I am afraid you will think me a strange bold to receive him; "but I know the rest of your family so well !- Lord Gresford."

Now Juliana, instead of the proper speech, which would ho ing In this the

deli

44

an

50

soot " she, chos hard I w her v

41 her n "Certainly not my lord—I am always glad to see any friend of my father's," was her simple answer.

The ignorant Juliana! Had her mother only seen her ever offered to a daughter of the house of Albany-how great would have been her disdain!

As it was the two sat down, and began to talk about the

in Worcester.

It was sultry, sulky midsummer evening-too hot for the car, and the most placid feel fevered as well as exhausted. The seven Misses Albany were lounging about which all remain Misses Albany-even unto this day. the drawing-room in as many relaxed attitudes, Jemima contriving to look just like the picture of a weary Bacchante; for she had twisted a vine-leaf or two in her hair, and left its rich curls fall loosely about her face; Martha, primmer than ever; and Kitty, laughing out of vacancy, and because she could do nothing else, though never a joke, FROM "INEZ DE CASTRO," AN UNPUBLISHED TRAold or new, would come-when the unexpected sight of a post-chaise, driving down the park, at once roused the sisterhood from their languor. With an eager " Dear !who can be coming?" they rushed to the windowseven Mr. Albany stepped out upon the verandah, curious as to who the new arrival would prove to be; while Mrs. Albany chose to go and trim a geranium which stood on the portico steps-(she never gardened save on such occasions). The vehicle after appearing and disappearing among the trees, at last fairly drew up. There was a universal scream, as much of surprise as pleasure—"Juliana!"

"Juliana come home!"

"How changed she is -grown quite a woman, I vow !"

"What is all this?" cried Mrs. Albany, contenting herself with a very trifing embrace. "What have you come glad to have you here again-but why did you not write?"

"I did, papa. But has not Gresford-Lord Gresforddelivered my letter?"

" No, he has not."

"Gresford, indeed!" echoed lively Kitty, sotto voce.

"Was there ever such a change ?-Worcester air, forsooth, and Worcester airs!"

"Then I must tell you myself, I suppose," continued she, when they had reached the drawing-room. " My aunts chose to go to Malvern for a few weeks, and-and I begged hard for them to let me come home while they were there, I wanted to see you all again," and she looked around her with a cheerful fondness which met no answer. "And -but has he not been here-Lord Gresford, I mean?"

"No, indeed!" replied Mrs. Albany, stately. "Come here indeed !- why, I should like to know?"

"To speak to my father," replied Julians, and without disguise. "He asked me to—to—" and she fell upon her mother's neck, and burst into tears.

"No-not for some months-I merely-I missed an And they were married before Autumn made brown introduction last night-you were so much surrounded- the woods of Gresford Manor. Kitty laughed, and atand I thought I might venture to stand my own friend to tempted to crack jokes at the wedding. Jemima essayed day. I hope I have not taken an unpardonable liberty." a scene, when her former admirer re-appeared at Albany -but for once failed in acting it gracefully. The rest of the sisters prudently thought of Christmas parties to come, and seasons in London, with all their five hundred dances perfect and indifferent case had she only known of the and delights, and gave their consent with a tolerable show two refusals she had given to the first decided proposals of warmth and affection. But Lord Gresford took his lady abroad for a year or two: and, on their return from Italy though he encouraged, and even surpassed his charming wife in every substantial kindness to her sisters, he showed guitar, music, and other such harmless matters. Lord less disposition to fulfil their expectations in the matter Gresford, however, stayed two months, instead of one week, of frequent and familiar intercourse than some might have thought natural. They were reduced, therefore, to the vainglorious (and to themselves painful) amusement of talking of the grandeur and prosperity of their sister, Lady walking abroad, too bright for remaining in the house-an Gresford, and the beauty of her four boys-for she bade evening when books lose their charm, and music irritates fair to be the mother of a line as long as the one whence she herself had sprung—the other links (or members) of

From the Amulet, for 1836:

HUNTING SCENE.

GEDY.

BY MISS MITFORD.

PERSONS OF THE SCENE.

Don Alphonso, King of Portugal. Don Manuel, his Minister. Count d'Aquilai, the Ambassador of Castile. Don Antonio, Don Garcia, Don Alvarez, Lords, Foresters, Huntsmen, &c. &c. Constance, Princess of Castile. Inez de Castro, a Spanish Lady attending on the Princes). Ladies.

ARGUMENT.

home for? I told you, Mr. Albany, they would be sending her home in this sudden way, some day or other—did I not? Old maids are always capricious. Well, Juliana, this visit must last you."

"How she is grown!" cried her father, delighted with the improvement in her looks. "Juliana, I am right closs are awakened of his attachurent to Inez de Castro, a Spanish lady attending on Constance; whilst Inez is a spanish lady attending on Constance; whilst Inez is a spanish lady attending on Constance; whilst Inez is a spanish lady attending on Constance; whilst Inez is a spanish lady attending on Constance; whilst Inez is a spanish lady attending on Constance; whilst Inez is a spanish lady attending on Constance; whilst Inez is a spanish lady attending on Constance; whilst Inez is a spanish lady attending on Constance. a Spanish lady attending on Constance; whilst Inez is herself sought in marriage by Don Manuel, the Prime Minister of King Alphonzo.

> Scene. The Forest of Setroal, near Lisbon. A Pavilion in the Back-Ground, > Enter Alphoneo, D'Aquilai, Manuel, Antonio, Garcia, LORDS, FORESTERS, HUNTSMEN, &c. CONSTANCE, IMEZ, and other Ladies.

Alph. NAY, nay, my royal huntress rest awhile In this fair forest-bower. Thou hast done enow For game to-day. Art thou not weary, Constance?

Const. No, not a whit. I love the pleasant toil O'erwell for weariness; and oft have tired Knights, squires, and dames, in our Castilian woods.

Alph. Aye, skill and liking are twin-born ; we love The art we have mastered; we excel in that We love. How many deer have died to-day By that fair slender hand?

Ant. Three, as I think. Gar. Four, surely, four.

D'Aquilai. No, three; -one at the brake; One standing by the pool; and one conched down Beneath the chesnut shade. Three deer have fallen By her unerring arrows.

Gar. A true eye!

Ant. And a sure hand! Alph. Fair princess, thou shalt be The goddess of the woods; hunters shall come To yield thee worship, as in times of old To crescented Diana; these huge trees Thy pillared temple; yonder seat thy shrine; And we thy priests, to chaunt triumphal hymns, And tend thy virgin altars. Rest thee, sweet, The sun rides high.

Ant. [apart to Manuel.] "Tis pity that Don Pedro Saw not the royal nymph. Her skill, her ardour, Matching his own, had scarcely failed to rouse The tardy wooer.

Man. [apart to Antonio.] Yet, Antonio, mark me, I speak not of this princely pair, but man As in the gross we view him-man loves not To see his cherished passions and pursuits Lie in faint shadow on a woman's mind, Reflected in that feebler element Like images in water, wavering, dim, Distorted. Love, like music, often lurks In seeming discords; and his subtlest springe Veils in strong contrasts. Mark me, Sir, I speak Of man in the abstract.

Alph. Lords, hath any seen My truant son?

Gar. My liege, one of his train, Lopez the falconer, says he saw him plunge Deep in the forest, as our stately show Of hounds, and horsemen, lords, and ladies gay, Approached to Setroal.

Aiph. Wild wayward boy! Count D'Aquilai, thy brave Castilian hounds Outvoice our Portugals, I deemed ye not So peerless in the chase; even these young minds Be gallant huntresses.

D'Aquilai. Save one, Fair Incz, Thou wast a laggard in our sylvan sport, And when thou cam'st across the prey wouldst tremble, Grow pale, and shuddering, turn thy steed away, As from a battle-field.

Inez. It is my weakness To quail at sight of death. Const. Of death!

Inex. Aye, even The death of these poor deer. They are so happy, So innocent, so beautiful, so made For life and joy. The sunbeams as they pierce The leafy cork-trees fall on their fine limbs With a gay glittering light; the painted wood-flowers Crowd round their delicate feet; the rivulets Whereat they slake their thirst dance sparkling by, Merrily, merrily, as pleased to view Each gentle head down-bending. Nature smiles On the fair harmless creatures; man bath taught them The world's worst lesson-fear.

Man. O gentlest maid ! Const. In sooth a goodly sermon! Inez. Yet I blame not Them who in manly hardihood of soul Find in the princely chase a princely joy;

Albeit mine own infirm and timorous spirit Shrink quivering from the sight. We differ all In temper as in feature. No two leaves Be quite alike, though growing on one tree. Man. Oh wise as gentle!

Const. A right sapient preacher!

Will no one take my veil? Where be my maidens!

Const. Begone! I need thee not; young Blanch! Beatrice !- Unaca! Be near me, damsels! Have I not said, Begone?

[then apart to one of her ladies.

Oh, how I lonthe The cold, reluctant, formal officer,-The ceremonial homage,—the lip-duty Of you smooth hypocrite! See how she stands With patient downcast looks seeming to shun The tender flatteries her feigned tears provoke. Ungrateful traitress! Unanca, it frets My very soul to see her with that air Of mute and sad submission, and to know The secret triumph of her thoughts!

[then to the king.

The day wears on. Alph. We are at thy dispose, Fair princess, thy vowed liegemen, to abide Here in thy sylvan reign, or tread once more The city, no less thine.

Enter ALVAREZ, seeking for some one amongst the comp ny in evident agitation and haste, which is particularly observed by INEZ.

Whom seek'st thou, Sir? Alv. So please you, Sire, the prince. Inez. Wherefore?

Ale, I hoped To find him here.

Alph. Seek him elsewhere, Alvarez;

He is not amongst us Inez. Hath aught ill befallen? What wilt thou of Don Pedro? Man. [to Alphonzo.] Mark, my liege! Inez. Can he not speak? Alph. Say forth thine errand!

Alv. Sire, A vague and nameless fear, too undefined

For words-Inez. On! on!

Alv. A fiery steed hath passed Without a rider, houselled royally.

Inez. Who saw him? Ale. A poor woodman.
Alph. Never doubt

But 'tis some courser of our train.

Inez. "Tis Pedro?

What colour were the housings? Crimson, wrought With gold?

Alv. I know not.

Inez. Wherefore brought ye not The woodman hither? 'Twas a fiery steed? Alr. Aye, one that seemed companion of the wind,

A wild steed of the desert. Tossing high His slender head and streaming mane, and spurning The very ground with his proud tread? a steed Untam'd untameable.

Inez. And black? Alv. As jet.

Inst. "Tis he! 'tis he!
Alph. Knows any man what horse !
Don Pedro rode to-day?

Gar. Last night, my liege,

I heard the prince give orders—at the roan— Inez. I saw him mount Black Saladin;—'tis he!

And he is dead!

Alv. Nay, lady—

Inez. Out on thee,

Foul raven !- messenger of il! !

Ale. Yet, grant

The steed were Pedro's, he may live.

Inez. Fly! Fly!

Search all the forest! Be ye men, and fly not To Pedro's aid? Oh, if I were as ye!— Fly! fly!

Gar. If suit the king's good pleasure-

Inez. If!

Why, is he not a father? Hence, and speed True tidings back!—The truth—the killing truth! Alph. Dispatch some skilful huntsmen, Don Alvarez,

To search the woods. [Exit Alvarez,

I join not this wild fear Knowing my son unmatch'd in sylvan craft.* And skilled to rule the stubbornest steed that e'er Spurned the hot sands of Araby.

Inez. He'll die!

He'll die!

Man. [to D'Aquilai.] Dost mark her? D'Aquilai. A strange passion!

D'Aquitai. A stra Const. Inez!

Inez. He'll die! he'll die!

Const. Command thyself! Arise!

Quell this strong agony which casts reproach Upon thy virgin fame. Arise!

Inez. I cannot.

Alph. Lady, what means this passion? At thy side Stands Pedro's plighted bride, with cheek unblanched, And lip unquivering, and calm, even pulse, Whilst thou....

Inex. She loves him not. But thou, his father?
Oh, canst thou dally here whilst thy brave son Lies perishing? Crushed underneath the hoofs
Of that fierce steed, or gorged by horrid tusks
Of fiercer boar—bruised, mangled, bleeding, dead?
Dead, or worse! worse! the fearful living prey
Of animals obscene, grim ravening wolves,
Rending the quivering limbs! whilst he—why waste ye
A moment in delay? Thou art a monarch;
Go, pour thy people, thy whole people, king,
Into the woods of Setroal to seek
And welcome thy brave son.

Alph. Go more of ye! [Exeunt Garcia and others.]
Her fears have an infection. Yet I doubt not
Of Pedro's safety; skilled as Theseus
To slay the beast of chase; active and strong
As great Alcides. Tush! he's safe. Yet, go!
[Exeunt lords, huntsmen, &c.

Go more of ye.

Man. Sweet lady, I would buy With limb or life, one heaving throb like that Which swells thy bosom now.

Inez. Hush!
Man. I would be

The wretch thy terror painted, mangled, bleeding, Dying that long and living death, to win One tear of thine. But thou from honest love Dost turn thee, Inex—

Inez. Hush, man, hush!

Man. With scorn

Bitter and hard to bear, whilst-

Inez. Hush, I say!

Do ye not hear a distant horn? Hark! hark!

D'Aquilai. Her sense is wandering.

Inez. Hark! the joyful sound

Lives in mine ears; the glad triumphant note,

Man. All is silence.

Inez. Hark!

Alph. Aye, now.

Inez. He lives! he comes! he's safe! Oh, thanks,

Thanks to all-bounteous heaven!

Alph. Support the lady.

Inez. Nay, I am well. He's safe !- He's safe !

Alph. She faints,

Bear her to the pavilion!

[Inez is carried into the tent, accompanied by one or two ladies.

Howsoe'er.

She knew the sound, the mot was Pedro's.

[then apart to D'Aquilai.

Count,

Was thy king mad that with his haughty sister. He sent this melting beauty?

From the Amulet for 1836. THE SQUIRE'S BARGAIN.

BY MRS. HOFLAND.

"I won't say your honour's made a bad bargain, for Cæsar's a good dog and up to much—but for sure, Caleb has got twice the money out of ye, he should have done." "A likely thing enough, girl, when one is dealing with

"I never cheated your honour, and many's the white crown I've taken at yer hands."

Mr. Beckenham, the gentleman to whom those words were addressed (the squire of the parish and lord of the manor,) who had just been purchasing a dog from the speaker's relative, readily owned this was true, and then whistling his dog to his side, passed forward; but, somewhat to his annoyance, the girl who had thus addressed him, took the same road.

Miriam Hassan was in truth a kind of privileged person; she was born a gipsy certainly, but her mother, having become, in the latter part of her life, the settled inhabitant of a hovel in the neighbouring village, and considered "a decent body," Miriam partook the good will extended to her, and they pity her own overwhelming grief and lonely situation as an orphan demanded. She did not however, assimilate with any person around her, and i, was undoubted, that all her attachments were to her kint

^{*}Don Pedro, of Portugal, is celebrated in history for being one of the most ardent and skilful in the long list of royal sportsmen. The number of horses, hounds, falcons, and other animals, trained to the pursuit of game, which were kept in his different palaces almost exceeds credibility. His very bed-chamber is said by the old chronicles to have been half-filled by his favourite dogs, whilst his hawks were perched even in the halls of audience.

Notes sounded on the horn at the death of the deer. A "mot" peculiar to himself was the frequent attribute of a distinguished hunter.

dred nomades, with whose wandering tribes she held fremerchandize as Miriam found most saleable through a when she gets there?" certain circle of the country where she constantly peramlihood.*

did his honour give a dinner (and he gave many,) without go to the house by a contrary path to that which he was Miriam and her donkey appearing, laden with the very pursuing, and take the dog with her. things in which cook or housekeeper found themselves deficient; and although there were times when she lay under the suspicion of dealing with a high, but improper personage, convenience induced them to deal freely with her. On these occasions, the head of the house not unfrequently became a party; and if it were in the cold season of the year, his gentle daughter frequently made her appearance also, with some article of warm clothing which might add to the wanderer's comfort, or some little donation in money, which might augment the slender provision of her fourfooted friend.

When this occurred, Miriam always obtained the praise due to gratitude and honesty, so that she had a right to utter the words we have recorded, and to look an appeal since I am certain she has no predilection in his favouras to their truth in the face of her customer, great as he was. Whether Miriam was duly instructed on the subject of the per-centage usually required upon perishable subjects of commerce, or whether she thought it right that the squire should be charged moderately for the carp taken from his own ponds, the pigeons furnished by his own dove-cote, the bares snickled in his own meadows, we know not-it is only certain, she was industrious in procuring immediately the dainties required, and moderate in the price she demanded. She had a peculiarity of manner which united archness and penetration, with anxiety to please and habitual civility; yet was by no means devoid of the characteristic freedom of observation, and carelessness of consequences, natural to one who owned no obligations of law or ceremony.

In the enjoyment of this mental liberty, and yet as it appeared, "on higher things intent," Miriam trudged by the side of Mr. Beckenham some time in silence; but, on his arrival at a gate opening into the park, she stepped forward, and, whilst undoing the latch, said, with a grave and mysterious air,-

"It's not altogether impossible, yer honour, I might say something that would just make yer heart some little easier. I've no great skill, mayhap, but such as I have, I'd be proud to use for yer honour."

Mr. Beckenham had started at the words which implied a suspicion of his heart being ill at case, for he could scarcely acknowledge it was so to himself, and for a moment he felt as if the gipsy girl had detected his emotions in no very creditable manner, and he muttered rather than answered,-

" Heaven from all creatures hides the book of fate," and for me hell shall never reveal it."

"There's a good deal passing on earth, Sir, by your leave, that may be seen and heard by them that fear the first and scorn the last, without just red rring to either. The dore in yer nest, and the woe in yer breast, ask only a father's care and a man's judgment."

"Woe! I have no woe, girl, thank God."

"A great solicitude's not a little sorrow to my mind, smith, your honourwhen it comes to a rich man's bosom."

"Solicitude!"

" Aye! just that, Sir. Ye would give a pretty bird to a quent intercourse. A donkey, which formed all her earth- gilded cage because it hangs in a goodly bower; but your ly possessions, being frequently loaded by them with such heart misgives ye, and says, 'Will my birdie sing or sigh

"How the plague could she read my thoughts so truly?" bulated in order to obtain what she called "an honest live- said Mr. Beckenham to himself, but to the young sibyl he vouchsafed no answer, but strode hastily forward in a That she had attained even in childhood, the occult manner that forbade intrusion, until perceiving that his knowledge once possessed by her mother, was always be- new purchase was paying his devoirs most assiduously to lieved by the servants at Beckenham Park, since never Miriam, from whom he was loath to part; he told her to > Mr. Beckenham, when freed from observation, began naturally to soliloquize on that which was upermost in his mind. "I have but one child, and it is natural that I should wish to marry her, and where could I look for a bushand so suitable in every respect as young Trevors? His father was my friend-our estates join-he is handsome, and highly educated-if he had not been my Emily's admirer, how much I should have wished him to become such. Why then should I hesitate in-- in-- what should I say? inducing her to accept him-insisting upon her doing it? So I certainly would, if she were not so yield ing, so gentle, so obedient to my wishes, that I know she would not refuse, yet might be unhappy in accepting,

"But this is nonsense-men ought to be in love, and Trevors is so; in woman such decided inclination is not called for. A good man's attentions, added to a good woman's sense of duty, never fail to create connubial happiness, and attachment of the most tender and enduring nature. But is Trevers indeed good enough to make my sweet Emily thus happy? Will he understand a creature so diffident and retiiring, and give her the support her real importance entitles my daughter to receive? Will he cherish her and indulge her as I have done, estimating her humility as a virtue, not presuming upon it as a me dium of his own authority? Oh! what a miserable old age should I have ensured, if, as the gipsy says, 'the dove in my nest' were removed thence to a kite's dwelling, or even to an engle's eyric."

At this moment Miriam approached him, leading the dog by a leash she had procured in his mansion.

"I thought it best to deliver Casar up to your honour's own hand, for he's mighty loth to leave me; he's a good dog, but truth to say, he has his fancies, and hates some particular persons wonderfully, so that he might do mischief amongst yer honour's company if not tied up."

" He does not fly at vagabonds and beggars, does he?" " No, Sir; there's no ingratitude in him, poor fellow; he loves his old friends, who have shared many a scanty bit

The squire felt that he had spoken unfeelingly, and, with a more kindly look, he said, " I hope the dog is not fierce towards clergymen? you would not teach him that, my good girl, I know."

"Oh! no, Sir! for was it not our own curate that brought Miss Beckenham to see my dear mother? and, for sure, I always thought it was like a saint fetching an angel to help a poor sinner. No! to my mind they are vile curs that bark at those who pray for us and teach us, whether they run on two legs or four. I don't know one man in the three next parishes who rails at ministers of any sort, that does so from any thing but shame or fear. There's our own black

"He's a bad man, sure enough, Miriam." .

"And the old general, who swears so and young dislikes? that's the question.

shy at any proud, hard-hearted man, and would snap at Miriam, still she seemed some way linked with the situathe king on the throne, if he were'nt (as they say he is,) tion of his family. Besides, Mr. Trevor had hinted somea real good-natured soul. But trust Cosar for never never thing about the partiality of his Emily for the curate as showing a tooth to a good man; and I'll be bound he'd being the true cause of her coldness to himself, and since die on the spot for you or your daughter."

"Well, we'll try him; but I think both you and the he not to inquire after it? dog are rather wiser than you ought to be, Miriam-you able to them, if aware of it."

that buy of the wicked and sell to the mean (and barring at the same time assumed a dark, mysterious air, and afyour honour, I've plenty such customers,) must see some feeted to talk of the conjunction of certain planets, and the thing of all sorts, especially in some cases, when one's not necessity of making an infusion of herbs by moon-light, as old ar yer honour's pedigree, nor as ugly as one's own and tracing circles in some magical incantation. donkey."

skin, and brilliance to her dark eyes, but she turned away covering bad designs, and punishing bad men. Tell me, speedily and was almost instantly out of sight, not how- in plain English, whether you think Mr. Monsal is at ever, till her late querist had pronounced an eulogy on his tached to any person in this neighbourhood?" daughter's discernment for calling her "as good as she was more effectually if her habits permitted it.

But Mr. Beckenham's guests were now assemblinghe adjourned to his dressing-room, and thence to the drawing-room, still accompanied by his new purchase. vor appeared, who was received naturally with more than of a lover." usual cordiality by the master, but with such outragious conduct on the part of the dog as to alarm the whole par. the gipsy, resuming her oracular sententiousness ty, and occasion, of course, the expulsion of the offender, who was carefully immured for the rest of the day.

ing out to a stranger guest some admired points in the she uttered these words,prospects from the window. Mr. Trevor stood beside them at the time; but, on its being remarked, that the young clergyman, who was their latest visitant, was coming down the terrace, he turned away with an air of discurate ?"

"Why not? He has been detained by doing his dutybesides, letting alone his office, which is sacred, and entitles him to respect, Mr. Monsal is a gentleman by birth, he did or did not pay his addresses to the general's niece?" a distinguished scholar, and a worthy man: brother, too, to one of the bravest naval officers in our service."

"He may be all that, and more, for ought I know, but his own pulpit cushion."

vantage at his own table as on this eventful day; for not become one." only was his mind troubled and his prospects blighted, but his conscience awakened, and continually whispering bled, but was silent, and his looks seemed to depend on words of blame to one, who, with abundant wealth, had her's for the power of revelation." allowed himself to hanker after more; and who, after carefully educating his daughter as a religious and virtuous woman, had yet been willing to peril her present and "Yet she told me but this moment that "The foam of eternal happiness, by marrying her to one whose estates the sea" would tell me every thing I wished to know. he had examined, but whose principles and disposition he Surely it is hard that such a father as I have been should Further conversation with Mr. Trevor confirmed his moment!" fears, and also his resolution to dismiss his suit, and hav- "Dear father, the truth is, that Captain Monsal (you

"Aye, aye, girl, you're right; but who is it that the dog | girl, for, although he felt pretty sure the dog's aversion to

Mr. Trevor belonged to the individual, rather than to gene-"All cross, ill-tempered, cruel people. He will look ral intuition, and might be naturally accounted for by Miriam also had coupled their names very closely, ought

The gipsy girl had always her share of the broken vicknow more of your neighbours than would be quite agree- tuals after a great dinner, therefore she was easily found; and when Mr. Beckenham showed a desire to ask her a "They that wander by bush and dingle, late and early, few questions, professed a readiness to answer them, but

" Nonsense !" cried Mr. Beckenham " leave off moon-As Miriam spoke a deep blush gave richness to her olive light rambling, you will spare Casar the trouble of dis-

"Yes! he loves General Davie's nicce; and he will marpretty," and promising himself that he would befriend her ry her too, sooner than he expects, for the general died of gout in the head not an hour ago. Mr. Monsal entered your house by the library as I came to the kitchen."

"Umph! I will tell him the news, and see how he is affected by it; but, surely, he never could be such a fool as Guest after guest entered, and all was well until Mr. Tre- to think of my Emily-and she-she has never thought

"'The foam of the sea' alone can answer that," said

The squire, too much agitated to laugh at her pretensions, hastened to the library-he found his daughter A shade came over the heart and reached the brow of seated at her piano, just beginning to sing a song which their entertainer, which he endeavoured to banish, by point. Mr. Monsal was placing before her, and, to his surprise,

> "The foam of the sea on this bosom may rest, The foam of the sea

"What can you possibly mean-what are you singing dain, saying, "Surely, Sir, you did not wait dinner for the Emily?" This question to the timid, and, as she thought discovered girl, was unanswerable. She appealed to Mr. Monsal by a look, which in her father's opinion, gave the lie to Miriam's assertion, and he hastily inquired, "Whether

> "I do, my good sir; and most fervently do I love and esteem her: but you know her uncle's unhappy prejudice."

" Aye, aye, I know all that is unhappy about him-but I confess I dislike all men of his cloth; and I am sorry to that is past-he will no longer oppose you-no raptures say Miss Beckenham seems partial to them-she has on the subject, but tell me at once what you mean-what given the last hour entirely to the rector, who is as deaf as my daughter means by the "Foam of the sea," they seem to me simple words, but I am convinced they have a Poor Mr. Beckenham, habitually hospitable and inten-meaning-a connexion, a something, that is cabalistic, tionally polite and attentive, never appeared to such disad and understood only by the initiated—of whom I mean to

The curate looked in Emily's eyes-she blushed, trem-

"I must ask Miriam, the gipsy girl, for explanation."

"She can give you none I am sure," said the curate.

had taken on trust, in a case demanding rigid scrutiny. seek to learn from her, what Emily could tell me in a

ing done so, he felt an uncontrollable desire to see the gipsy know Captain Monsal) wrote this song "that this gentle man composed it, and that I was going to play it-and-| William Cobbett was of a class perfectly distinct from and-in short-to sing it."

have a large independent fortune in right of your beloved great things for them. But though not of such a sordid mother-what signifies my opinion?"

very power which sealed my lips-without your approbation I never marry."

a seclusion which has made you too timid, and nearly led bies of his were often mere senseless vagaries, and men me into a fatal error. How much I have feared and suf- could not submit to be rough-ridden by one of themselves. fered, only myself and the gipsy knows; she shall be well cared for, cunning and trickey as she is, for the girl is rational point of view, than Baron Glenely, than my Lord truly modest, and has a thankful heart. Bow, wow, wow; Brougham and Vaux, or than the self-appointed "member now crowding on us are not matter for light gratulation- regret, too, is increased by the reflection that he was a your happiness, dear Monsal, is connected with an awful genuine English writer. There was a substance about him removal, and even ours, sweet as it is, yet tells us to 'rejoice with trembling."

From Fraser's Magazine

WILLIAM COBBETT, M. P. FOR OLDHAM.

Among the various classes of characters which may be months had removed the first momentary excitement. discerned in our political hemisphere, there are three which stand in a conspicuous light. Of one of these classes the subject of our last Gallery-portrait was an excellent representative. A second is well seen in the person of him of tials his career was that of a barque on a trackless ocean, whom we are now to speak. A third has no better type and exemplar than in Henry Brougham. The prominent characteristics of these classes may be thus particularised: I. Enthusiasm. II. Self-will. III. Political trading.

We observed last month-and it is a fact of which all who observed his progress are well aware—that with Mi-chael Thomas Sadler every thing was sacrificed to his plans of benevolence. As a public man, of undisputed power, no one can doubt that he might have rendered more pervice to his party than he actually did, had he entered with more zeal and interest into the politics of the day .he was an enthusiast.

Turn to the opposite class-to that which forms our third division-and see how differently such men as the first writing an elaborate defence of slavery; and then, jun." announcing "the extreme illness" of the writer's when the tide turned that way, becoming an apostle of the father. Then comes the following statement, signed by when the tide turned that way, becoming an apostle of the abolition cause. Look at the Grants and Macaulays, writing against reform in the Edinburgh Review; and then 19th. refuting their own articles, when it became politic to do so, on the floor of the House of Commons. Is not the whole above are realized, and that the hand which has guided this game as open and obvious as possible? These men have work for thirty-three years has ceased to move! The reada certain quantity of what is called talent to sell; and they ers of the Register will of course, look to this number for each of these two. His mind was not full of zeal for the "And is that all? It is fear truly."

"Not all, dear father—not all—poor Monsal has long keting plan of the "young men of talent." He rather loved your Emily; and, certainly, I—do not blame me, I aimed to force his way by dint of muscular power; and never will marry, but I confess-I do confess that I love to a certain extent he succeeded. His sympathies were m."
with the people; and had he but possessed some moral and "But you won't marry him, you say—why not, you religious principle, he would probably have wrought out other—what signifies my opinion?"
soul as the regular place-hunters of our second class, he "Signifies! Oh, surely, every thing to me—it was that was yet a self-seeker. The first idea in his mind was ever, -WILLIAM CORBETT! It was this that effectually prevented his usefulness. Whatever whim he took up, right "But I give it you, my child, in this case, fully, freely, or wrong, it became his rule, for the exaltation of himself, -we have been both to blame-I have brought you up in to force down the throats of his followers. But these hob-

Infinitely more respectable, then, in every just and ah, Cosar! my fine fellow, you shall never want a bone, of the supreme council,"—we have yet to regret in Wil-while Beckenham woods have a bough; but the events liam Cobbett the waste of great and noble powers. Our -a reality, a durability. The effect of his sayings and doings vanished not away, like the excitement of a Shiel or Macaulay "flare-up," feaving one to wonder, the next hour, at what we had been startled, and by what we had been pleased. The value of his reasonings, whatever it was, was at least a real one; and you returned to his argumentation with at least an equal interest, when weeks and

But the one thing which William Cobbett wanted was sound moral principle, flowing, as it ever must, from correct religious knowledge. In the absence of these essenwithout a compass, and beneath a cloudy sky. Often on a right tack, but ever so by accident, we see in him a striking example of the waste and inutility of the most stupendons talents, when unchecked and undirected by correct principle, they become the senseless agents of Self-

From the Spectator.

a ne pati or bait Than yell

m ci w ar se po sh lit th ha

DEATH AND CHARACTER OF WM. COBBETT.

Mr. Conserr died on Thursday morning. He broke down, as our readers will recollect, in the attempt to address But with him this was impossible. His whole heart and the House of Commons on Lord Chandos's motion for the soul, mind and sterngth, were prescupied. In other words, repeal of the Malt-tax. We noticed at the time that his physical powers were giving way, and that it was no temporary or accidental malady under which he laboured.

The circumstances of Mr. Cobbett's last illness are Broughams, the Grants, the Macaulays, the Palmerstons, detailed, briefly, in the Weekly Political Register published panage matters. They, too, can talk of philanthropy, and this morning. First, there is a short bulletin, dated on the of that most volubly and pathetically. Look at Brougham, first writing an alchemic of the control of " John M. Cobbett," and dated from Clifford's Inn, on the

"It is my mournful duty to state, that the forebodings work for thirty-three years has ceased to move! The readare watching and tending the market in the best way they some particulars of the close of my poor father's life; but can. Macaulay has sold his article for 10,000 ayear they will I am sure, be forgiving it they find them shortly (and no one can doubt his talent as a huckster); Grant stated. A great inclination to inflammation of the throat and Brougham for 5000 each; and so on.

malt-tax, my father attempted to speak, but could not make But he had none of these. his voice audible beyond the few Members who sat round him. He remained to vote on that motion, and increased bear up for a lengthened period against his multiplied ap hoarseness and inflammation. On Thursday night last, opens a book of caricatures." he felt unusually well, and imprudently drank tea in the open air; but he went to bed apparently in better health. strain. In the early part of the night, he was taken violently ill, and on Friday and Saturday was considered in a dangerous state by the medical attendant. On Sunday, he revived again; and on Monday, gave us hope that he would yet be well. He talked feebly, but in the most collected and sprightly manner upon politics and farming; wished for "four days rain" for the Cobbett corn and the root crops; and, on Wednesday, he could remain no longer shut up from the fields, but desired to be carried round the farm; which being done, he criticised the work that had been going on in his absence, and detected some little deviation from his orders, with all the quickness that was so remarkable in him. On Wednesday night, he grew more and more feeble, and was evidently sinking; but he continued to answer with perfect clearness every question that was put to him. In the last half hour his eyes became dim; and at ten minutes after one P. M., he leaned back, closed them as if to sleep, and died without a gasp. He was eeventy-three years old; but, as he never appeared to us to be certain of his own age, we had some time ago procured an extract from the Register of Farnham parish, in which it appears that the four sons of my grandfather, George, Thomas, William, and Anthony, were christened on the 1st of April 1763; and as Anthony was the younger son and William was the third, we infer that he was born one year before he was christened, that is, on the 9th of March 1762. He might therefore have been older, but not much."

The newspapers have not suffered the death of this cimens of their obituary remarks. The following are from the Courier: though severe, they are discriminating and just.

" A part of Cobbett's excellences, as well as of his defects, may be fairly ascribed to his deficient education, and the circumstances under which he was originally placed. He was at once the clearest and most convincing, the coarsest and most abusive of writers. He had no rival in the art of setting subjects in the perspicuous and the most ludicrous points of view. While he boldly attacked some, he was a land, more, we do not scruple to say, than had been done slave to other national prejudices quite as gross. He dealt by Mr. Pitt himself, from his unaided exertions. This is little in general declamation, but was most liberal of epi-thets, which he poured forth with unsparing profusion. He had no depth or originality. He saw clearly the outside of a subject, but he saw nothing of its interior, and had no comprehension of general principles. Hence his intolerable dogmatism, the unhesitating confidence of his predictions, and the frequency with which they were contradicted VOL. XXVIII. JANUARY, 1836 .- 16, years, and, as he got older, it enfeebled him more. He by the course of events. But with all these defects, he was suffering from one of these attacks during the late acquired at one time very great influence, which he would spring, and it will be recollected, that when the Marquis have preserved and increased had he possessed any real of Chandes brought on his motion for the repeal of the respect for principle, for truth, or for the feelings of others.

"His extraordinary talents as a writer enabled him tohis ailment; but on the voting of Supplies on the nights of tacies and contradictions; and from 1800 to 1810 his Friday the 15th, and Monday the 18th of May, he exerted Register enjoyed a wonderful circulation and influence. himself so much, and sat so late, that he laid himself up. But the disgust occasioned by his unceasing tergiversa-He determined, nevertheless, to attend the House again on tions, the grossness of his scurrility, his virulent invectives the evening of the Marquis of Chandos's motion on Agriculagainst those he had formerly lauded as his best friends, tural Distress, on the 25th of May; and the exertion of and the total failure of his promises and predictions, despeaking and remaining late to vote on that occasion were stroyed his ascendancy, and reduced the number of his too much for one already severely unwell. He went down readers to a mere handful. Latterly, indeed, most of those to his farm early on the morning after this last debate, and by whom his Register was bought, looked into it merely had resolved to rest himself thoroughly and get rid of his on the principle that one looks at the antics of a bear, or

The Standard writes in a different and far more enlogistic

"No man has written so much upon public affairs, and we think no man has written so well. In the attributes of a severely correct and unaffected, a clear and a vigorous style, Mr. Cobbett was wholly without a rival, we venture to affirm, since the day of Swift; nor did this necessary staple of good writing want the ornaments of copious and striking illustration, or strong and well-connected argument. From the immense magazine of Mr. Cobbett's voluminous compositions may, without difficulty, be collected samples of the highest eloquence to be found in our language; while it would be nearly impossible for the most malignant jealousy to winnow from the mass a single dull or feeble article!

"Gifted with the most extraordinary powers of intellect, and the clearest original views of what is right and profitable to mankind-instinctively imbued, too, with generous and manly sympathics—more than half the deceased gentleman's life has been engaged in a course of at least questionable hostility to the institutions of his country, and in a bitter warfare with all around, of all parties, about which there can be no dispute. There was much in the circumstances of Mr. Cobbett's early life, and in the state of society in our age, to account for, and therefore to excuse this seeming paradox. Born a peasant, in a day of wealth-idolatory-uneducated and plain in his tastes and attainments, amongst a people of much fallacions and artificial refinement—the son of the Farnham cottager would originally feel his own intellectual superiority a perextraordinary man to pass unnoticed, and we subjoin spe. petual prompter to despise the system in which he moved.

> "His first desertion of the Tory party has been ascribed to a gratuitous insult offered to him by Mr. Pitt, who, with a superciliousness that clouded his great qualities, affected so much of aristocratic morgue as to decline the introduction of Mr. Wyndham's protégé; Mr. Wyndham being a person of higher genealogical rank than Mr. Pitt, and the person proposed to be introduced, Mr. Cobbett, being the man who, after Mr. Burke, had done incomparably the most for preserving the institutions and the honour of Engthe common version of Mr. Cobbett's abandonment of Tory politics. We believe it is a correct one; it is, undoubtedly, confirmed by the marked and disgraceful neglect. of Mr. Cobbett's services, during the interval from his return from America to the period of his change."

The Morning Chronicle has supplied a brief memoir of Mr. Cobbett, as well as some remarks on his character as a Cobbett's life. In fact, he has been so continually before seventy-three. moment, and died with perfect composure.

of the works of Peter Porcupine, Cobbett states that he was that he uttered, was important in his own estimation, he is born in 1766. As, however, we have derived the above the constant theme of his voluminous writings. particulars from his family, there can be no doubt of their "It would be vain to deny that William Cobbett was one accuracy; and it would anpear, therefore, that he was of the most powerful writers that England has ever proinaccurately informed as to the particulars of his early life, duced. He full keenly and observed accurately, and he on his return from America to England in 1801.

word. His father possessed a small piece of ground at mated as his first American pamphlet, published in the full Farnham, in Surry; and Cobbett himself was brought up tide of youthful vigour. The wonder is, how a man writas a common agricultural labourer. In 1783, he quitted ing every day for upwards of forty years should never exhis father's roof, and repaired to London; where he suc. hibit any symptoms of coldness or indifference, but comceeded in finding employment in the office of an attorney, municate to his pages a constant interest. Having enlisted as a common soldier, he was sent to Nova

England under very favourable circumstances. went even so far in the House of Commons as to declare enmity and become the object of his abuse. that a statue of gold ought to be erected to him. His health was drunk at Tory dinners throughout the island. did not rank high. He never saw the whole of a subject; His letters on the subject of the Treaty of Amiens profavourably; but to him he became also hostile.

imprisonment in Newgate, and a fine of 1000l. From an became more Saxon.
idea that he would be deprived of his liberty, under an "Though Cobbett public man and an author. We give the article entire. the public during the last forty years, and his Register is "This powerful and original writer died yesterday, at so complete a record of all that he has said and done, felt ten minutes past one P. M., at his farm in Surry, aged and thought, that there is no man, perhaps, of whom so He retained his faculties till the last little can be told that would be new to any class of readers.

"Cobbett was purhaps the greatest egotist that ever "In an account of himself, to be found in the collection lived; and as every thing that he did, and every sentence never failed to make a strong impression on his readers. "Cobbett was a self-taught man, in the true sense of the His last Register, published on the 13th instant, is as ani-

"As an advocate he was without an equal. In that Scotia, and attained the rank of Sergeant-Major. On the first of requisites—the statement of a case—he particularly return of the regiment to England, he became involved as excelled. He instinctively seized on the circumstances prosecutor in a court-martial, but did not await the issue. which favoured the views he wished to support, and he He left England for France, and sailed from a French port seldom failed to produce the impression at which he aimed to the United States; where he maintained himself for What he could not effect by direct statement, he attained some time by teaching English to Frenchmen. At that by inuende. He was shrewd beyond most men, and he time the French, or democratic party in America, were could detect and expose a subterfuge more successfully than loud in their abuse of England: and Cobbett was induced most men. But after all, Cobbett was not a wise man. to esponse the cause of his mother country. He published We question if, in the whole course of his life, he ever set a succession of pamphlets, under the assumed name of himself seriously down to discover the truth. He was a Peter Percupine, written with great force and vivacity, some man of impulses. William Cobbett was the object toof which were reprinted at the time in England. He was convicted of a libel against Dr. Rush, and subjected to stantly directed. Hence the constant changes of opinion, heavy damages. In 1801, he returned to England, and with respect to all subjects and all men. There is not, established a morning paper, under the title of the Porcu- perhaps, a question which he has not by turns advocated pine, in which he warmly supported Mr. Pitt. That paper, and opposed—there is not a man whom he has not by however, soon failed; and he soon afterwards set up the turns praised and abused. Hazlitt supposed this change Register; which has been continued to the present time. of opinion was the result of a fickleness of disposition; and "Cobbett commenced his career as a public writer in that without this fickleness we should also have been with-He was out his freshness. It is certain that it was always sufpowerfully patronized by the Ministry. Mr. Wyndham ficient to be in the way of William Cobbett to incur his

duced a great sensation both here and on the Continent. him a special case, and he could make more off it than any Of this production it was said by the celebrated Swiss man. His illustrations were peculiarly forcible, and whathistorian, Muller, that it was more cloquent than any thing ever he had to describe, he described well. His "Rural that had appeared since the days of Demosthenes. It is Rides" contains, perhaps, the very best descriptions of generally understood that Mr. Pitt gave offence in some English scenery that ever were written. His descriptions way to Cobbett; for on his return to power, Cobbett lost of rural life in Pennsylvania, when he left England in no opportunity of attacking his Ministry with great bit. 1817, are also admirable. Being an accurate observer, his terness. Of Mr. Wyndham he long continued to speak language was always graphic. His style was always racy rourably; but to him he became also hostile.

"From a Church and King man, Cobbett became, in what declamatory, and indicated a familiarity with French 1805, a Radical. In 1810, he was sentenced to two years' writers. As he advanced in years, his language and style

"Though Cobbett upon the whole was a good speaker, anticipated suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, he left he was not a good debater, and therefore was not in his England for America in 1817; whence he returned when element in the House of Commons. He could get on well the suspension terminated. It had long been a great object enough in a lecture, when he had all the talk to himself; of his ambition to sit in the House of Commons; and after but he could not bear opposition with temper, and he had of his ambition to sit in the House of Commons, and after the passing of the Reform Bill he was returned for Old-not a command of resources sufficient for the exigencies of ham, through the influence of Mr. Fuller, an extensive a discussion. What he might have been had he entered manufacturer at Todmorden. By his death a vacancy takes place for Oldham. "We have merely noticed a few of the incidents in Mr. figure as a speaker. He made one or two good speeches;

T all met he die to but to pit to to the time to the t

but he repeated himself, and always made the same speech men behaved nobly, both anchors were saved, and the To a certain extent, indeed, his Register was liable to the Medora was again under a press of sail in an incredibly same charge of sameness; but his happy illustrations and short space of time. We contrived to carry on all night, descriptions made you forget that you had heard the same and every time we tacked, Massey's sounding machine opinions repeated by him a hundred times before.

"He has left a widow and a large family. Two of his off shore in the direction of Cape Rosier. sons are at the bar; and are, we believe, exceedingly well At day-break it was found that we were at least a dozen liked. One of them wrote the well-known description of miles to windward of Anticosti, with a brisk gale to work the turning up of the Rats, quoted by the Quarterly Re- with, This gladdened all parties, especially in the cabin. view as one of the happiest of Cobbett's effusions.

"No man could have occupied the public so constantly with himself as Cobbett has done, without possessing great fast-table gay, notwithstanding the motion of the vessel. talents. Take him with all his faults as a writer, and he All was confidence and cheerfulness: Miss P-, in the will still be an extraordinary man."

From the Amulet, for 1836.

THE WRECK.

BY A POST-CAPTAIN.

"Again the dismal prospect opens round, The wreck, the shore, the dying, and the drown'd."

my friends and acquaintances, I sailed from Quebec in the tween the Magdalen Islands and Newfoundland, when my Medora, and with heartfelt feelings of delight anticipated fears subsided; and after walking the deck to a late hour. ter, as passengers.

joyed the noble prospect which our advance to either shore creaking of the timbers, announced the violence of the unessy, for, from having often sailed about the gulf, I was sea, increasing with it, rose literally mountains high; the desolote island. Besides the uncertainty of the reciprospritsail-yard placed fore-and-aft, preventer-braces rove, eating currents, its coasts are extremely dangerous, being the hatches sattened down, and every thing got as snug lined with reefs of flat limestone, which extend out to fifty as circumstances would allow of. They then endeavoured fathoms water, so that there are few spots in its whole to keep the ship close to the wind, but the sea canted her extent, where a vessel can anchor.

Shortly after the wind had died away, a heavy folling the rigging was terribly strained in the effort. swell began to set towards the shore, from the south-west, As the morning broke, the gale seemed, if possible, to —the common indication of a gale from that quarter increase, the sky was one dense cloud, and the rain fell in.

This drove us so fast towards the island that there was no torrents. A tremendous gust now split the foresail into alternative but to drop the anchors, which was done im-ribbons, while, at the same moment, a sea struck her with mediately, in forty fathoms water. Yet there was no a force that made every timber and plank tremble. I chance of their holding, but what might arise from their grasped a rope near the mizzen-rigging, and while thus hooking in some crack in the rock, which was so perfectly clinging for safety, heard a wild cry of agony break through clean, that an armed deep-sca lead did not bring up a par- the howling of the storm; for, as the vessel righted, the ticle of sand. The anchors, therefore, could not hold; foremast had snapped short off, and crushed several unbut though they came home, they kept the vessel's head happy men in its fall.

The captain and his crew managed so admirably that pitched bowsprit in. The weight of the anchors and the ship was prevented from broaching to; and in order chain cables retarded our progress towards the shore, and to relieve the wildness of the helm, a hawser was veered afforded us hope that the wind, which we knew was pre-cursed by the swell, would arrive before any serious ca-tributed, and while one party proceeded to clear away the tastrophe could take place. The situation, however, be-came truly alarming; for, at 6 r. m., we had driven within half a mile of the reefs, on which such a surf was break-ertions were successful in casing the ship, but we disconot occur in our favour. At this critical time a man dis- of the weather, so as to make it requisite to keep the vered, from the mast-head, the expected gale on the ho- pumps incessantly going. and never did any sound give me more pleasure. The rolled into the lee scuppers, and the water was streaming assured that we were deepening our water, and clawing

where the depression of spirits, occasioned by yesterday's accident, gave way to an ebullition which made the breakjoy of the moment, was inclined to laugh at the terror she had manifested; while her father was so pleased with the cool conduct of the seamen, that he declared he would make each of them a present on anchoring in England.

Meantime the wind strengthened, but as it veered westward in our favour, the hilarity continued, and we stood across the Gulf of St. Lawrence in the hope that all danger was now over. But the murkiness of the sky, and the difficult navigation around us, made me still apprehensive, though I said nothing that might be disheartening. Having arranged my affairs, and taken a farewell of This continued a couple of days, and we had passed beretarning to my native home, after ten years absence from I went down to my berth, confident of soon gaining the England. The vessel was in excellent trim, the crew in open ocean. I had not been long asleep, when I awoke, high order, and her captain steady and skilful; besides and found the ship lying nearly on her beam-ends; and myself, there were embarked, Mr. P- and his daugh. by the rapid tumult of water past her sides, I knew that a heavy squall must have caught her. There was much With light hearts, we dropped down the magnificent St. confusion above and below; and the chattering of ropes Lawrence, having all sail spread to a fine breeze, and ensented. As we approached Anticosti it suddenly fell assault. I hurried immediately on deck-the night was calm; and though we were still at some distance, I felt pitchy dark, the wind had freshened to a tempest, and the well aware of the risk which attends a proximity to that top-gallant masts were sent on deck, the fib-boom run in, head off, so that she made more lee than head-way, and ng, as left us no doubt of the result, if some change did vered, with some dismay, that she had opened to the force

n. approaching rapidly, the waves being capped with I now descended into the cabin, where I found all was n. We could distinctly hear it roaring as it advanced, terror and confusion; every article that could move having is at every seam. Poor P-, in deep anguish, was stand the rush of waters. A mournful silence ensued endeavouring to soothe the alarm of his daughter, while among the men, but the horrid brawl of the tempest was mind was agitated. rage with unabated violence, the rain fell like a deluge, and and engulphing us in its dread abyse. occasional glare of the lightning discovered to us, notwith. Two of the seamen alone, besides myself, were saved. standing the extreme darkness of the night, a reef of frowning rocks, whitened with breakers, immediately

After contemplating the awful scene before us with a dreadful anxiety, the ship's company, who were greatly worn from fatigue, were called aft to snatch a hasty rehowever, was only a momentary effect, for each individual herself acquainted with the formation, aspect, peculiari the fate that threatened them in the unavoidable destruc- ganizing those for persons of maturer years. She also of their yessel, astern of us.

the interesting girl seemed to be equally intent upon con-broken by piercing shricks from the cabin; at the same cealing from her father the extent of her fears. My ap-instant, the vessel struck, and was dashed with such viopearance, and the tidings I brought, that the ship was lence on the reef, that the mainmast was thrown over the easier, began, in some measure, to quiet their apprehen-side, and the rudder forced upwards. Fortunately, she sions; and I strove, by treating the matter with affected canted to leeward, or every soul must have immediately indifference, to restore their full confidence. The capperished; but she continued to beat hard, and we heard, tain, too, soon afterwards joined us, and made some awk-by the cracking of her timbers below, the progress of her ward attemps to be cheerful; though I could perceive, by dissolution. All hope of saving even life had now vanhis vacant restlessness, the deep concern with which his ished, and recommending ourselves to the protection of the Almighty, we began to consider ourselves as beings of Another heavy sea having struck the ship I returned on another world. The ill-fated Medora lay struggling upon deck. At this instant, the boats were washed overboard, her beam-ends, grozning and writhing like a giant in the and every wave seemed to make a deeper and more fatal agonies of death; and the darkness that surrounded us impression upon her, for she rose to each with a dull and scemed the darkness of the grave! Oh, with what anexhausted motion, as though about to surrender to the guish did we hear the cries of those who were successively force of the opposing elements. And as the water within washed away by the breakers that beat over us-at interwas gaining upon her, in spite of pumping and bailing, it vals we saw their obscure forms for a moment while strugbecame evident that we were reduced to extreme danger. gling on the white foam of the billows, and the next in-Even the seamen began to look aghast at the prospect of stant they were gone forever!

foundering, when, towards the close of the day, LAND was As it was impossible that the ship could hold together announced as being in sight under the lee beam. This much longer, I determined to get my two forlorn fellow discovery gave great joy to all on board except myself, passengers on deck, as the only prospect, however slight, for I was too well acquainted with the iron-bound shores of their reaching the shore. With this intent I and anoon either hand, not to know full well the danger of ap-ther hand, made our way through the skylight into the proaching them. In this instance, however, it was a case cabin; the lamp was still burning, and threw its dim rays of desperation, for with the probability of otherwise sink-ing, the slightest chance of anchoring, or even of running gloomy scene. The sad father, propped by the fallen furon shore, was considered preferable to keeping the sea. hiture, supported his almost inanimate daughter in his In this state, we drove past a rugged head-land, and per-arms. He raised his head as we approached; but I shall ceiving a sort of bay inside it, we tried for soundings, and never forget the careworn expression, and sickly paleness finding bottom with thirty fathoms, the ship was partially of his countenance. His heart had fainted within him; rounded to, and both the bower anchors let go; the cables not that he feared to die, but he was agitated at the apwere then veered away to a long range, and the stream proaching fate of his beloved child, to whom every crash of and kedge dropped under-foot. The ship rode heavily, the timbers sounded like a summons to eternity. We and pitched immoderately, but all the top-hamper being slung them both, and had them secured under the weather taken off, there were strong hopes that she would hold her bulwark, where they joined in prayer with those next on till the morning. But to me the expectation of riding them. A wild scream was now heard from forward. A out the tempest appeared frail, for the wind continued to tremendous sea struck the ship, rending her fore and aft, the waves tumbled in tumultuous rollers, washing over the protracted yell; it grew fainter, and all was hushed, save forecastle. To add to the horrors of our situation, the the howling of the gale, and the rolling of the billows.

From the Spectator.

v li

ti hii tri ai ri bi ga

is

an

wit

mu

MISS LLOYD'S SKETCHES OF BERMUDA.

Miss Lloyd is apparently," an accomplished young past. Scarcely was the melancholy meal commenced ere lady, skilful in the handling of her pen and pencil, well the ship trembled and receded to her centre, a huge sea road in poetry and history, and possessing a cultivated taste broke in over all, and the cables snapped like twine for the beauties of nature, with some knowledge of butany, "The Lord receive us;" ejaculated the captain, "it is now geology, and natural history. In 1829, she accompanied all over with the Medora," Cries and groans burst from the family of Archdeacon Spences to the Bermudas, and the lips of all, and despair paralyzed every breast. This, remained there some eighteen or twenty months; making quickly became sensible that it was more than ever neces ties, productions, and history of the islands, assisting in sary to act with discretion and firmness, in order to avert founding Negro infant schools, and in extending and ornoted the manner of living; saw the principal prospects When the hower cables parted, the ship hung for a that were worth seeing; studied, so far as she was able, the short interval by the stream and kee'ge, but then began to character and condition of the slaves; and wrote epistles drive, broadside on, dragging them along with her. Every to her friends at home, embracing accounts of all these man now clung to a rope, determined to remain by the matters, and many others of minor importance, though ship while she held together, an effort of some difficulty, perhaps of equal interest in the eyes of a lady. What as the sea was now making clear breaches over her; and retained these letters in obscurity so long, we know not; it was only the struggle of desperation that could with the reason given for their present appearance is, the exadvised their publication; the extrinsic circumstances of friend who lived on an adjoining island.

to the undertaking.

addition to the works of the season. If they have not and forwards through the sun or rain twenty times a no pretension. They would be welcome if they treated are but few Negro servants who are not given to pilfer of a well-known or of a commonplace spot. But the "still sugar, sweetmeats, and similar trifles. vexed Bermoothes" are neither one nor the other. Of all these preliminaries are at length settled, the late we have heard little about them; yet the peculiar nadally business of laying the cloth must be revised. It is tious interest which the muses of WALLER and MOORE cessary article, or made some ludierious blunder. have thrown over it, are sufficient to dispose us to lend a "One day while staying at a friend's house, having occa-listening ear to any thing respecting them. In our exbook.

as the islands have few agricultural productions, there with a circle of wine-glasses, while the knives, forks, and were in strictness no prædial Negroes,) we do not wonder spoons were laid in Vandyke patterns around the table. at the Bermudian Legislature getting rid of them.

THE TROUBLES OF BERMUDIAN HOUSEWIFERY.

glish servant would accomplish in a few hours.

is the grand source of all the complaints we hear about that the measure may turn out one of political wisdom.herself upon a branch till she chose to come down. If a and gradually improve the soil.

poor old dame is burdened with half-a-dozen of these wild "I am rather disappointed in the fruit. None of the slaves, what can she possibly do? She is obliged to sup luscious fruits of the West Indies are cultivated here.

"The trials and vexations of housekeeping, especially in and as it is of rapid growth there is a continual supply. the country, and in the absence of any regular market, are "Large quantities of apples, oranges, shaddocks, forbidsuch as none but those who have had some experience in den fruit, cocos nuts, &c. are imported from the West Inthese matters can conceive. Schiller's tuchtige Hausfrau dies and America. And yet the early accounts of Bermust hide her diminished head before the labours of her muda are warm in the praises of its fruits; the orange sister housewife in Bermuda. She, in the first place, has was prized, even above that of India; and I was told by no bandy maidens at her beheat; but is perhaps burthened a gentleman, that, in his younger days, grapes were so with three or four dawdling women, whose noisy, half-clad abundant in Tucker's Town, a place which does not now of maintaining any thing like order.

"The heat of the climats, too, renders it impossible to "This deterioration of the climats are the control of the climats are the control of the climats."

periment now taking place in the West Indies, and the provided for, and the Bermudian housewife has to ascercircumstance of Bermuda having abrogated the appren- tain when Mr. Such-a-one kills a calf, or Mrs. So-and-so ticeship clause and declared their Negroes immediately a young kid; or, if the weather be so boisterous, what free. As the Somer Isles can scarcely be considered to she can have in place of fish; and her anxiety is whether form part of the West Indies, and as there is little bearing her eaterer will return in time for dinner. A lady told me, particularly upon Emancipation, we rather imagine that that having unexpectedly to provide for a large dinnersome eye of taste accidentally lighted upon the letters, and party, she had been obliged to telegraph for a turkey to a West Indian slavery merely serving as an encouragement "The duties of the store-room are never ending, still bethe undertaking.

ginning; and as pantries are generally built detached Whatever be the cause, their appearance is a pleasant from the house, a Bermudian lady has to walk backwards the point and the artificial vivacity which MADDEN posses-day, for Negro servants seldom think beforehand of what ses, nor the elegant fulness that gave such truth and com- may be wanted. In fact, they seem to prefer applying for pleteness to the composition of poor Mr. Inclus, they are every individual article as they find that they require it; pleasantly and gracefully written, with much variety and and she is in most cases obliged to attend herself, as there ture of this delightful coral reef, the Crusoe-like adven-ture attendant upon its first discovery, and the adventi-something of waiting at table have not omitted some ne-tracts we shall not aim at illustrating geographical, histo- party, I was not a little amused to see the arrangement o rical, or econominal matters, nor indeed at fully exhibiting the table as superintended by a new servant. In the cen! any topics in the volume. Our quotations will be of a tre stood the cruet encircled with a ring of water-glasses, random kind-specimens of the writer rather than of the and beyond it another of tumblers. The corners of the table were, in the same manner, each formed into a From the following account of domestic slaves, (and, centre, composed of a decanter and salt-cellars encompassed with here and there a plate by way of relief."

No doubt, the real reasons of the Legislature in emancipating the slaves, were of a homely prudential kind .-"In general, the offices for the Coloured domestics are They foresaw many difficulties in the apprenticeship plan; wretched; this, perhaps, is owing to the proprietors hav-whatever might be the value of individuals, the Negroes ing about them a greater number of slaves than they can as a body were of small worth; and, owing to the pecu-possibly employ. They very rarely have distinct depart. liar circumstances of the Islands, (some of which are inments assigned to them, and three or four are often en-dicated in parts of the following passage,) freedom gave gaged for a whole day upon a work which one good En- the slaves no more than that which Dr. Johnson says is ish servant would accomplish in a few hours. the limit of the people's liberty in most countries—the "This superfluity of half-working, half-idling servants, liberty of working or starving. It is, however, probable the intolerable laziness of the Negroes. I have often been The resources of the country are yet considerable; its caamused to see a little eurly-pated vixen, when desired to pabilities seemingly great; and though the Negroes, perform some task which she disliked, scamper up a cestimulated to industry, by want, and freedom, should not dar-tree with the sgility of a monkey, and remain rocking be able to import mould from America, they may manure port them; her household is distracted; no one will pur- The melons are certainly delicious, and very plentiful; the chase or employ them; and she is forced to join in the lime, sweet orange, mulberry, peach, grape, strawberry, universal confession, that the evils of slavery have fallen water-lemon, sugar-apple, and one or two more, are good, with a double weight of calamity upon the master.

children, fighting and crawling about, add to the difficulty produce a single vine, that for a quarter-dollar you might

"This deterioration of the soil is general: districts which keep a supply of meat; the morrow must consequently be formerly yielded two crops of Indian corn in the year, are now barren downs; tobacco, coffee, and cotton, which seem to me but a pleasant dream. Here we take no note grow wild, are no longer cultivated; and Bermuda depends of time, for their is no succession of changes in the face upon other countries for a supply of its wants; in return of nature to remind you of its rapid though imperceptible for which she sends only cedar, arrow-root, onions, and a flow. small quantity of honey and wax. The soil is evidently "Accustomed to look upon the vicissitudes of the season impoverished; and I think it would be no bad plan to as monitors, who would forbid us to forget that we are indigo of which I have seen some flourishing patches; the which nature is clothed. cochineal, too, might probably be cultivated on the millions "Here is not the eloquence of the falling leaf-of the of the prickly pear (cactus opuntia), which, it is said, quiet slumber of nature; no tree deposes its verdant honpossesses all the valuable qualities of the true cochinilifer, ours, again to put forth the bud of promise and hope, to to which it has some resemblance. This mode of obtaining the cochineal is, I am told, followed with success in in the root there is still spring; here no early primrose some parts of Spain; and there seems no reason why it rises from its grave, with all its beautiful associations of a should not answer equally well here. The rich raw silk brighter world. Even the days and nights, in their one which liange across the road in long festoons from one round of unchanging length, give no warning of the fleetcedar to another, and is the production of a very beautiful ing hours." silk-pider, might without much trouble be also made a profitable article of commerce.

plies from America, makes them regardless of the resources of their own islands which, however small, are still large enough to yield a much greater produce than they do at present. Of the 14,000 acres which the Bermudas contain, only 400 or 500 are brought under cultivation: of these, about 50 acres produce onions, 51 arrowroot, 197 potatoes, 57 barley and oats, 106 vegetables; the

to be identical with slavery. Perhaps the cultivation of tinct in its parts, and the tout ensemble quite equal, if it be these beautiful islands may be reserved for that glad day not superior to any weekly rival in England. when this reproach shall be taken away, and when the inby the withering influence of slavery."

Two more samples, and we must close.

A VIEW FROM A VILIA.

"Last Friday we went on a visit to Mrs. Trott; whose house really deserves its name of Verdmont, for it stands in the midst of evergreen hills, and commands a splendid view over all the Southern coast-Ireland, Somerset, and nearly fifty other islands.

"We could distinctly trace the natural breakwater of and defends low shores from the violence of the sea. Along the South coast, this zone runs at an inconsiderable distance from the land; and when the long heaving waves are driven by the fury of the tempest against this barrier, they often present the most magnificent spectacle which a marine can afford.

"To the right and left, as far as the eye can reach, you see these huge billows rolling towards the shore, till their further progress is stopped by the reefs: here, collecting too often degenerates into Yankee grandiloquence, and all their strength, they rise in graceful curves, their foaming crests hang suspended over the breakers, and as they play and dance in the sunbeams, sparkle like brilliants, till some of the water falls at full length from its own weight, and the whole of this fairy frostwork is lost in all their strength, they rise in graceful curves, their foamweight, and the whole of this fairy frostwork is lost in the quiet waters of the shore."

UNCHANGING FACE OF NATURE.

ballast their vessels, with fine rich mould from America. hastening on our journey, Europeans are lost in uncon-"Bermuda presents peculiar facilities for the growth of scious oblivion, amid the perpetual sameness of beauty in fi of P was of the art for

ne

W

ed

or

Wo

nor

an f

ture

cros

hors

now

part

gon

arist

hims

invit

for th

gent

addre

acros

castle

our 1 pared Dutel

emile

The volume contains a very good map of the group of islands, with some pretty views by the fair writer, which "The facilities with which the Bermudians obtain sup- convey an idea of the form of the seenes, whatever they may do of their character and climate.

From the Spectator. THE NEW YORK MIRROR.

AFTER the direful accounts that have been propagated rest are occupied by extensive groves of cedar, waste land, of the "whity brown" appearance of our Transatlantic conand large ponds or marshes, which would certainly re-temporaries, the external elegance of this American weekward the trouble and expense of draining; whereas they ly Journal of Literature and Fine Arts was naturally the now only render their vicinity unhealthy by the exhala- first point which attracted our attention. Its ample pages tions which they give out, especially after the heavy rains are perhaps rather too large, if judged by the bibliographi-"One great drawback to a more extended cultivation cal fashions now prevalent in the Old World; but the seems to be the stigma unfortunately fixed upon field la colour and quality of its paper are unexceptionable, its bour; which, in the eyes of the poorer Whites, appears typography is solid in its general effect, yet perfectly dis-

Judging from the few numbers we have before us, the dustry and energy of the Negro shall be no longer checked formal character of the New York Mirror appears in some measure to combine the features of our older monthly magazines and weekly literary papers: there are original essays, tales, and sketches of society, that partake of the nature of the first class of periodicals; whilst it is identified with the second class by meagre notices of new books -in which a few lines of introduction indicating something about the subject of the work, and lavishly bestowing panegyric with more of good-nature than of judgment, are followed by copious extracts. Original poetry and notices of the fine arts are common to both classes: in the coral which encircles the whole group of the Bermudas, "Notabilia" and "New Music" it resembles a weekly journal; in the length of its Foreign correspondence a magazine.

The spirit which animates the productions of the Mirror seems in the main youthful-perhaps juvenile would be the more correct term. The essayist pours forth the result of his fancies and speculations rather than of his observation; the sketcher, when satisfied to present the scene as it really appears, is fresh and amusing; but he

The Foreign correspondence is in a great measure free from these faults. The "Letters from Italy" are written with point, and pleasantly narrate a rapid tour through "When I look back upon the lost eighteen months, they that country, with the impressions which its hindscapes, its incline to guess, a well-instructed American. "Pencillings through files of servants to the dining-room. " appears to be an account of the American poet's (Mr. N. P. Willis) journey in England; and though hound and the cur is not very complimentary in itself, he seems not always sufficiently guarded in publishing the nor much in character with an American Republican. private conversations of marked individuals to whom he was introduced, his communications are by far the most spirited and interesting in the work. The fragments before us relate to his trip to Scotland; and contain accounts beauty of the higher classes; and as I looked around me of JEFFREY and Wilson, and of his visit to the Duke of upon the aristocratic company at the table, I thought I Gondon's from which last we will pick out a few extracts. never had seen "heaven's image doubly stamped as man Passing a clever description of his approach to the castle, we will first present the poet in his dressing-room; ob- men and four or five young ladies of rank; and five or six serving, by the by, that he strangely considers the riband people of more decided personal attractions could scarcely of the Bath as something distinctive of a duke.

ture.

crowning the hills, and by the occasional prance of a with you, but it is his manner; and he would think an horse's feet on the gravel and the roll of rapid wheels, and Englishman out of his senses who should bow down to now and then a gay laugh and merry voices, the different his very plate and smile as a Frenchman does on a similar parties were returning to the castle. Soon after, a loud occasion. Rather chilled by this, you are a little astonishgong sounded through the gallery—the signal to dress; ed when the ladies have left the table, and he closes his
and I left my music occupation unwillingly to make my chair up to you, to receive an invitation to pass a month toilet for an appearance in a formidable circle of titled with him at his country-house; and to discover that, at aristocrats, not one of whom I had ever seen-the Duke the very moment he bowed so coldly, he was thinking himself a stranger to me, except through the kind letter of how he should contrive to facilitate your plans for getting invitation lying upon the table,

"I was sitting by the fire imagining forms and faces The breakfast delights our tourist even more than the there was a knock at the door, and a tall, white-haired gentleman, of noble physiognomy, but singularly cordial address, entered, with the broad red riband of a duke across his breast, and welcomed me most heartily to the castle. The gong sounded at the next moment, and, in "Has the name of being the proudest and coldest aristoour way down, he named over his other guests, and pre-pared me in a measure for the introductions which follow-bears such a character. He is of the middle height, rather ed. The drawing room was crowed like a soirée. The Dutchess, a very tall and very handsome woman, with a smile of the most winning sweetness, received me at the always too large for him, a pair of coarse check trowsers door, and I was presented successively to every person very ill-made, a waistcoat buttoned up to his throat, and a present. Dinner was announced immediately: and the cravat of the most primitive négligé, his aristocracy is cer-

cities, and its sights made upon an educated but not, we had ever seen it before in so large a party, we passed

The following is good, though the simile of the grey-

ENGI 18 (ARISTOCKACY.

"I have been struck everywhere in England with the and noble" so unequivocally clear. There were two young be found; the style of form and face at the same time be-"It was a mild, bright afternoon, quite warm for the ing of the cast of superiority which goes by the expressive end of an English September; and with a fire in the room name of "thoroughbred." There is a striking difference and a soft sunshine pouring in at the windows, a seat by in this respect between England and the countries of the the open casement was far from disagreeable. I passed Continent: the paysans of France and the contadini of Italy the time till the sun was set looking out on the park. Hill being physically far superior to their degenerate masters; and valley lay between my eye and the horizon, sheep while the gentry and nobility of England differ from the fed in picturesque flocks, and small fallow deer grazed peasantry in limb and feature as the racer differs from the near them; the trees were planted and the distant forest dray-horse, or the greyhound from the cur. The contrast shaped by the hand of taste, and broad and beautiful as between the manners of English and French gentlemen is was the expanse taken in by the eye, it was evidently one quite as striking. The empressment, the warrath, the shrug princely possession. A mile from the castle wall, the and gesture of the Parisian, and the working cyclrow, shaven sward extended in a carpet of velvet softness, as dilating or contracting eye, and conspirator-like action of bright as emerald, studded by clumps of shrubbery, like the Italian in the most common conversation, are the anflowers wrought elegantly on tapestry, and across it bound-tipodes of English high breeding. I should say a North ed occasionally a hare, and the pheasants fed undisturbed American Indian, in his more dignified phase, approached near the thickets, or a lady with a flowing riding-dress nearer to the manner of an English nobleman than any and flaunting feather dashed into sight upon her fleet other person. The calm repose of person and feature, the blood palfrey, and was lost the next moment in the woods, self-possession under all circumstances, that incapability of or a boy put his pooy to its mettle up the ascent, or a surprise or deréglement, and that about the slightest cirgamekeeper idled into sight with his gun in the hollow of cumstance, and the apparent certainty that he is acting his arm and his hounds at his heels: and all this little absolutely comme il fant, is equally "gentlemanlike" and world of enjoyment and luxury and beauty lay in the Indianlike. You cannot astonish an English gentleman, hand of one man and was created by his wealth in these If a man goes into a fit at his side, or a servant drops a dish northern wilds of Scotland, a day's journey almost from upon his shoulder, or he hears that the house is on fire, he the possession of another human being. I never realized sets down his wine-glass with the same deliberation. He so forcibly the splendid results of wealth and primogenihas made up his mind what to do in all possible cases, and he does it. He is cold at a first introduction, and "The sun set in a blaze of fire among the pointed firs may bow stifly (which he always does) in drinking wine to him or seeing the country to advantage on the way."

for the different persons who had been named to me, when dinner; and after the company have separated for the difficult question of precedence being sooner settled than I taiply not in his dress. His manners are of absolute sim-pherty amounting almost to want of style. He crosses told of his making acquaintance at the table-d'hote with his hands behind him, and balances on his heels: in con- an antiquary, who gives him a capital story, which our versation his voice is low and cold, and he seldom smiles. pilgrim can do no less than give to his readers. From Yet there is a certain benignity in his countenance, and Rouen, we suppose, he passes, through Paris; at least we an indefinable superiority and high breeding in his simple next see him established at the village of Auteuil, in a address, that would betray his rank after a few minute's maison de sante. Here he spends his time in studying conversation to any shrewd observer. It is only in his some of the immates of the house; lounging in the Bois manner toward the ladies of the party that he would be de Boulogne; sitting at his window receiving impressions immediately distinguishable from men of lower rank in from the passing objects, mirth, music, bridal, and burial;

LORD ABERDEEN

the course of publication. When completed, we should lows. A journey from Bourdeaux to Madrid in the dilisuggest their reprint in a collected shape. If all the let. gence, and a brief sojourn at the Spanish capital, are the ters resemble those we have read, there can be little boubt next principal events in the Filgrimage; and, with the about their success in England-and none at all, we ima. journey from Madrid to Granada, furnish the opportunity gine, about their American popularity.

From the Spectator.

OUTRE-MER.

traveller, in the usual acceptation of the terms. The nevertheless. things which delight other men appear to have had small attraction for him. Balls, concerts, theatres, the galleries "In times of old, there lived in the city of Rouen a wayfarers like himself, peasants with a dash of personal pleasantly enough in loitering about the market-place, and or national romance, quaint old gentlemen who have tales walking up and down on the sunny side of the street.

to tell, or whose history is a tale of itself. His favourite

"The fair Marguerite, his wife, was celebrated through far less elaboration and minuteness, indeed, but with an delicately moulded, and her swimming gait like the motion Pilgrim's account of himself, state distinctly that the fairest dames; and when she became poor, her fame was not a little increased by her cruelty to several substantial to be believed when we make a statement in print, self-interest induces a faith even against evidence. But since the Pilgrim cannot be Washington Irving, he must be his fetch or his double. Either the author of the Sketch-in his capacity of author—has received a warning, or there are "two Richmonds in the field."

events, he travelled through Normandy to Rouen, outside Monsieur d'Argentville, a sexagenarian, with whom I the diligence; describing his first impressions of the country through which he passed, and painting the vehicle Santé of Auteuil. I found him there, and left him there. which carried him. At Rouen, he rambles through the Nobody knew when he came-he had been there from city at nightfall; emerges from a narrow alley in front of time immemorial; nor when he was going away-for he the Cathedral, and, for the first time in his life, as he tells, himself did not know; nor what ailed him-for though nees a specimen of Gothic architecture. His reverential he was always complaining, yet he grew neither better and meditating in Pere la Chaise. A pedestrian excursion These "Pencillings by the Way" appear to be still in from Orleans to Tours along the banks of the Loire folfor some pleasant sketches of Spain and Spaniards. The ensuing scene is Italy-done far too slightly, if it were to be, touched at all; and the finale-a tour through Germany and down the Rhine-is huddled up in a few lines.

In choosing the extracts, we shall have an eye to the An American of elegant mind, literary habits, and a can be better than the two following passages? The first love of antiquity, chivalry, and old customs-with a is the opening of the antiquarian's gift; and heretofore greater knowledge of the European literature of the middle there has been but one man who could paint so happily ages than is, we imagine, usual amongst his matter-of-the luxury of laziness in the first paragraph, or give so fact countrymen—paid a first visit to the Old World, it stily the satirical touch at the close of the second. In the would appear, from internal evidence, some eight or nine piece of Monsieur D'Argentville, there is more of the pith years ago. A common tourist he certainly was not; neither of his prototype Golosmith than Invino always exhibits; can he be termed a scientific, a learned, or even a classical yet it seems to us to smack strongly of the Sketch Book of art, the meetings of the learned, the assemblies of legis-tradesman named Martin Franc, who, by a series of mislators, the courts of rulers, are matters which he deemed fortunes, had been reduced from opulence to poverty. unworthy of record, if he thought them worthy of a visit.

OPENING OF A TALE.

But poverty, which generally makes men humble and The scenes among which he loves to linger, are the Gothic laborious, only served to make him proud and lary; and The scenes among which he loves to inger, as an experimental properties and properties are temple, the neglected, the deserted, or the ruined castle, in proportion as he grew poorer and poorer, he grew also proper inhabited by Christian or Paymin knighthood, and properties are the properties of the softer kind of landscape, when seen under a cheering, day to day, by now and then pawning a silken robe of his a warm, or a sober atmosphere. The persons whom he wife, or selling a silver spoon, or some other trifle saved studies, or with whom he takes up, are mostly odd bodies; from the wreck of his better fortune; and passed his time stories are the humorous with a touch of the satirical, or the whole city for her beauty, her wit, and her virtue. the elegantly pensive-melancholy yet not despairing. In She was a brunctte, with the blackest eye, the whitest short, A Pilgrimage to the Old World appears as if it were teeth, and the ripest nut-brown cheek in all Normandy; intended to be a kind of foreign Bracebridge Hall; with her figure was tall and stately, her hands and feet most almost equal elegance of thought and language, albeit of a swan. In happier days she had been the delight of rather more meagre. The Epistle to the Reader, and the the richest tradesmen in the city, and the envy of the writer appears for the first time; and as we always expect not a little increased by her crucity to several substantial

THE SEXAGENARIAN.

The Pilgrim, we suppose, started from Havre. At all "The personage sketched in the preceding paragraph is saunter through the building is described; and we are also nor worse, never consulted a physician, and ate vora-

del inh No the of attr alon

> alwa flow

olive

h ptl to of ar tu di se

200 chile me. what insti to th misg futur

of th

Good, pions of the Castil cazar O who of the and P ever a their

VOL

129 OUTRE-MER.

troubled his neighbours with his elbows, and uttered the despair is dumb?" monosyllable pish ! rather oftener than good breeding and "The dust of the Cid lies mingling with the dust of tions being completed, gave fall swing to an appetite which I will dwell no longer on this theme." was not inappropriately denominated by one of our guests une faim canine.

"The old gentleman's weak side was an affectation of youth and gallantry. Though "written down old, with all look down upon the busy scene beneath us. What a the characters of age," yet at times he seemed to think himself in the heyday of life; and the assiduous court he Though three stories high, we can hardly hear the sound paid to a fair Countess, who was passing the summer at the Maison de Santé, was the source of no little merriment compared with the cries of Madrid. to all but himself. He loved, too, to recal the golden age of his amours; and would discourse with prolix eloquence, and a faint twinkle in his watery eye, of his bonnes fortunes in times of old, and the rigours that many a fair dame had suffered on his account. Indeed, his chief pride seemed to be to make his hearers believe that he had been a dangerous man in his youth, and was not yet quite

The other extracts shall come from Spain.

SPAIN NATURAL, AND SPAIN POLITICAL,

delightful kind. The character of the soil and of its the clear sky, the pure, balmy air, the delicious fruits and monious ditty with the "Melo-melo-o-o-meloncitos; children of impulse and sensation.

what it is—what nature intended it should be, and what the claws, head downwards, fluttering, scratching, crowing man has made it—my heart sinks within me. My mind with all their might, while the good woman tries to drown instinctively reverts from the degradation of the present their voices in the discordant cry of "Quien me compra to the glory of the past; or, looking forward with strong un gallo—un pat de gallinas? (Who buys a cock—a brace the armour of Ferdinand and Isabel; of Guzman the Good, and Gonzalo de Cordova, and of other early chambis arm; a Gallego, with a huge water-jar upon his shoul-pions of Spain: but what hand shall now wield the sword ders; an Italian pedlar, with images of saints and Maof the Campeador, or lift up the banner of Leon and donnas; a razor grinder, with his wheel; a mender of Castile? The ruins of Christian castle and Moorish al. pots and kettles, making music as he goes, with a shovel casar still look forth from the hills of Spain; but where, and a frying pan; and, in fine, a noisy, patch work, ever-O where is the spirit of freedom that once fired the children changing crowd, whose discordant cries mingle with the of the Goth? Where is the spirit of Bernatio del Carpio, rumbling of wheels, the clatter of hoofs, and the clang of and Perez de Vargas, and Alonzo de Aguilar? Shall it for church-bells, and make the Puerta del Sol, at certain hours ever sleep? Shall it never again beat high in the hearts of of the day, like a street in Babylon the Great." their degenerate sons? Shall the descendants of Pelayo Besides the contents we have described, there are VOL. EXVIII. PEDRUARY, 1836 .- 17.

ciously three times a day. At table he was rather peevish, bow for ever beneath an iron yoke, "like cattle whose

a due deference to the opinions of others seemed to justify. Old Castile; but his spirit is not buried with his ashes. As soon as he seated himself at table, he breathed into his It sleeps, but is not dead. The day will come when the tumbler, and wiped it out with a napkin; then wiped his foot of the tyrant shall be shaken from the neck of Spain; plate, his spoon, his knife and fork in succession, and each when a brave and generous people, though now ignorant, with great care. After this he placed the napkin under degraded, and much abused, shall "know their rights, and his chin, by way of bib and tucker; and these prepara knowing, dare maintain." But I am no political seer-

THE PUERTA DEL SOL-MADRID.

"There, take that chair upon the balcony, and let us of our own voices. The London cries are whispers when

"See, yonder stalks a gigantic peasant of New Castile, with a montera cap, brown jacket and breeches, and coarse blue stockings, forcing his way through the crowd, and leading a donkey laden with charcoal, whose sonorous bray is in unison with the harsh voice of his master. Close at his elbow goes a rosy-cheeked damsel selling calico. She is an Asturian, from the mountains of Santander. How do you know? By her short yellow petticoats, her blue boddice, her coral necklace and ear-rings. Through the middle of the square struts a peasant of Old Castile, with his yellow leather jerkin strapped round his waist, his brown leggins and his blue garters, driving before him "My recollections of Spain are of the most lively and a set of gabbling turkies, and crying, at the top of his voice, " Pao, pao, pavitos paos!" Next comes a Valentian, with inhabitants—the stormy mountains and free spirits of the his loose linen trousers and sandal shoon, holding a huge North-the prodigal luxuriance and gay voluptuousness of sack of water-melons upon his shoulder with his left hand, the South—the history and traditions of the past, resemb-and with his right balancing high in air a specimen of his ling more the fables of romance than the solemn chronicle luscious fruit, upon which is perched a little pyramid of of events—a soft and yet majestic language, that falls like the crimson pulp, while he tempts the passers-by with "A martial music on the ear, and a literature rich in the cala, y calando; una sandia vendo-o-o. Si esto es sanattractive lore of poetry and fiction,—these, but not these gree!" (By the slice—come and try it—water-melon for alone, are my reminiscences of Spain. With these I recal sale. This is the real blood!) His companion near him the thousand little circumstances and enjoyments which has a pair of scales thrown over his shoulder, and holds always give a colouring to our recollections of the past; both arms full of musk-melons. He chimes into the harflowers, the wild fig and the aloe, the palm-tree and the aqui está el azucar!" (Melons, melons; here is the real olive by the wayside,—all, all that makes existence so joy-sugar!) Behind them creeps a slow-moving Asturian, in ous, and renders the sons and daughters of that clime the heavy wooden shoes, crying water-cresses; and a peasant woman from the Guardarama Mountains, with a montera " As I write these words, a shade of sadness steals over cocked up in front, and a blue kerchief tied under her chin, When I think what that glorious land might be, and swings in each hand a bunch of live chickens, that hang by misgivings, but with yet stronger hopes, interrogates the of hens-who buys?) That tall fellow in blue, with a future.

"The banished armour of the Cid stands in the archives of the Royal Museum of Madrid; and there, too, is seen ories, "Si yo tuviera balcon?" (If I only had a balcony!)

"What next? A Manchego, with a sack of oil under scattered throughout the volumes several notices of the conjectures of later writers, and he has tested the whole poetry and romances of the middle ages. They are by collating authorities, or weighing the possibilities of the written with taste, elegance, and discrimination, though case. The result of his labours is not a history, but a with a leaning to hoar antiquity. But these, with one sublimated chronicle. He has preserved the simplicity, or two other papers, might have been composed without the minuteness, the old-wife-like gossiping style, and the making a journey to the Old World. And-else we abundant anecdotes of individual adventure, that give such are cloyed with unvarying sweetness—some passages a charm to the old writers: whilst to these qualities he has in the second volume might have been dispensed with, superadded a connexion which they never sought for, an being fitter for filling space than exciting interest.

From the Spectator.

THE CONQUEST OF FLORIDA.

THE reader of ROBERTSON is acquainted with the fact of the accidental discovery of Florida by PONCE DE LEON, count has yet appeared of the different disastrous expedi-Various causes have contributed to this nevery probably greater.

admiration, and probably a spice of family enthusiasm, colonize or conquer the New World. led our author to inquire further, and he met with an account by a Portuguese adventurer who served in the ex-pedition. These two works are the chief authorities of little question that the explorers reached those Prairies of Mr. IRVING: he has added something to the exploits from the far-off West with which the works of our author's recontemporary authors, he has endeavoured to throw some lations have made us so well acquainted; came in sight of ight on the route of the expedition from the researches or the Rocky Mountains; and discovered the Arkansas; from eloquence which they could not have conceived, and an oecasional pleasantry which their faith would not have allowed them to indulge. Something perhaps of life and vigor may have been lost in the process of throwing off growness and impurity, but as we have never read the originals, we cannot decide upon the point.

Notwithstanding this deficiency, the Conquest of Florida is both agreeable and interesting. Had it possessed aniwhilst the veteran enthusiast was sailing in search of the mation and variety, it would have been a most extraordi-Fountain of Youth, which was to restore to him a blessing nary production-a kind of tragic Odyssey, with a spice his gold could not purchase; and a brief allusion is made of the Iliad, divested of their continuity of action. Bating by the same historian to the adventures of ALVAR NUGNEZ the descent into Hell, and the transformations of Circe, the in that country. But, we believe, no full and popular ac sights seen by DE Soro's band were as wonderful as any beheld by Ulysses; their sufferings were certainly greater, tions undertaken by Spanish adventurers to colonize the their adventures and expedients equally strange; whilst regions that now form the most Southern part of the Uni- the battles and single combats interspersed throughout the work may vie in number and detail with those before gleet; but the principal ones may be ascribed to the cha- Troy. Nor is the Conquest altogether devoid of higher racter of the people, the poverty of their country, and the interest: the leader has much that is chivalrous in his ill-success of the attempts. Corres and Pizarro arrived character, with something that is heroic, and it is not prein extensive empires, amongst a half-civilized people, and sented to us without those minute traits that mark the inin gold-producing lands; where, by a succession of daring dividual. His principal followers, too, have their personal exploits and of treacheries which historians have not been characteristics, which distinguish them from one another; ashamed to denominate policy, they succeeded, according and in the laboured descriptions of their chroniclers we not to the indignant boost of CORTES to CHARLES the Fifth, only learn to recognize the men, but have the customs and "in giving him more kingdoms than his father left him manners of the time brought up before us, more especially provinces;" besides amassing no slight amount of riches that pride of pedigree which operated in the wastes of for themselves, and showing others a ready way to wealth. Florida as strongly as in Spain, and that lofty though for-On the other hand, HERNANDO DE SOTO and his predeces- mal courtesy which has been deemed peculiar to the sor were unfortunate; and their failure laid the foundation Spanish cavalier, and was not wanting in these marauders for no immediate success and no ultimate results. Hence, when their passions slumbered. There is also the germ whilst the exploits of the conquerors of Mexico and Peru of a connected story in the leading incidents of these unare the themes of historians, novelists, and poets, the ad-fortunate explorers. The beginning dates from their first ventures of the first discoverers of the Mississippi and of setting forth, radiant in all the purple and panoply which its fertile valley have been unnoticed, save in the pages of the spoils of Mexico and Peru or the sale of their Spanish contemporary chroniclers, though their courage and capa- properties could procure. The middle might be dated city were equally great and the hardships they underwent from the disastrous battle of Mauvila, in which a victory was gained, although with the loss of spoil and stores; but The aim of Mr. THEODORE INVING'S Conquest of Flori. we rather incline to fix it at the moment when DE Soro, de (a misnomer, by the by, for Florida was not conquer- wandering in disguise through the camp, overhears a coned, but overrun), is to do justice to the memory of these firmation of the reports, that if he led his army to the sea, ill-treated adventurers,—more especially to Hernando de with the idea of founding a city and colonizing the country, Soro. The circumstance which incited him to under. take the task was an accidental meeting with GARCILASO to Spain: for from this time he became a changed man, DE LA VEGA'S "Chronicle," whilst studying Spanish at moody, melancholy, and severe, guiding his conduct not so Madrid. "As I read," says Mr. IRVING, "I became in-much by policy as by a desire to prevent his men from sensibly engrossed by the extraordinary enterprise therein having an opportunity to disband, and leading them on a narrated. I dwelt with intense interest upon the hair- desperate adventure to the interior on a forlorn hope to disbrained adventures and daring exploits of steel-clad war. cover gold. The death of DE Soro, from a fever brought riors, and the no less valiant and chivalrous deeds of on by fatigue, anxiety, and the climate, is the catastrophe; savage chieflains, which entitle this narrative to the high and the final event it gives rise to is the return to Panuco, praise bestowed upon it by Mr. Souther, of being one of after innumerable hardships, of the remnant of the most the most delightful works in the Spanish language." This gallant and well-appointed band that had ever set out to an ed dle the Mississippi to the sea.

Of the details of their route no particulars can be fur-

tinctly marked, nor expect that the elements of heroic action are brought out with the strength of heroic song. A of the author's style, and of the sort of reading he will proach. meet with. Here are some disjointed bits from an episodical adventure of Juan DE Anasco and his thirty lancers, been travelling for six successive days through a hostile country, continually depending for their safety on the swiftness of their horses, and the bridge of which the reader hears is formed of felled trees sunk under the water.

"On the seventh day, Pedro de Atienza declared himself to be ill. They made light of his declaration, and, not uscless were almost driven to despair." to lose time, urged him forward. He continued from time to time to complain, but without being attended to until having ridden in this way for several hours, he fell dead ferings. There was no time to be lost, however, in ceremonials. They dug a grave with their hatchets upon the spot, buried him by the way-side, and then rode on, deploring the loss of a brave soldier and well-tried comrade.

"That night, after travelling twenty leagues, they encamped on the border of the great morass. It was so extremely cold, in consequence of a keen North wind, that they were compelled to kindle fires, at the risk of warning tages in their canoes over the Spaniards, who could not need. avail themselves of their horses, and had neither archers nor cross-bows to dislodge the enemy. Thus troubled and that fleetness of foot for which his countrymen were reanxious, one-third of their number kept watch at a time, markable. Finding, however, that the horse gained upon while the others slept in order to recruit strength for the him, be took refuge under a tree, as the natives were acfatigues of the coming day.

"The Spaniards had slept but a few hours when they were awakened by the sufferings of Juan de Soto, who had he awaited the approach of his enemy. Diego de Soto been the companion of Pedro Atienza, and who died al. galloped up to the tree, but not being able to ride under it, most as suddenly, being overcome by excessive fatigue.

"Some of the troops fled from the neighbourhood of the them and caused these sudden deaths. Gomez Arias, discharged it the moment the horse was abreast of him. vexed at their panic, cried out, "If you fly from us, whither will you go? You are not on the river-banks of Seville, nor in its clive groves." Ashamed of their alarms, the teen or twenty paces and fell dead. fugitives returned and joined in prayers for the dead, but panion had died of the dreaded pestilence.

"When the day dawned they prepared to pass the mo-The remainder, perfectly naked, vaulted upon their horses, hand. The savage, however, contented himself with his and endeavoured to force them into the water; but it was good fortune, and made off for the woods." so cold that they sbrank back. The soldiers then attached ropes to their halters, and four or five swam to the midanimals, however, planted their feet firmly in the ground, horseback to gather some fruit that grew in a wood skirtand could not be moved.

ter them. For more than three hours the latter thus la- gave the alarm of Indians at hand, and throwing himself near the embouchure of which river they descended the boured in vain. At length they succeeded in forcing two of the horses over, one of which belonged to the leader. The reader who has followed us in our notice must not Juan de Anasco, the other to Gonzalo de Silvestre. Both imagine that the points we have alluded to are very dis- of these cavaliers being among the number of those who could not swim, had already passed by the bridge. As soon as their horses had landed they saddled and mounted few miscellaneous extracts will at once give him an idea them, in order to be ready for action, should an enemy ap-

"Notwithstanding two horses had thus led the way. no other, either by coaxing or cudgelling, could be prewho were sent on an exploring expedition. They have vailed upon to follow Gomez Arias, the hardy chief of nineteen companions, who, entirely naked, had been labouring up to their waists in water more than four hours. exposed to the keen North wind, and so thoroughly chilled that their bodies were almost black. They were wearied in body and vexed in spirit; and seeing all their exertions

AN INDIAN'S EXPLOIT.

"At another time a party of twenty horse and fifty foot beside his horse. His comrades were shocked at his sud-sallied out on a foraging expedition to gather maize. Afden death, and at their own want of sympathy in his sufselves in an ambush in a hamlet about a league from their quarters, in hopes of entrapping some of the natives. In the upper part of what appeared to be a temple they placed a centry; who after some time descried an Indian moving stealthily across the public square, casting furtive glances, as if he dreaded a concealed foe.

"The sentinel giving the alarm, Diego de Soto, nephew to the Governor, one of the best soldiers in the army, and the Indians of their vicinity. Twenty resolute men would an excellent horseman, spurred into the square to capture have been sufficient to dispute this pass and massacre every him. Diego Velasquez, Master of the Horse to the Goverone of them; as the savages would possess great advan nor, followed at a hand-gallop, to aid De Soto in case of " The Indian seeing them approach trusted for safety to customed to do when they had no lances to defend themselves from the horse. Here, fixing an arrow in his bow. wheeled close beside it, and made a thrust with his lance over his left arm at the Indian as he dashed by. The latcorpse, declaring that the plague had broken out among ter evaded the blow, and drawing his arrow to the head The shaft entered just between the girth and the stirrupleather, the wounded animal went stumbling forward fif-

" Diego Velasquez spurred to the relief of his comrade, would not aid in interring the body, insisting that their com- and passing the tree, made a plunge with his lance as De Soto had done. The same event followed. The Indian dodged the lance, discharged another arrow just behind Eight Spaniards who could not swim proceeded to the stirrup-leather, and sent the horse tumbling to take its the bridge, and having replaced its railing carried over the place beside its companion. The two cavaliers sprang saddles of their horses and the clothes of their companions, upon their feet and advanced upon the Indian lance in

INDIAN ARCHERY.

dle of the current, attempting to drag the horses after them; others struck them behind with long poles. The men, Simon Rodriguez and Roque de Yelves set out on ing the village. Not satisfied with plucking it from the "Two or three were at length urged into the stream; lower branches, seated in their saddles, they climbed the but when they come to the deep water the cold was so tree to gather it from the topmost boughs, fancying it of great that they turned back, dragging the swimmers af better flavour. While thus employed, Roque de Yelves from the tree, ran to recover his herse; but an arrow with their journey, the troops continued to press forward, tra-a barb of flint entered between his shoulders and came velling all day, and arriving at their place of encampment out at his breast-he fell forward and lay stretched upon just before nightfall, drenched with rain and covered with the earth. Rodriguez was too much terrified to descend mud. They had then to go in quest of food, and were They shot at him like a wild beast, and he fell dead, generally compelled to obtain it by force of arms, and pierced by three arrows. Scarcely had he touched the sometimes at the expense of many lives. ground when they scalped him and bore off the trophy in "The rivers became swollen by the rains; even the the slain Spaniards had fled towards the camp. Upon the by the unceasing opposition of their enemies and the want horse died. The Spaniards suspecting that he had been the knees of the infantry. For clothing they had merely tracing it, found a shaft which had passed through the which served for shirt, doublet, and coat, and was almost thigh and entrails and lodged in the hollow of the breast always wet through. They were in general bare legged, They were perfectly amazed at the result of the examination, for an arquebuse could searcely have sent a ball so far."

WANTONNESS OF WEARINESS.

" In the course of their weary march throughout this desolate tract, a foot-soldier, calling to a horseman who his comrade, being heartily tired of carrying them on his back, though he had a pair of broad shoulders, capable of bearing the burden of a mule. The horsemen refused to accept so thoughtless an offer. "Keep them yourself," said he; "you have most need of them. The Governor intends shortly to send messengers to Havana, where you can forward these presents and have them sold, and obtain three or four horses with the proceeds; so that then you will have no further need to travel on foot."

"Juan Terron was piqued at having his offer refused. "Well," said he, "if you will not have them, I swear I will not carry them, and they shall remain here." So saying, he untied the bag, and whirling it round, as if he were sowing seed, scattered the pearls in all directions among the thickets and herbage. Then putting up the bag in his sowing seed, scattered the pearls in all directions among the thickets and herbage. Then putting up the bag in his phrase, "gone over it;" a suspicion strengthened by the marched on, leaving his comrade and other hystanders as. marched on, leaving his comrade and other bystanders as-

"The soldiers made a hasty search for the scattered pearls, and recovered thirty of them. When they beheld their great size and beauty, none of them being bored and discoloured, they lamented that so many had been lost; Is an historical novel, of considerable power and interest.

be taken from

THE RETREAT.

t

ne se H w of the

an lo

st

th

in

the

Ki

ha

to riv

Cu

tho

and

due

rea

frie

ject nat

wei

hon

par

dau

the 8001 driv

coul we l

of ti

a ge

T of in

dred

story an i Robi

of th

adva

at la ita s

scen prese

ture, and f

stane

they

for es

T upon

triumph. The arrival of his comrades saved the scalp of brooks were no longer fordable, so that almost every day poor de Yelves. He related the event in few words, and the soldiers were obliged to make rafts to cross them. At making confession, immediately expired. The horses of some of the rivers they were detained seven or eight days, thigh of one of them was perceived a drop of blood. He of sufficient materials for constructing rafts. Often too, at was taken to a farrier, who, seeing that the wound was no night, they had no place to lie upon-the ground being greater than that made by the puncture of a lancet, said covered with mud and water. The cavalry passed the there was nothing to cure. On the following morning the night sitting upon their horses, and the water was up to struck by an arrow, opened the body at the wound, and jackets of chamois and other skins, belted round them, without shoes or sandals.

"Both men and horses began to sicken and die under such dreadful privations. Every day two, three, and at one time, seven Spaniards fell victims to the hardships of this journey, and almost all the Indian servants perished. There were no means of carrying the sick and dying, was his friend, drew forth from his wallet a linen bag, in for many of the horses were infirm, and those that were which were six pounds of pearls, probably filched from one well were reserved to repel the constant attacks of a vigion of the Indian sepulchres. These he offered as a gift to lant enemy. The sick, therefore, dragged their steps forward as long as they could, and often died by the way; while the survivors, in their haste to proceed, scarcely stayed to bury them, but left them half covered with earth, and sometimes entirely unburied. Yet, in spite of sickness and exhaustion, the army never failed to post sentinels and keep up their camp-guards at night in order to

> In an address full of good and grateful feeling, Mr. THEODORE INVING dedicates his volumes to his uncle Washington, acknowledging, amongst weightier obligations, his assistance in the composition of the present work. We have not perceived any marked traces in parts of the author of the Sketch Book; but there is such a

From the Spectator. HORSE-SHOE ROBINSON

for the whole would have sold in Spain for more than six Both these qualities, however, are displayed in the histothousand ducats. This egregious folly gave rise to a com. ry rather than in the fiction: had Mr. KENNEDY travelled mon proverb in the army, that "there are no pearls for over well-known ground, and taken up a familiar subject, Juan Terron." We must pass the illness and death of DE Soro; the would certainly have been thought heavy, and perhaps unaccount of the precautions adopted by his troops to pre. readable. The wild scenery of such half-settled countries went the discovery of his mortal sickness by the natives, as Virginia and Carolina, the habits of life and diversified lest they should attack them in consequence; and the characters of the remoter parts of the States some fifty years "maimed rites" with which he was first buried at mid-since, the stirring adventures and barbarities of Colonial night in a ready-dug excavation, and then taken up and partisan warfare, and the irregular troops by whom it was entombed in the channel of the Mississippi, to render the chiefly waged, are subjects that give a truthful air and an discovery of his remains impossible. The last extract shall exciting antiquarianism to the work, altogether apart from its merit as a novel.

The scene of the story is laid in the Southern States, in 1780, about the time when the American General GATES "The winter now set in with great rigour: it was accompanied with heavy rains, violent gales, and extreme pendence was, apparently crushed. The most important, cold; yet in their eagerness to arrive at the termination of the most active, and the busiest character in the novel, is Sergeant Robinson, whose cognomen and nickname of "Horse-Shoe" (from his trade of a farrier, and the returning sweep of a river near his own house), give the title to the book. This man has from nature a stalwart person, a good and a stout heart, a quiet dry humour, and an acuteness which Yankee habits have disposed him to render serviceable to his own interests and those of his friends. His training as a backwoodsman and hunter have made him well acquainted with the country, rendered him capable of enduring excessive fatigue, and given him skill in all the Indian modes of finding his own way through the forest and over the mountain, or of tracking or avoiding an enemy. In addition to these qualities, he has served long enough in the "continental line" to have acquired the wary craft and ready adaptation to all kinds of circumstances which distinguish the old campaigner. Upon him and upon a Sergeant Curry—a kind of darker Bothwell the action of the tale depends. Curry, instigated by an English Captain St. Jermyn alias Tyrrell, plots; but Robinson is always ready to foil them by counterplots; and in the end, Curry is killed by Robinson, in single combat, at King's Mountain; and St. Jermyn, by a species of stronghand law, is hanged upon a tree after the action.

St. Jermyn's intrigues have a threefold object: he wishto join the Royalists; he desires to win his daughter and ful insecurity." her estates; and, chiefest of all, he aims at destroying his rival, Butler, by murdering him, through the agency of Curry and a Tory band of half-robber soldiers, or failing a gentleman upon such a crime with such instruments.

The want of development of character, and the absence of interest, are felt too in all the love scenes between Mildred and Butler; and throughout the whole romance of the story there is a deficiency of art and connexion. Butler is an instrument in the hands of events, or of Horse-Shoe Robinson; Mildred does nothing to the purpose; and some of the incidents are mere disconnected episodes, that neither advance or retard the catastrophe, which is brought about at last without any skill. The interest of the work is in its sketches of history and landscape, and in its isolated scenes; which, however, derive their power chiefly from present objects, without much relation to the past or fu-The court-martial where Butler was tried as a spy, and the night-ambush where he is made prisoner, for instance, would be nearly as effective in fragments as where they now stand.

The whole of any one scene would encroach too much upon our columns; we must therefore pick up a few bits for extracts.

A DISTRACTED PROVINCE.

"One feature that belonged to this unhappy state of things in Carolina, was the division of families. Kindred were arrayed against each other in deadly feuds; and, not unfrequently, brother took up arms against brother, and sons against their sires. A prevailing spirit of treachery and distrust marked the times. Strangers did not know how far they might trust to the rites of hospitality; and many a man laid his head upon his pillow, uncertain whether his fellow-lodger, or he with whom he had broken bread at his last meal, might not invade him in the secret watches of the night and murder him in his slumbers. All went armed, and many slept with pistols or daggers under their pillows. There are tales told of men being summoned to their doors or windows at midnight by the blaze of their farm-yards, to which the incendiary torch had been applied, and shot down, in the light of the conflagration, by a consealed hand. Families were obliged to betake themselves to the shelter of the thickets and swamps, when their own homesteads were dangerous places. The enemy wore no colours, and was not to be distinguished from friends either by outward guise or speech. Nothing could be more revolting than to see the symbols of peace thus misleading the confident into the toils of war; nor is it possible to es to engage Mr. Lindsay, a Loyalist of Virginia, openly imagine a state of society characterized by a more fright-

A WILD LANDSCAPE,

"By the time that they had gained the summit of a long that, to get him executed as a spy. The intrigues of love hill that rose immediately from the plain of the river, and politics are short, but wearisome; nor is their con-Robinson apprized Butler that they were now in the vicinity duct very cleverly managed. There seems no sufficient of Adair's dwelling. The sun had sunk below the horizon, reason for St. Jermyn assuming a feigned name in his and the varied lustre of early twilight tinged the surroundfriendly visits to Lindsay; for detection would have sub ing scenery with its own beautiful colours. The road, as jected him to the punishment of a spy; and though it was it wound upward, gradually emerged from the forest upon natural that a family, the politics of whose junior members a tract of open country, giving signs of one of those oriwere Colonial, should dislike him, there was nothing dis-ginal settlements which, at that day, were sparsely sprinkled honourable in a Royalist officer endeavouring to acquire through the great wilderness. The space that had been partisans, nor any crime in his falling in love with his host's snatched from the ruggedness of nature for the purposes of daughter. His attempts upon Butler are base enough, but husbandry, comprehended some three or four fields of the reader scarcely feels satisfied of their probability; there thinly-cultivated land. These were yet spotted over with seems a want of motive. Love and avaries will indeed stumps of trees, that seemed to leave but little freedom to the drive a man a long way; but to an English officer of high course of the ploughshare, and bespoke a thriftless and rank and high connexions, the dower of Miss Lindsay slovenly tillage. A piece of half-cleared ground, occupycould have been no such enormous attraction; and though ing the side of one of the adjacent hills, presented to the we hear of his love, he never displays it. There is none eye of our travellers a yet more uncouth spectacle. This of the smothered fire developed which would have driven spot was still clothed with the native trees of the forest, all of which had been death-stricken by the axe, and now heaved up their withered and sapless branches towards the heavens without leaf or spray. In the phrase of the woodman, they had been girdled some years before, and were destined to await the slow decay of time in their upright attitude. It was a grove of huge skeletons that had already been bleached into an ashy hue by the sun, and whose stiff and dry members rattled in the breeze with a preternatural harshness. Amongst the most hoary of these victims of the axe, the gales of the winter had done their work and thrown them to the earth, where the shattered boles and and boughs lay as they had fallen, and were slowly reverting into their original dust. Others, whose appointed time had not yet been fulfilled, gave evidence of their struggle with the frequent storm, by their declination from the perpendicular line. Some had been caught in falling by the boughs of a sturdier neighbour, and still leaned their hugs bulks upon these supports, awakening the mind of the spectator to the fancy that they had sunk in some deadly paroxysm into charitable and friendly arms, and, thus locked together, abided their tardy but irrevocable doom. It was a field of the dead; and the more striking truth and interest to the first or the art to connect the two in its imagerie from the contrast which it furnished to the last with the story, Mr. KENNEDY has put forth a work of rich, verdurous, and lively forest, that, with all the joyous- power in parts, but ineffective as a whole. ness of health, encompassed this blighted spot. Its aspect was one of unpleasant desolation; and the traveller of the present day who visits our Western wilds, where this slovenly practice is still in use, will never pass through such a precinct without a sense of disgust at the disfiguration of the landscape."

HOW TO TELL A GENTLEMAN.

" Because you are a gentleman," replied the girl, curtseving, " for all your homespun clothes."

"Ha! pray how have you found that out?"

" You talk differently from our people, Sir. Your words or your voice—I can't rightly tell which—are softer than I have been used to hear. And you don't look, and walk, and behave as if homespun had been all you ever wore."

" And is that all?"

"You stop to consider, as if you were studying what would please other people; and you do not step so heavy, Sir; and you do not swear; and you do not seem to like to give trouble: I can't think, Sir, that you have been always used to such as are hereabouts."

A DISTANT COMBAT.

"The first few scattered shot, that told of the confusion in which the combat was begun, were, after an interval, succeeded by regular vollies of musketry, that indicated an orderly and marshalled resistance. Platoon after platoon fired in regular succession, signifying, to the practised hearing of the soldier, that infantry were receiving the attacks of cavalry, and that as yet the first had not faltered. Then the firing grew more slack, and random shots were discharged from various quarters; but amidst these were heard no embodied vollies-it was the casual and nearly overpowered resistance of flying men.

"At this juncture there was a dark frown on the brow of Curry, as he looked at his comrades and said, in a low and mattered tone, "That helter-skelter shot grates cursedly on the ear: there's ill-luck in the sound of it."

"Presently a few stragglers appeared at a turn of the road, some quarter of a mile in the direction of the battle, urging their horses forward at the top of their speed. These were followed by groups both of infantry and cavalry, pressing onward in the utmost disorder; those on horseback thrusting their way through the throng of foot soldiers, seemingly regardless of life or limb; the wounded with their wounds bleeding afresh, or hastily bandaged with such appliances as were at hand. All hurried along, amidst the oaths, remonstrances, and unheeded orders of the officers, who were endeavouring to resume their commands: it was the flight of men beset by a panic and fearful of pursuit; and the clouds of dust raised by the press and hurry of this career almost obscured the setting sun."

We have spoken plainly of Mr. KENNEDY's defects, because he has opened a new field, which promises to yield a good crop if properly cultivated. That he is familiar with the history and traditions of the American Revolution, is evident: he would fashion his matter with far more effect if he limited himself to short tales, and aimed at bringing out rather than expanding the traditions of the Revolution. The arrest, rescue, and love of Butler, would have filled a volume or a volume and a half, and furnished a tale of great power. By aiming at the production of an historical novel, which, after the manner of Scorr, should be expanded by dialogue, enriched by the introduction of in Europe, it would not be owing to the inactivity of her public characters, and illustrate the general history of the legislators. From 1789 to the present day the total numtime, without possessing dramatic genius necessary to give ber of laws enacted, and ordinances equivalent to them,

From the Amulet for 1836.

wi

cei

the

of i

wh

of i

whi

whi

pay

prov

But

plan

struc

as ye

the s real :

which milita policy

of an

of his father

bour t

sion;

distan

ed to

WAS VO

man e been d and th

Warm

The

THE MOTHER .- BY CHARLES SWAIN.

A softening thought of other years, A feeling linked to hours When life was all too bright for tears, And hope sang, wreathed with flowers; A memory of affections fled, Of voices heard no more, Stirred in my spirit when I read That name of fondness o'er.

Oh, Mother !- in that magic word What loves and joys combine! What hopes, too off, alas, deferred !-What watchings-griefs-are thine! Yet, never, till the hour we roam, By worldly thralls opprest, Learn we to prize that holiest home. A living mother's breast.

The thousand prayers at midnight poured Beside our couch of woes; The wasting weariness endured To soften our repose: . Whilst never murmur marked thy tongue, Nor toils relaxed thy care! How Mother, is thy heart so strong, To pity and forbear?

What filial fondess e'er repaid, Or could repay the past? Alas, for gratitude decayed !-Regrets, that rarely last! 'Tis only when the dust is thrown Thy blessed bosom o'er, We muse on all thy kindness shown, And wish soe'd loved thee more!

"Tis only when thy lips are cold We mourn-with late regret, 'Mid myriad memoirs of old-The days for ever set; And not an act, nor look, nor thought, Against thy meek control, But, with a sad remembrance fraught, Wakes anguish in the soul!

On every land, in every clime, True to her sacred cause; Filled by that affluence sublime From which her strength she draws, Still is the Mother's heart the same; The mother's lot as tried: And, oh, my nations guard that name With filial power and pride.

FRANCE.

If France did not happen to be the most flourishing state

French paper.

From the Quarterly Review.

FRIEDRICH DER GROSSE. Eine Lebensgeschichte, Von J. D. E. Preuss. 4 Bande, und Urkundenbuch. 4 Theile. (Frederic the Great. The History of his Life. By J. D. E. Preuss. 4 vols. 8vo. together with four volumes of original documents by way of Appendix.) Berlin, 1832-1834.

terest in the contemplation of his career, in that point of from predilection as much as from system. than the exploded dogmatical fashion of thinking, against lation. which their warfare was directed. They laboured entirely for present fame, and they have had their reward; for poswhich they wished to supersede; and has even ceased to which most European governments are gradually proceed-pay the homage which was really their due for the iming to reform themselves—was framed by the unwearied provements in society to which their sallies gave origin. energies of one man. Frederic's first principle, which he But it is the civil government of Frederic,—the mind which followed even to erroneous results, was to do every thing planned, and the resources which were applied to the construction of the Prussian monarchy, -of which we have The end of government-the happiness of the people, but as yet a very confused and imperfect knowledge; while, if prescribed and regulated happiness—was kept in view the subject is fully considered, we shall find in him the with steady, unremitting rectitude. All separate authoreal founder of that peculiar form of moderate autocracy rities, corporate or individual, which might interpose bewhich now prevails over the greater part of Europe. The tween the royal person and his subjects, lost one by one military monarchy, the most recent of all great systems of their weight and authority, and he became the central policy, and widely differing from the military despotism mover of everything. The nobles became still more imof an usurper, this was the creation of Frederic. The poverished and dependant than before; their substance foundations of the edifice were laid undoubtedly by many was wasted in the expenses of an ill-paid military service, of his predecessors in German states, and especially by his while the laws which forbade the disposal of their lands to father in Prussia. But he completed by forty years of la-roturiers, still propagated from one generation to another bour this monument of his genius and of national submis-their needy multitude. The clergy, gradually more and sion; other sovereigns have done nothing but extend to more discountenanced while ostensibly protected, lost their distant regions the copy of the model which he bequeath-independent provisions whether enjoyed by Protestant or was very gradually accomplished by princes of the Ger-people and security of the king. All the independent man empire. In France the old fabric of aristocracy had been demolished much earlier, by the wars of the league and the policy of Richelieu. But the feudal garb was rather laid aside, like the traveller's cloak, through the warmth of court favour, than torn away by main force why God made sand."

- "After ail the meditation I have bestowed on the subject," Frederic used to say, when dissapointed in his agricultural speculations, "I never yet could discover why God made sand."

is 76,758 (not 20 of which have been formally repealed). from the wearer. The French government became a They are thus divided: - Under the Constituent Assem- paradise of courtiers and royal favourites; it retained the bly, 3,402; Legislative Assembly, 2,078; National Con-vices of an aristocratic system without any of its indevention, 14,034; Directory, 2,049; Consulate, 3,846; pendent strength; and the power of standing armies, the Empire, 10,254; Louis XVIII. (1st year of his reign), substitute which modern times have discovered for that 841; Hundred Days and Provisional Government, 318; strength, was not fully understood even by Louis XIV. in Louis XVIII. (after the 1st year), 17,112; Charles X., the plenitude of his military glory. But the poverty of 15,801; Louis Philippe (up to September 20, 1835), 6,323. German capitals offered none of those means which France Average, 138 laws a months during the last 46 years. had found so efficacious in subduing the pride of the nobles. Saxony alone, of all the realms of the Emperor, emulated the character of the court of Paris in splendour and magnificence. The lesser barons of Germany owed the decline of their authority, about the beginning of the last century, rather to the warlike character of the nation, and the frequent eampaigns which rendered standing armies necessary for the protection of wide tracts of open country. As the subordination, the regular constitution, and the numbers of these new armies increased, the gentlemen gradually exchanged the character of their ancestors for that of officers and servants of their sovereign, while that The history of Frederic the Great is deserving of greater sovereign, from their suzerain and equal, became their attention than it generally receives from the men of this general and their master, Frederic William I. the father of age, on more accounts than one. It is not only as the Frederic, one of the most eccentric of monarchs, -whom, general and the conquerer, (although in military fame had not all his enterprises been fortunate, had he not been equalled by one only who has ever appeared on the stage one of the most sagacious and successful princes of his of modern Europe,) that history exhibits him as the most time, we should find it difficult not to pronounce a madprominent figure of his time. Nor can we take much in man, -pursued the one great object of forming his army view in which he most desired admiration-his connexion tance which Frederic received from him was this magnifiwith the literary history of the last century. No subject cent army-a treasure which, however, one campaign sufis now less generally attractive than the quarrels and re-ficed to dissipate; an expensive, but poor, sandy, half conciliations, the mutual flatteries and mutual insults, of cultivated kingdom; two or three fortresses, and as many the philosophic schools of littérateurs. The reaction in second-rate cities; a nobility proud and punctilious, but the public mind has been so complete, that the scepticism almost wholly devoted to military service; a clergy powof Frederic and Voltaire, that negative system of criticism, erful, pedantic, and somewhat fanatical; an administration which assumed such proud dictation over all the wisdom conducted on indifferent principles, but orderly and well of modern and ancient times, -is now even more obsolete arranged in detail; a patient, brave, and laborious popu-

Out of these materials, the modern kingdom of Prussia,
—that wonderful machine of state-craft, as a mere terity has more utterly forgotten them, than the antiquity machine the most remarkable in existence, on the model of Catholic, and became pensioned servants to perform a state The task of breaking down the power of inferior nobles duty, less for the love of God than for the peace of the theran orthodoxy, such occurrences as the former were the tendency towards this species of centralization: by no means rare,) were put a stop to. The liberty of although the catastrophe of Prussis, after the battle of of the state. A very prominent feature in Frederic's perate despotism. Everything has gradually been made, system, which indicated clearly his principles of paternal like the processes in manufactures, simpler, cheaper, and of these enterprises were conducted on most mistaken Frenchmen, used to turn into ridicule the antiquated cereprinciples: much was done at great expense by the state, mony of the German Courts; now, our own is almost the which would have been much better and cheaper done only European palace which maintains the ceremonial of by subjects; and many instances of particular munifi-past times, and citizen-kings in outward department rule cence were in fact impositions on the many for the be. from Petersburgh to Naples. The landed aristocracy are nefit of the few. It is only when contrasted with the melting away in most countries under the pressure of low financial anarchy prevailing in his time in most Euro- prices and political insignificance, and their place is suppean countries, the rapacity of farmers, the ill-filled plied by the Bureaucratie. Compulsory enrolment, which treasuries and oppressed peasantry, that this part of first began in Prussia, has superseded voluntary recruiting Frederic's labours stands out in eminent relief.

authority, ministerial, municipal, and religious, was fully purpose of compulsory education, and taught by the state, subjected to the central power-when throughout his wide whose soldiers they are, from their birth. Constitutional dominions no step could be taken for the public service, or forms, eagerly desired only twenty years since, praised even by individual industry without the cognizance of and even promised by kings and ministers, are losing imomnipresent authority—then Frederie's great idea might portance in the public mind of most countries; as rebe said to be complete; and although he to the end of his formers begin to despair of fixing the universal medium, life continued to superintend his machine in person, it once so confidently hoped for, between despotism and dewas fit to work without any assistance from the personal mocracy. In those regions in which such constitutions character of the monarch. The sovereigns of neighbour-exist, they seem to continue only by sufferance, in presence ing states were not long in perceiving the substantial ad-of the great fourth estate of the standing army, which at vantages of his institutions. From his time, the form and once protects and overawes them. All is equalizing; but etiquette which hedged in royalty,-the relies of the gro. it is the equality of civil, not of political freedom, which tesque splendour of the middle ages, gradually wore away is now spreading itself over the central regions of Europe. in the northern continental courts, and were exchanged Perhaps those who anticipate the triumph of republicanism for the simple but terrible array of a camp. Tight uniare less correct in their views, at least for a time, than forms succeeded the motley costume of Louis XIV. and those who imagine that the recent struggles to establish royalty itself laid aside its trappings to assume a military free governments in the west—the struggles of democratic authorities, which in ill-governed countries are apt to aspect. Instead of the feudatories and nobles, the priests arise out of the body of the administration, disappeared and the men of learning, who had formed the cortège of before a king who was his own minister, and succeeded sovereigns, generals and aides de-camp became their only more nearly in realizing the daring idea of universal surattendants. The Austrian Emperor Joseph II. and his reillance than any other monarch has ever done. The brother Leopold, who endeavoured to frame their personal brief forms, quick execution, and unhesitating obedience characteristics as well as their political system upon those of the camp, were transferred by degrees into every of the successfull enomy of their mother, were among department of the state; and its presiding spirit devoted the principal propagators of this great innovation. The himself wholly and without the slightest remission of difference was, indeed, very wide between the acute and his vigilance to the performance of his own part, "Si practical Frederic himself, and these two pre-Benthamite I'on veut que le gouvernement monarchique l'emporte sovereigns, the vain followers of theories of which the sur le républicain," says he, in his Essai sur les Formes ultimate tendency was wholly misunderstood by themdu Gouvernement, "l'arrêt du souverain est prononcé: selves. Even Frederic, although from motives of policy il doit être actif et integre." And to this self-imposed he complimented and flattered his youthful imitator, saw obligation he adhered as an inflexible law. Such an the foible of his character, and drew his portrait, as well artificial instrument as a government of this nature can as that of many similar philosophers, in a single sentence, hardly continue long in action, unless its general opera-"Il veut finir avant que de commencer." His wild tion is for the immediate benefit of the subject. Ac-schemes of improvement were cut short, as might be excordingly, the system of Frederic was to do all for the pected, by the insubordination excited among all classes people, nothing by the people; and, while not a single of his subjects. Yet Joseph deserves, equally with Freshred of the capricious political liberty of the middle deric, the praise of good intention; there never lived a ages was left, civil freedom was secured and extended prince who was more thoroughly impressed with a sense to a higher degree than before. Mind as well as person of his duty towards his subjects; and, powerless as he was freed from the restrictions of centuries. All the was to produce substantial reform, he acted no small part vexations small persecutions which the zeal of the clergy, in the great work of hewing down the old monarchies of and the jealous pride of corporate bodies, had exercised Europe into the military shape. The French revolution, against individuals, (in Prussia, in the days of her Lu. by leaving to princes no safety but in the sword, increased the press was widely extended, although by no means Jena, proved at the same time how weak it is against the so far as some modern panegyrists of Frederic seem to attack of a foreign enemy, who, by striking one decisive suppose. Every complaint was attended to; and heavy blow at the centre of the machine, can paralyze all its as taxation undoubtedly was, (although less so than in distant and subordinate parts. Finally, the years which later times,) yet little room was left for complaint, where have passed since the fall of Napoleon have been spent in the most rigid economy was applied to every department consolidating and strengthening these new fabrics of temgovernment, was the encouragement given to agriculture more expeditious. Forms and delays of every sort are by bounties, by largeeses in seasons of public calamity, slowly disappearing, even, as far as possible, in the last and by the plantation of colonies in waste land. Many strongholds of the law. Formerly, Englishmen, and even in all great armies but our own: the children of whole When the system was fully established-when all kingdoms are marshalled moreover, like an army, for the

t a p (o w si st ca

na de

to 801 rea

gro

syst ecor

In I

ques ed i

the p

tive o

VO

aspirations in countries where democratic principle is ex-regret that so many valuable original materials as are here tinet—will probably end, and that speedily, in producing accumulated should have fallen into the hands of a writhis more compendious constitution: and few cool rea ter so little qualified to do justice to them. The exis-soners will doubt that institutions such as those of Prussia tence of so minute and authentic a work, as to facts, may would cause greater immediate benefit to a country like deter from the task other men capable of really perform-Spain, than an English government of tenpound house ing that labour which the memory of Frederic of Prusholders. The chambers in France—the noblesse in Russia sia still demands from modern Europe, which, in its preand Hungary-are perhaps the only bodies which now sent forms of government and modes of thinking, may oppose a feeble resistance to the spread of the military almost date its origin from his reign. monarchy—the euthanasia of all the old continental constitutions; possibly of our own.

Few princes have been more repeatedly made the subjects of discussion, in histories, biographies, memoirs, and not generally interesting out of its limits. anecdotes, than Frederic of Prussia. His outward aspect and peculiarities, his mode of life in the camp and the city, are known to every one; perhaps there are few historical characters with which we fancy ourselves more familiar, or the mention of which calls up more vividly the the habitual expression of sarcasm conveyed both in face conduct us to a more intimate knowledge of the man .- play contained in them of the interior of a royal mansion. Voltaire's alternate satirical and complimentary descripdetails into which it diverges, render it no great addition source of much which distinguished his manhood. By actions of a forty-years's reign, private and public, with otherwise have found in luxury or in vice; patient persescarcely those exceptions which common decency and mo. verance, and that elasticity of hope under reverses, which rality imperiously demand. The rights of the house of bore up so bravely against the vicissitudes of his after life, Brandenburg over Silesia are argued again, after the sword were first learned by him in the palace of Potsdam and had decided the law-suit ninety years ago against ordinary the castle of Custrin. reason and justice, with all the zeal of an advocate. The Scandalous partition of Poland is vindicated on similar ing to directions minutely prescribed by Frederic William grounds of special pleading. All the errors of Frederic's to Duhan and his son's other preceptors; for the king was system against the most obvious principles of political most anxious to bring him up to his own model of excellence, economy are culogized with the most unconscious gravity. in a religious as well as social point of view, although his In his private life he is pictured as almost faultless,—pedantry and prejudices rendered him a very unfit guartemperate, gentle, considerate, and peaceful; even the dian over the mind of susceptible youth. The collections question "Was Frederic irreligious or not?" is answerof our author contain draughts in the king's band of the ed in the negative, after sixty pages of examination into manner in which every day was to be employed by the boy; his sayings and writings. We do not deny the author the hours of rising, praying, coffee, hair powder, and boots, the praise of having made very extensive and various collare all minutely noted. History and divinity formed lections, and of having given a far more complete narra-nearly the only matter of instruction; and reading and tive of many important occurrences than any which had repetition of the Bible and Noltenius's Catechism, together previously appeared; but when a work of such high pre-previously appeared; but when a work of such high pre-tentions, executed with so great a want of those qualities of impartiality and discernment which render history slight knowledge of French and Italian was added to valuable, comes under our inspection, we are tempted to these elementary studies; but Frederic's familiarity with

The original materials, however, with which this work is enriched, are chiefly calculated to enhance its value in Prussia; as they refer in great part to persons and things of correspondence between Frederic and his generals and ministers contain little, as far as we have examined them, beyond brief orders and notices respecting details of administration. Among those from which we have derived the greatest share of amusement, are the letters which shadow of one who seems present to our imagination like passed between Frederic and his father, and other docuan old and intimate acquaintance. And yet, beyond his ments, throwing fresh light on the extraordinary domes-cocked hat and military boots, his brilliant eye, his quick tic history of the court of Prussia under the father of its step and bent figure, his polished address contrasted with future hero; all tending to confirm those sketches of the Margravine of Bareith, of which the authority has someand language, we are in truth sadly wanting in guides to times been questioned, on account of the marvellous dis-

No small portion of Frederic's character was formed, tions, and Thiebault's lively but incorrect reminiscences, are the authorities from which we derive most of our ideas. His father, who, in the bitterness of his heart, lamented respecting him. All who have touched the difficult sub. over the fondness which his degenerate son exhibited for ject of his character in modern times have not contented literature and amusement, little foresaw the gradual efthemselves with adopting the wholesale language of his fect which his dicipline, harsh and unpaternal as it was, admirers or his detractors: according to one class, he was the father of his people, according to another, an ambitious and heartless despot. In our own country, the recent judgment, great early severity is apt to drive the object of work of the late Lord Dover has added nothing to our it into the wildest self-gratifications as soon as the imme-previous stock of information; nor has that elegant writer diate check on his appetites is removed. But on spirits of (of whom it would be both invidious and unjust to speak stronger frame it produces a very different effect. Habits of order and endurance are gradually acquired under that shades of his disposition which renders it so interesting a extremity of constraint from which the soul revolts while study. His work is little more than a concised panegyri. cal narrative. The work now before us certainly does not err on the side of conciseness; but its vapid, undiscriminating style of culogy, and the ill-connected and tedious to our store of historical knowledge. The author's object those means, his fiery and enthusiastic temper was bent appears to be a laborious vindication of the whole of the

The early education of the prince was conducted accord-

VOL. XXVID. PERRUARY, 1836-18.

all. Greek and Latin was almost wholly omitted.

ich explicire dem Prizen euream bullam.' The king lifted way of arriving at the some results. his cane and said, 'Ich will dich, Schurke, suream bullam' telte de dire arec Lucrèce, 'Felix qui potuit rerum cognos- try, music, all the relaxations which began to attract the cere causas." -- Voi. i. p. 24.

the fashion of these times-would disgrace a Parisian worth while to compare this curious specimen of the stylegrisette of the present day,) contain amusing corrections royal in domestic quarrels with the soft and diplomatic of his royal correspondent's odes and epistles. Frederic's tone of a similar correspondence between a king and an style too, was never polished: in French notwithstanding heir-apparent within our own recollection. all his assiduity, he never attained full facility of expressing himself, his diction being always hard, cramped, and "Scin eigensinniger, boser Kopf, der nit seinen Vater somewhat ostentatious; while his German writing is the liebet, dann wann man nun alles thut, absonderlich seinen verschaften will nit wenn mill nit wenn will most extraordinary mixture of colloquial barbarisms, with Vater liebet, so thut man, was er haben will, nit wonn er French and Latin words and idioms.

of all directors to a genius like that of Frederic. His nit reiten noch schiessen kann, und dabei mal-propre an Christianity was a stern system of dectrinal orthodoxy, seinem Leibe, seine Haare wie ein Narr sich frisiret und not verschneidet, und ich alles dieses repremandiret, aber ture of dignity with simplicity which characterizes his in. alles umsonst, und keine Besserung in nits ist. Zum anstructions on this subject is not uninteresting.

and must not even be spoken of in his presence, as a poi. WILHELM."-vol. i. p. 27. son which may easily stain, seduce, and win over tender straint and impediment, within the bounds of duty."

not better means of fulfilling his intentions within his reach. But the Lutheran divines, from whom Frederic Catt's execution, with the circumstances related by was taught to seek the first rudiments of faith, were narrow-minded and polemical pedants. While they wowed abhistory.

the former language was acquired by habit in later days. solute hatred to the Catholic religion, they set up the The language of his father land was hardly insisted on at name of Luther as an idol of more than papal veneration. l. Greek and Latin was almost wholly omitted.

"Frederic himself was in the habit of relating that scholastic jargon. Those, on the other hand, who endeahe had in his earliest youth a Latin teacher; that his fa-voured, as far as they might with safety, to preach ther one day come in while this teacher was making him more intelligible doctrine to the people, were too apt to translate the Golden Bull; and that the king, on hearing keep the leading truths of their faith out of sight, and to some bad Latin phrases, said to the linguist, 'Was machet reduce it to a mere system of morality: from which the du, Schurke, da mit meineum Sohne?" 'Ihre Majestat, inquirer obviously turned to natural religion, as a simpler

The whole of the prince's remaining time, as far as the -drove him out of the room, and thus put an end to the king could controul it was to be devoted to the one en-Latin studies. Perhaps Duhan afterwards made him occupy grossing pursuit—the endless reviews and manœuvres, at himself a little with Latin; but his progress appears never to which he considered it the chief part of a monarch's ordihave been more than moderate. Nevertheless, Frederic was nary duties to assist; and which soon excited in the mind ford of employing Latin phrases, right or wrong, in speaking of his pupil a disgust that seemed insurmountable, aland writing :- festing lente-dominus vobiscum-flectamus though in after years, when the pageant became connected genua-vals ac fave-non plus ultrà-stante pede moirire- with the substance of military achievements, they became disputundus—beati posedentes—beatus paugeres spiritus—in a letter to Duhan, 12th Jan. 1738. Ja me conhis father began first to assume a serious character. Poemind of the former, were hateful to the old monarch, We must add that orthography seems to have been whose dissatisfaction was usually expressed after a fashion wholly omitted in the prince's education. Neither in less courtly than energetic. To one letter of exculpation French nor German could be write a sentence without from his son, he replied in the following extraordinary ticommitting the most extraordinary blunders. Some of rade, which we cannot attempt to translate, its force con-Voltaire's letters (whose own spelling --- so licentious was sisting as much in the manner as the matter. It would be an mi

pr tit

dis

aut

scri

T

way

Fred

great

action

" the

mank them.

of F

mock

passio of inst

vidnals

in a hi who sh

was alt feelings

"Sein eigensinniger, böser Kopf, der nit seinen Vater dabei steht, sondern wenn er nit alles sicht. Zum andern On the more important topic of religion, Frederic Wil. weiss Er wohl, dass keinen eseminirten Kerl leiden kann, liam, with the best intentions, was the most unfortunate der keine menschliche Inclinationen hat, der sie schamt, dern hoffahstig, recht baurenstolz ist, mit keinem Men-"Especially my son must be rightly brought to a true schen spricht, als mit welche, und mit popular und affabel love and fear of God as the foundation and only pillar of ist, und mit dem Gesichte Grimmassen macht als wenn er our temporal and eternal welfare; and on the contrary, all ein Narr ware, und in nits meinen Willen thut, als mit mischievous errors and sects which conduce to utter cor. der Force angehalten; nits aus Liebe und are alles dazu ruption, as Atheist, Arian, Socinian, or whatever other nit Lust hat, als seinem eigenum Kopf folgen, sonsten names they may be called by, must be altogether avoided, alles nits nûtze its. Dieses ist die Antwort. FRIEDRICH

What were the immediate effects of this paternal adminds; and with respect to the Catholic religion, being monition does not appear; but the father, who could not one which may reasonably be enumerated with these, it see in the effeminate youth whom he despised, the future must be endeavoured, as far as possible, to make it edious here of his age, continued his severe and vexatious system to him, and to impress well upon him its groundlessness of restraint. The tragedy to which his extravagance and absurdity; on the other hand, he should be led to the finally led; the desertion, recapture, and imprisonment of true Christian religion, which especially consists herein, Frederic; the sufferings of his friends; the death of the that Christ died for all men, as the only consolation of nearest and dearest of them by a cold-blooded judicial life; and he must be well-informed of the Almighty power and attributes of God, that at all times a holy fear and reverence of God may abide in him; for this is the only means life. From that time, the chief peculiarities of his nature to hold the sovereign power, freed from all human re- seem to take their origin. He was indeed partially recon-It is a pity that so serious and kingly a monitor had greater freedom, and more leisure to return to his beloved many and such warm tokens of affection from their imligion, by which his enemies sought to prejudice the king ric was the very reverse of all this. Unchangeable in all too deeply convinced of the ill success of his Christian, rable contempt in which he held mankind, their opinions, but misdirected endeavours, exclaimed to his confidential feelings, and prejudices. How such contempt was reconintimates, "L'Athèisme sera un jour sur le trone;" he cileable with the vanity which made him court the suffraabandoned all attempts at exercising compulsion over the ges even of the men he despised the most, and prefer the mind of his heir.

"You know," says Frederic, in a letter to Suhm (1737). "that irreligion is the last resource of calumniators, and that all it means is, that there is nothing more to say. The king fell into a passion; I kept myself cool: my regiment did wonders, and their success in exercising, a little meal strewn on the soldiers' heads-men more than six feet high, and many recruits-have proved stronger reap. 112

But although the latter years of his father's life passed over more tranquilly for Frederic, it is impossible not to perceive that the bent of his mind throughout his future life was fixed by the unmerited ill-treatment of his youthcealed desire of flattery in return, his social propensities, and the gay retirement of Rheinsberg, which seemed to presage a reign of unambitious peace—we discern some-times that tone of deep and concentrated sarcasm, that trability to insult, from the constant fire of jokes to which make Frederic in his youth two distinct men-the one day he uttered, and that the iambic of the hour was but a kind, complying, easy and vain; the next impetuous, scorn-casual eruption from that unfathomable reservoir of conto conciliate; insomuch that Voltaire's energetic verses, this unamiable part of his character, the reason why a authentical as they are, seem scarcely an exaggerated description:

" Assemblage éclatant de qualités contraires, Ecrasant les mortels, et les nommant ses frères : Misanthrope et farouche avec un air humain, Souvent impétueux, et quelquefois trop fin : Modeste avec orgueil, colère avec faiblesse, Pétri de passions, et cherchant la sagesse : Dangéreux politique et dangéreux auteur, Mon patron, mon disciple, et mon persécuteur."

action, but a far inferior one in almost all besides, that accorded but too well with the dark view which he had depassion and caprice, gave way freely to the vulgar humour cision of their manœuvres. "As for me," said Frederic, was altered by excess of greatness, was rather remarkable pline and subordination." for the ready sympathy with which he entered into the From the same peculiar views and feelings, we find that feelings of his dependents. Few princes have enjoyed so little cordial intimacy existed between Frederic and the occupations, while he maintained a decent attendance to mediate attendants; and this, notwithstanding the radical the duties of his regiment. Even the accusations of irre- selfishness which formed the basis of his character. Fredeagainst him, did not prevail; although Frederic William, things, he was in nothing more so than the fixed, unalteaffected enlogies of some French writers, of whose worthlessness he was thoroughly convinced, to the utmost glory he had acquired in arms and government, is one of those contradictions which so often baffle us in endeavouring to estimate the character of a man of genius. This contempt he dealt out as liberally to individuals as to the world in general. Sarcasm was the element of his existence. He disliked solitude, and loved conversation, chiefly from this unbounded propensity to wit and satire. His recorded sons than those of my assailants. All is now quiet, and no more is now said about religion, about Walden, about this unbounded propensity to wit and satire. His recorded sayings are more pointed, more concisely terrible in their now said about religion, about Walden, about my persecutors, or about my regiment either."—vol. i. sarcastic power, thun those of any philosopher of his day. If Voltaire possessed greater variety of fancy, his royal ally had the advantage of greater depth and concentration. He could not restrain this inclination, at the expense not only of alienating personal friends, but of creating public enemies. Louis XV. and Elizabeth hated him less from political causes, than on account of the torrent of epigram ful days. In the midst of all the vanities of his early with which he overwhelmed them and their governments, letters to Voltaire—of his compliments, and his ill-conand the encouragement which he gave the literary men of all Europe to adopt a similar tone. Those who were admitted to his personal intimacy were never safe from his distrust of mankind in general, together with the resolute they were exposed. There was no gaiety of heart in the and fierce self-confidence, which seemed, as it were, to humour of Frederic. Every one could see that he felt what ful, braving all opposition, and alienating by his harsh, tempt which he nourished towards the whole species of contemptuous manner those whom it was most his policy his fellow-creatures. It is possible that we may find, in monarch, whose general system of government was founded on the purest principles both of reason and benevolence, never seems to have felt or perceived the terrible severity of his military discipline, the misery which it occasioned among those subjected to it, and the profligacy which was produced among the people, by the conversion of the whole kingdom into a vast garrison. It was the father of Frederie who commenced this most inhuman tyranny; his son continued it, chiefly through absolute necessity; for he looked on his kingdom like the vessel of an Algerine cor-This quality of misanthropy is in fact, look at it which sair, making its way among the flags of the nations it had way we will, one of the most prevailing characteristics of robbed, simply by the terror which it inspired, and the Frederic's temper and conduct. Lord Byron says of a vigilant daring of its crew. But it may be feared also, greater man than Frederic in the extent of his sphere of that the barbarities which disgraced his military system "the great error of his life was his constant obtrusion on liberately taken of human nature. At a review of his mankind of his want of all community of feeling with troops, previous to his first campaign, he asked the marshal them." But it was far more the propensity and the error who stood by him, what were the reflections which the of Frederic than of Napoleon, "like stern Diogenes to spectacle excited in his mind? The marshal made some mock at men." The emperor undoubtedly, in his fits of reply about the fine condition of the troops, and the pre of insulting those about him, and too often and openly ex"what I think of is this: here are sixty thousand men, pressed the contempt which the conduct of particular indieach strong and active, and better armed than either of viduals excited in his mind. But, in general, he possessed us; all of them our implacable enemies, and having just in a high degree the art of attaching to his person those cause to hate us; and yet they tremble before us, who who shared his danger and elevation, and, until his mind ought to tremble before them; such is the power of disci-

of many points, in which a little fancy will enable the rest. searcher of resemblances to detect much similarity, differboth-each of them princes who, in long and glorious written mostly in pencil on the margin of petitions and repride and happiness of domestic life might be in heart an are written in the king's own peculiar German, of which envious spectator of such felicity in others. This is a both the orthography and the diction are utterly unlike point in the King of Prussia's character, which we should any other language. Applications for money are usually have little inclination to touch, where it not for the light answered in the phrase, "I have not a farthing." "Ich kann which it throws on some of the most important passages in keinen Groschen geben." "There is nothing in the chest with a triumphant emphasis: but he should remember, be- their conduct on particular occasions in the war, or preforc he refers to the Margravine of Bareith as an authority sence at some scenes of Prussian defeat. A proprietor of beyond exception, that her testimony, if taken to its full extant, will leave no very favourable impression of the habits count of damage incurred from the Russians, is told that proper military gravity, rather than encourage his seldiers collection shows his utter regardlessness of the pride and form more lasting connexions: a most serious injury to sensibility of those around him; for these answers would be morality of a country where the army comprised near-undoubtedly reach, in one way or another, the ears of those by a fifth of the men in the prime of life. In the first bat-"Liebstenscheine," which empowered a private to engage paigns, seem to have shared little of his personal intimacy, a fair companion for the duration of his quarters. The and to have appeared at court rather in the fulfilment of an single married officer out of its seventy-four. A large dorf, was treated with marked neglect. Many also, after a and military, either remained bachelors, or married very presence of mind failed them, or their force was actually late in life. Occasionally, indeed, his humour relaxed, inadequate to the service demanded, in defending themselves and he not only consented to the marriage of some of his against enormous odds in the Seven Years' War.

favourites, but exercised the royal pen in composing French epithalamia on the occasion. But both in refusing and associates of his own choice. His literary companions, according this privilege. Frederic, as our author allows, indeed, were often selected more with a view to their acted capriciously and despotically. His conduct towards value as purveyors of the world's good opinion, or to their his immediate dependants was, indeed, until late in life, agreeable qualities in conversation, than to any affection

chief generals of his reign. Except in the actual field of when his manner and disposition softened, little worthy of battle, there was no mutual familiarity and confidence be- a mind in many respects so great. "He punished his dotween the soldiers and their great leader. It was the loyal- mestics with hard words, with blows of the fist and cane, ty of the troops to the Prussian monarchy and to the glory with imprisonment and dismissal, or enrolment as com-of the great captain, far more than their attachment to his mon soldiers." A curious illustration of the jealousy and person, which caused them to enact such miracles under suspicions with which his ever-watchful eye observed the his command; and this was more especially the case with conduct of those about him, is to be found in the situation their officers. Ill paid as they were, their situation was of his four cabinet councillors or secretaries. These men rendered far from enviable by the incessant joulousy with were the depositaries of the secrets of his reign; they which they were watched; and it could not have added were in constant confidential communication with him: much to their zeal in the service to find, as they did in al- their salary amounted to forty thousand france a year, a most every instance, that they were looked on by their very large sum under such a government as his. Yet sovereign in no other light than as mere instruments, to be nothing was more dreaded than an appointment to one of constructed and worked in the cheapest and most effective these places. Whoever accepted it (and no one dared remanner. The disagreeable circumstances were shared, in fuse it) was thenceforward a slave for life. Power he had a still greater degree, by his civil servants. Frederic's none, for the king was absolute master of his own house. dislike to marriage among those on whom he chiefly re- He was doomed to live a hermit in the midst of society, lied, is one of the most remarkable traits in his adminis- under almost incessant labour, subject not only to the untrative economy. Undoubtedly be justified it to himself sleeping eye of the king, but to the most refined system of by common principles of policy; but we may be permitted espionage on the part of his attendants; for Frederic, like to doubt, whether a deeper feeling of jealousy did not prompt many other sovereigns, imagined that his only security lay his aversion from matrimony in others. This is one, out in making every member of his house-hold a spy upon the

Among the papers contained in the Appendix to the ence of sex apart, between Frederic and our own Eliza- history before us, is a collection of Frederic's hasty answers, reigns of forty years, were incessantly employed in active presentations transmitted to him from third parties by his watchfulness against foreign or internal enemies. A sove-secretaries. They illustrate the severity of his temper, and reign who had voluntarily rejected all that constitutes the the ready sarcasm which flashed through his mind. They his life and principles of his action. Our author, indeed, to-day, but we will look and see what comes in to-morrow." in his usual style of axhibiting one view only of a question, Requests for preferment or leave of absence on the part of recapitulates the idle stories of Frederic's early gallantries officers are often replied to by some tart remembrance of nd character of her beloved brother. Frederic was wil. "he might as well ask for compensation on account of the ng to permit any excess, provided it were conducted with deluge, when his cellars were under water." The whole tallion of Guards, which contained very few married men, the captains had the power of granting licenses called generals of Frederic's army, and the heroes of his camcaptain was bound to see that the parties entering into such onerous duty than for their own gratification. Some, inan engagement were able to provide for its consequences; deed, of the best esteemed among them fell early: Keith, and the dissolution of these singular unions, which the Schwerin, and Winterfeld, the greatest favourite of all captain had also power to authorize, was, it was said, by no But Ziethen, although treated with high respect, was never means common. The famous Bareith regiment of dra-goons, which the king particularly favoured, contained, sia, who had formed the Prussian cavalry and won for his when it took the field for the Bavarian war in 1778, not a master the hardest of all his victories at Lissa and at Zornproportion of Frederic's most trusted servants, both civil long and honourable service, fell into disgrace when their

the S gle to with conte them of his Fre by dis ing, v by the were | ever tr

de

M

qu

of

un

Ab

gue Bibl

his

No

his

fort

his brot

cons

abou

seem whic

attac

dome

vives

the n

not at bel-esp a wit a But wh taire's 1 fails to the wor yet with Quoted subsisting between them and their patron; who sometimes against himself. Yet his annals contain some terrible in-condescended to such familiarity with them, only to treat stances of his severity, where some strong impulse of his brothers of the family of Keith, and with other intimates would by no means justify. whose names have passed down to posterity along with It was the consciousness of the proud and haughty Nor would it be just, even in this slight attempt to apprehis services, and then of the life, of his too sensitive considerate and affectionate. There was a softness of heart he commends a desperate task to his chosen lieutenant. about Frederic, wherever his love was once fixed, which seemed almost to compensate for the barsh external covering attachment to his sisters was peculiarly strong; of all the domestic charities, this perhaps is one which usually survives the longest in harsh and rugged dispositions. In the midst of the severest calamities which beset him in the Seven Years' war, when his life was a constant struggle to provide resources to maintain his very existence with honour, and suicide was almost a daily subject of contemplation with him, the death of his favourite among them was felt with more acuteness than all the distresser of his unparalleled situation.

. Th

Frederic was not, as he has been often represented, cruel by disposition. The utmost that can be charged against him in this respect is the carelessness to human suffering, whether mental or corporal, which was produced by the intense eagerness with which particular objects were pursued by his ardent imagination. No monarch ever treated with more ready forgiveness personal offences

* The plain-spoken English resident, Mitchell, could not at all understand the coquetry of the king and the bel-esprit. "When that prince," says he, "writes as a wit and to a wit, he is capable of great indiscretions. But what surprises me still more is, that whenever Voltaire's name is mentioned, his Prussian Majesty never fails to give him the epithets he may deserve, which are the worst heart and the greatest rascal now living: and yet with all this be continues to correspond with him."
Quoted by Preuss from Ellis's Original Letters, vol. iv.

them the next instant with hauteur or sarcasm. His con-mind, whether public or private, was interfered with. The nection with Voltaire does little eredit to either party, unpardoned offences of Trenck, and of his own unfortu-From their first personal intercourse, each of these acute nate brother, remain as stains upon his general character and vigorous observers saw and knew the other: each for elemency: and it is with shuddering that we read of feared the power and despised the weakness of his ally; some of the excesses to which his desperation prompted and the difference in their subsequent language, when him during the Seven Years' war-of Catholic priests put speaking to and when speaking of each other, during to death, on the most vague accusations of encouraging twenty years of correspondence, exhibits the most ludicrous duplicity; it is like the double dialogue in a comedy sian officer broken on the wheel, when taken in an unsucof Moliere.* Bat amongst his own circle he exhibited cessful attempt to liberate himself and his fellow prisoners not merely the talents of a companion of the first order, from the casemates of Custrin. But the reckless and sarbut also much friendly and generous feeling. His friend castic language of Frederic, and his pride in showing his ship with D'Argens, which lasted without interruption want of sympathy with human kind, made him liable to through so large a portion of his life; with the two noble accusations which the general character of his actions

his own, far surpassed the degree of affection and confi-manner in which his contempt for men and their judgdence usually allotted to princes. There is no more pleas-ments had been so often conveyed, which rendered doubly ing trait in his history than the return of the aged Lord bitter to him the thought of defeat and submission. He Marischal, after all his wanderings through the world, could not bear to appear humiliated and disarmed in the quitting alike his home in Scotland and his "beloved sun" eyes of that world which he had so often braved in the of Valencia, to pass the last years of his protracted career time of triumph. Such feelings added double vigour to under the roof of Sans-Souci, in the cloister of "Notre the resolution with which he withstood all the extremities Abbe, l'homme au monde le plus aisé à vivre." As long of the Seven Years' war. The project of suicide was not as his advanced age would permit him, he was a constant with him as with Napoleon, a wish formed in moments of guest at the table of the king; when this became impos- despair, and abandoned through weakness; there is abunsible, Frederic, as the youngest of the two, used to spend dant evidence that he was resolved, throughout, to adhere his hours of relaxation in visits to his old Scottish friend. to this as the last resource, but not until every possible Nor would it be just, even in this slight attempt to appre-ciate the king's character, to pass over his conduct toward cess. The original "Instruction to General Fink," which his own family, which, with the exception of the one un he wrote after the battle of Cunnersdorf, and which is pubfortunate instance of severity which deprived him, first of lished by our author, proves very remarkably the composure with which he had prepared to perform the last serbrother, the Prince Royal, was for the most part highly vice to the state, and the dignified confidence with which

* It runs thus in the original German: " Der General which he generally turned to the world about him. His Fink krigt eine schwere Comission, die unglükliche Armée, so ich ihm übergebe, ist nicht mehr im stande mit die Russen zu schlagen, Hadek wirdt nach Berlin eillen, villeicht Laudon auch, gehet der General Fink diesse beyde nach so kommen die Russen ihm in Ruken, bleibt er an der Oder stehen, so krigt er den Hadek diss seit, indessen so glaube das wen Laudon nach Berlin wollte solchen könte, er unterwegens attaquiren und schlagen : solches wohr es guht gehet gibt dem Unglük einen anstandt und hält die sachen auf. Zeit gewonnen ist sehr viel bei diesen desperaten Umstäude. Die Zeitunge aus Torgan und Dresden wirdt ihm Cöper mein Segretar geben; er mus meinen Bruder, den ich Generalissimus bei der Armée declariret, von allen berichten. Diesses Ungluk ganze wiederherzustellen gehet nicht an, indessen was mein Bruder befehlen wirdt das mus geschehen; an meine Neveu mus die Armée schwehren. Diesses ist der einzige Raht den ich bei denen ungluklichen umbständen im Stande zu geben bin, hette ich noch Resourssen so wehre ich dar-bei geblieben. FREDERICH."

[General Fink has a hard commission; the unfortunate army which I make over to him is no longer in condition to fight the Russians: Haddick will hurry on to Berlin, and perhaps Laudohn also. If General Fink goes after these two, the Russians will come be-hind him; if he makes a stand at the Oder, he will be exposed to Haddick on this side; in the mean time I think that if Laudohn marches on Berlin, he might attack and beat him. If this goes well, it will check our ill luck, and hold things together: time saved is a great thing in these desperate circumstances. My secretary, economy which has been so often made the subject of ridi- Sans-Souci. cule was in fact the most important of duties to Frederic, plishing. And many of the principles of his government, of the press in public discussion have very much mistaken love of power, to prejudice, or to wilfulness, were in all probability justified in his mind as parts of a system founded on the strongest grounds of policy. Thus, the ing them, like Oliver Cromwell, mere "paper pellets," contradictions which have been so often pointed out between his words and actions on the subjects of public otherwise have vented itself in a more violent manner. opinion, of the equality of ranks, of literature and edu- But he seldom allowed the peers to overstep the dictinction cation, are easily explained with reference to his own interpretation of the peculiar condition of himself and his tacks on himself, and authorized interference with his po-

Although, for example, Frederic's encouragement of pub. lie opinion was far greater than prevailed in most neighbouring countries, we should be much mistaken if we were to measure it by the license enjoyed under our modern constitutional governments. It is true that very unlimited freedom was allowed to religious and philosophical discussion: although a censorship of the press existed in Prussia throughout his reign, yet its powers were controlled by the liberal predilections of the monarch himself. He would indeed have strangely contradicted his own character, had he prohibited in his subjects what he so extensively encouraged throughout Europe in general,-the freedom of criticism and ridicule against ancient opinions. As to his own religious views, which have been the sub ject of so much discussion, they are hardly worth the pains which have been expended in elucidating them. He was far too wise to be an Atheist, as his enemies represented him, and far too politic to avow such opinions, had he entertained them. But it is surely too well known to need argument, that all revelation was equally and utterly dis-carded by his judgment. That he was thoroughly pene

Cöper, will give the general the newspapers from Targau and Dresden: he must inform of every thing my brother, whom I have declared generalissimo of the army. To repair this misfortune entirely is impossible, but what my brother orders must be done. The army must take the oaths to my nephew. This is the only advice which I am in a condition to give under thes unfortunate circumstances. Had I any resources left l should have remained. FREDERIC.]

It was in the field and the cabinet, not either in the trated with a strong and most scrupulous sense of his duty brilliant reunions of Sans-Souci or in literary labour, that to his subjects and to human kind, is sufficient to establish Frederic's true greatness was to be found. Valour, indus, the excellence of his character as a legislator, whatever try, and unrivalled sagacity, these are the qualities which were the sanctions of the code of right and wrong which all allow him: but few have done him the justice which his own imagination has established. Beyond this moral he really deserves, or have cited that strong and pervading conviction, there is no reason to call him in any sense a sense of duty which alone could have directed all these to believer. He had, as it is somewhere expressed by himtheir great results. Most have judged the man superfi-self, "no conception of an immortal soul." His dislike to cially no less than the statesman, and have concluded, because his main object seemed to be the consolidation of considerable stress, was merely a political aversion, owing his own power, that this power was valued for its own sake to his personal experience in the affairs of Silesia, which only, and not as a means of creating happiness around made him believe that no vassal of the Romish church him. Yet, little as the pursuit of such an ultimate end could be a faithful subject to the House of Brandenburg; seems to agree with the unamiable parts of Frederic's his own title of king having remained throughout his life character, he must indeed be a sceptic as to human virtue unrecognized by the Pope, and the banners of Austria who can deny, that such was the object of the uniform having been blessed, like those of a crusading power, in and unremitting toil of so many painful years. Like the Seven Years War. Hence, although allowing the other men, Frederic allowed his ambition to overcome his fullest toleration to the communicants of that belief, he better judgment: yet even when most in error, he was in did not willingly employ Catholics in offices of great trust heart striving for what he had persuaded himself to believe and authority. But the appellation of the Protestant King, good. It is this which adds splendour to the dignity and with which his English allies were pleased to compliment ennobles even the weakness of his character. The close him, must have caused no small amusement in the circle of

But whatever may have been the license allowed by as by no other means could be execute the vast projects Frederic to the philosophic writers of the French schools, which, with such narrow resources, he succeeded in accom- those who have praised him as a supporter of the liberty which it has been the fashion to attribute purely to his the facts of his history as well as the principles of his policy. Pasquinades, which only touched himself in per-son, he treated with very philosophical disdain: considerserving as safe discharges of the ill humour which might which he had made in his own mind between satirical atlicy. No critique on public affairs was allowed to appear, without having passed under the eye of the censor. journalists found on his accession the degree of liberty which they had previously enjoyed rather curtailed than extended. Spencer's Gazette, the principal Berlin newspaper at that time, was forced to change its motto of " Truth and Freedom" for the more courtly phrase "With Royal Permission." And if, in the subsequent course of his reign, tial nob wea a st he "E " wh a no Mele talen logie All t of a highe

witho of Fr

deep

object

the se

himse

which

b

n

wit

Fr

wh

im

regula " It mainta nobless cannot in mer they oc general tinguisl his hon while a action, t father, a

It is t commen constant exigencia Without a body of which hi not, like prizes to soldier o paigns in ^{*} Heffener's story of the caricature is well known. At the time when Frederic was issuing some very op-pressive edicts in support of his coffee monopoly, a humorous print represented him as sitting on the ground with a coffee mill between his hands and grinding away with much perseverance. As the king was riding through the streets of Berlin, he perceived a crowd assembled round the place where one of these prints was exhibited: he immediately rode up, and desired the tradesman to "hang it lower, that the people might not break their necks staring at it." He was recognized, and saluted with the loudest applause. Another less known anecdote is reported by our author (vol. iii. p. 276) from the Memoirs of Chodowiecki, the engraver. This artist had published, in the Berlin Almanac for 1771, twelve engravings on subjects from Don Quixote, and the head of Joseph the Second on the frontispiece. The wits of Berlin having made some remarks on the coincidence, Frederic, in order to avoid the umbrage which might have been given to the sensitive young emperor, desired the academy to look out for some still more satirical devices for the following year, and to place the king's own head on the title page. Chodowiecki accordingly selected twelve scenes out of the Orlando Furioso.

YCAPS.

"As to the freedom of the press," he says to D'Alembert in a letter of 1772, "and the libels which are its inevitable consequence, I confess that so far as I know mankind, with which I have busied myself for a tolerably long time, I am nearly convinced that preventive restrictions are advisable, as such freedom is always misused : and that books must therefore be subjected to a censorship, not severe but efficient, in order to repress every thing which may endanger the common security and welfare of society, which cannot be made with impunity subjects of attack." -vol. iii. p. 253.

Probably there never existed a mind less impregnated Frederic: and his judgment on such questions as these, whatever may be the value to be set on it, can rarely be weakness: and our author seems to mention it as affording enforced against the purchase of military fiels by roturiers,*
a striking contrast to the philosophical disdain with which he affected to treat the adventitious advantage of birth. of a prince, in whose service it was hardly possible for the object which he had in view, which induced him to adopt himself gives a part of the reason, but not the whole reason, regulations, dated 1779.

maintain this vigilance in the choice of officers, since the burg, and the rest of the empire, to the exclusion of his noblesse commonly possesses principles of honour. It actual companions in arms, whose only deficiency was the cannot be denied, that we sometimes find desert and talent want of the prefix before their names. But Frederic's is men of no birth: but these are exceptions, and when its men of no birth: but these are exceptions, and when they occur, it is advisable to retain such officers. But in general no resource remains for the nobility, except to disof the time effected but a slight alteration in his obstinate tinguish themselves by the sword. If a gentleman loses his honour, he finds no refuge even in his father's house: troops at the commencement of the war of the Bavarian whils a roturier, when he has committed a disgraceful action, takes up again, without blushing, the trade of his who distinguish themselves, shall be advanced a step for father, and does not think himself any farther dishonoured."

It is to be remembered, in reading this passage, and the commentary upon it which his conduct furnished, that the constant labour of Frederic was to supply the pressing exigencies of his service at as cheap a rate as possible. Without some stimulus to exertion, it was in vain to expect a body of officers, fitted to perform the overwhelming tasks which his gigantic projects imposed upon them. He had not, like the French republic or the Emperor, enormous prizes to hold out as the reward of successful valour: no soldier could enrich himself during his hard-fought camsuccessor. But the law of 9th October, 1809, first rendwhich his gigantic projects imposed upon them. He had paigns in needy provinces: no fortunes were made in the ered such transactions generally legal,

the vigilance which he usually exercised, was occasionally service of Frederic by the inferior officers, no titles and somewhat relaxed, those who wish to ascertain his real appanages could reward the merit of his generals. Hence sentiments on this important topic will perhaps find he had none of those splendid incentives to action, by the them best expressed in the matured decisions of his later possession of which a skilful leader can draw from the ranks all the superior powers and energies which they contain; and although Frederic well knew that there were among his plebeian countrymen thousands of hearts burning for distinction and fame, or glowing with national ordour, he was too keen and too unfavourable an observer of human nature to conceive that such motives as these could ensure him a regular supply of men, calculated to meet the extremities of desperate service to which he had to expose them. The only principle on which he could rely to supply the place of such incentives, was that chivalrous point of honour, which the fashionable writers of his time, and none more than the king himself, had affected to despise and to ridicule. And this was only with certainty to be relied upon in that class in which habits of with prejudice in matters of government than that of education and family pride had confirmed it. By adhering to the choice of men of noble birth, he secured the supply of a particular easte, devoted to his service in the field, and rendered absolutely dependent on him by their impeached by referring it to the influence of royal par-field, and rendered absolutely dependent on him by their tialities and passions. His conduct with respect to the general poverty, no less than by their loyalty: for the sysnobility of his kingdom has frequently been cited as a tem of entails, and the prohibition which was still strictly enforced against the purchase of military fiefs by roturiers,*

Accordingly, the king applied himself to continue his "Every one," he says in the History of his own Time, army as he had found it, officered almost entirely by men " who distinguishes himself through talents and virtues, is of noble birth: but the sanguinary battles of the Seven a nobleman; and in this sense he may be looked on as a Years' war carried off by hundreds the well-born youth Melchisedec, who has neither father nor mother." "Les of his regiments, and it became absolutely necessary to talens sont distribués par la nature, sans égard aux genéa-logies"—" Les vertus, les talens ont-ils besoin d'ayeux." All these fine phrases seem rather misplaced in the mouth vice, raised numbers of common soldiersfrom the ranks: while the colleges and gymrasia of the country supplied highest merit to rise to military or even civil distinction, almost the whole of their young élèves, sons of clergymen, without the accident of noble birth. Yet the investigator merchants, and tradesmen, to fill the place of the nobility of Frederic's history will be apt to conclude that it was a who had fallen. It appeared therefere a most harsh and deep and well-considered policy, with reference to the severe measure when the king, in remodelling his army after the peace of Hubertsburg, dismissed all roturier offithe severe rule of exclusion against plebeian officers. He cers from his service: when these gallant men, who had won the battles of their country, were "marched out," which probably actuated him, in the appendix to one of his almost without exception, and left to poverty and despair. As the country did not supply noblemen enough to officer the army even on its reduced scale, they were sought after "It is more necessary than is generally believed to in foreign countries, and engaged from Saxony, Mecklenadherence to original views. In the instructions for the succession (1779), the direction is given that "All officers, every gallant action which they perform: if under-officers distinguish themselves, they may thus obtain a patent of nobility and become officers: and in the same manner privates may raise themselves to the rank of under-officers."

In civil institutions, Frederic was rather less averse from the employment of plebeian talents. Yet only one roturier reached the rank of minister without receiving a patent of

were at all times peculiarly displeasing to him; and he tan simplicity. made a point of affording pensions to the female members of poor families, or placing them in foundations destined partiality uniformly expressed by Frederic for the authors bour to maintain a demarcation which the advancing lamented the neglected muse of Germany, or boasted with footstep of time was about to obliterate for ever!

Education, one of the elements of social prosperity which Prussia is now most justly proud of enjoying, is not so much indebted to the hero of her monarchy as is generally supposed. Even his panegyrist Preuss is forced to confess that " Frederic did less for the schools and universities than might have been expected from him, the great friend of cultivation and science. All this province of government indicated no great and searching ameliorations, which had become so extensively necessary. Many wholesome regulations were published, but the means were wanting to carry them into execution." In fact, the strict economy of Frederic prevented him from putting into practice various schemes, which attested nevertheless the interest he took in national enlightenment. But besides the enormous expense of his military establishment, it was in taking care, as our author expresses it, of the body of the state-in planting colonies, draining, cultivating, building, and unsuccessful commercial experiments—that the money saved by such rigid carefulness was chiefly expended. A few details from the work before us will illustrate his parsimonious endeavours to further the mental improvement of his subjects. In 1830, the Prussian government expended 480,000 dollars on the six principal universities. Until 1799, thirteen years after Frederic's death, Halle, then the principal of them, received only 18,000. Many edicts and ordinances appeared for reestablishing and multiplying the land-schools, (those of primary education,) but the difficulty of finding salaries for the new school-masters, for whose maintenance the king could only be induced now and then to appropriate some small surplus which happened to be in hand after supplying some more favourite speculation, generally prevented their fulfilment. But a still more objectionabe economy was that which began to be practised in the latter years of his reign, on the suggestion of Von Brenkenhoff-the establishment of invalid soldiers and inferior officers as masters of elementary schools. 'The normal schools, or seminaries for teachers, owe their origin, however, to the reign of Frederic: the first was founded in 1750 at Berlin, and two others were added during his reign. Prussia now possesses fifty eight. Nor was the direct interference of the king and his government with the mode of instruction adopted in his dominions very important: it did not extend beyond the suggestion of a few books and subjects of study, nor was any general system of education promulgated under those auspices. the whole, therefore, Prussia is beholden to her great monarch in this important branch of her civilization, for little beyond those qualities which his example imparted to every part of his administration. The love of order, the sense of duty, the habit of frugality and moderation, these old republican virtues were the inheritance left by an absolute prince to his subjects: qualities which he carried to a higher degree than any sovereign who has ever claimed nobility; this was Frederic Gottlieb Michaelis.* Misal-lthe respect of his people, and which have founded amidst liances, and the mixture of gentle and common blood, modern luxury a government and a nation of almost Spar-

Many a writer has expressed wonder and regret at the for young ladies of rank. So earnestly did Frederic la of France over those of his native country-many have Schiller her indpendence of princely patrons, when

. ven Deutschland's grösstem Sohne, Von des grossen Friedrich's Throne, Ging sie schutzlos, ungeehrt."

But few have endeavoured to explain Frederic's continued want of sympathy with the genius of his native land on the ground of policy. Frederic wished to surround himself with learned men: his vanity and his taste alike prompted him to enjoy their flattery: nor was he insensible to the benefit which he derived from the association of his name with that of the powerful class of philosophers, who commanded public opinion in Europe. But to excite who commanded public opinion in Europe. a national spirit on behalf of literature and the arts, would have been to raise up a power against himself: for he must have well known that his system of beneficent but vigilant despotism would have found no very lenient critics among writers depending, not on himself, but on their fellow countrymen, for support and for fame. There was, it is to be feared, a constant scene of insecurity in Frederic's enjoyment of his popularity among his subjects: the barbarities of his military system kept alive a strong spirit of disaffection in the lower class, ready at any moment to burst forth: and had he done as his panegyrists would have had him, and created a German literature among the people, his own creature would probably have been the first to turn against his authority.

the

rup

peo

Un

sco

per deri

revi

pow

and were intel

the p

very

main

West

shou

that :

zed is fast-s

of th

Engli

the B

pride

and g creek

look-o

were i VOL

T

Such are a few of the prominent traits in the public and personal history of the great Frederic, which these volumes tend to elucidate. It would be difficult to find a nobler subject of study, even from the high elevation of that royal genius above the ranks of ordinary men, or from the great interests which have been involved in the reforms introduced by him into European systems. His reign is one great drama, in which the unity of action and plan is carried from the beginning to the end. Never was a mind less susceptible of change. Circumstances altered, and generations passed away, while he sate on the throne; but his principles remained as stedfast as if the wax which received his first ideas had become converted at once into solid marble. In his life, we find nothing of over caution or timidity taught by adverse circumstances: no imagination exalted and perverted by success. Allowing only for the physical decay of the body, he was the same man in his last years of peace and security, as when, in the first ardour of youth, he threw down the gauntlet to the power of Austria. His opinions, as well as sentiments, underwent not the shadow of turning. Religion gains nothing by the misrepresentations of those who would persuade us that all her great enemies have been fearful, dubious and repentant in their last hours. He left the society of men as he had sojourned among them, neither sharing in their hopes their fears, their belief or their devotion. Only those who were about him observed that when his bodily energies diminished, he was rather less fond of leading the conversation to those topics of metaphysics and religion which had once formed the common subject of his supper-table discussions: that he was less bitter in his sarcasms against Christianity and its professors, and more name of calling them—out of the rank of citizens, and disposed to let the world take its own way in believing as nobility, and titles of baron, count and prince, were well as acting. But they perceived no other alteration. He resisted the approaches of death as those of an enemy,

[&]quot;It is remarkable, however, that Frederic always chose his Kammer-rathe—his clerks, as he was in the habit of calling them-out of the rank of citizens, and performing every usual duty until actual weakness forced without being perceived, completely screened from obserhim to relinquish it. He even adopted, according to his by the exuberant vegetation. biographers, some of the tricks said to have been resorted to by certain of the Roman emperors, (as they were by checked the rovers from attacking our flag; though from Cardinal Richelieu,) for concealing the advance of decay, several acts of horrible atrocity which they perpetrated on But all this was done through no weak fear of death, but the other ships, there is much reason to apprehend that from firm determination to act his self-imposed part to the many of their misdeeds were buried in the ocean. The very end. Thus he decended from the lonely position apparent exemption did not last long: on the 19th of which he had so long occupied, the solitary mark of Eu-April, 1815, a shallop of Margheretta, on the Spanish ropean admiration, among the sensual or imbecile princes Main, suddenly attacked the Sisters, an English shooner, who professed to make him their model: his memory be- at anchor off Isle Blanco, and having carried her, cruelly came enshrined with those of the heroes of antiquity, who murdered M. R. Beek, the master, and thirteen of the crew. never received into their hallowed circle a spirit more im- Occasional violations of right occurred, but the system pressed with stamp of their primitive vigour: the century had not attained its height; and though these hordes, who of Frederic, an act of the great European Drama, closed, aggravated piracy by wanton barbarity, were dreaded by and the curtain fell to rise again over a new and extended "all such as pass on the seas upon their lawful occasions," scene, occupied by actors hitherto unknown, fraught with the grievance had not greatly attracted the public notice in weightier interests and greater revolutions.

Einst rief dem Könige der Brennen Das Schicksal ernst und tröstlich zu: Es wird kein Sohn nach Dir sich nennen, Doch dein Jahrhundert heisst wie Du.

From the United Service Journal.

MODERN MAROONERS.

their independence, than the consequence of a sudden the Hebe, the Zephyr, the Vittoria, the Industry, the Prorupture of social ties, and the relaxation of law among a theroe, and other English vessels, were captured and pilpeople of loose morals, became manifest in the number of laged, and their crews treated with the most savage inpredatory vessels which were fitted out in their ports. humanity. Under the style and title of patriot privateers, these corsairs perty; but as they often sunk what they took, after plun- loud and deep were submitted to Government; but in seperty; but as they often sunk what they toos, after plunical deep were anomated to Government; but in sedering, under the axiom that "il n'y a que les morte qui ne veral instances the complaints were too strongly tinged with reviennent pas," it was soon seen that they were actuated by a spirit of lawless adventure, and that the commerce of all nations was threatened. Meanwhile Spain, which within our own remembrance, was at least the third naval power of Europe, had been so prostrated in the late wars, the total complete the power of the set was the state of the late wars. that she was unable to protect her coasts from the insults gents and Spanish flags, either of which were worn by and ravages of these new and inveterate enemies.

very magistrates had the turpitude to give direct encou- wherever it might happen to be, leaving the question ragement to crime by openly sharing in the spoil, and af. of the flag and neutrality to be settled by higher authofording the thieves every facility for disposing of the re. rity; yet such straightforward measures can seldom occur. mainder. It was no wonder, then, that the whole of the owing to the wary rover availing himself of all the wiles West Indian seas and the waters of the Spanish Main of paint, rig, documents, and flags, to hide identity and should become the theatre of the utmost depravity, and frustrate proof. Such considerations never entered many that a second system of buccaneering should be organi of the heads of those who so elamorously invoked the zed in those parts. Their vessels were generally very Government to execute vengeance; and even the Comfast-sailing and well-armed shooners, under one or other mittee of Lloyd's carried themselves so untowardly on a of the revolutionary flags, and manned with Spaniards, fancied breach of etiquette, that the Admiralty declined English, Americans, and desperadoes of all nations. Like all further correspondence with the subscribers. the Buccaneers, their professed object was to humble the pride of old Spain, while the real pursuit was debauchery injurious to the naval character got abroad; and the and gain. They especially frequented the shallows and extent to which they reached cannot be better proved creeks of the coasts of Cuba, where they kept a good than by the circumstance of the editor of a work so look-out for merchant-vessels, in stations inaccessible to ably conducted as the Annual Register, after representing men of war on account of shoals and reefs; and there the measures of Government as being extremely inadequate were instances where they have been among the Kays, to check the outrages, adding these odious words :- "One step by step, not yielding an inch until nature faled, and within musket-shot of British and American cruizers,

For some time a salutary respect for English prowess England.

This impunity quickened crime, and the ravages inflicted on trade were rarely unaccompanied by brutality. On the 13th of December, 1821, a large Liverpool ship, as Mr. Canning informed the House of Commons, was boarded by the Corsairs, when the English captain, after having been tortured to insensibility, had his brains blown out by a wretch, who also killed the steward. The Martha, the Harborough, and the Alexander were taken by the same ruffians shortly after; and the captain and crew No sooner had the colonies of South America declared of the Alexander were all murdered. In 1822 the Alpha,

Such wholesale depredations naturally excited a great scoured the Atlantic on pretence of seizing Spanish pro ferment in our commercial cities, and remonstrances both nd ravages of these new and inveterate enemies. The piracies in the Caribbean Sea and Gulf of Mexico commanders bore regular commissions. It was absowere committed by bands of robbers who preserved a good lutely necessary for us to wait a reasonable time, to see intelligence with the neighbouring towns of Cuba, where in what way the Spaniards meant to act before we could the pillage, as of old, was sold at seducing prices; and so take very strong steps. There could exist no doubt, that feeble was the government, that it was utterly unable to if any of our naval captains got sight of a pirate, and had suppress or punish so infamous a combination. Nay, the proof of his being one, he would take or destroy it,

VOL. XXVIII. FEBRUARY, 1836 .- 19

great topic of complaint was, that the captains of our fri- under an incessant and galling fire. This was sustained affords a stricking specimen of the malignity with which ten were slain outright, fifteen wounded, twenty-eight impulses to "the Searcher of all hearts," we will only singularly small, being only two killed and four wounded. remark that the imputation is absurd on its open bearing; The prize was a remarkably fine shooner, of 120 tons, for an editor who presumes to cater politics for the public carrying one long 18-pounder on a pivot, four long 9-pounsame writer, in the same parsgraph, had just before de- rials, which might have proved destructive had not the clared to be inadequate for their object. Accurate know- desperate bravery first manifested evaporated. Knowing and rife with invective, had the effect of awakening at maics, where her commander, Guyatano Aroganez, and tention to the sufferings of commerce; and orders of a twenty-three of his associates, were tried, cast, and exemore direct tendency than they had hitherto received were cuted. despatched to our cruisers. The consequences were About the time that this was being transacted at the quickly apparent in the activity with which the pirates east end of Cuba, an equally gallant exploit occurred on and the gallant officers employed in exterminating this cutter, the Grecian, observed a rakish shooner in the second race of Marooners gave a practical refutation to mouth of the Filipina river, at the bottom of the bay of the slanders against them. Numbers of the outlaws igno-Cortez, and, though apparently more than her match, inminiously ended their lives at Jamaica and other islands, stantly stood in. The place was a favourite haunt of the for the law was as severe as of yore, insomuch that of old marauders, whence it was named the Pirate's Lagoon; thirty-two men of Las Damas Argentinos, prize to H. M. it has about three fathoms water, but some of the narrow sloop Victor, who were tried at St. Christopher's in 1828, passes formed by the reefs have not more than six or the Zaragozana, on the coast of Cuba. carrying only from twelve to sixteen feet water between and five made prisoners when the rest fled in all directions. the shoals. As the ships were thus debarred from acting, lours, which, after the first shot, were supplanted by the the action. black flag. She had previously landed a party of marksmen, and stationed them among the bushes at the har- outlaws, in their very dens; but the service was of a very gates on the West Indian station, allured by the profits and returned with intrepidity and spirit for upwards of which they have on the freight of bullion, were more assi-three-quarters of an hour, when a favourable moment ariduous in transporting gold and silver from the contiguous sing, the Britons dashed alongside with three loud cheers, ports of South America than in protecting our trave." and boarded under a heavy fire of grape and musketry. Such are the ignorance and falsehood with which official The effect was instantaneous, for the pirates, who till then matters are treated by general writers, and t'e passage had evinced firmness and courage, were now penic-struck: irresponsible people can impute motives to a whole body of made prisoners, and the remainder leaped overboard, some high-minded men of whole rules of behaviour or prin- of whom were drowned and others taken by the Spaniards. ciples of action they can know nothing. Leaving private Our loss, considering the hardihood of the attack, was

La

sul

fro

que

an

He

pir

she

for

we

red

the

sor

hac

to spa

car

wh

rec ing the

wa

of

wa

bri wh

der

cre

ma

bet

the

ins

son oat

par

am

are

in cas

tion

rea

eip

der

Ze

the

we

ought to be sufficiently acquinted with the service of that ders, and eight swinels, with a large proportion of small public to know that "the captains of our frigates" could arms. Among other preparations against boarders, her only act in obedience to their orders-orders which the decks were covered with bottles full of combastible mateledge of the subject would have shown him that the that the ships could not attack them, they were daunted conduct of these officers had been in exact accordance by the resolute approach of the boats in full day, and to with the duty which they were directed to perform. The discussion which had taken place, however angry ness of our loss. The Zaragozana was conducted to Ja-

were pursued into their very haunts, and there crushed; its western shores. On the 20th of March, 1823, H.M. twenty-eight were executed, three pardoned, and only one seven feet. While the cutter was threading her way, the acquitted. Some of the pirates were captured under circumstances a death's head and cross-bones at the main, with a view, highly creditable to the spirit and address of their captors, no doubt, of intimidating the British. This, however, was Early in 1823, H. M. ships Tyne and Trucian gained soon proved to be a fruitless bravado; for the gallant cuteight of the well-known and dreaded piratical shooner, ter only redoubled her efforts to close; whereupon the They followed pirate oponed her fire of round, grape, and small shot, her at a distance for several days, for light and baffling having all her guns brought over on one side. At about winds prevented their closing, till at length they arrived one, P.M., the Grecian commenced close action, and conoff Port Baracoa, she evidently standing for the open antinued it for nearly an hour when she grounded in two chorage of the Playa de Miel. The British ships, disguise fathours water, within pistol-shot of her opponent. This ed to resemble merchantmen, also stood in under very might have been fatal to her, but that the freebooter had easy canvass, and gradually neared the chase, who remain-resolved to abandon the defence of the shooner, which at ed unaware of deception till they had approached pretty this critical moment blew up with a tremendous explosion. close, when she suddenly perceived her danger, and crow- Meanwhile the parates had taken to their boats, and made ded all sail to the castward, to gain the difficult harbour for the shore, which was only half a cable's length distant, of Mata. Having the legs of her pursuers she soon got whither they where quickly pursued by the English tars. to anchor, and sprung her broadside athwart the narrow A desperate, though short, conflict took place on the beach, entrance, which was little more than a furlong wide, and in which the pirates had about thirty killed and wounded

It proved that the schooner was La Gata, of ninety and it was essential that so mischievous a vessel should be tons, commanded by Josef Sabins, a notorious outlaw, taken or burnt, all the boats were instantly hoisted out, with a complement of ninety men; she was armed with well manned and armed, and led by Captain Walcott, the two long guns, an 18 and a 12 pounder on pivots, and six commanding officer, proceeded to attack her. At about 9-pounders, with small arms. She had also a stout felucea three in the afternoon the boats arrived within gun-shot, with four carriage-guns, and two other boats with a mounwhen the Zaragozana opened her fire under Spanish co. ted swivel on each, besides musketry, all of which were in Various and spirited were the attacks made upon the bour's mouth, which increased the advantages of her harrassing nature. On one occasion, soon after the bar-already excellent position for defence, and placed our lads barous murder of one of our old messmates, Lieutenant board, and got among some mangrove bushes; five of them his whole countenance was distorted. spared so long only for the purpose of removing the brig's overboard."

reckless cruelty, and the same drinking, gambling, roar- ple:ing, brawling, ruffian revelry obtained among them. On was tried at the Admiralty sessions, in London, on charges found to contain some of the chief mate's party was given in evidence that he had feloniously entered the brigs Victoria and Industry, in company with others, who assaulted the crews with cutlasses, long knives, and pistols. But as it also seemed that Smith was acting un der bodily fear, and that he did not associate with the miscreants till he had been tortured by being bound to the maininast while cartridges of gunpowder were exploded between his legs, the jury acquitted him. To be sure, the full benefit of compulsion was allowed him, for the law some awkward circumstances delivered against him on oath, at which an admiralty Court in the West Indies might have stumbled. This man afterwards published a parrative of his sojourn, or, as he called it, his captivity among the pirates of Cuba. In this work, though there are several passages which shake the writer's testimony in point of veracity, considerable insight may be gained into the manners and habits of the Piccaroous. We will cast off the stories of the loves of Scraphina and the Spanish wife for Smith, and his wonderful luner observation, as matters of moonshine, and proceed to what might really have fallen under his notice; and even this we principally select, because it is borne out by collateral evidence.

Aaron Smith, it appears, was chief mate of the brig Zephyr, which was captured by a piratical cruiser, under the orders of a ferocious half-caste Spaniard. The English commander, and a Captain Cooper, his passenger, were tortured with fire till all the specie on board was produced; after which, their plundered vessel was restored, produced; after which, their plundered vessel was restored, man persisted in his plea of innocence, declared that and they resumed their voyage, leaving Smith behind as a he had nothing to confess, and entreated them all to man of all work. The Corsair then stood among the spare his life. They paid no attention to his assertions, reefs, into a secure and commodious harbour called Rio but by the order of the captain, the man was put into

Layton, in 1824, the boats of the Hussar frigate being Medias. Here the connection between the rovers and the sent, under the command of Lieutenant Holt, against a inhabitants was palpably evident, for not only ladies and holde who had taken possession of the Isle of Pines, on gentlemen repaired on board to negociate for the spoil, but the S. W. coast of Cuba, they were absent 67 days, en even priests and magistrates. A dance and carousal folduring all the privation and fatigue of such a duty, in that lowed, in which all the men became madly intoxicated, sultry and unhealthy climate. On the 20th of August, and two of the crew had a desperate fight with knives, in the same year, the boats of the Icarus were despatched while the "cool spectators" looked on. At length, both from Havannah, under the orders of Lieutenant Croker, in combattants being desperately wounded, the guests deparquest of a mischievous schooner, the Diableto, of 6 guns and 50 men. They stood to the eastward beyond Bahia atrocity. One of the fighters accused his antagonist of Honda, and in a creek within Cayo Blanco, caught the having conspired with others to assassinate the captain, pirate at anchor, with one of her prizes. A few shot that and deliver the schooner into the hands of the chief mate. abe fired not having retarded the resolute approach of the The commander became furious, and resolved to glut his boats, some of the outlaws quitted their vessel, and made vengeance. "I saw," says Smith' "that his brutal temper for the shore in four shallops, while others leaped over was excited by this information; his eyes flashed fire, and He vowed destrucwere killed by musketry, and several appeared wounded; tion against the whole party, and rushing upon dock, asbut from the nature of the marsh, they could not be secu-sembled the crew, and imparted what he had heard. The red. On boarding the schooner, Lieutenant Croker had air rang with the most dreadful imprecations; they simulthe satisfaction to release the master and crew (nine per- taneously rushed below, and dragged the helpless wounded sons) of an American brig, the Henry of Hartford, which wretch on deck, and without taking into consideration that had been taken by the Diableto. They had been treated the accusation against him might be unfounded, proceeded in the most inhuman manner, and were to have been put to cut his legs and arms with a blunt hatchet, then mangto death on the following morning, their lives having been ling his body with their knives, threw the yet warm corpse

The pages we are citing afford many melancholy proofs The modern Marooners exhibited many of the traits by of the fierce brutality which invariably attends the loosen-which their predecessors were distinguished, though they ing of moral and religious restraints. We will not dwell never acted in formidable concert. Yet the same prover- upon the disgusting topic; but it is necessary, in exposing bial carelessness in the disposal of their pillage, the same the odious effects of lawless habits, to exhibit an exam-

" In the afternoon, a boat full of men appeared coming the 19th of December, 1823, a man named Aaron Smith towards the schooner, which, upon examination, was of piracy committed in the Caribbean sea. Full proof sooner was this known than the captain declared that he was given in syidence that he had feloniously entered the would kill them all, and ordered thirty muskets to be loaded and brought on deck. When the boat was about two hundred yards from the schooner, the men ceased rowing and held up a white handkerchief for a signal, as if doubtful of their safety, which was answered by a similar one from on board, and they again advanced. When within reach of the musketry, the dreadful order of 'fire' was given. Five of the men fell in the boat, the sixth leaped over and began to swim, after whom a boat was dispatched. On his being brought on board, insists that a pirate must be a free agent; but there were the captain told him the accusation that was against him and his party, and threatened him with a cruel and lingering death, if he did not confess the whole truth. In vain did he declare his innocence, and ignorance of any plot; the ruffian was resolved to glut his vengeance and ordered him to be stripped and exposed, naked, wounded, and bleeding as he was, to the scorching fervour of a July sun, the July sun of a tropical climate!

The feelings of humanity got the better of my caution, and I entreated the captain not to torture the poor wretch in that dreadful manner, declaring that I firmly believed him innocent; for, had he been guilty, torture and terror would have wrung a confession from him. In vain I pleaded, in vain I represented the inhumanity of punishing a poor wretch in all probability innocent of the crime laid to his charge. He was deaf to my of the crime laid to his charge. entreaties, and threatened me with vengeance for my interference, declaring that he had not done half that he intended to do. "Having said this he turned to the man, told him that he should be killed and therefore advised him to prepare for death, or confess himself to any of the crew whom I chose to call aside for that purpose. The the boat, pinioned, and lashed in the stern, and five of these affairs were transacting in the in the "far" Westthe crew were directed to arm themselves with pistols some light and fast-sailing vessels, under patriot flagsand muskets and to go in her. The captain then ordered me to go with them, savagely remarking that I should now see how he punished such rascals, and giving directions to the boat's crew to row for three hours backwards and forwards through a narrow creek formed by a desert island and the island of Cuba. 'I will see, cried he exultingly, 'whether the mosquitoes and the sandflies will not make him confess.' Prior to our leaving the schooner, the thermometer was above ninety degrees in the shade, and the poor wretch was now exposed naked to the full heat of the sun. In this state we took him to the channel, one side of which was bordered by swamps full of mangrove trees, and swarming with the venomous insects before mentioned.

"We had scarcely been half an hour in this place when the miserable victim was destracted with pain; his body began to swell, and he appeared one complete blister from head to foot. Often in the agony of his torments did he implore them to end his existence and release him from his misery; but the inhuman wretches only imitated his cries, and mocked and laughed at him. In a very short time, from the effects of the solar heat and the stings of the mosquitoes and sanddies, his face had become so swolen that not a feature was distinguishable; his voice began to fail, and his articulation was no longer distinct. I had long suspected that the whole story of the conspiracy was a wicked and artful fabrication; and the constancy with which this unfortunate being underwent these tortures served to confirm my suspicions. I resolved, therefore, to hazard my interference, and after much entreaty and persuasion, prevailed upon them to endeavour to mitigate his sufferings, and to let the poor wretch die in peace, as the injuries which he had already sustained were sufficient of themselves to occasion death. At first they hesitated; but after consulting some time among themselves, they consented to go to the other side of the island where they would be secured from observation, and untie him and put something over him. When we had reached that place, we lay upon our oars and set him loose; but the moment he felt the fresh sea breeze, he fainted away. His appearance at this time was no longer human, and my heart bled at seeing a fellow creature thus tormented. When our time was expired we again tied him as before, to prevent the fury of our captain for our lenity, and once more pulled for the passage on our way to the vessel. On our arrival, his appearance was the source of merriment to all on board; and the cap-tain asked if he made any confession. An answer in the negative gave him evident disappointment, and he inquired of me whether I could cure him. I told him he was dying; 'Then he shall have some more of it be-fore he dies,' cried the monster, and directed the boat to be moored within musket-shot in the bay. having been done, he ordered six of the crew to fire at him. The man fell, and the boat was ordered alonside. The poor wretch had only fainted; and when they per-ceived that he breathed, a pig of iron was fastened round his neck, and he was thrown into the sea. Thus ended a tragedy, which, for the miseries inflicted on the victim, and for the wanton and barbarous depravity of his fiend-like tormentors, never perhaps had its equal. The inhuman wretches who had been the chief participators in this horrid deed seemed to regard it as an every-day occurrence: the guitar tinkled and the song went round, as if nothing had happened; and the torments that he had uttered, served to form the subject of their jests, and to be echoed in their barbarous mirth."

were infesting the Atlantic; and the sea robberies in the Archipelago, which followed the Greek declaration of independence, seemed to make the striking off of every other moral obligation with that of allegiance a concomitant of regeneration. The latter afforded a melancholy proof of the ferocity imbibed by these who know no law but force, no restraint but inability,-whom appetite and passion rule, without the controul of reason or reflection. For under the noble, and soul-stirring pretext of liberation, they impeded and assregarded the efforts of their gallant computriets by the most sordid rapacity among vessels of all nations; and in addition to the excesses committed to other pirates, the most revolting and disgusting mutilations were perpetrated on the Turks who fell into their hands. On one occasion, while we ourselves were on the coast of Egypt, a Karamanian brigantine being taken by a Greek coreair, after unheard-of cruckies had been practised on the bodies of the miserable victims, they were cast overboard alive, with their arms and legs previously broken, and jeeringly told to "swim for their

This ferocity seems to be a natural consequence of maritime robbery with people of all persuasions and countries. The practice of piracy among the revolutionary flags awakened and allured the cupidity of several oceanic wanderers, who, but for the infection, might have plodded on in reputed honesty. But in no instance were these fellows less cruel than the oldest practitioners; cases of felony were not sufficient to glut their new passions, but they must also exercise the utmost insolence and barbari-Numerous and harrowing instances have come to light; but it may be inferred that many of the worst cases have been buried in the "vasty deep," from the known instances of vessels being sunk after pillage, with their crews, to cut off all clue to detection, under the horrid axiom that "dead men tell no tales." It is only from some expressions dropped by a pirate that it was understood his Majesty's packet, the Redpole, of 10 guns, was taken on her passage from Rio Janeiro, in 1824, and the worthy Captain Bullock, with all his crew and passengers, made to "walk the plank." The cruelty was as undiscriminating as wanten. On the 4th of August, 1829, the Irlam was boarded in the Atlantic ocean, by a piratical cruiser, commanded by a Frenchman, when every person on board was brutally maltreated, and the vessel pillaged and scuttled. Three men were killed, Captain Campbell was cut and wounded in several places, and his sister, a girl only 16 years of age, was stabbed to the heart, and thrown overboard with her servant. The same miscrent had recently boarded the Mary of Bristol, whose crew, with one exception, were murdered in cold blood.

The sanguinary propensity of all who break the moral ties is a serious and striking ethical lesson. Unbridled authority in general operates as a moral poison; but its deadly tendency is most manifested when it is allowed to unsettle the understandings, and inflame the passions of the ignorant and ferocious part of the community, among whom it never fails to extinguish the feelings of the heart. France had no sooner regenerated, than, to the horror of such of her reformers as were really well intentioned, which their victim had just undergone, and the cries though short-sighted, she displayed a rancorous depravity that renounced humanity altogether. Spain is now labouring under the same evil, and bands of men seem as-Such was the modern buccanneering which the spirited sociated and organized more for the gratification of perofficers of the British and United States natives extermina- sonal hatred, and the unworthy purpose of ministering to ted. Piracy, however, was not wholly suppressed. While the stormy projects of the malignant, than for the weal of

w for 88 qu ble

wi

me

spc

th

co

tn

th ru

fre

in

ma COL the me this celv by wh the and low the

the sup sho call In who pira thei Vess fish I lou

boar tled, ceale mas whil hole plun the i their

but act v whic sel, t M

wher trava the r the sparks of revolution, which shone in glimmering co. and she sailed away to Smyrna. Information, however, ruscations, blaze forth with a violence that blinds its having been forwarded to Malta respecting the affair off for proofs of the deplorable weakness of human nature, so great a contraband during his stay, that some of the when abandoned to its own pride and perversity. And it petty shops were quite stuffed; this circumstance, coupled is thus that, the moment a man turns to piracy, it seems with the folly of his men, and the mischievous rakishness as if the fiend had full possession of his faculties, for the of his vessel, left little doubt as to the perpetrator of the

mer of 1817, who, from inquiry which was made on the der the command of Lieutenant Hobson of the Spey, and spot, had till then pursued the guiltless calling of coasting sent her in pursuit of the William. The Frederic armariners, and had suddenly resolved to go "upon the ac-rived at Smyrna in thirteen days, where the object of their count." Armed with muskets, sabres, and long knives, visit was descried riding at anchor, and was immediately they boarded a vessel near Milazzo, and in a few minutes recognised by the two sailors of the Helen, as the identical murdered twelve men, a woman, and a child, besides three vessel that had boarded them off Cape de Gata. After men and two women mutilated and left for dead. After taking up a berth near her, Lieutenant Hobson proceeded this horrible carnage, the villians deliberately scated them—with the utmost circumspection and ability, to preclude selves in the midst of the terrific spectacle, and surrounded the possibility of resistance or escape. Hoisting out the by the dead and dying, they feasted on the provisions long boat, in a manner sufficiently lubberly to lull apprewhich they found on board. In a few days afterwards, hension, he conveyed most of his men, well armed, into it, these same wretches took another felucca, La Generosa, and there covered them over with tarpaulins; after which and after killing three men, drove the remaining six be-she was taken in tow by a skiff, and proceeded slowly tolow, nailed down the hatches, and scuttled the vessel, for wards the harbour in the manner of a load of merchanthe purpose of sinking her. It is only from the miraculous escapes of some of these devoted ships that we learn ticed, till having reached his desired bearing, he sudthe full barbarity of pirates; and as these can hardly be dealy dropded alongside and instantly took possession of supposed to bear any proportion to those "targetted," or the William. So masterly and unexpected was the mashot at till sunk, and otherwise destroyed, how many nœuvre, that the pirate and his terror-struck gang were all called "missing" must have fallen to ruthless freebooters? In the present case, it fortunately happened that a boy, happened to be absent. After their return to Malta they who in the confusion had stowed himself away in one of were brought to justice; the proofs were clear and unethe sails, remained undiscovered; after the departure of the quivocal; and another melancholy example was afforded pirates, he flew to the assistance of those below, and with of the cold-blooded inhumanity which instantly steels the their united exertions the hatches were torn up, and the heart of the freebooter. Delano and his crew, save the vessel kept above water until relief was rendered by some King's evidence, were condemned and executed on board boarded by a vessel off Cape de Gata, and after being rifled, same instant: half of them were then hung in chains at and her crew battened down in the fore peak, was scut. Fort Ricasoli, at the entrance of the harbour, and the tled, with the intention of the attocity being for ever con-others were interred at the feet of the gibbets. A wily cealed beneath the waters. Yet, under such durance, the attorney, with a view to procrastination, had started an master, Cornish, retained all his presence of mind, for objection to the legality of the court, and was clamorous while his cargo was being ransacked, he saw through a for his hopeful clients being sent to England, where the hole in the hatches the maker's name and residence on his Old Bailey chances sometimes run mightily in favour of plunderer's top-sails. When the pirate parted company, delinquents, as was found by the thirty-eight choice robbers the imprisoned men, desperate by the rush of waters into taken by Captain Turner, of the Black Joke, in 1828. their vessel, forced open the hatchway, and gained the deck; Sir Thomas Maitland, however, aware that, if an example but the spoiler being yet in sight, they were compelled to were necessary, it should be prompt and near the scene of act with strict caution. At length they entered the boat, crime, was of another opinion: - "I shall try them," said which had also been scuttled, and quitting the sinking ves- he to the writer of this, "and if they are convicted of the sel, they rowed for the coast of Spain, where they gave in abominable villainly charged against them they shall be telligence of their disaster to the British Consul, where her crew made themselves remarkable by their ex- tar in 1830, was another instance of the instant demonia-

that wretched nation. And another heretofore happy an expensive supper to a large party of nymphs and street country has reason for alarm and apprehension, since it is musicians, a third ordered a dozen of satin waistcoats more owing to the good sense of its people than to the from a tailor, with other freaks of a similar nature. But wisdom or energy of its rulers, that equal license for ha-tred, impiety, and rapine, is not proclaimed. Even now who bore a most respectable character, no suspicion arose, freezied promoters. The dog-star roges, and so virulent Cape de Gata, and two of the Helen's crew being also is the imparted venom, that all the hellebore of Anticyra brought there, farther inquiry took place. It appeared would scarcely suffice for the cure. Our business, how that though the William was only in port from the 29th of ever, is not with nations, and we merely glanced at them August till the 3d of September, the master had carried on qualms of conscience give way to a reckless thirst of piracy. At that moment there were only two royal vesblood, and the most dreadful inhumanity. This has been sels in port, the Spey and the Race-horse, both of which shown by the conduct of such as have never confederated were under refit; the insurance companies of Valetta, with other freebooters, of which we will adduce an in-therefore, determined on preventing the escape of the cristance or two which have happened within our knowledge, minals, chartered a Gibraltar brig, the Frederic, which A small band of Sicilians fitted out a felucca in the sum- was manned by twenty seamen from the men-of-war, unthe William, which was moored in the middle of the port, In July, 1819, the English brig Helen was suddenly and appropriately fitted for suspending them all at the hung, and the point of law may be settled afterwards."

Meantime the William of Liverpool arrived at Malta, The noted Benito di Soto, who was executed at Gibraltravagant prodigality,—one man being seen tarring down cal tendency of piracy. This man had peacefully plied his the rigging with gold chains round his neck, another gave vocation, till having leagued with the mate of the Defensor de Pedro, a slaver, to take her from the captain, he at once pettifoggers can muster together. By the whole tenor of suggested that all who remained faithful to their trust should their lives pirates openly abdicate all rights and claims

Soto alone was alive to his own interest, promoting the martial. mad orgies which he scarcely participated in, till seeing from the findish spectators. At length the fire seized the right owner, to strip pirates of their prizes and stolen every part, the poor black fell exhausted, and the ocean goods wherever they might be found. soon closed over him and his unhappy shipmates.

tality proceeded. After having been thus employed for it is in the power of any government to disperse suspicious upwards of two hours, they sat down to a licentiously hor. bodies of people. Privateering is well known as the nurseaid repast in the cabin, whither all the helpless females were ry and school of piracy; an essential improvement in the driven, whose fearful screams added to the agonies of the art of warfare, and subsequent amelioration to the conimprisoned. Fortunately the ruffians caroused so long that dition of the human race, would result from the abolition Soto hailed them in anger; and in their hurry to obey of private war on the sea. This might easily be carried ing the cabin-doors, heaping lumber on the batches, and and invariable rule, in all future maritime wars, that no sailed off as full of plunder as she could stow. The unhap- piracy, must be rigorously suppressed; for though, from py women, thus accidently left alive, succeeded in forcing the open hazard of their calling, they aspire to a disdain-their way out of the cabin, and became the means of lib-ful distance above the baseness of ordinary fraud, their erating the men, who must otherwise have perished. Still audacious bravery, tried hardihood, and fertility of expethe ship was filling fast, and, but for the most unceasing dient, render them dangerous to the community. efforts, must have foundered that night: a stranger, how-ever, who fell in with them on the next day, relieved them make merchant vessels defend themseles better than they from their peril and carried them in safety to England, have latterly done: they fall an easy prey to any gang, This was the more providential, for it was not till the night however small, that takes up the "account." Boarding had far advanced that Soto discovered the Morning Star's nettings, close quarters, and good small arms, should be people, instead of being slaughtered, were only left to be supplied to every ship that sails the ocean. Nor should drowned. Furious at the information, he immediately they ever place such reliance in colours as to let a stranger hauled to the wind to regain sight of her and complete her find them unprepared; for the better the front displayed, destruction; but finding no tracea of the vessel, he con the larger and better manned must be the pirate ships, and soled himself that she was buried in the deep.

governments to exert themselves in its extinction. It is disabled stranger, the demand for assistance baving fre-not enough to declare that freebooters are hostes humani quently lured the generous to their destruction. This is generis, and then shield them under every quibble that a diabolical feint. "Counterfeiting the signals of distress,"

be turned adrift in a boat: a measure which was imme- founded on the social laws of nature; as they directly and diately adopted, and the people were never heard of after. avowedly oppose the whole foundation and object of that wards. A gale of wind sprung up that same evening, and law, the happiness of mankind. The public interest, therewhile the pirate ship left the devoted boat at the rate of ten fore, which is the end of all law, requires that such avowknots an hour, the most outrageous revelry reigned with. ed enemies of all should be destroyed, and the utmost to be afforded them, on capture, should be a summary court-

Even this would avail little, unless the scoundrels of rethe new commander fall into a dranken sleep, he put a ceivers and purchasers of the plunder, without whom pipistol to his head and deliberately blew out his brains, racy would die a natural death, were also ferretted out He now became a monster of blood and cruelty. An and condignly punished. The statutes say, that as pirates American brig had the misfortune to fall into his clutches are robbers, and as a sale by them is, of course, only a just afterwards, when the crew were driven down into the sale by robbers, a third party, though a bana fide purchahold, and there secured, except a negro, who was kept on ser, cannot claim against an owner upon the allegation of deck for the amusement of Soto and his steel-hearted mis- a capture by such pirates and a sale to himself. Such a creants. They then set fire to the doomed vessel, and taking is not a capture but a robbery, and does not divest while the miserable African leaped from place to place to the owner of his property. We would go farther than avoid the flames, the most hellish shouts of laughter burst this, and, with Grotius, authorize any one, although not Heretofore, whenever sea-roving ran high, the natives of The next exploit was the pillage of the Morning Star, Europe were clamorous for England's interference, on the an English ship, on her passage from Ceylon in 1828, ground of her acknowledged maritime supremacy. Thus This vessel, besides a valuable cargo, had several passen. in June, 1699, a very rich ship belonging to Norrkoping, gers on board, consisting of Major and Mrs. Logie, an being taken by corsairs off the coast of Holland, it was army surgeon, two civilians, and about five-and-twenty in- argued that Selden, and all our authors who have written valided soldiers, several of whom had their wives with them, in defence of our dominion over the adjacent seas, do own Being overtaken near Ascension, her captain was ordered that England is obliged in consequence thereof to cleanse on board the pursuer, where he had no sooner mounted those seas from pirates, and provide for the safety of the side than he was instantly killed, together with his se. pavigation in them. It may be supposed that the new cond mate, who had accompanied him. A party of villains, nations of liberal reciprocity has "altered all that;" and headed by a brute named Barbazan, were then dispatched we, therefore, call on the Princes of Europe to lend their to the Morning Star, with orders to plunder her, put every aid in suppressing the nefarious system. Much can be person to death, and then sink her. Having by dint of cut. effected by very easy means if our advice be taken. As ting and stabbing driven the men, who were utterly un- men assembled together, without acknowledged authority, armed, into the main-hold, except some who were reserved have ever been considered to associate sceleris causa; and to assist in their operations, the work of pillage and bru- those "qui civitatem non faciunt sunt pirata vel latrones, his commands, they contented themselves with fasten. into effect were the great powers to adopt, as a permanent boring holes below the water-line. The ship was then left commissions of letters of marque and reprisal be granted to her apparently certain fate, and the Defensor de Pedro to paivateers. Smuggling, that lawless union of trade and therefore the more difficult to equip. Nor must caution Such being the hateful fruits of piracy, it behoves all be abandoned, even when running towards an apparently

all t deso WAY even heat noug yello beaut cast | weed now a wreat there these portio dezola of suc dozen habita and at ings w period and w by bar theless, were le ance fre

all

ou

ist

shore o the side gentle a I spe but neve tions st

glad bo

imagin

same co

says Paley, "is an artifice which ought to be reprobated ties of home and kindred, as dearly felt as fondly cherished, by the common indignation of mankind; for a few exam- as boldly defended as they can be in the present day; ples of captures effected by this stratagem would put an and out upon the dull imagination and cold heart that canend to that promptitude in affording assistance to ships in not feel the link of human sympathy binding us to our distress, which is the best virtue in a sea-faring character, fellow beings even of the days gone by ! and by which the perils of navigation are diminished."

all ages and countries, because it is strikingly involved gazed over the gray sea as it lay before his eye, rolling in, with the histories of commerce and navigation. Nor are with one dense line of feaming waves pouring for ever our views wholly retrospective. The rapid spread of liberal- over the other. The sky was bleak and heavy, covered ism now unhinging society, the altered views on colonial with clouds of a mottled leaden hue, growing darker topolicy, and the present relaxed state of discipline, may tend to nourish a practice so congenial to random adventurers, loose-livers, swaggering renegades, and all that class of hap-hazard fellows, who detest the restraints of law and gospel. Let those whom it may concern look to it.

From the Keepsake, for 1836.

THE FISHERMAN OF SCARPHOUT.

TWO CHAPTERS FROM AN OLD HISTORY.

BY G. P. R. JAMES, ESQ.

"Author of Richelieu," "The Gipey," &c. &c.

CHAPTER 1.

even spirit, which repels by its very tranquil humility the go out on a stormy night when he is coming back after a heat of passion and the overbearing of pride-opposing long absence." nought to the angry billows, but a soft and lowly line of period when another state of society existed in Europe; out to sea to-night!" and when one class of men were separated from another by barriers which time, the great grave-digger of all things, was so still—came forth, and greeted her husband with a has now burried beneath the dust of other years. Never- calm glad kiss; and sitting down, the father pulled off his theless, the inhabitants of that track of sandy country heavy boots, and warmed his strong hands over the cheerwere less different in habits, manners, and even appear- ful blaze. ance from those who tenant it at present, than might be shore on which their habitations stood, and the element by rattled on the casements of the cottage. the side of which they lived-simple, unpolished, yet gentle and humble, and at the same time wild, fearless, and ing to his daughter. "Emiline, give me the book, and rash as the stormy sea itself.

I speak of seven centuries ago—a long time, indeed! tempest."
but nevertheless then, even then, there were as warm affect.

His daughter turned to one of the wooden shelves; and tions stirring in the world, as bright domestic love, as from behind some very homely articles of kitchen furni-glad hopes and chilling fears as now—there were all the ture, brought forth one of the splendid books of the Romish

Upon a dull cold melancholy evening, in the end of au-We have taken this general sketch of piracy, through tumn, one of the fishermen of the shore near Scarphout wards the north-west, and the gusty whistling of the rising wind told of the coming storm. The fisherman himself was a tall, gaunt man, with hair of a grizzled black, strong marked, but not unpleasant features, and many a long furrow across his broad, high brow.

The spot on which he stood was a small sandhill on the little bay formed by a projecting ridge of Dunes, at the extreme of which stood the old castle of Scarphout, even then in ruine, and at the time of high tide separated from the land by the encroaching waves, but soon destined to be swept away altogether, leaving nothing but a crumbling tower here and there rising above the waters. Moored in the most sheltered part of the bay, before his eyes, were his two boats; and behind him, underneath the sand hills that ran out to the old castle, was the cottage in which he and his family had dwelt for ten years.

He stood and gazed; and then turning to a boy dressed Asour midway between Ostend and Sluys, exposed to in the same uncouth garments as himself, he said, "No, all the fitful wrath of the North Sea, lies a long track of Peterkin, no! There will be a storm-I will not go todesolate shore, frowning no fierce defiance back upon the night. Go, tell your father and the other men I will not waves that dash in fury against it; but-like a calm and go. I expect my son home from Tournai, and I will not

The boy ran away along the shore to some still lower yellow sands. There nothing grows which can add com- cottages, which could just be seen at the opposite point, fort to existence: there nothing flourishes which can about two miles off; and the fisherman turned towards his beautify or adorn. Torn from the depths of the ocean, and own dwelling. Four rooms were all that it contained, and cast by the storm upon the shore, sea shells, and variegated the door which opened on the sands led into the first of weeds will indeed sometimes deck the barren beach, and these: but the chamber was clean and neat; every thing now and then a green shrub, or a stunted yellow flower, within it showed care and extreme attention; the brazen wreathing its roots amidst the shifting sand, will here and vessels above the wide chimney, the pottery upon the shelves, there appear upon the low hills called Dunes. But with all bore evidence of good housewifery; and as the fisherthese exceptions, all is waste and bare, possessing alone that man of Scarphout entered his humble abode, the warm portion of the sublime which is derived from extent and blaze of the fire, and the light of the resin candles, weldesolation. It may be well conceived that the inhabitants comed him to as clean an apartment as could be found in of such a spot are few. Two small villages, and half a the palace of princes. He looked round it with a proud dozen isolated cottages are the only vestiges of human and satisfied smile; and the arns of his daughter, a lovely habitation to be met with in the course of many a mile; girl of fourteen, were round his neck in a moment, while and at the time to which this tale refers, these few dwell she exclaimed in a glad tone, speaking to her mother who ings were still fewer. That time was long, long ago, at a was busy in the room beyond, "Oh, mother, he will not go

The wind whistled louder and louder still, the sea moanimagined; and in original character were very much the ed as if tormented by the demon of the storm, and few, same combining in their disposition traits resembling the but dashing drops of heavy rain, came upon the blast, and

> "It will be a fearful night!" said the fisherman, speak. we will read the prayer for those that wander in the mother and daughter knelt beside him.

Higher still grew the storm as the night came on; more frequent and more firece were the howling gusts of wind; cold; and ere you reach the coast of France, that fair flowand the waves of the stirred-up ocean, cast in thunder upon or would be withered never to revive again. You must the shore, seemed to shake the lowly cottage as if they leave her here." would fain have swept it from the earth. Busily did Dame Alice, the fisherman's wife trim the wood fire; eagerly of her father," replied Baldwin. "What, are you a man and carefully did she prepare the supper for her husband and a seaman, and fear to dare the storm for such an and her expected son; and often did Emiline listen to hear object?" if, in the lulled intervals of the storm, she could catch the sound of coming steps.

seemed at their highest, there came a loud knocking at the door, and the fisherman started up to open it, exclaiming, " It is my son!" He threw it wide; but the moment he had done so, he started back, exclaiming, "Who are you ?" and pale as ashes, drenched with rain, and haggard, knows not." as if with terror and fatigue, staggered in a man as old as the fisherman himself, bearing in his arms what seemed the lifeless body of a young and lovely woman. The apparel of either stranger had, at one time, cost far more than the worth of the fisherman's cottage and all that it contained; but now, that apparel was rent and soiled, and upon that of the man were evident traces of blood and was done, he set his fair burden on one of the low settles, and besought for her the aid of the two women whom he beheld. It was given immediately; and although an air of surprise, and a look for a moment even fierce, had come over the fisherman's countenance on the first intrusion of strangers into his cottage, that look had now passed away; and, taking the fair girl, who lay senseless before him, in his strong arms, he bore her into an inner chamber, and placed her on his wife's own bed. The women remained with her; and closing the door, the fisherman returned to his unexpected guest, demanding abruptly, " Who is that?"

The stranger crossed his question by another-"Are you will you plight your oath not to betray me?"

my oath."

"Then that is the daughter of Charles, Count of Flanders!" replied the stranger. "I have saved her at the risk of my life from the assassins of her father!"

"The assassins of her father!" cried the fisherman, "Then is he dean?"

"He was slain yesterday in the church-in the very church itself at Bruges! Happily his son was absent, and his daughter is seved, at least if you will lend us that aid bring you safe to Boulogne, if I sleep not with you bewhich a young man, who is even now engaged in mislead. neath the waves; and there, from the King of France, ing our pursurers, promised in your name.

"My son!" said the fisherman. "His promise shall land." bind his father as if it were my own. But tell me, who

"I am Baldwin, Lord of Wavrin," replied the stranger. "But we have no time for long conferences, good fisher-The count is slain; his son, a youth, yet unable to recover or defend his own without aid: his daughter is here, pur-sued by the murderers of her father; she cannot be long concealed, and this night-this very night, I must find means to bear her to the shores of France, so that I may can outlive long years?" demanded the fisherman; "but, place her in safety; and as a faithful friend of my dead nevertheless, let us to Boulogne; for there is even now soveriegn, obtain the means of snatching his son's inherit- the King of France : so said a traveller who had landed here ance from the hands of his enemies, ere their power be con-firmed beyond remedy. Will you venture to bear us out judge upon the spot who shall inherit the long vasant church, from which her father read forth a prayer, while to sea in your boat, and win a reward such as a fisherman

can seldom gain."

"The storm is loud!" said the fisherman: "the wind is

"But she will be discovered and slain by the murderers

"I fear nothing," answered the fisherman, calmly. "But here is my son! Albert, God's benison be upou At length, when the rushing of the wind and waves you, my boy," he added as a young man entered the cottage, with the dark curls of his jetty hair dripping with the night rain. "Welcome back! but you come in an hour of trouble. Cast the great bar across the door, and let no one enter, while I show this stranger a refuge he

"No one shall enter living;" said the young man, after returning his fathers first embrace: and the fisherman taking one of the resin lights from the table, passed through the room where the fair unhappy Marguerite of Flanders lay, recovering, from the swoon into which she had fallen, to a recollection of all that was painful in existence. "Should they attempt to force the door," whisstrife. Motioning eagerly to shut the door-as soon as it pered the fisherman to his wife, "bring her quick after me, and bid Albert and Emiline follow." And striding on with the Lord of Wavrin, into the room beyond, he gave his guest the light, while he advanced towards the wall which ended the building on that side. It had tormed part of some old tenement, most probably a monastery, which had long ago occupied the spot, when a little town, now no longer existing, had been gathered together at the neck of the promontory on which the fort of Scarphout stood.

This one wall was all that remained of the former habitations; and against it the cottage was built; though the huge stones of which it was composed were but little in harmony with the rest of the low building. To it, how-Walran, the fisherman of Scarphout?" he demanded, "and ever, the fisherman advanced, and placing his shoulder against one of the enormous stones, to the astonishment "I am Walran," replied the fisherman, "and I do plight of the strnnger it moved round upon a pivot in the wall, showing the top of a small staircase, leading down apparently into the ground. A few words sufficed to tell that that staircase led, by a passage under the narrow neck of sandhills, to the old castle beyond; and that in that old castle was still one room habitable, though unknown to any but the fisherman himself. "Here, then, let the lady stay," he said, "guarded, fed, and tended by my wife and children; and for you and me, let us put to sea. I will you may gain aid to re-establish rightful rule within the

"To Boulogne," said the stranger, "to Boulogne? Nay, let us pause at Bergues or Calais, for I am not loved in Boulogne. I once," he added boldly, seeing some astonishment in the fisherman's countenance, " I once wronged man. A party of assassins are triumphant in Flanders, the former Count of Boulogne-I scruple not to say it-I did him wrong; and though he has been dead for years,

"And do you think the love or hate of ordinary people

ene righ sente guer the f fuge vault and f looke herse broth fore h guide He, or after t gave | degree in reg beach. its pro hardy d of Wat the rud heard t but he t reign's he bade a chance Watchin pushed s stant she ment wi sea, and

cour

T

There they were mentary a drops be Gradually grew less shorter in bed and he becoming of the con ders again ten her sor doubted wi aspect of t very differe father's pal she gazed r in its appea the dressoir and many a ready for he enormous w the velvet ha the vaulted the cold, bar lone and rui before had o mme blood t gazed out of

from the

VOL. XXVII

enemics, and aid to restore your sovereign's son to his Wavrin and his dangerous voyage; and, like the figures rightful inheritance."

fore her faithful friend who, with a father's tenderness, had heart of Marguerite of Flanders was but too well dispess its prow towards the surf, and one or two of the fisherman's ous to her peace. Morning and evening, every day, Alb but he thought of his murdered sovereign, and of that sovelest hours of her weary concealment. reign's helpless orphans, and springing into the frail bark, But in the meantime the fisherman returned no more Watching till the wave had broken, the three strong men eventful evening, did not appear again. The eye of the pushed the boat through the yielding sand; the next in-fisherman's wife strained over the waters, and when at stant she floated; they leaped in, and struggling for a mo- eventide the barks of the other inhabitants of the crust were ment with the coming wave, the bark bounded out into the seen approaching the shore, his children an down to insea, and was lost to the sight of those that watched ner quire for their parent-but in vain. About the same time, from the shore.

CHAPTER II.

they were like the tears of a spoiled beauty when her mo- hope, and the priest of Nore Dame de Blackenbergh was mentary anger has gained all she wishes, and the passionate besought to say masses or the souls of the departed. The drops begin to be chequered by smiles not less wayward. good old man wept as he promised to comply, for though Gradually, however, the smiles predominated; the clouds he had seen courts, and lived in the household of a noble grew less frequent and less heavy, the sun shone out with prince, he loved 148 simple flock, and had ever been much shorter intervals, and though the wind and the sea still sob-bed and heaved with the past storm, the sky was momently Marguerite a Flanders, with a fate but too intimately inbecoming more and more serene. Such was the aspect terwoven with that of the unfortunate family at Scarpof the coming day, when the unhappy Marguerite of Flan-hout, has been made acquainted with the hopes and fears ders again opened her eyes, after having for a time forgot- of every day, had mingled her tears with Emiline, and ten her sorrow in but too brief repose. For a moment she had even clasped the hand of Albert, while she soothed doubted whether the past were not all a dream; but the hin with sympathetic sorrow for his father's loss, aspect of the chamber in which she now found herself, Mine is an unhappy fate," she said, "to bring sorvery different from that which she had inhabited in he row and danger even here, while seeking to fly from it father's palace, soon recalled the sad reality. And yet as myself." she gazed round the room, there was nothing rude or soarse "Grieve not, lady, in that respect," replied Albert, in its appearance. Rich tapestry was still upon the walls; raising her hand to his lips; "we have but done our duty the dressoir was still covered with fine linen and purple, towards you, and our hearts are not such as to regret and many a silver vessel—laver, and ewer, and cup, stood that we have done so, even though we lose a father by it. ready for her toilet. The small grated windows, with the corrmons walls in which they were set, the faded colours of for better ones. In the meanwhile you are in safety here, the velvet hangings of the bed in which she had been sleeping, and should need be, I will defend you with the last drop of the vaulted roof, showing no carved and gilded oak, but my blood."

the cold, bare stone, told that she was in the chamber of a lone and ruined fortress; but one that less than a century aspect. Scarcely were matins over, when the good old. before had contained persons in whose veins flowed the priest himself visited the cottage of the fisherman, and same blood that wandered through her own. Rising, she proceeded to those of his companions, spreading joy and gazed out of the window, which looked upon the wide and hope wherever he came. What, it may be asked, was the WOL. EXVIII. FEBRUARY, 1836.—20.

county of Boulogne, will give you protection against your rushing sea, and she thought of the good old Lord of in a delirious dream, the forms of the old fisherman, and The Lord of Wayrin mused for a moment, but con- his beautiful daughter, and fair wife, and handsome, darksented, and all was speedily arranged. The fair Mar-eyed son came back upon ber memory. A slight knock guerite of Flanders, roused and cheered by the care of at the door roused her; but her whole nerves had been so the fisherman's family, gladly took advantage of the re-fuge offered her, and found no terrors in the long damp enter. At length, however, she summoned courage to do vaults or ponderous stone door that hid her from the world; so, and the fair and smiling face of Emiline, the fisherand feeling that she herself was now in safety, she scarcely man's daughter, appeared behind the opening door. Torn looked round the apartment to which she was led, but gave from the fond, accustomed things of early days, left lone herself up to the thoughts of her father's bloody death, her and desolate in a wild and unattractive spot, surrounded brother's situation of peril, and all the dangers that lay be by dangers, and for the first time exposed to adversity, the guided her safely from the house of murder and desolation. to cling to whatever presented itself for affection. Emi-He, on his part, saw the heavy stone door roll slowly to line she found kind and gentle, but though younger, of a after the princess, and ascertaining that an iron bolt within firmer mood than herself, having been brought up in gave her the means of securing her retreat, at least in a severer school; and to her Marguerite soon learned to degree, he left her, with a mind comparatively tranquilized cling. But there was another companion whom fate cast in regard to her, and followed the fisherman towards the in her way, from whom she could not whithhold the same beach. There was found already the boat prepared, with natural attachment, though but too likely to prove danger hardy companions ready to share his danger. The Lord the fisherman's son, who had been left behind by his father of Wavrin looked up to the dark and starless sky; he felt to afford that protection which none but a man could give, the rude wind push roughly against his broad chest; he visited her retreat in the company of his sister; and Marheard the billows fall in thunder upon the sandy shore; guerite was soon taught to long for those visits as the bright-

he bade them push off, though he felt that there was many a chance those words might be the signals for his death.—

Day passed after day; morning broke and evening ell, and the boat which had left the shore of Scarphout of that too, fragments of wrecks,—masts, sais, and planks, were cast upon the sands, and dark and ad grew the brows of the once happy family at the point of Scarphout. The two other men whom he had chosen to accompany him were There were tears in the blue eye of the morning, but unmarried, but their relations at length gave up the last

dream was, in that age, sufficient to dry the eyes of mourn- vulsed the land. ing and bring back hope to bosoms that had been desolate. a taste which Marguere fancied all unequalled in the if a hard measure be dealt to me." rienced princess of Flanders celt that she was loosing her asked himself, that Burchard had really discovered Maryoung heart to the youth of low degree; and yet what guerite of Flanders? If so, it were time, he thought, to own bosom from his hopeless flight. It was not alone that any cost to himself; and those directions had been, in she had ever beheld, it was not alone that he was gentle, sea, and landing on the coast of France, to place her in kind, and tender, but it was that on him alone was she the hands of the King or his representative, it may easily east for aid, protection, amusement, information, hope; be conceived that the execution thereof would be not a that her fate hung upon his word, and the while he little painful to one for whom each hour of her society deep, earnest, anxious solicitude for her peace and or her felt that it must be done; but for the last three days four in her bosom, he had dared to love her in return-to love far from the coast, and Albert determined, in the first her, the princess of that land in which he was alone the instance, to ascertain their purpose. With some young son of a poor fisherman? She knew he had-she saw it hen from the neighbouring cottages, he put to sea, in his eyes, she heard it in every tone, she felt it in the ant finding an easy excuse to approach one of the large sender touch of the strong hand that aided her in their vesse, which he had beheld, he asked, as if accidentally, stoken wanderings. And thus it went on from day to day, to whom they belonged, when, with consternation and till words were spoken that no after thought could ever anxiety, to heard that they were the ships of "Burchard, recall, and Marguerite owned, that if Heaven willed that Prevot of & Donatien." Returning at once to the shore, her father's lands should never return to her father's house, he dismisses his companions and sought his father's cotshe could, with a happy heart, see state and dignity pass tage; but there he found that tidings had come that the away from her, and wed the son of the Fisherman of King of France had advanced upon Bruges, and that grown into weeks, and weeks had become months, yet no France, had directed their flight towards the sea-shore,—tidings of him or his companions had reached the shore, Time presed—the moment of danger was approaching; and men began to fancy that the vision of the old priest but still great peril appeared in every course of action

source of such joy? It was but a vision! The old man ever, the family of the fisherman himself. They seemed had dreamt, he said, that he had seen the fisherman of to hold the judgment of the good man infallible, and every Scarphout safe and well, with a net in his hand, in which day he visited their cottage, bringing them tidings of all were an innumerable multitude of fishes. And this simple the events which took place in the struggle that now con-

By this time, the King of France had roused himself to Albert flew to communicate the tale to Marguerite of chastise the rebels of Flanders, and to reinstate the young Flanders, and there was spoken between them many a count in his dominions. He had summoned his vassals to word of joy-joy that so often entwines its arms with his standard, and creating two experienced leaders martenderness. He now came oftener than ever, for the old shals of his host, had entered the disturbed territory with priest by some means had learned that he took an interest lance in the rest. Little armed opposition had been made in all the changing fortunes of the state of Flanders, and to his progress, though two or three detached parties from daily the good man brought him tidings, which sometimes his army had been cut off and slaughtered. But this only he felt it a duty, sometimes a pleasure to tell to the lonely exasperated the monarch still more, and he had been dweller in the ruined castle. He found, too, that his pre- heard to vow that nothing but the death of every one of sence cheered her, and that his conversation won her from the conspirators would satisfy him for the blood of Charles her grief. She began to cling even more to him than to the Good, and of the faithful friends who had fallen with his sister; for he knew more of the world, and men, and him. Such was the tale told by the good priest to Albert, courts than Emiline, and he thought it but kind to afford the fisherman's son, one day towards the end of the year, her every solace and pleasure he could give. Each day and by him repeated to Marguerite of Flanders, who his visits became more frequent, and continued longer. heard it with very mingled feelings; for if a momentary Sometimes he would liberate her, after a sort, from her joy crossed her heart to think that the murderers of her voluntary prison, by taking her, with Emiline, in his boat father would meet their just reward, and her brother upon the moonlight sea, or even by leading her along, would recover the coronet of Flanders, the fear, the cerunder the eye of Heaven's queen, upon the smooth sands, tainty that she herself would be torn from him she loved, when the waves of a calm night rippled up to their feet.— overclouded the brief sunshine, and left her mind all At other times he would sit upon the stones of the old dark. The next day, however, new tidings reached Albert, battlements, rent and rifled by the warfare of ages, and and filled his heart with consternation and surprise. Burwould wile her thoughts away from herself by tales of chard, the chief murderer of the dead count, had, it was other days, when those battlements had withstood the said, despatched a messenger to the King of France, to assault of hosts, and those halls had been the resort of the bid him either hold off from Bruges, or send him a free fair and bave, now dust. Then, again, he would give her pardon for hinself and all his companions, lest another tidings which he had gained while dwelling at Namur or victim should be added to those already gone from the at Tournay; Aciting the gallant deeds of the servants of family of the dead count. "I have in my power," he had the Cross in distant Palestine, or telling of the horrors of added, "the only daughter of Charles, called by you the captivity in Payningie; and then, too, he would sing, as Good. I know her retreat-I hold her as it were in a chain, they sat above the waters, with a voice, and a skill, and I shall keep her as a hostage, whose blood shall flow world. Day by day, and hour by hour, the fair inexpe- Albert fell into deep thought. Could it be true, he could she do to stay the fugitive, or call him back to her fulfil one part of his father's directions concerning her, at Albert was, in her eyes at least, the nost handsome man case danger menaced her in her retreat, to carry her to emed to feel and triumph in the task, yet it wa with a was joy. The more he pondered, however, the more he carity. And did she think, that with all these feeings or five strange sail had been seen idly beating about not Burchard had fled with his troops; but the same report But still the fisherman himself returned not: days had added, that the rebels, hotly pursued by the chivalry of might be no more than an ordinary dream. Not so, how- which could be adopted. The escape by sea was evidently unf of I wel an Kin and Wou hanc Albe you,

King

10

"(

cat

ren

it s

Wi

secre there but a His came helme him fi that a many. up, "1

to our

for an

Mar to a sp horsem full spe where I There v croache castle, b running lowed u the gro the sea o was a pe that Ma lived, he ing from

" See !" afe betw the secret of horsen with joy i hills, scare rying on standard o against the

for her or

he wiped

of hope a

rently discovered; and if a flight by land were attempted, cried; but still the foremost boldly galloped on. They it seemed only likely to lead into the power of the enemy, reached the shore, drew up their horses when they saw With her, then, he determined to consult, and passing that the tide was in; turned suddenly towards the cottage; through the vaults, he was soon by the side of the fair and the next moment Albert could see his mother and Emiunfortunate girl, whose fate depended upon the decision line fly from their dwelling across the sands. The men at of the next few minutes. He told her all; but to her as arms had other matters in view than to pursue them; but well as to himself, to fly seemed more hazardous than to Albert now felt that Marguerite's only hope was in his own remain. The high tide was coming up; in less than half valor. an hour the castle would be cut off from the land; the "To the turret, my beloved!" he cried, "to the turret!" King of France was hard upon the track of the enemy, And half bearing, half leading her along, he placed her and various events might tend to favour her there. "I under its shelter, and took his station in the pass. A new would rather die," she said, "than fall living into their soul seemed to animate him, new light shown forth from hands; and I can die here as well as anywhere else, dear his eye; and, in words which might have suited the noblest Albert."

King arrives, you are safe."

"But arms!" she said. "You have no arms."

"Oh! yes, I have," he answered. "No one knows the secrets of this old castle but my father and myself; and amidst a thousand other banners of various feudal lords. there are arms here too for those who need them. Wait Hope grew high in Albert's breast, and he trusted that ere but a moment, and I will return."

His absence was as brief as might be; but when he came back, Marguerite saw him armed with shield and helmet, sword and battle axe; but without either haubert or coat of mail, which, though they might have guarded him from wounds, would have deprived him of a part of that agility which could alone enable one to contend with

"If I could but send Emiline," he said, as he came up, "to call some of our brave boatmen from the cottages to our assistance here, we might set an army at defiance for an hour or two."

Marguerite only answered, by pointing with her hand to a spot on the distant sands, where a small body of upon the rebels to surrender, and promising pardon to all horsemen, perhaps not a hundred, were seen galloping at but the ten principal conspirators. A loud shout of defifull speed towards Scarphout. Albert saw that it was too ance was the only reply; for at that very moment the eye late to call further aid; and now only turned to discover of Burchard lighted on the form of Albert as he crouched where he could best make his defence in case of need .-There was a large massy wall, which ere the sea had encroached upon the building, ran completely round the and starting up with his battle-axe in his hand, he plantcastle, but which now only flanked one side of the ruins, running out like a jetty into the waters which had swal-French on the shore could now behold him also, as he stood lowed up the rest. It was raised about twenty feet above with half his figure above the parametr and instantly. the ground on one side, and perhaps twenty-five above the sea on the other; and at the top, between the parapets, brought forward, and poured their quarrels on the men of was a passage which would hardly contain two men abreast. the Prêvot as they rushed forward to attack him. Two or Upon this wall, about half way between the keep and the three were struck down; but the others hurried on, and sea, was a small projecting turret, and there Albert saw that Marguerite might find shelter, while, as long as he hived, he could defend the passage against any force com-ing from the side of the land. He told her his plans; and for her only answer, she fell upon his neck and wept. But his foes went down before his strong and ready arm, loud he wiped her tears away with his fond lips, and spoke words of hope and comfort.

efe between us and the land, and if they do possess the secrets of the vaults, they cannot reach us till the tide were bent upon her, certain that if she could be taken, a falls." When he turned his eyes to the shore, the body promise of pardon, or death of vengeance at least, would of horsemen were within a mile of the castle; but then, be obtained; but only one could approach at a time, and hills, scarcely two miles behind them, a larger force hur-dying. At that moment, however, Burchard, whio stood rying on as if in pursuit with banner and rennon, and behind, pointed to the castle-court below, where a number standard displayed, and lance beyond lance bristling up of old planks and beams lay rotting in the sun. A dezen against the sky.

cat off; the retreat of Marguerite of Flanders was appeal "The King of France! the King of France!" he

of the land, he exhorted her to keep her firmness in the "They shall pass over my dead body ere they reach moment of danger, to watch around, and give him notice you," answered he. "Many a thing has been done, Mar- of all she saw from the loop-holes of the turret. Then guerite, by a single arm; and if I can defend you till the came a moment of awful suspense, while in silence and in doubt they waited the result; but still the host of France might be seen drawing nearer and more near; and the standard of the king could be distinguished floating on the wind Burchard could find and force the entrance the avenger would be upon him. He hoped in vain, however, for the murderer was himself well acquainted with the spot, and had only paused to secure the door of the vaults, so that his pursuers could not follow by the same means he himself employed. In another minute loud voices were heard echoing through the ruin, and Albert and Marguerite concealing themselves as best they could, beheld the fierce and blood-thirsty Prevot with his companions seeking them through the castle. Still onward bore the banners of France; and ere Burchard had discovered their concealment, the shore at half a bow shot distance was fined with chivalry. So near were they, that, uninterrupted by the soft murmur of the waves, could be heard the voice of a herald calling under the wall, and the men at arms poured on along the narrow passage. Concealment could now avail nothing; ed himself between the rebels and the princess. with half his figure above the parapet; and instantly, seeming to divine his situation, some cross-bowmen were the safety of Albert himself required the cross-bowmen to cease, when hand to hand he was compelled to appose the passage of the enemy. Each blow of his battle-axe could still be beheld from the land; and as one after another of and gratulating shouts rang from his friends on the shore. Still others pressed on, catching a view of Marguerite her-"See." he said, "the sea is already covering the chaus- self as, in uncontrollable anxiety for him she loved, she gazed forth from the turret door, and a hundred eager eyes with joy inexpressible, he beheld upon the edge of the sand- Albert was forming for himself a rampart of dead and of his men sprang down, caught up the materials which he showed them, planted them against the wall beyond the of St. Donatien. It was, as he merited, upon a scaffold. turret, and soon raised up a sort of tottering scaffold be. Explanations, too, are tedious, and the old history tells no hind the place where Marguerite's gallant defender stood, more than we have here told, leaving the imagination of He himself, eager in the strife before him, saw not what its readers to fill up all minor particulars in the life of the had happened; but she had marked the fatal advantage Fisherman of Scarphout. their enemy had gained, and, gliding like a ghost from out the turret, she approached close to his side, exclaiming, "They are coming !- they are coming from the other side !- and we are lost !"

Albert turned his head, and comprehended in a moment. But one hope was left. Dashing to the earth the next opponent who was climbing over the dead bodies between them, he strock a second blow at the one beyond, which control them, he strock a second blow at the one beyond, which control them is the bright of the strock as second blow at the bright of the strock as second blow at the bright of the strock as second blow at the bright of the strock as second blow at the bright of the strock as second blow at the bright of the strock as second blow at the bright of the strock as second blow at the bright of the strock as second blow at the bright of the strock as second blow at the bright of the strock as second blow at the bright of the strock as second blow at the bright of the strock as second blow at the bright of the strock as second blow at the strock as second blow a made him recoil upon his fellows. Then casting his battle. Cross of the South, and the brilliants of another bemiaxe and shield away, he caught the light form of Marguerite in his arms, sprang upon the parapet, and exclaiming, " Now God befriend us:" plunged at once into the deep sea, while, at the very same moment, the heads of the fresh assailants appeared upon the wall beyond. A cry of lot to reside for a considerable time under the Equator, terror and amazement rang from the shore; and the King of France himself, with two old knights beside him, rode on till the waters washed their horses feet. Albert and Marguerite were lost to sight in a moment; but the next instant they appeared again; and, long accustomed to sport star in the heavens. I did see them; but the proud boast with the same waves that now curled gently round him as an old loved friend, bearing the shoulders of Marguerite tion that I gained, did but show me the imperfection of lifted on his left arm, with his right he struck boldly towards the shore. On-on he bore her! and like a lamb in the bosom of the shepherd, she lay without a struggle, conquering strong terror by stronger resolution. On-on he can fathom the wisdom that bore her! Glad shouts hailed him as he neared the shore; and with love and valour lending strength, he came nearer and more near. At length his feet touched the ground, and throwing both arms round her, he bore her safe, and rescued, till he trod the soft dry sand. Then kneeling beground—but still he held her hand. "Hold! noblesfore the monarch, he set his fair burden softly on the old!" cried the king of France, springing from his greeting he well has won. Advance the standard over sails were shifted for the best suit; greater security was as to-day, gallant, brave, and true. This is the remy good Lord of Boulogne?" and he turned to a tall old ly to be produced by a gale of wind. The tempest like as for ten years you here enacted the Fishermon of Scarp ocean, manifesting his wonderful power on the deep; but

The nobles laughed loud, and with tears of joy the old Count of Boulogne, for it was no other, embraced his advanced, and pressed Marguerite's hand in that of her deliverer, saying, " Her father, sire, by will, as you will it so well. At the same time it is a comfort to my heart but for myself I can truly say, that in many an hour of to offer my noble lord, the Count of Boulogne, some atenement for having done him wrong in years long gone, and for having, even by mistake, brought on him your tion that the eye of the Deity watched over my conduct, displeasure and a ten years exile. He has forgiven me, has quickened my intellect, increased my vigilance, and but I have not forgiven myself; and as an offering of rendered me firm and collected in the midst of threatened repentance, all my own lands and territories, at my death, I give, in addition, to the dowry of Marguerite of We a

From the United Service Journal. LEAVES FROM MY LOG-BOOK.

to

th

his

sh

the

thr

bra

shi

acc

for ger

ma

iting

trer

Mr.

I'm

you

mu

kee

" be

han

shal

poop " M

com

to d

by t

coe 1

hear

the g

duct

days crea

their

plete One

WE had crossed the Line-the gem in the extremity of sphere had arisen into view, presenting the gorgeous spectacle of the heavenly orbs nearly from pole to pole. I have ever loved to gaze on the splendid canopy jewelled with the myriads of its sparkling hosts; and in after-life it was my during which period I never missed a night from observing the constellations as they progressively appeared in their proper season, priding myself on the idea that I should be enabled to boast of having seen every visible never escaped my lips, for the utmost extent of informathe human understanding, when compared with the boundless infinity of power possessed by the Creator. I grasped at knowledge, and the attainment delighted me-but who

"Guides, directs, and rules the whole!"

The utmost bounds of man's intelligence is only calculated to fill his mind with admiration and worship whilst he humbles himself before Omniscience.-But to proceed with my voyage.

We were approaching the southern extremity of Africa, and preparations were consequently made to contend against horse. "Before any one greets him, I will give him the the gales so common in this part of the world. The worn us! Albert of Boulogne, I dub thee Knight! Be ever given to the masts by setting up the rigging which had become relaxed through the heat of the torrid zone; new compense we give. Fair lady of Flanders, we think tiller-ropes were rove-in short, every thing was done that you owe him a recompense likewise; and we believe that, prudent foresight could suggest. There always has been ecording to our wise coast laws, that which a fisherman a something peculiarly interesting to me in the performbrings up from the sea is his own by right. Is it not so, ance of the necessary duties to counteract the effects likeman beside him. "You of all men, should know best; the breath of the Almighty, rushes over the face of the at the same time the Great Being has given to his creature man the knowledge, the skill, the judgment, even the wisdom, to struggle against the sterm he has loosened from the hollow of his hand; and I have often thought noble sen, while at the same time the Lord of Wavrin that Omnipotence looked on with pleasure to witness the exercise of those talents which are the peculiar characterfind, gave the disposal of her hand to me, and I am but bably condemn the indulgence of such feelings, preferring doing my duty to him in bestowing it on one who merits to attribute effects to the more common course of nature, peril, when the wild waves have beat over me, and the storm has poured its vengeance on my head, the convic-

We were somewhere about the latitude 39° S., when a sudden squall took us aback, and the sea was in an instant We will not pause upon the death of Burchard, Prevot one white sheet of foam. It was the morning-watch unto "shorten sail."

"Ma conscience, Pascoe," exclaimed Marshall, who had coat? Hoot toot, Grunmett, it 'll be washed out at the port." the watch on deck, and had come below to rouse the "The parson will keep it company, then," said I; "but mates-" Ma conscience, Pascoc, but yon's a fearful sight it is evident, with all your generosity, that you think more says there's a gale coming on!"

"The devil he does!" returned Pascoe, turning out of his hammock and drawing on his trowsers. "But, Marshall, bear a hand up, and tell him to stop the ship till I get and endeavoured to cling to it; but the heavy waters again on deck, and make all snug. Halloo, Grummett, show a broke over the gangway, and he was a second time washleg, man, we're going to have a regular sneezer, and must ed down to leeward, and would in all probability have lost wait upon old Snatchblock for a taste of diamond P."

take it wi' me on the yard, and if I leave it here ----"

the parson there"-(the Rev. Mr. C. had come on deck uddressing the boatswain, "you blease lend me a hand to through alarm, and was standing holding on by the main- get dar massa parson to windward-he do same for you brace cleat)-"twig the parson-don't you see how he's some day." shivering and shaking-he's just changed his religion on account of the weather."

faith."

ger; "don't you see he has turned quaker ?- Now Scotch- the matter o' that, you may see him to his cabin, and my man, lend him your coat, and make an act of charity of word for it there's a licker-case in the corner. - How are

I'm grieved to see it. You're cauld, Mr. C-, and harm." young bluid does na feel the biting o' the wind sae vora much, so, Mr. C-, you'd better take ma great coat to voice-" I fear I have got my death." keep you warm."

handing it to Mr. C-, "Ey, Sir, but ye're unco wel- forget brandy is a good anecdote against a sen-drencher." The clergyman took the garment, which Marshall assisted him to put on; and then starting up the ment," urged the parson, " and you shall have a glass of poop-ladder, the wily Scotchman exclaimed to Pascoc, grog each; but first of all let me slip off this saturated and "Ma certie, but it will be dry and warm for me when I heavy garment."

come doon again."

to descend, when Tremenhere hailed us to strike the mizen Mr. Snatchblock ?-it is literally souking." top-gallant mast, (the yard had already been sent on deck by the watch,) and we consequently obeyed orders. Pas fond of suction," returned the boatswain, and raising the heard his voice in shouts of laughter above the howling of gardte, who had that moment slid down to leeward amongst the gale, as he pointed down to the quarter-deck. The re-the party, and the weight bore him to the deck. "Ax your duction of canvass had made the Lady Graves very un-pardon, Mr. Beaumgarden," said the veteran, as the cadet steady in her motions; and as there had been for several rose upon his knees, and shook off the wet coat.—" I days previous a long swell, which the freshening gale in-ercased into mountain-waves, that topped and broke from slap in your teeth; but may hap you arn't never none the their great weight, a heavy sea occasionally rolled com- worse for it, and maybe it'll teach you a lesson I learned pletely over us, sweeping the whole range of the decks. long ago, though, as you may see, I don't always practise. One of these had struck the ship just shaft the main chan-it—never throw hot water and askes to windard." nels, and an immense body of water fell with its greatest Beaumgardte received the apology rather ungraciously, his hold, and washed away into the lee-scuppers, where he thought it best to take no further notice of it. Mr. C. sprawled about unable to rise, and the men were too busy was conveyed to his cabin, and the negro and the boats. to lend him a hand. Marshall had been taking great cre-wain's mate got a stiff nor wester, whilst Pascoe, myself, dit to himself for his kindness to Mr. C——, when Pas-Marshall, and old Snatchblock, paid a visit to diamond P.

der Tremenhere, and the hands were instantly turned up/coe's laugh directed our attention to the disaster-"Ma coat, ma coat!" shouted Marshall-" will nobody save ma

-the waters are like lime-wash, and Muster Tremenhere of your coat than you do of Mr. C-.... Here comes his life, or sustained serious injury, had it not been for In a few minutes we were on the quarter-deck, and or black Jackson, who had finished his duty aloft, and dedered aloft to furl the miren-topsail. "Eh, Pascoe, what 'll scended to the quarter-deck. "Gar Amighty, massa par-I do wi' my great coat?" inquired Marshall-"I canna son, what he do in a lee-scupper, ch?" said the black, raising the reverned gentleman in his strong arms, and hold-"It will be washed overboard," said Pascoe; "but twig ing on by the Jacob's ladder. "Here, massa Natchblock,"

" How naturally the clargy help one another," said the boatswain to his mate, pointing to black Jackson and the "Nay, nay," returned Marshall, " he's too good a man minister. "Well, well, mayhap one of us may want a for that, Pascoc-he's no' the minister to forsake his cast of his office afore we reaches Madderas or Calcutta;

so, Bill, clap on t'other side of the thunder-cloud and par-"But I tell you be has," rejained Pascoe in seeming an buckle him twixt you to the companion ladder -- nay, for it—he'll perhaps say a good word for us whilst we're hand-you, Sir?" The clergyman shook his head, from which the ing the topsail." The reverend elergyman had come from his warm cabin, to close them-" Aye, aye, I know how it is," continued and being suddenly exposed to the keen cold blast, be did Snatchblock: "I've swallowed many a quart of the briny tremble most aguishly. Marshall approached him-" Ey, belement in my time, but your conceyback is a good pre-Mr. C-, the caller air is shaking you a wee bit, and venter, and mayhap a toothful wouldn't do the lads any

"Take me down stairs," requested Mr. C-

"Lord love yer heart, no," replied Snatchblock, " you've "You are very kind, my young friend," said the divine; only got a little salt water, which maybap may save a dose "but I cannot think of depriving you of your covering." from the medicine chest. You'll be spinning us another "Ey, Sir," returned Marshall, stripping off the coat, and yarn next Sunday, wind and weather permitting, and don't

" Do, my good fellows, carry me down stairs to my apart-

"Ma coat, ma coat," exclaimed Marshall, who now join-We had handed the mizen-topsail, and were preparing of the group, "did you ever see sie a concern as nra coat,

"Aye, aye, young gentleman, it's very like a whalecoe was in the cross-trees to remove the fid, when we ponderous robe, he threw it, as if by accident, over Beaum-

ree on the poor parson, who was instantly forced from but as he could not say it was done intentionally, he

the flying Dutchman."

do you mean by the flying Dutchman?"

exclaimed the boatswain contemptuously; "here's a youth for all the world like a flying-fish, keeping straight on as has lived fourteen or fifteen years in the world and in a direct course from the crest of one foaming moundoesn't know what the flying Dutchman is !- why were tain to another, as if she'd been sailing in a smooth did you get your edication ?- it's the ghost of a ship with tideway. 'Ship, ahoy!' shouted the mate again, for he spectrunes for a crew."

"And winding-sheets for sails," chimed in Pascoe; " we saw her last voyage, but we were a little farther to the eastward.-My eyes, but that was a heavy lurch, boasun -she's sharing it out amongst them upon deck!-that sea shook every timber in the craft." A crashing noise was heard-"There's something carried away, depend upon it."

"It's only Tremenhere dropped one of his front teeth," said the boatswain. " But about this same flying Dutchman, young man-so you never heard of her, eh?" Marshall answered in the negative, and Snatchblock went on "She's a doomed craft, steered by a dead man's hand!" -The Scotchman shuddered .- "I remembers seeing her devil's horns off."

had main bad weather of it, Mr. Snatchblock."

through the fokstle into the cook's coppers, and was boil- yard; and there the ship's company was like so many the watch sings out through his speaking-trumpet, 'Hard through Adam's grandmother as to think of killing a up with the helm—hard up with it—and away aft there dead man. The mosket was handed to him, and he the watch and brail up the trysel—hard up, boy—hard stood on the bulwark of the gangway (for her sides were up!" 'Hard up it is, Sir,' said the weather-wheel, 'but built up, lads) taking a steady aim; but a tremendous sea she's got no way, and won't answer.' 'Aft, and brail up came roaring up astarn of us, lifting her quarters high in the trysel? shouted the officer again— Bear a hand, men, the air, and burying her bows as she plunged down forud, for your lives? Well, young gentleman, I felt quite conit toppled over the sides just as the mate fired, and away twisticated to think what he could be arter, for though the whirl of waters carried him into the boiling eddies of there was as pretty a gale o' wind as ever a lubber would the deep; we saw him for a minute or two struggling wish to skulk in, yet we were all alone, and nothing what- amidst the white foam of the ocean, and then we saw him somever to keep us company; howsomever we drops the no more. 'Clear away the small cutter!' shouted the mainstaysel like a hot murphy, and away we sallies aft second officer of the watch, and some of the lads jumped to the trysel brails; but just as we'd clapt on we hears the into her, and were casting of the lashings, when the cap-

"I'm thinking, Mr. Marshall," said the boutswain, as he officer hail, 'Ship, aboy ! starboard yer helm, or you'll be mixed himself a regular out-and-out good un, "I'm thinking aboard of us!" But he might as well have whistled a there's nothing on arthe, no nor on the ocean neither, as hornpipe to a haystack, for I looks out dead to windard, equals this here stuff, and I'm pleased to see you take to and there in the dim haze, looking just as if she had stept it kindly for you were apt to grin at it when you first came out of a cloud, was a large craft coming right down stem aboard. Howsomever, there's some difference, I must on, with studd'n-sels set alow and aloft, and t'gallant royallow, between Johnny Groat's house and the latitude of als over all, though the breeze sneezed hard enough to blow the canvass out of the bolt-ropes. On she came "The flying Dutchman!" reiterated Marshall-"what right slap afore it, but she didn't seem to settle down atwixt the waves like as a right arnest natral ship would "Well, I'm blessed if that don't beat cock-fighting;" do, but she appeared to dance along the tops of the seas warn't up to the thing, and 'I'm d-d, ould chap,' says I to myself, comotherously under my voice, but you're expending good breath for no manner o' use-howsomever, brail up the trysel, lads-ease off the sheet handsomely, you lubber, and do everything ship-shape, for the gaze of the dead is upon you-that's the flying Dutchman, or my name's not Joe Snatchblock! 'Does she answer her helm?' inquired the mate: 'Aye, aye, Sir,' replied the quartermaster-she feels the forestaysel, Sir, and is paying off-she'll gather way directly.' And she did gather way, but still that churchyard craft came on, with her sails bleached in the sun an storm, like grave-clothes on a corpse, and her white shrouds showing like the blanched bones of a skeleton, and onward she came till she fairly ranged up alongside of us, once: we were lying to under a mainstaysel, forestaysel, and there we could see admidst something like a crystaland trysel, and it was blowing hard enough to blow the line light, the men-that is, them as was men once-all standing stiff and stark, with their glazed eyes fixed, and "Ma certic," exclaimed Marshall, "but you must have looking like the horn in a purser's lantern, whilst bolt upright in a perpendiculous upon the taffrel, holding on by "Why, it did blow a bit of a breeze, I must own," re- the vang, was a tall fellow in Dutch trowers, and on his joined the veteran, "and we were forced to shove our head a broad-brimmed hat big enough for a jolly-boat; he heads down the hatchway to get breath. I was boasun's had a speaking-trumpet in his hand as long as the spankermate at the time, and the wind jammed my call so taut boom. 'Ho, the ship ahoy! from whence came you?" atwixt my teeth, that they were obligated to get a handy- shouted the mate; but there was no answer; and so says bylly to bowse it out. The captain happened to take off I to the officer, 'It's no manner o' use hailing, Sir-it's his hat to look alost, when away went as fine a head of the flying Dutchman, and none other.' 'Flying devil!' hair as ever barber twizzled, and he was left as bald as a says he in a passion: 'but devil or Dutchman, clear away coot. Well, d'ye mind, we were lying-to, as I said afore, that fokstle gun there forud, and give him a bit of iron, with the sea running as high as the Peak o' Teneriffe, as he won't answer a civil question .- Ho, the ship ahoy? and the rain pouring down marlin-spikes and top-mauls, -he hailed again from the starboard gangway, but all was and there we was pitching bows under, till the best bower as silent as the tomb, and away she went past as like a jumped slap in-board, and one of the flues went right shot, her topmast studd'n-sel boom just clearing our mained as soft as a doughboy-one of the messes had it for corpses, not one on 'em stirring a limb. 'Are you ready dinner. Well, I had the first watch that night, and it was with that gun forud? shouted the officer- D-n, bear a somewhere about four bells that away goes the mainstay- hand, and let fly right at his cabin windows! Hand me sel sheet, and the block hit the long-boat a rap that made here a musket-I'll have a slap at that fellow on the taffrel, all sneer again; so we hawls down the sail, and were busy if he's the devil himself !" 'He's ounly the Dutchman, Sir,' in the lee-waste receing a new sheet, when the officer of says I, 'and you may just as well try to poke daylight

fi an we the side at a law of grant of

1

tain runs out of his cabin, and demanded the cause of her disrespectfully of the Company's provisions," said Allen; being before the wind, and what the uproar was about. "but was it a large pie?" "The ship, Sir,' cries one-"The mate, Sir,' cries another "It had a beautiful build, Sir," returned Pasoce; "there aft." he hallooed out- Quartermaster, bring her carefully to be made on purpose for such a night as this, if we could to the wind.' All ready with the small cutter!' sung only get at it." out the lads who had been clearing her away. 'Mr. Dareall's overboard, Sir,' said the midshipman, 'Keep bars with a little more strength of hand than conscience all fast " shouted the captain-' no boat could live in such could properly sanction, but they resisted his efforts. a sea as this. To your stations, men!-where's the "There, be off with you, youngster, we must be content stranger?" We ran to looard, and there went the craft with the usual fare;" and away went Pascoe with the away into the thick gloom till she disappeared. The poor quartermaster. "It is hard, too, to have such a deliofficer was buried in an ocean grave."

"And where about did this happen, Mr. Snatchblock?" to look at it." inquired Marshall: "it is a horrible story, if true."

doubt it?" remonstrated the boatswain: "d'ye think I I'll unship them, Mr. Purvis, if you'll take the pie in tow. sail under false colours, and carry sham papers? And as "In tow!" reiterated Purvis, "you mean me to take it to whereabouts it happened-why it was at no great dis- in toto; 'but lead us not into temptation;' why it will be tance from where we are now; he's always cruising in a downright act of plunder, and may bring me to the bar these here latitudes, and mayhap you may have proof of as a robber." the fact afore many dog-watches are out. But come, "According to Grummett's account," said the second young gentlemen, its time we looked at the weather again mate, "you must be brought to the bar before you per-—there's a fresh hand at the bellows, or I'm much mispetrate the theft. Well, Well, I warn you not to steal the taken; she's getting cursedly uneasy, and kicks like a Captain's pic, unless indeed the breach is very practicable: young horse,'

a sea literally running mountains high; but the India-me to keep the secret." man behaved extremely well, and climbed over the rolling waves as if replete with instinct. The fleet were scatter-laughing; " but come, Grummett, it is evident you have ed-each ship taking care of herself, for in bad weather been at the trick before, or how the devil should you bethe exertions for individual safety supersede all other con-come acquainted with the insecurity of the safe." siderations of a general nature; yet occasionally we could "Indeed, Mr. Purvis, you wrong me," replied I, "it see a ship or two on the crest of some enormous billow, was only done to-day, when one of the sodgers fetched

all its fury, but every thing was snug, and the watch the capstan round, that the place might not be seen to having nothing to do, stowed themselves away from the windard ;-it is a most delicious pie, Mr. Purvis!" cold, although ready in an instant to start up and obey "Saw wood, then, my boy," said Purvis; "but avast orders. It was four bells when the forecastle mate (the a minute, here comes Pascoe, he must lend us a hand." sixth), Mr. Purvis, came aft and joined us on the quarterdeck, to windward of the capstan, against which we were basket, which was deposited on the deck, and jammed up standing, and holding on by a rope extended fore and aft. with swabs, and secured by marline to the capstan pauls, "This is a pretty sea-boat, Purvis," said the second officer; whilst a dry boat's sail was sprend to sit upon. "she comes up and falls off with all the grace of a lady gannet."

I really wish the watch was out. D—n all watches, a middle watcher,"—taking his seat—"Quarter-master!"—any body should have mine for a trifle. But, yo"Aye, aye, Sir," answered old Johnson, making the best hoy, reefers, it's past four bells, -where's the goblet and of his way towards us; "I'm close aboard of you, Mr. Al-

this is the middle watch?"

"They waited for orders, I believe," said Allen; "but bear a hand, Pascoe; tell the quartermaster to get his lantern ready, and away down and fetch up the grub; to the veteran, "put that under your jacket, Johnson, this breeze has given me an appetite; can we muster nothing but bread and bees'-wax? I should relish-

"A nice piece of pork pie, Mr. Allen, for instance," weevliy bread and rotten cheese?"

"The flying Dutchman,' says I. 'Silence, fore and would just be enough for a glorious tuck-out; it seemed

"Aye, there's the rub," exclaimed Purvis, feeling the cious morsel close to us and not even to be allowed

"I know where there's one or two bars loose," said I, "Why, young gentleman, what right have you got to "and they may be removed with very little difficulty;

still I warn you against the consequences, though, if you The gale was indeed severe, and the Lady Graves, be should commit such an act of felony, and Grummett will fore night closed in, was lying to under a main-staysail in stand pie-lot, why, I shall expect my full share, to induce

"Me no tieve 'em, me take 'em," returned Purvis,

as her masts and rigging came against the light of the whey to locard, and stove it in with his head. I saw the steward myself bungling at it with a hammer, to make all Mr. Allen had the middle watch, and of course Pascoe fast, whilst the carpenters were battening the hatches and myself shared it with him. The gale still raged in down; but he only made patch-work of it, and so shed

Pascoe appeared with the quartermaster, carrying a

" A good look out, there forud," shouted the officer of of fashion in a ballroom, and tops the seas as easy as a the watch; "keep your eyes unbuttoned upon the poop; do you see any thing of the Commodore's light?" An an-"Yes, she behaves well, Sir," replied Purvis; "but swer in the negative was returned.-" Then here goes for glasses,-the bread-basket and cheese; have you forgot len; the water is out of the drip-stone; I filled the goglet with my own hands,-it's precious cold, and wants a goodish taste of rum to warm it."

" Tail on, then," said Allen, handing a stiff glass of grog 'twill cherish the cockles of your heart, old boy !"

"Well, God bless you, Sir," returned Johnson, taking the glass, and holding it as steady as if the ship had been said Pascoe; "I saw the Captain's steward stow one lying moored to a buoy in the Thames; "God bless you, away last night in this hurricane-house," laying his Sir, my ould heart does get a little frost-bitten by age, Mr. hand upon the safe that was fixed to the drumhead of Allen, and nothing thaws it like a drop of lignum vite, as the capetan; "don't you think it would eat better than the learned calls it. But axing your pardon, Sir, may I share it with black Jackson, there; for though he's ounly a "Hold your tongue, youngster, and don't be speaking knock-kneed negur, and hasn't the discrimmagement of a

Christain, yet there's a natral summut about him as would "Aye, aye," returned I, "her seams are opening very put many a pale face to the blush ?"

him poor niggar for sell him in a West Ingees." " And was you stole, Jackson ?" said Allen compassion-

a sucking mermaid, and away and keep a look out." taking the grog, which disappeared at one gulp, "dis make groaned I again, and "Oh," groaned Pascoe; whilst wo tank you, Sir."

enacting at the capstan-head. "There's the grog and bis-voice that we did not expect to hear, and which we knew cuit, Mr. Purvis," said Puscoe. "The cadets in the steer- to be the Rev. Mr. C ___'s_" Oh," groaned Pascoe. age-there's not one of them snoozing-begged hard to "Then I am resigned," said the worthy elergyman;know how the weather is, and I told them we were past "'thy will be done," and he again composed himself in his all safety, and had got into deep water, the gale was in cot. "What's all this uproar?" shouted Major Campbell; creasing, and Mr. Allen had sent me down for the ship's "is there any danger?" We did not dare to trifle with him

ly," returned Purvis. " Pork pie or cheese, that's the ques. way, and was going down. "And you all in your beds, tion; now, who would gat cheese when he could get pork young men !-- for shame, for shame !-- turn out and see pie?-and if we don't consume it somebody else will, for if you cannot render assistance." " And I will go also,"

little trouble; " they're gone, Mr. Purvis.'

through the aperture. " Here Pascoe, puckalow the dish, sounded through the speaking-trumpet down the comand hand it over to Mr. Allen."

"Ave, ave, Sir," returned Pascoe, "it shall never be said I disobeyed the orders of a superior officer; and now, the companion-ladder, and a desperate struggle took place

the deck. "But there, don't make a noise, but sit down ling down the companion hatch; shricks and yells followand share it out;" and he commenced singing in an under ed, and the cadets rolling over one another, and hallooing

"They say little pigs make very good pork."

The pie was consumed, and a most delicious one it was the grog went round-the empty dish was carefully restored to the safe-the bars were refastened, and the middle watch at an end. The Quarter-master and Pascoe took the basket below, and the latter reported that the cadets were dreadfully alarmed; indeed, the motion of the ship gether, some on their knees, others flat on their faces, was incessant, and the dashing of the waters, and horrible ereaking of bulk-heads, was no very pleasant music to terrified minds. We held a consultation, and I was sent below into the steerage, where I commenced groaning most piteously. " Who's that?" inquired the cadets; "what's

"Matter enough," I replied; "the ship is expected to grannics' knots?" go overboard every minute, and every timber in her will be afloat."

"Lud have mercy upon us !" solemnly ejaculated another, " you don't say so?"

"Oh!" groaned I, "my poor mother!"-a heavy sea struck us at that moment, and gave the Lady Graves a tremendous shaking. "Oh! there it comes-what shall I immediately followed him and found the watch and idlers do? we must go to the bottom."

"Oh dear! there goes my watch out of my cot," muttered a third,-"Oh, the devil, what's this?" (I had pitch son had one bucket, Jackson had another, and I a thirded a wet swab into his bed; "why, here's one the of ship's did we hit the proper time for a wash?"

mops tumbled right through the deck!"

"Most admirably so, Mr. Purvis," replied Pascoe: "the mops tumbled right through the deck!"

fast; I got my foot jammed betwixt a couple of the planks "Drink off your stuff, old man," requested the officer, just now. Oh, ho, it's all over with us!" The men began "Jackson shall have a glass to himself. Come here, Con- to jog the the hand-pumps, and clattering noise added go; why do you call your country the Coast of Guinea?" considerably to the confusion,-"There's the chain-pumps "Ky, Massa Allen," responded the black, "you nebber going, and every one of you must turn out and take a know dat? 'Cause om hab de yellow feber when dey steal spell, though it will only prolong existence for a short time."

"Grummett," exclaimed Pascoe, who now joined me, ately; "well, well, never mind, I don't want to ask questions, "where are you?"-"Oh," grouned I. "Oh, mesmate," -here's something to keep your eyes open, swallow it like continued he, "this is enough to make the stout heart quail! The carpenter has found a hole in the main-hatch-"Aye, aye, Massa Allen," replied the grateful black, way, and there's six feet water in the pumps."-"Oh," a eye crack for see ebery thing in a varsel warld; many could hear the cadets repeating their prayers, and imploring for mercy, and amongst them Beaumgardte was one of During this colloquy on the deck, a different scene was the loudest, " Is there no hope, Mr. Pascoe?" inquired a bible, to read prayers to the watch before we went down." and therefore remained silent, but the cadets loudly voci-" Poor devils, we'll have some sport with them, present. ferated that the ship had sprung a leak in the main-hatchit was made to be caten, and so Grommett, shove out the said the parson. The gale had somewhat lulled, and the sail she had set not keeping her sufficiently steady, the "There they go, Sir," said I, displacing them with very ship rolled heavily to windward, and several seas washed clean over us. The cadets in a body crept out of their "And out comes the pie"; added he, abstracting it cots, and were partly dressed, when Mr. Allen's voice repanion-" Rouse out the idlers, and send them up directly, or she'll roll her keel out!" Away rushed the cadets to for precedency. Pascoe and I renewed our groans louder "Oh you pi-rats!" exclaimed Allen, placing the dish on than before, when a tremendous rush of water came tumbout with all their might, effectually roused every soul in the cabins, and out came Tremenhere. "Quartermaster, a light here!" he called out, and old Johnson speedily made his appearance with a lantern, and was soon followed by Pascoe and myself with another, for we had gone forward and got up the fore-scuttle. The dim rays of the lights showed us the unfortunate cadets, huddled up tosome clinging round each other's neek, and all in the utmost state of terror, soaked to the skin, and not a little bruised in their attempts to get away.

> "Why, what's all this?" exclaimed Tremenherewhat are you doing out of your cots, young gentlemen, and shricking as if old Davy was twisting your necks into

> " Ask the midshipmen, Sir," said Beaumgardte; "they told us the ship was sinking, and-

"Have you stowed away the buckets," whispered Pascoe to old Johnson, and, receiving a knowing wink in reply, he left me to fight it out; but in another instant I heard him hailing, "Grummett, Mr. Allen wants you;" and I setting the close-reefed maintop-sail.

"Did we do it well, Pascoe ?" asked Purvis- "John-som sma all t were and and was to th of th topm guns with and t repea lower water afloat altog gates risk 1 dark, serted helm ness o alone. a mel but k expec the v -un streng teous, lower frigate see if had g when from gradu

cam

Tre

44

T

T

Madra Her science Pascoe paddlin "Th

lately

ever, c

less th

the fle

in our

and en sighted

26th o

licat H

replied out, Sc And gether;

with s ing bu cap up feetly d

VOL.

some squally looks."

all tarred with the same brush, you know."

and finding everything in order, he went below again, glass of rum is acknowledged with the utmost gratitude and turned in.

The next day the gale increased, and the maintopsail to the mainstaysail. Towards evening it lulled, and one pointing to the surf-"surely these logs never came of the ships, a large Chinaman, hoisted her colours at the through sic a foaming surge as that!" topmasthead, union downwards, whilst the reports of her with the howling of the storm. She lay to leeward of us, altogether: but look at that fellow yonder, see what a and the frigate was about two miles to windward. We rate he's going at by means of clock-work." repeated the signal and bore up, and the man-of-war followed the example. We found the Chinaman was making on a catamaran, which was running along at a rapid water very fast, and the captain, fearful of not keeping her rate, without any visible cause for its motion. affoat through the night, was desirous of quitting her altogether: his boats were in readiness, ours and the fri-shall; "there must be great ingenuity vera badly ap-gates were also sent; and after much labour and great plied?" risk we succeeded in taking out every living soul before dark, without any material accident happening. The deserted ship, under a close-reefed maintopsail, with her helm lashed a-lee, formed an object for careful watchfulgradually settled down, and the proud ship that had so some of the people.

lately stemmed the waves, in a few minutes disappeared for We were soon surrounded by boats from the men-of-science," exclaimed Marshall, "what do you call them, mother's arms, and with both his parents conveyed across out, Scotchman !"

gether; light, active men, their black bodies whitened family fond of monstrosities (and a black servant was with saline particles from the briny element, no cover-considered a curiosity in those days), and was baping but a cloth round their loins, and a pointed straw tized in a very public manner by no less a personage cap upon each head in which they convey letters per-than a bishop, but disliking the livery, he took to the feetly dry and safe. Those who have never witnessed ocean, and became a thorough seaman. All ships or VOL. MXVIII, PEBRUARY, 1836 .- 21.

cadets made sure it was all over with them when the water it can form no conception of the rude construction of came pouring down, and they roared so loud, that Mr. these catamarans, and the immense surf they have to Tremenbere turned out, and I am afraid we shall have pass through, and I have seen them, when the ships have been riding with lower yards and topmasts struck, "Never mind-away to duty now, and show yourselves bring off a communication from the shore as clean and smart," said Purvis; "it will soon blow over, and we are as dry as when first placed in their hands, although tarred with the same brush, you know." they have been repeatedly buried beneath the huge waves.

The chief-mate came on deck; but Pascoe and myself that rolled over them. Yet they perform this for a very were in the main-top. He said a few words to Mr. Allen, trifling remuneration, and the gift of a biscuit and a they will even dance for it.

"Aweel, Pascoe," said Marshall, "but them's strange was once more handed, so that we were, as before, reduced ootlandish beings anyhow, and yon's a wondrous sight,"

"Not a bit of it," replied Pascoe; "they've an underguns as signals of distress were faintly heard mingling ground tunnel beneath the surf, so that they escape it

We both looked, and saw a man squatting very steady

"And whereaboots is the machinery?" inquired Mar-

"You'll see his machinery presently, Mr. Marshall,"

ness during the night; and the consideration that she was menced hauling upon a line which increased the speed of alone, without succour, on the wide waters carried with it his long barque, which suddenly twisted round and went a melancholy interest. Her captain never quitted the deck, off in another direction; in a short time, however, we obbut kept his eyes almost constantly fixed upon the craft, served him pull up a large fish, which, by its back fin, I expecting every moment to be her last. Towards morning knew to be a shark, and whilst on the surface he slacked the weather moderated, and the Chinaman was still affoat his line and struck the monster a heavy blow with his —unmanned and unmanaged, she had weathered the paddle, and off it flew again, dragging the catamaran strength of the gale. Daylight at length broke-a beau-nearly under water. Several times he repeated the operateous, gorgeous, redflushed daylight,-and the boats were tion of getting the creature within his reach and battering lowered down and manned, pursuant to a signal from the it with his paddle, till at last it became exhausted, and then frigate, for the purpose of returning to the China ship to he dexterously brought his logs alongside of us, and assistsee if anything could be done to save her. The flotilla ance was given him to secure his prize. It was a ground had got about half a cable's length from its destination, shark, about nine feet in length, with a tremendous pair when the bows of the immense fabric were seen to recede of jaws, and as the poor fellow could not well carry it from the wind-her stern rose high in the air, her head ashore, he proffered it for sale, and it was purchased by ever, carrying with her a cargo which could not be worth war and the homeward bound ships, all anxious for intelless than eighty thousand pounds. The boats returned, ligence; and whilst the certainty of war inspirited to naval the fleet was collected together, and the wind coming round force, the probability of being captured produced a diffe-in our favour, we soon quitted this inhospitable climate, rent effect amongst the crews of the Indiamen. An officer and enjoyed a fine run through the Mozambique Channel, from the senior captain's ship came on board to press, and sighted, Point de Galle, in the island of Ceylon; on the twelve of our best men were taken, amongst whom was 26th of August made St. Thomas's Mount and the Pul-black Jackson. To him, however, it was a matter of inlicat Hills; and on the following morning moored ship in difference—he had no relatives—no bonds—no kindred to Madras roads, about two miles from the shore.

Here a world of wonders opened upon us. "Ma con-kidnapped on the coast of Africa when an infant in his Pascoe?" pointing to a catamaran that two natives were the Atlantic to Jamaica. His father had received the paddling off.

"They're a couple of devils playing at single-stick," the boy was known as Jack's son, hence arose the cogname of Jack from the planter who purchased him, and replied Pascoe; "they'll be alongside directly-so look nomen he had assumed of Jackson. His parents died, t, Scotchman."

and the lad contrived to get to England and draw the And alongside they came on their logs lashed to-breath of freedom. At first he became a domestic in a

of him I never heard.

own safety, as for the lives of those individuals intrusted must take our chance." to his care. Accidents, wholly unavoidable, would frequenttinction for saving a certain number of lives.

his quarters, where we re-dressed and made ourselves fit but where or when I had heard it I could not recollect, to appear in public. We dined with him, and afterwards and every time he spoke my thoughts became more and services were alike to him, if he had but a good com- went out for a stroll through the streets; and I remember being much struck with the immense number of shops Here Major Campbell and his detachment left us, as and stalls for the sale of confections and sweetmeats. The did also several of the cadets, some of whom subsequently sounds of music attracted us to a large building, which rose to eminence, but the principal portion of them were we entered without hesitation, and the overpowering brilexpended during their initiation in servitude in this baleful liancy of light within nearly blinded us. It was a temple climate, and not a few by yielding to intemperance at the of idolatry nearly filled with worshippers, who on seeing mess-table. The seconds to the two young men, Prideaux us uttered the most deafening shouts, and some of the naand Deschartes, were put under confinement to take their tives taking us by the arms, we were hurried before the trial on a charge of murder, and they were in prison when altar of as misshapen and hideous a figure as imagination we sailed but; I afterwards learned that one of them died could possibly conceive. It was a gigantic beastly crealiterally of a broken heart before the day of ordeal came ture, yet possessing something like human features, to on, the other was acquitted of murder, and as no second-ary charge was made he was released, but what became description to do adequate justice; and the votaries of this monstrous specimen of indecency, either labouring under The appearance of Madras from the roads is extremely intoxication or the effects of opium, were throwing their picturesque, and I longed to obtain liberty to visit the bodies into the vilest contortions and attitudes that licenshore, which after a few days was obtained, and accomtiousness could suggest. Utterly disgusted with the specpanied by Pascoe we bargained with a Massoolah boat to tacle, I requested Pascoe to quit the place, but he seemed land us. These boats in shape strongly resemble a walnut-shell; the planks are sewed together by rope made lessness of manner which I knew he did not feel. Again from the husk of the cocoa-nut, and are quite light, car- I urged him to depart; for the infuriated and maniac rying from four to six rowers and a steersman. They are countenance of the worshippers began to excite a considerhigh out of the water, and the oars are formed of a long able degree of alarm, but Paseoe whispered me, "For the pole with a flat circular or oval piece of wood at the outer love of heaven, remain quiet, and do not display the smallextremity. The men went off merrily from alongside, est semblance of fear! We cannot return if we would, singing their accustomed tune to keep time with their as you may convince yourself if you look round—not at oars. As they approached the surf, which was white with this moment though, lest they should suspect—we have feathery foam, their voices were more subdued and the ut-entered against orders into this infernal den, and must terance much quicker; indeed the terrific appearance of make the best of it-the fellows know their advantage, those ever-rolling surges must have an influence over the and we shall probably be plundered if not murdered, but most courageous boatman, possibly not so much for his take care of your dirk and stand firm by my side-we

I took an opportunity of stealing a glance towards the ly occur, but the catamarans were constantly dancing over great doors, and the dense crowd between us and the place these raging billows, and handsome rewards were given by of retreat convinced me, in a moment, of the futility of the Company for rescuing persons from drowning; and attempting an escape; whilst the shouting, shricking, yellmany of these naked heroes were round their necks a ing, and laughing of these frantic blacks, on whom the handsome silver chain and badge as an honourable dis- dazzling glare from immense lamps shed a red hue, gave something of an idea of the infernal regions, with Belzebub The first surf that took us came bubbling and hissing presiding at a public meeting. The scenes we witnessed along curling its fleecy head, and it was not without a that night are not fit to meet the eye in print; debauchery sickening sensation of apprehension that I saw the boat and every evil passion triumphed to a degree of hellish laid nearly broadside to it. Pascoe laughed and I tried to wickedness; several times I felt attempts to get my dirk do the same, but it was no go. The sea struck us and from mc, but I held it fast, and both of us received personal the spray flew many feet above our heads, but the Mas- insults of a gross nature. Still we had brought it upon soolah boat rose like a cork upon the summit of the surge, ourselves, and to get away by compulsion was impossible. which rushed on towards the beach, and we were again We made an effort to pass through the crowd, but were floating on comparatively smooth water; the song was instantly repulsed, and the overpowering odours of burning resumed, though not so loud as at first, whilst the watch- sandal wood, together with the excessive heat, were fast ful eye of the steersman kept a sharp look-out for the next exhausting our strength; a sickening faintness came over me, and I should have fallen—when suddenly the noise exerted their utmost skill and strength to get inshore so ceased, and looking round to ascertain the cause, I saw an as to avoid its extreme fury; their voices emitted a low officer, with a detachment of soldiers, standing within the hissing quick noise, pronouncing the word "Aysa," which had a curious effect on the ear, as the sound very much that was poured upon them. The officer beckoned us to apresembled that which was caused by the commotion of proach, and no hinderance was now thrown in our way, the waters, as if the men were holding mysterious com-so that we were soon enabled to join the detachment and munion with the spirits of the raging element. Again we retire. For this timely release we were indebted to a serwere lifted up and borne along with amazing rapidity in jeant, who had seen us enter, and being aware of the nature the midst of foam and spray and threatened death, for the of the temple, had lost no time in going to the fort, and boat nearly rolled over when on the curling top of the sea, informing the officer of the guard, who sent a subaltern and was half filled, to the great detriment of our white with a party of men, to prevent mischief. We expressed trowsers and uniform coats. At length, after two or three our warm acknowledgments to the officer for his timely repetitions, we got safely on land; and Major Campbell, assistance, and his reply recalled sensations that I could who had been watching our approach, kindly invited us to not account for; his voice was quite familiar to my ear,

On r

pli far

tai

me

ger

due

did

beir Mr.

by-

now

my of h

Jene

trip

in fa

1

Muc Quot E

M wheth negled the sie clever Stephe

he ke

went v There sheep, heeded redden respect he fled

" Th of Do

we have met somewhere before ;- may I request the favour serts, he reverences her steps: he greets herof your name?"

"The name is unknown to you, Mr. Grummett," he re- the yet meeker, the gentler shepherdess?" plied; "you may see we are old acquaintances by my familiarity and the knowledge I retain of your person."

tainly my name, and you evidently know me. memory is at fault, for I cannot recollect you."

gentleman," answered he, "but to-morrow you must favour feeds the geese; Eve presses the cheese." me with a visit; I shall then be off duty, and will introduce you to another old acquanintance-a lady who has reveres her-he bent the knee where her feet pressed the never forgotten you since the separation at St. Jago."

"It is Mrs. Jennings!" I exclaimed, "and you are-

"Her husband," replied he, "but the name of Jennings Mr. Grummett, but perhaps it would be as well to suffer heedless jests. Be led there, sweet Eve!" by-gones to be by-gones, except between ourselves. I shall call upon you in the morning, and your friends will accom. where he dwells-we entered the cell-we begged the pany you to breakfast with me. There is the tavern; and decreenow, good night."

I grasped his hand with true friendship, briefly expressed my gratification at meeting with him, and the brightening of his prospects, and we parted for the night. It was the He rendered the decree, see here the sentence decreed." Jennings whom I have noticed so copiously in my first trip as corporal and serjeant, but now a lieutenant, and high were these :

in favour as a clever officer.

From the Keepsake, for 1836.

WRITTEN IN 1824,

On reading five Spanish novels,* each omitting throughout one vowel in the alphabet, and a sixth containing one vowel only.

BY LORD HOLLAND.

Much trouble it costs to pen stories like these-Quoth a punster, " How so? they are written with Ees."

EVE'S LEGEND.

E servem lex est, legemne tenere necesse est? Spes certé nec mens, me referente, deest; Sed lege, et ecce Even nentemve gregemve tenentem Perlege, nec me res edere rere leves.

MEN were never perfect; yet the three brethren Veres ere ever esteemed, respected, revered, even when the rest whether the select few, whether the mere herd, were left neglected.

The eldest's vessels seek the deep, stem the element, get sence: the keen Peter, when free, wedded Hester Greenthe slender, stern, severe, erect Hester Green. The next, clever Ned, less dependent, wedded sweet Ellen Heber,-Stephen, ere he met the gentle Eve, never felt tenderness ; he kept kennels, bred steeds, rested where the deer fed, went where green trees, where fresh breezes greeted sleep. There he met the meek, the gentle Eve—she tended her the appearance of certain productions, so it is in the world sheep, she ever neglected self—she never heeded pelf, yet she of trade. The snow-drop announces the approaching heeded the shepherds even less. Nevertheless her cheek spring; the Annuals indicate the coming book season. The reddened when she met Stephen-yet decent reserve, meek spring may be long delayed, or the weather continue so respect, tempered her speech, even when she shewed tender. wild and bleak that January may seem to change into ness. Stephen felt the sweet effect-he felt he erred when June; but the flower, at all events, assures us that the more confused. "You will perhaps pardon me, Sir," said tender. She, he reflects, never deserved neglect; she never I, "for being inquisitive, but I cannot help thinking that vented spicen—he esteems her gentleness, her endless de-

" Tell me whence these meek, these gentle sheep, whence

"Well bred, we were eke better fed, ere we went where reckless men seek fleeces. There we were fleeced. Need "I am much puzzled," returned I, "Grummett is certhen rendered me shepherdess—need renders me sempsnly my name, and you evidently know me. Yet my tress. See me tend the sheep—see me sew the wretched shreds. Eve's need preserves the steers, preserves the sheep; "That hole of iniquity has shook your nerves, young Eve's needle mends her dresses, hems her sheets; Eve

> Her speech melted Stephen, yet he nevertheless esteems, green-he blessed her, he begged, he pressed her.

"Sweet-sweet Eve, let me wed thee; be led where Hester Green, where Ellen Heber, where the brethern Vere did not belong to us, and I have taken my proper one on dwell. Free cheer greets thee there, Ellen's glees sweeten being reinstated in rank. I am not ashamed of the past, the refreshment, there severer Hester's decent reserve checks

"Never-we well remember the Seer. We went

'Where, whenever, when, 'twere well Eve be wedded-Eld Seer, tell!'

Then she presented Stephen the Seer's decree. The verses

"Ere the green reed be red, Sweet Eye never wed; Ere be green the red cheek, Never wed thee, Eve meek."

The terms perplexed Stephen, yet Stephen jeered the terms; he resented the senseless credence; "Seers ever err." Then he repented, knelt, wheedled, wept. Eve sees Stephen kneel-she relents, yet frets when she remembers the Seer's decree-her dress redeems her. These were the events :-

Her well kempt tresses fell well; sedges, reeds, bedecked them. The reeds fell, the edges met her cheeksher cheeks bled. She presses the green sedge where her cheek bleeds. Red then bedewed the green reed—the green reed then speckled her red cheek. The red cheek seems green—the green reed seems red. these were e'en the terms the Eld Seer decreed—Stephen weds Eve.

HERE ENDETH THE LEGEND.

WHEN?

SEPTEMBER THE SEVENTEENTH.

From the Speciator.

LITERATURE OF THE ANNUALS.

As stated epochs are marked in the natural world by he fied the sex, yet felt he defenceless when Eve seemed worst of the winter is gone. So, a slackness may still be felt in the publishing world ere books become as plenty as "These specimens of laborious idleness are the work the contemporaneous blossoms; but the lot of Annuals on our table proves that the season of 1835 is ended.

Peace be with it,—and turn we to the harbingers of the the gallant picador galloped to the assault; the contest was coming year. Of these, the Landscope Annual first chal-renewed with various fortune. Half the morning had a happier mood than on the present occasion. The pro- president's signal was displayed. vince of Spain which Mr. Roberts this year illustrates by his exactly faithful pencil, is Andalusia; and Mr. Roscoe prince of Seville's matadores, prepared for the last scene. has done what he can to give additional interest to the Throwing off his cloak, with a light fearless step he walkglowing scenes or gorgoous Morisco structures presented ed up till within six yards, and directly faced the bull. In in the plates. What is called the romantic has given place one hand he bore a little red banner, in the other a short to what is called the real. A coup d'ail of Andalusian, or and broad sword. They stood some minutes surveying rather Spanish history, is presented to the reader, from the each other; for the bull's eye was evidently upon him, first arrival of the Saracenic conquerers till the expulsion and his fixed as steadfastly on that of the bull. After the of the Mahommedan race, and incidentally down to the feats he had witnessed, Pepchillo felt he had undertaken seige of Gibraltar. With these more comprehensive sub- no trivial task. Instead of provoking him, he stood on jects, are intermingled historical anecdotes, descriptions of his guard, and left the honour of the attack entirely to his scenery and customs, and a scattering of information on foe. At this moment the intense interest of the beholders useful things. As regards variety of matter, therefore, was wound up to a degree of pain; for it was felt that the there is nothing to complain of; but something of fresh-ness, spirit, and connexion of design is wanting. Mr. bull, and called the matedor too carly into play. He stood Roscor has never seen the spots he writes about; he appartly concealed by the red flag, so that the bull could see pears to have thought that to give the great masses of history would have been too formal and weighty for his work at his man; who, quick as thought, wheeled half round, and he had not room to involve its romance.

of what should have been a tour, are Cordova, Seville, As he bore down on him again, the matador levelled his Xeres, and Cadiz, we proceed to glean a few extracts.

CARTHUSIAN STRICTNESS.

(the monastery of the Cartuja), except female royalty; and behind, and knowing the wound was mortal, did not rethe present Queen honoured the brotherhood with a visit. peat the blow. But ere they came to his aid, while in the A monk attended, and marked each slab upon which her act of withdrawing his sword, the bull, as if endued with seet rested; and they were carefully removed and replaced new life, sprang up and dashed him to the earth, falling by others.

DEATH OF TWO HEROES.

The fate of the great matador, Pepehillo, the boast of Seville, was caused by the last sudden effort of an expiring bull,-a powerful animal of the old Ronda breed, ferocious as he was cunning. With the punica fides of the old Carthaginian, he pretended to be dead before he was, and gored his adversary after the latter had believed that he cheerful. Autumn was stealing, not striding over the hibited their skill to the astonishment of the whole arena. picture as she sat within the window of her father's house. The hero of Ronda had charged the band of picadores no less than ten times, slain two, and killed four of their pet beneath a verandah that was curtained by clustering horses: in the first, by a dextrous turn of the bridle-hand vines: the elder of them had filled a basket with the rich and right leg, the rider evaded the shock; but in the seclusters of the purple grape, and held it up, a double tempcond, he bore horse and rider to the ground. The former tation to the little Miriam and a bounding, beautiful greyrose no more, and his master lay perfectly motionless on bound, the pet and torment of the family. Kate Morison, the his side, as his sole hope of escape. A thrilling silence tempter, would not, however, suffer either of them to touch a ensued; but the suspense lasted only a few moments, single grape until she had first presented the basket to Rachel; The spectators rose; but the instant the bull, having des. indeed, her youthful sisters loved Rachel dearly,-and loved patched the horse, prepared to gore the rider, the chicles, her the more, for that the rese was fading from her cheek, rushing with loud cries, waving their scarlet cloaks, threw and her lips seldom smiled as was their custom in former themselves between him and his victim. Springing from times .- I have often observed that the love of children inthe ground, the picader vaulted on another steed; while creases with the illness of a friend or companion,-a beauthe bull, darting upon the foot champions, pursued them tiful illustration of the disinterested nature of true love. across the ring so closely, that the last man appeared to plant his foot upon his head as he cleared the outer pali. The doctor said you might eat grapes." sade. Mr. Townsend observes, that he thought it was literally the case, such was the flying leap he took over you should not have tempted Miziam and Nina with them." the barrier. A tremendous shout of applause proclaimed "Oh!" replied Kate, laughing, "I love to tempt themthe heroc's safety; and, master of the ring, the bull, in. to teaze them a little; it does them good." stead of skulking round the sides, answered with a roar of defiance as he resumed his station in the centre. Again quoting from the Holy Scriptures on trivial occasions, but lenges attention, by the weight of its name, the unity of clapsed; ten horses had been successively disabled; the its subject, and the reputation of its editor,-although we noble bull, sore beset and wounded, yet remained dauntless have met Mr. Roscon with a more congenial theme and in as before, when the bugles sounded the death-note, and the

and the enraged beast passed under his banner, but reco-Observing that the cities which form the principal points vered himself for a fresh charge without receiving a hurt. sword at the left side of the bull's neck, and turning sharply round, hit the exact line, and ran the steel up to the very hilt. The animal staggered and fell on his knees; and No female is allowed to pollute the sanctity of the spot the matador, calling for the poniards of his attendants from at the same moment a lifeless heap upon the sand.

From the New Monthly Magazine.

THE TEMPTATION OF RACHEL MORISON.

It was a clear, sunny September morning-bright and ad given him the coup de grace. Both had that day ex. landscape, and Rachel Morison looked out upon a joyous

Her two younger sisters had spread a richly-fringed car-

"There is a bunch, Rachel,-a bunch fit for a queen!

"Thank you, dear Kate; they are very fine indeed; but

"No, I do not think so," said Rachel, "I am not fond of

But of bl Y them Kath and v a bel that ! and p mony

Li

4 te

you and

ten

row alre

1

she

crep

win

who tere

Was

Her

were muc

to fe

vent and h lacera queat fate n you must remember we pray not to be led into temptation; She laid a few leaves of paper upon her table, fairly and and, Kate, looking on the temptation with which you tempt. plainly written; and Kate retrimmed her lamp, and flung

"What, sister?"

"Upon my own!"

"Yours, Rachel! I did not tempt you with grapes?"

"Grapes!" repeated Rachel Morison, smiling, though young girl's trials are of the heart. there was sadness in the smile. " No, not with grapes ;-yet I have had my temptation."

"What was it, sister?"

"I will tell you when you are old enough to understand its nature."

"But I am old enough, Rachel. I shall be seven next month. Perhaps, sister, you were tempted to tell a story?"

" No."

"To wear tight shoes at the dancing lesson?"

" No !"

leave ?"

" No."

" To ride the kicking pony?"

rows which have planted and watered the willows that are such. already growing over my early grave."

felt her heart sad within her. A little time, and the sharp many, amiable qualities, was, nevertheless, deficient in the to feel and to tell how truly she missed-

"The glancing of her sister's eye, The waving of her hair, The footsteps lightly gliding by, The hand so small and fair."

of black frocks and a crape bonnet.

them, we think they pass as quickly. The retrospect of less in his expressions, though he gave me no reason to both is nearly the same; but the prospect, how different! suppose that he was guilty of infidelity. I wanted the Katherine Morison had completed her seventeenth year, courage, and, in truth, the Christian knowledge, to combat and was already arrived at the dangerous distinction of being his assertions; and for a long time, I sheltered myself una belle and a beauty. She had almost ceased to remember der the hope, almost the belief, that he did but jest! And that her sister, whose once beautiful form was now part awful as it was, still it was a comfort, a coward's comfort, and parcel of the earth wherein it lay, left a "written testi-truly, that has no truth for its foundation. My dear momony" of her trials; that she laid open her heart's feelings, ther, too, trembled while she prayed for my happiness; but hopes and disappointments for her advantage; that, to pre- my father thought of the splendor of the alliance, and revent her sister's tears, she had re-shed her own-for she had joiced therein. torn afresh wounds which time had comparatively healed, "The time approached for our union, and the care, atand had again counted the drops of blood distilled from her tention, and tenderness of my affianced husband made me lacerated heart. "My blessed child." said her mother, almost forget what then I had hardly time to think upon "have you forgotten poor Rachel's legacy?-how she be- amid the congratulations, and preparations, and the festiqueathed you the knowledge of her 'temptation,' that your vals that were to celebrate our marriage. Every one, too, fate might not be as hers?

ed your little sister and the pretty hound, made me the garland from her brow, that she might read the story of think ——"

"A woman, Kate !-- a young unmarried woman's trials are generally of the affections; -trials of temper-trials of judgment-trials of powers-come afterwards; but a

"I hope that you have not yet understood what it is to love; unless, indeed, you love what is lovely,-lovely not only for time, but for eternity. The impression made on a young heart may be considered light; and yet, Katherine, it is long-oh, how long !- before it wears out : I found it so. You know the pains my dear mother ever took to impress upon us our religious duties; to teach us Christ allin-all sufficient; and to manifest our faith by our works. I fear me that I trusted too much to my own strength-that I thought too much of my own acquirements,-The pains "To go into the garden and gather cherries without bestowed on my education made me superior to my companions, but not, alas! superior to myself. The remembrance of your sister-of the once living reality of her who pens these lines, will, before you read them, have faded to "Indeed, my Kate, you need not attempt to find out an outlined vision. You will remember a thin, pale girl, Listen to me; if it pleases God that I live until you have who loved flowers and music, and for whom you gathered completed your seventeenth year, I will relate to you my the finest grapes, and the thought of her will bring back 'temptation;' if-listen to me, Katharine-I am taken from her last kiss, her white brow, her dead hand, the neveryou into the world of spirits before you attain the beauty to-be-forgotten touch of death!-the tears-a mother's and incur the dangers of womanhood, I will leave a writ- precious tears :- and then the funeral. Ay, my beloved ten testimony that may warn you how to avoid the sor- sister, all will be as a vision; but we may learn wisdom from

" I did think too highly of my acquirements, and practiced Kate did not quite understand what her sister meant, but them more for the sake of display, than a desire to give she saw that her eyes were filled with tears, and so she pleasure. They attracted the attention of one who, poscrept silently to her side, and looked up into her face, and sessed of much beauty, much talent, and some-indeed winds of an unusually cold spring sent (the physician said) great requisites for domestic-much less Christian-happoor Rachel Morison to an early grave. There was one piness. For a time, we were as two gay butterflies sportwho knew otherwise, -who knew that the iron had en-ling in the sunshine; I learnt to see with his eyes, to hear tered her soul, and festered in its core, and that her body with his ears, to feel his feelings, to live but in his presence; was too delicate to withstand the struggles of her mind. and yet I hardly knew it-was not that strange? One of Her mother closed her eyes, and sorrowed over her bier, - the mysteries of love; perpetually denying his influence but not as one having no hope, for her last blessed words with my lips, lying to my own heart, practicing self-dewere, "I know that my Redeemer liveth!" There was ception, but, however, I might have succeeded in deceiving much mourning in the bereaved dwelling. Kate was able myself, I did not, could not, deceive him. He knew his power, and while he loved me-(Ah! Kate, take my experience with you in the world, and remember that while men talk of love, women feel it)-loved me, he believed, well, yet endeavoured to laugh at my 'amiable weaknesses,' 'early prejudices,' want of worldly knowledge.' Such he termed, in honied words, woman's best and surest safe-But little Miriam soon forgot her trouble in the excitement guard, her refuge, her hope, her shield and buckler. At first I was alarmed, but he never wounded my feelings. Years pass, as well as months; and when we review Day by day, secure of my affections, he became more care-assured me how certain I was of happiness, and I endea-

the dew drops, and the air was heavy with perfume; my cross; but the film had been graciously removed from everything was hushed and silent-even the song of the mine eyes-he was an acknowledged infidel, regarding the bird was tempered in its sweetness; and I prayed-oh! holy ordinances of religion mummeries. Could I look up how fervently prayed, that I might-that we might together to select such a one as my guide through life? My father find 'the way, the truth, and the life.'

what one of them would have given worlds I never had two.

lowed!

despise? I would not do it for any woman upon earth?'

away from this, she will get rid of all her early prejudices, not be led into temptation; for once being led therein, by and become one of the world; her mind is comprehensive, the vanities, the pleasures, or the riches of life, our escape and her love for me will tend to teach her the superiority is doubtful, and our trial great." of rational over formal religion?

once a month-a pretty prospect of domestic felicity!"

" Psha-you do not suppose that my present life is a she gleaned from the "Temptation of Rachel Morison." type of what is to come? No, no; I do not intend to be canonized under the denomination of Saint Alfred, but it pleases her, and believe me she is not half as bad as she was. I remember when she would not read a newspaper on Sunday !"

" Is it possible ?"

overwhelmed me. The blessed sacrament to be termed more than eighteen months since I had quitted their house "mummery"—the man for whom I lived and prayed to at Richmond, and I was very anxious to know what reexult that my religion was declining-to plan its destruc- ception I might have. I followed the servant up stairs, tion! I do not ask you to pity me now, because my trans- and when he opened the door, walked in, as my name was gressions have been pardoned-my race run-my sorrows announced. ceased their troubling-my spirit found its rest!-but Lady de Clare rose in haste, so did Cecilia, and so did

Temptation was with me still. I knew that Alfred's at-tentions had been unremitting—that he had watched over I never felt more awkwardly, and I believe my feelings me—they said he had prayed for me. Oh! to whom was were reciprocated by the whole party. I was evidently de he to pray? his people were not my people, his God not trop.

voured to-yes, I did-believe it. I gave myself up to the my God. And yet I loved him-loved him in my heart of intexication of an unsanctified hope, and I fought against hearts-prayed for him, Kete; I pray for him still-at my doubts and Christian terrors; it was to be the LAST morn-at midnight-by the way side-and in secret; his Sunday before our marriage, and we were to take the name is on my lips !-- in my heart! My mother, though sacrament together. He had agreed with so much seem she knew by bitter experience that two can never be as ing pleasure that we should do so, that I hailed it is a happy one, except in the Lord-she almost wished me to perform omen; and on that memorable Sabbath morning entered my contract—she feared that, though the spirit was willing, a bower whose roses and jessamine had been twined by the flesh was weak-and she talked of the believing wife HIS hands-which made them doubly dear to me. It was saving the unbelieving husband. It might be so; and had a bright and balmy day-the sprays were bending beneath I married, believing that he believed, I would have borne spurned me from him-talked of the lands which I had "I had escaped from the tumult of company to com. lost-the station I had cast away? My bride's maids mune with my own heart, and HE, to 'whom all hearts are mourned that their splendid dresses could not be worn ; open, knows, that I prayed more for him than for myself, and you, Kate, a little fairy of five years old, wept bitterly Suddenly, the church-bell sounded in my ears its blessed the loss of cake. But oh! when he, the loved one, promised summons. I was pushing back the silver stars of a clus. to be all I desired-said that I could save him from the tering jessamine that curtained the arbour's entrance, when destruction into which he would surely plunge if I did not I saw the object of my prayer coming towards me; per. share his name—then came my worst temptation—then, haps I would not have drawn back had he been alone, but then, I felt how bitter it was to remember that he who had an intimate friend, who was to have been his brideman, deceived me once might repeat the deception! They tell was with him, and I shrank beneath the shade. As they us we ought to forget the faults of those we love; I found approached, they laughed and talked together, and I heard remembering their perfections the most dangerous of the

"Enough! we parted. He said, 'If his life, if his "'The Sacrament will take up so much time, that I opinions, became really religious, would I marry him?' I cannot meet you as I intended.' This sentence attracted said, 'Yes.' He went forth again into the world, and he my attention; though when indeed did he speak that I forgot me-I remained in my own home-I forgot not was not attentive? Oh, how I shuddered at what fol. him. His career has been thoughtless, brilliant, and extravagant-he has grown of the world, wordly; while I "'Then, why do you go? Why submit to what you have found rest, and peace, and hope, -- and ere long, ere you have read these pages, shall have been made immortal. "I would do more than that for Rachel, but when once Oh, then, beloved Katherine, let your prayer be, 'Let me

Bitterly did Katherine weep over the records of a life "'To have a preaching wife-to be obliged to go to which was terminated before twenty summers had stamped church, sing psalms on Sundays, and take the sacrament the perfection of beauty on her brow, but I am happy to record, that Kate was saved much misery by the wis

From the Metripolitan.

hide

an

per

Pia

WO my

JAPHET IN SEARCH OF A FATHER.

(CONTINUED FROM LAST VOL.)

" Fact-upon my honor. Now she is getting better Having finished my letters, I set off to Park street, to and better; - I must tolerate the mummery till we are call upon Lady de Clare and Cecilia. It was rather early, but the footman who opened the door recognised me, and "Kate, Kate, I heard no more. A torrent of bitterness I was admitted upon his own responsibility. It was now then, or rather when restored to perfect consciousness, you a third person, whom I had not expected to have met— would have pitied me. Harcourt. "Mr. Newland," exclaimed Lady de Clare, "For weeks I could not leave my bed; the delirium of "this is indeed unexpected." Cecilia also came forward, brain fever for a time spared me worse agonies, but the blushing to the forehead. Harcourt held back, as if wait-

" Do you know Mr. Harcourt?" at last said Lady de mind, and I was making comparisons between Cecilia de Clare

I, " I certainly do."

"It is a long while since we met," observed Cecilia, who felt it necessary to say something, but at the same formality. time did not like to enter upon my affairs before Harcourt.

pleased at my reception; " but I have been fortunate since you".

say, in what?-but did not like to ask the question.

"There is no one present who is not well acquainted with my history," observed I, "that is, until the time to create mystery. I have at last discovered my father."

"I hope we are to congratulate you, Mr. Newland," said Lady de Clare.

"As far as respectability and family are concerned, I certainly have no reason to be ashamed," replied I. "He is the brother of an earl, and a general in the army. His name I will not mention until I have seen him, and I am formally and openly acknowledged. I have also the advantage of being an only son, and if I am not disinherited, heir to considerable property," continued I, smiling sarcastically. "Perhaps I may now be better received than I have been as Japhet Newland the Foundland; but Lady de Clare, I am afraid that I have intruded unseasonably, out waiting for a reply, I made a hasty retreat, and gained the door.

and my arm was caught by Cecilia de Clare. I turned though not a favourable one, of expressing what I con-

tear stood in her eye.

"What have we done Japhet, that you should treat us in this manner?" said she, with emotion.

make. I perceived that my presence was not welcome, allowed to prove to you that I am not deserving of the coldness with which I am now received. Mr. Newland, and I would no further intrude."

"Are you then so proud, now that you have found out that you are well born, Japhet?"

"I am much too proud to intrude where I am not wished for Miss de Clare. As Japhet Newland, I came here to distress to those who are bound to you, not only by gratisee the Fleta of former days. When I assume my real tude, but sincere regard." name, I shall always be most happy of an introduction to the daughter of Lady de Clare."

blues eyes upon me.

the hall to the door.

perceived that Cecilia's handkerchief was held to her eyes, after her coming down stairs to me to expostulate. They Piazza in no pleasent humour. I was angry and disgust resentment, I rendered the obligations more onerous. ed at the coolness of my reception. I thought myself It was unkind of me-and I wished that Harcourt had ill-used, and treated with ingratitude. "So much for the not left the room. As for his conduct, I tried to find world," said I, as I sat down in my apartment, and spun fault with it but could not. It was gentlemanly and my hat on the table. "She has been out two seasons, feeling. The fact was, I was in a very bad hu-and is no longer the same person. Yet how lovely she mour, and could not, at the time, discover the reason has grown! But why this change—and why was Har-which was neither more nor less than that I was more court there? Could be have prejudiced them against me? jealous of finding Harcourt so intimate at Lady de Very possibly." While these ideas were running in my Clare's than I was at the unpalatable reception which I

Clare and Susannah Temple-not much in favour of the "If it is the Mr. Harcourt that I once knew," replied former-and looking forward prospectively to the meeting with my father, the doubts as to my reception into so-"Believe me it is the same, Newland," said Harcourt, ciety, colouring every thing with the most sombre tints, coming to me, and offering his hand, which I took with the door opened, and in walked Harcourt, announced by the waiter.

"A chair for Mr. Harcourt," said I to the waiter, with

"Newland," said Harcourt, "I come for two reasons; in "It is Miss de Clare," replied I, for I was not exactly the first place, I am commissioned by the ladies, to assure

I had the pleasure of seeing you last."

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Harcourt, for interrupting you, but I require no ambassador from the ladies in question. They may make you their confident if they please, but I am not at all inclined to do the same. Explanation, after what I witnessed and felt this morning, is quite unnecessary. that I left you and Lady de Clare, and I have no wish I surrender all claims upon either Lady de Clare or her daughter, if I ever was so foolhardy as to imagine that I had any. The first reason of your visit it is therefore useless to proceed with. May I ask the other reason which has procured me this honour?"

> "I hardly know," Mr. Newland, replied Harcourt, colouring deeply, " whether, after what you have now said, I ought to proceed with the second-it related to myself."

> "I am all attention, Mr. Harcourt," replied I, bowing

" It was to say, Mr. Newland, that I should have taken the earliest opportunity after my recovery, had you not and will now take my leave. Good morning;" and with. disappeared so strangely, to have expressed my sorrow for my conduct towards you, and to have acknowledged that I had been deservedly punished; more perhaps by my Flushed with indignation, I had nearly gained the bot. own feelings of remorse, than the dangerous wound I had tom of the stairs, when I heard a light footstep behind me, received by your hand. I take even this opportunity, alround, and she looked me reproachfully in the face, as the sider it my duty, as a gentleman who has wronged another, to express. I certainly was going to add more, but there is so little chance of its being well received, that I had better defer it to some future opportunity. The time may "Miss de Clare," replied I, "I have no reproaches to come, and I certainly trust it will come, when I may be with every wish for your happiness, I will now take my leave; but I must say, it is with painful feelings; as I feel that the result of this interview will be the cause of great

Harcourt then bowed, and quitted the room. "It's all very well," muttered I, "but I know the world, and am "Oh! how changed," exclaimed she, fixing her large not to be scothed down by a few fine words. I trust that they will be sorry for their conduct, but see me again in-"Prosperity changes us all, Miss de Clare. I wish you side of their doors they will not," and I sat down, trying a very good morning;" and I turned away, and crossed to feel satisfied with myself-but I was not; I felt that I had acted harshly, to say no more. I ought to have lis-As I went out I could not help looking back, and I tened to an explanation sent by Cecilia and her mother, s she slowly mounted the stairs. I walked home to the were under great obligations to me, and by my quick had met. The waiter came in, and brought me a note as soon as I had found my father, and this it was which

I wish to see my old acquaintance, Timothy, and your I despised myself for my vanity and folly. shop. Answer by the bearer. "J. MASTERTON."

I wrote a few lines, informing Mr. Masterton that I Masterton, tired with my long abstraction. would be with him at the appointed hour, and then sat down to my solitary meal. How different from when I of myself, sir," replied I, " with respect to the De Clares." was last at this hotel! Now I knew nobody. I had to "I did not say so, Japhet; but, to tell you the truth, regain my footing in society, and that could only be ac- I thought something very like it. Now tell me, were complished by being acknowledged by my father; and as you not jealous at finding her in company with Harsoon as that was done, I would call upon Lord Winder-court?" mear, who would quickly effect what I desired. The gusted I was at my reception.

with you, I should suppose that you were blinded by jea- she?" lousy. Does it not occur to you, that if Mr. Harcourt was that I heard something about it. Harcourt's elder brother say to my being in this dress, sir," observed I. "Had I died, and he's come into the property, and I heard some not better change it on my arrival?" body say that he would in all probability succeed in gaining the handsomest girl in London, with a large fortune- racter pretty well, thanks to your raving about her." that it was said to be a match. Now, if such is the case, calling upon you, and the conversation which took place, dinner. is another proof that you have been mistaken."

I. "I merely perceived that I was considered intrusive, ed back; "but as for making one of that fellow Timothy, and finding in the company one who had treated me ill, I'll defy them." and had been my antagonist in the field, I naturally sup- "He laughs at every thing," replied 1; "and views posed that he had prejudiced them against me. I hope I every thing in a ridiculous light—at all events they will may be wrong; but I have seen so much of the world, never make him serious." young as I am, that I have become very suspicious."

make you unhappy, and not prevent your being deceived, the room first. Susannah came forward to welcome me,

I was analysing my own feelings, and I felt that I had duced Mr. Masterton. acted in a very absurd manner. The fact was, that one "We hardly knew thee, Japhet," mildly observed Mrs. of my castle buildings had been, that I was to marry Flota Cophagus.

had actuated me, almost without my knowing it. I felt "I have this morning received a summons from your jealous of Harcourt, and that without being in love with father, who returned, it appears, two days ago, and is now Miss de Clare, but actually passionately fond of another at the Adelphi Hotel. I am serroy to say, that stepping person; I felt as if I could have married her without lovout of his carriage when travelling, he missed his footing, ing her, and that I could give up Susannah Temple, whom and has snapped his tendon Achilles. He is laid upon a I did love, rather than that of a being whom I considered couch, and as you may suppose, his amiability is not in- as almost of my own creation, should herself presume to creased by the accident, and the pain attending it. As he fall in love, or that another should dare to love her, until I has requested me to bring forward immediate evidence as had made up my mind whether I should take her myto your identity, and the presence of Mr. Cophagus is ne-self; and this after so long an absence, and their having cessary, I propose that we shall start for Reading to-mor-giving up all hopes of ever seeing me again. The reader row at nine o'clock. I have a curiosity to go down there, may smile at the absurdity, still more at the selfishness and having a leisure day or two, it will be a relaxation. of this feeling; so did I, when I had reflected upon it, and

"What are you thinking of, Japhet?" observed Mr.

"That I have been making a most egregious fool

" Exactly so, sir."

next morning I was ready at nine o'clock, and set off "I'll tell Susannah Temple when I see her, that she with post horses, with Mr. Masterton, in his own carriage. may form some idea of your constancy," replied Mr. I told him what had occurred the day before, and how disyou must be-you can't marry them both. Still, under "Upon my word, Japhet, I think you are wrong," re- the circumstances, I can analyse the feeling-it is natuplied the old gentleman; "and if you had not told me of ral, but all that is natural is not always creditable to huyour affection for Miss Temple, to see whom, by the by, I man nature. Let us talk a little about Susannah, and confess to be one of the chief motives of my going down then all these vagaries will be dispersed. How old is

Mr. Masterton plied me with so many questions relative admitted to the ladies at such an early hour, there is pre-to Susannah, that her image alone soon filled my mind, ference shown him in that quarter? And now I recollect and I recovered my spirits. "I don't know what she will

"By no means; I'll fight your battle-I know her cha-

We arrived in good time at Reading, and as soon as we and you broke in upon a quiet re-union between two alighted at the inn, we ordered dinner, and then walked young people about to be united, almost without announce-down to the shop, were we found Timothy very busy ment, and so unexpectedly, after a lapse of so long a time, tying down and labeling. He was delighted to see Mr. surely you cannot be surprised at their being a degree of Masterton, and perceiving that I had laid aside the quaconfusion and restraint-more especially after what had ker's dress, made no scruple of indulging in his humour passed between Harcourt and you. Depend upon it that making a long face, and thee-ing and thou-ing Mr. Maswas the cause of it. Had Lady de Clare and her daughterton in a very absurd manner. We desired him to go ter been alone, your reception would have been very differton to Mr. Cophagus, and beg that he would allow me to ent; indeed, Cecilia's following you down stairs, proves bring Mr. Masterton to drink tea, and to call at the inn that it was not from coldness towards you: and Harcourt and to give us the answer. We then returned to our

"Whether they will ever make a quaker of you, Japhet, "I never viewed it in that light, certainly, sir," observed I am very doubtful," observed Mr. Masterton, as he walk-

In the evening we adjourned to the house of Mr. Co-"Then discard suspicion as fast you can, it will only phagus, having received a message of welcome. I entered If you are suspicious, you will have the constant fear and then drew back, when she perceived the alteration in of deception hanging over you, which poisons existence." my apparel, colouring deeply. I passed her and took the Arter these remarks I remained silent for some time; hand of Mrs. Cophagus and her husband, and then intro-

ob eve Ne ten pri

gar

pric wor put us f prid plac hum me a garb he d

with

indee port.

Se case, at he agree speak plied, to ar not c found instru

" T let me dress, it is to old m "I Susan a R

rupted hardly wrong, nah he " No old Ma

The ton exp and Mr that he Mr. Ma would t eth, for your sister hath not even greeted me in wel- before the evening was over, and Mr. Masterton retired to come."

"I greet thee in all kindness, and all sincerity, Japhet, find it seemly."

"Miss Temple," interposed Mr. Masterton, "it is to oblige those who are his sincere friends, that Mr. Newland has laid aside his dress. I quarrel with no creedevery one has a right to choose for himself, and Mr. Newland has perhaps not chosen badly in embracing your tenets. Let him continue steadfast in truth. But, fair young lady, there is no creed which is perfect, and even mility, and therefore I object to his wearing the garb of do?" pride."

"Of pride, sayest though ? hath he not rather put off the Japhet." garb of humility, and now appeareth in the garb of pride?"

"Not so, young madam: when we dress as all the world dress, we wear not the garb of pride; but when we put on a dress different from others, that distinguishes think you?" continued I, appealing to them all. us from others, then we show our pride, and the worst of pride, for it is the hypocritical pride which apes humility. Mrs. Cophagus, "and you, Susannah-It is the Pharisee of the Scriptures who preaches in high places, and sounds forth his charity to the poor; not the humility of the Publican, who says, 'Lord, be merciful to a smile on Susannah's face as she walked away. garb of pride, and for that reason have we insisted that gus and I were alone. he discards it, when with us. His tenets we interfere not with. There can be no religion in dress; and that must indeed be weak in itself, which requires dress for its support."

Susannah was astonished at this new feature of the case, so aptly put by the old lawyer. Mrs. Cophagus looked at her husband, and Copbagus pinched my arm, evidently phet, do as you please—dress yourself—dress her—any agreeing with him. When Mr. Masterton had finished dress—no dress like Eve—sly puss—won't lose you—alf speaking, Susannah waited a few seconds, and then re-right—and so on." plied, "It becomes not one, so young and weak as I am, instructed."

old man like myself."

Susannah.

rupted I.

wrong, and I must request thy forgiveness;" and Susannah held out her hand.

"Now you must forgive me, too, Miss Temple," said old Masterton, and Susannah laughed against her wishes. been in your company."

The conversation then became general. Mr. Masterand Mr. Cophagus immediately acceded. It was arranged but there is no perfection now on earth: be, therefore, as that he should go to town, by the mail, the next day.

Mr. Masterton talked a great deal about my father, and gave his character in its true light, as he considered it

"My the blessing of the Lord be on you always, Jawould be advantageous to me so to do. He then entered phet," replied she.

"I did not think that outward garments would dis into conversation upon a variety of topics, and was cerguise me from my friends," replied I; "but so it appear tainly very amusing. Susannah laughed very heartily the hotel, for I had resolved to sleep in my own bed.

I walked home with Mr. Masterton; I then returned Newland," replied Susannah, holding out her hand. "Yet to the house, and found them all in the parlour. Mrs. did I not imagine that, in so short a time, thou wouldst Cophagus was expressing her delight at the amusement have dismissed the apparel of our persuasion, neither do I she had received, when I entered with a grave face:-"I wish that I had not left you," said I to Mrs. Cophagus; "I am afraid to meet my father; he will exact the most implicit obedience. What am I to do? Must not I obey him ?"

"In all things lawful," replied Susannah, " most certainly, Japhet.'

"In all things lawful, Susannah! now tell me, in the very case of my apparel. Mr. Masterton says, that he in yours we find imperfection. Our religion preaches hu never will permit me to wear the dress. What am I to

"Thou hast thy religion and thy Bible for thy guide,

"I have: and in the Bible I find written on tablets of stone by the prophet of God, 'Honour thy father and thy mother;' there is a positive commandment; but I find no commandment to wear this or that dress.

"I should bid thee honour thy father, Japhet," replied

"I shall bid thee good night, Japhet."

At this reply we all laughed, and I perceived there was me a sinner.' Your apparel of pretended humility is the Cophagus followed her, laughing as she went, and Copha-

"Well, Japhet—see old gentleman—kiss—shake hands

-and blessing-and so on."

"Yes, sir," replied I, "but if he treats me ill, I shall probably come down here again. I am afraid Susannals is not very well pleased with me."

"Pooh, nonsense-wife knows all-die for you-Ja

I pressed Mr. Cophagus to tell me all he knew, and I to argue with thee, who art so much my senior. I can found from him that his wife had questioned Susannah not cavil at opinions which, if not correct, are at least soon after my departure, had found her weeping, and that founded on the holy writings; but I have been otherwise she had gained from her her ardent affection for me, This was all I wanted, and I wished him good night, and "Then let us drop the argument, Miss Susannah; and went to bed happy. I had an interview with Susannah let me tell you, that Japhet wished to resume his quaker's Temple before I left the next morning, and although I dress, and I would not permit him. If there is any blame never mentioned love, had every reason to be satisfied. it is to be laid to me, and it's no use being angry with an She was kind and affectionate; spoke to me in her usual serious manner, warned me against the world, acknow-"I have no right to be angry with any one," replied ledged that I should have great difficulties to surmount, and even made much allowance for my peculiar situation. "But you were angry with me, Susannah," inter- She dared not advise, but she would pray for me. There rupted I.

"I cannot say that it was anger, Japhet Newland—I hardly know what the feeling might have been; but I was her, I said, "Dear Susannah, whatever chance may take place in my fortunes or in my dress, believe my, my heart shall not be changed, and I shall ever adhere to those principles which have been instilled into me since I have

This was a phrase which admitted of a double meaning, ton explained to Mr. Cophagus what he required of him, and she replied, "I should wish to see thee perfect, Japhet ?

my bosom. She gently disengaged herself, and her large to-morrow at one o'clock—come in time."

eyes glistened with tears as she left the room. In a quarter of I called upon Mr. Masterton at the time appointed on have been very wise in your choice, and that your little ushered into a room on the ground floor, where we found quaker is a most lovely creature; I am in love with her Mr. Cophagus and two of the governors of the Foundling myself, and I think that she is far superior in personal Hospital. attractions to Cecilia de Clare.

" Indeed, sir !

plexion is unrivaled; as far as my present knowledge and favours, were about to receive them. My time is precious; experience go, she is an emblem of purity."

"Her mind, sir, is as pure as her person."

"I believe it; she has a strong mind, and will think tioners." for herself."

"There, sir, is, I am afraid, the difficulty; she will not stairs, and not wait to be sent for." yield a point in which she thinks she is right, not even for her love for me."

quences: she will not long wear that quaker's dress. to receive his son, he litigiously requires proofs and more people! I think I see her now entering a ball-room."

don her persuasion!"

much beauty and much perfection in the quaker's creed. however be firm and keep my temper under every circum-All that requires to be abandoned are the dress and the stance :- I will show him, at least, that his son has the ceremonies of the meetings, which are both absurdities spirit and the feelings of a gentleman." Recollect that Miss Temple has been brought up as a quaker; the established church, hear the beautiful ritual, and listen into the presence of my long-sought-for and now muchto a sound preacher. Let her be persuaded to do that, dreaded parent. which cannot be asking her to do wrong, and then let her and the nonsense occasionally uttered in the quaker's conthose of other sects, the outward forms and observances are imperfect. I trust to her own good sense."

"You make me very happy by saying so?"

"Well, that is my opinion of her, and if she proves me to be correct, hang me if I don't think I shall adopt her."

"What do you think of Mrs. Cophagus, sir?"

"I think she is no more a quaker in ber heart than I would have no objection to appear in feathers and diamonds great size, apparently six feet three or four inches, and

"Well, sir, I can tell you that Mr. Cophagus still sighs after his blue cottonnet pantaloons and Hessian boots, present we have this eventful meeting between you and complexion was of a brownish yellow, and his hair of a your father to occupy us."

wished him good night at an early hour.

I put my arm round her waist, and slightly pressed her to "Recollect, Japhet, we are to be at the Adelphi hotel an hour I was with Mr. Masterton on the road to London. the ensuing day, and we drove to the hotel in which my "Japhet," said the old gentleman, "I will say that you father had located himself. On our arrival, we were "Really, Mr. Masterton," said one of the latter gentlemen, "one would think that we were about to have an au-"Yes, indeed: her face is more classical, and her com-dience with a sovereign prince, and instead of conferring I ought to have been in the city this half hour, and here is this old nabob keeping us waiting as if we were peti-

Mr. Masterton laughed and said, "Let us all go up

He called one of the waiters, and desired him to announce them to General De Benyon. They then followed "I agree with you she will not, and I admire her for it; the waiter, leaving me alone. I must say, that I was a but, Japhet, she will yield to conviction, and, depend upon little agitated: I heard the door open above, and then an it, she will abandon the outward observances of her per- angry growl like that of a wild beast: the door closed suasion. Did you observe what a spoke I put in your again, and all was quiet. "And this," thought I, "is the wheel last night, when I stated that outward forms were result of all my fond anticipations, of my ardent wishes, pride? Leave that to work, and I'll answer for the conse- of my enthusiastic search. Instead of expressing anxiety ready. They say his temper is violent beyond control, "But what occasions you to think that she will aban- and that submission irritates instead of appeasing him: what then if I resent? I have heard it said that people of "I do not say that she will abandon it, nor do I wish that description are to be better met with their own weaher to do it, nor do I wish you to do it, Japhet. There is pons:-suppose I try it:-but no, I have no right:-I will

As these thoughts passed in my mind the door opened, she has, from the exclusiveness of the sect, known no other and Mr. Masterton requested me to follow him. I obeyed form of worship, and never heard any opposition to that with a palpitating heart, and when I gained the landing which has been inculcated; but let her once or twice enter place up stairs, Mr. Masterton took my hand and led me

I may as well describe him and the whole tableau. think and act for herself, and my word for it, when she The room was long and narrow, and at the farther end draws the comparison between what she has then heard was a large sofa, on which was scated my father with his injured leg reposing on it, his crutches propped against the venticle, by those who fancy themselves inspired, she will wall. On each side of him were two large poles and herself feel that, although the tenets of her persuasion stands with a magnificent macaw. Next to the macaws may be more in accordance with true Christianity than were two native servants, arrayed in their muslin dresses, with their arms folded. A hooka was in advance of the table before the sofa; it was magnificently wrought in silver, and the snake passed under the table, so that the tube was within my honoured father's reach. On one side of the room sat the two governors of the Foundling Hospital, on the other was seated Mr. Cophugus in his quaker's dress; the empty chair next him had been occupied by She is a lively, merry, kind hearted creature, and Mr. Masterton. I looked at my father: he was a man of stout in proportion, without being burthened with fat: be was gaunt, broad shouldered and muscular, and I think must have weighed seventeen or eighteen stone. His "More fool he! but, however, I am glad of it, for it head was in proportion to his body, and very large; gives me an idea which I shall work upon by and by : at so were all his features upon the same grand seale. His we arrived in town in time for dinner, which Mr. joined together under the throat, and these, which were Masterton had ordered at his chambers. As the old gen-tleman was rather tired with his two day's travelling, I face, and contrasting with the colour of his skin, gave his tout ensemble much more the appearance of a royal Bengal

M

you

" T

ider

not

terte

proc

in H

and to th

wish

feelli midd

nativ

sofa. at las

comn

good like y able."

" I

Th

vation

in the man v

was a myseli

pend i duty to

which

a chair hope y

politene

my sea

tremen "If

sir, I he is due,

the auti the tabl

the ink

ter the

I sai

" It

tiger than a gentleman. General De Benyon saw Mr. Masterton leading me forward to within a pace or two of you say, is due to the author of our existence. If I rethe table before the general. "Allow me the pleasure of collect right, the commandment says, 'Honour your father introducing your son, Japhet."

There was no hand extended to welcome me. My and then turned to the governors of the hospital.

"Is this the person, gentlemen, whom you received as an infant, and brought up as Japhet Newland?"

The governors declared I was the same person; that they had bound me to Mr. Cophagus, and had seen me more than once since I had quitted the asylum.

"Is this the Japhet Newland whom you received from these gentlemen and brought up to your business?"

"Yea, and verily-I do affirm the same-smart ladgood boy, and so on."

"I will not take a quaker's affirmation-will you take your oath, sir ?"

"Yes," replied Cophagus, forgetting his quakership,

"Take oath-bring Bible-kiss book, and so on." "You then, as a quaker, have no objection to swear to the identity of this person." "Swear!" cried Cophagus, "yes, swear-swear n not Japhet !- I'm damned-go to hell, and so on."

The other parties present could not help laughing at this explosion from Cophagus, neither could I. Mr. Masterton then asked the general if he required any more

"No," replied the general discourteously; and speaking in Hindostance to his attendants, they walked to the door and opened it. The hint was taken, Mr. Masterton saying to the others in an ironical tone, " After so long a separation, gentlemen, it must be natural that the general should wish to be left alone, that he may give vent to his paternal feellings." In the mean time, I was left standing in the middle of the room, the gentlemen departed, and the two native servants resumed their stations on each side of the sofa. I felt humiliated and indignant, but waited in silence : at last my honoured parent, who had eyed me for some time, commenced.

"If you think, young man, to win my favour by your good looks, you are very much mistaken: you are too like your mother, whose memory is any thing but agreeable.

The blood mounted to my forehead at this cruel observation: I folded my arms and looked my father steadfastly in the face, but made no reply. The choler of the gentleman was raised.

"It appears that I have found a most dutiful son." was about to make an angry answer, when I recollected myself, and I courteously replied, "My dear general, depend upon it that your son will always be ready to pay duty to whom duty is due; but excuse me, in the agitation of this meeting you have forgotten those little attentions which courtesy demands; with your permission I will take a chair, and then we may converse more at our case. I hope your leg is better."

I said this with the blandest voice and the most studied politeness, and drawing a chair towards the table, I took my seat; as I expected, it put my honoured father in a tremendous rage.

"If this is a specimen, sir, of your duty and respect, sir, I hope to see no more of them. To whom your duty is due, sir !—and pray to whom is it not due, sir, if not to the author of your existence?" cried the general, striking the table before him with his enormous fist, so as to make that this will do you are very much mistaken. You don't the ink fly out of the stand some inches high, and bespatter the papers near it.

"My dear father, you are perfectly correct; duty, as and your mother;' but at the same time, if I may venture to offer an observation, are there not such things as recifather fixed his proud grey eyes upon me for a moment, procal duties—some of which are even more paramount in a father than the mere begetting of a son?"

"What do you mean sir, by these insolent remarks?"

interrupted my father.

"Excuse me, my dear father, I may be wrong; but if so, I will bow to your superior judgment; but it does appear to me that the mere hanging me in a basket at the gate of the Foundling Hospital, and leaving me a banknote of fifty pounds to educate and maintain me until the age of twenty-four, is not exactly all the duties incumbent upon a parent. If you think that they are, I am afraid that the world, as well as myself, will be of a different opinion. Not that I intend to make any complaint, as I feel assured that now circumstances have put it in your power, it is your intention to make me amends for leaving me so long in a state of destitution, and wholly dependent upon my own resources."

"You do, do you, sir? Well now, I'll tell you my resolution, which is, there is the door-go out, and never let me see your face again."

"My dear father, as I am convinced that this is only a little pleasantry on your part, or perhaps a mere trial whether I am possessed of the spirit and determination of De Benyon, I shall, of course, please you by not complying with your humorous request."

"Won't you, by G-!" roared my father: then turning to his two native servants, he spoke to them in Hindostance. They immediately walked to the door, threw i wide open, and then coming back to me, were about to take me by the arms. I certainly felt my blood boil, but I recollected how necessary it was to keep my temper. I rose from my chair, and advancing to the side of the sofa,

"My dear father, as I perceive that you do not require your crutches at this moment, you will not perhaps object to my taking one. These foreign scoundrels must not be permitted to insult you through the person of your only

"Turn him out," roared my father.

The natives advanced, but I whirled the crutch round my head, and in a moment they were both prostrate. As as soon as they gained their feet I attacked them again, until they made their escape out of the room; I then shut the door and turned the key.

"Thank you my dear sir," said I returning the crutch to where it was before. "Many thanks for thus permitting me to chastise the insolence of those black scoundrels, whom I take it for granted you will immediately discharge;" and I again took my seat in the chair, bringing it closer to him.

The rage of the general was now beyond all bounds; the white foam was spluttered out of his mouth, as he in vain endeavoured to find words. Once he actually rose from the sofa, to take the law in his own hands, but the effort seriously injured his leg, and he threw himself down in pain and disappointment.

"My dear father, I am afraid that, in your anxiety to help me, you have hurt your leg again," said I, in a sooth-

"Sirrah, sirrah," exclaimed he at last; "if you think know me. You may turn out a couple of cowardly blacks, but now I'll show you that I am not to be played with.

or be put into the hands of the police."

cannot charge me with an assault,"

"But I will, by G-, sir, true or not true."

"Indeed you would not, my dear father. A De Benyou would never be guilty of a lie. Besides if yo were to call in the police? I wish to argue this matter coolly, because I ascribe your present little burst of ill humour to your sufferings from your unfortunate accident. Allowing then, my dear father, that you were to charge me with an assault, I should immediately be under the necessity of charging you also, and then we must both go to Bow tendance of my servants, sir." street together. Were you ever at Bow streat, general?"
The general made no reply, and I proceeded. "Besides, my dear sir, only imagine how very awkward it would be when the magistrate put you on your oath, and asked the tray, which contained the et ceteras on a napkin;you to make your charge. What would you be obliged to deelare? That you had married when young, and finding that your wife had no fortune, had deserted her replied my officer in the army, and the Honourable Captain De Ben. yon, had hung up your child at the gates of the Foundling Hospital-that you had again met your wife, married to wetted the bandages on his leg. "Is there any thing elso another, and had been an accomplice in concealing her I can do for you, sir?" said I. capital offence of bigamy, and had had meetings with her, although she had belonged to another. I say meetings, for you did meet her, to receive her directions about me. You have desired me to quit your presence for ever, and I am charitable and suspect nothing—others will not do you attempted force. I resisted that, because I would so. Then, after her death, you come home, and enquire not allow you to have the painful remembrance that you about your son. His identity is established—and what had injured one who had strong claims upon you, and then? Not only you do not take him by the hand, in had never injured you. I resented it, also, because I common civility, I might say, but you first try to turn wished to prove to you that I was a De Benyon, and had him out of the house, and then give him in charge of the spirit to resent an insult. But, general, if you imagine police: and then you will have to state for what. Perhaps that I have come here with a determination of forcing you will answer me that question, for I really do not myself upon you, you are much mistaken. I am too know.

degree subsided; he heard all I had to say, and he felt me kindly, believe me you would have found a grateful how very ridiculous would have been his intended proceed, and affectionate heart to have met that kindness. ings, and, as his wrath subsided, so did his pain increase; would have found a son, whose sole object through life he had seriously injured his leg, and it was swelling ra- has been to discover his father, after whom he has yeurnpidly—the bandages tightened in consequence, and he cd, who would have been delighted to have administered was suffering under the acutest pain. "Oh, oh!" ground to his wants, to have yielded to his wishes, to have sooth-

"My dear father, can I assist you?"

"Ring the bell, sir."

am here, my dear general; I can attend you professional cover you. I can appeal to Lord Windermear for the ly, and, if you will allow me, will soon relieve your pain. truth of that assertion. Allow me to say, that it is a very Your leg has swollen from exertion, and the bandages severe trial—an ordeal which few pass through with safemust be loosened."

extreme pain. I went to him, and proceeded to unloose the bandages, which gave him considerable relief. I then and perhaps disgraceful birth. It is harder still, when I replaced them secundum artem, and with great tenderness, expected to find my dearest wishes realised, that without and going to the sideboard, took the lotion which was any other cause than that of my features resembling those standing there with the other bottles, and wetted the ban- of my mother, I am to be cast away. One thing, General dages. In a few minutes he was quite relieved .- "Per- De Benyon, I request, and I trust it will not be denied, haps, sir," said I, "you had beeter try to sleep a little; I which is, that I may resume the name which I am ensnored most comfortably. "I have conquered you," into your presence. General De Benyon, farewell for ever."

I discard you for ever—I disinherit—I disacknowledge thought I, as I watched him as he lay asleep. If I have you. You may take your choice, either to quit this room, not yet, I will—that I am resolved." I walked gently to the door, unlocked it, and opened it without waking him, "The police, my dear sir! What can the police do? I ordered some broth to be brought immediately; saying may call in the police for the assault just committed by that the general was asleep, and that I would wait for it your servants, and have them up to Bow street, but you outside. I accomplished this little mancuvre, and reclosed the door, without waking my father, and then I took my seat in the chair and resumed my book, having placed the broth on the side of the fire-grate to keep it warm. In about an hour, he awoke and looked around him.

"Do you want any thing, my dearest father?" enquired I.

The general appeared undecided as to whether to recommence hostilities, but at last he said, "I wish the at-

"The attendance of a servant never can be equal to that of your own son, general," replied I, going to the fire, and taking the basin of broth, which I replaced upon "I expected you would require your broth, and I have had it ready for you."

"It was what I did require, sir, I must acknowledge," replied my father, and without further remark he finished

I removed the tray, and then went for the lotion, and

"Nothing-I am very comfortable."

"Then, sir," replied I, "I will now take my leave. proud, and happily am independent by my own exertions, By this time my horrid father's wrath had to a certain so as not to require your assistance. Had you received ed him in his pain, and to have watched him in his sickness. Deserted as I have been for so many years, I trust that I have not disgraced you, General De Benyon; and if "There is no occasion to summon assistance while I ever I have done wrong, it has been from a wish to dis--to be thrown as I have been upon the world, with no He made no reply, but his features were distorted with friend, no parent to assist or to advise me, to have to bear up against the contingency of being of unacknowledged will take a book, and shall have great pleasure in watching by your side." I pledge you that I will never disgrace it. And now, sir, asking and expecting no more, I take my leave; Exhausted with pain and violence, the general made no and you may be assured, that neither poverty, privation, nor reply; he fell back on the sofa, and, in a short time, he affliction of any kind, will ever induce me to again intrude

th te an

r

y,

an Th abl led

tlei dut to t

and Ben

then If, is shou ohly no d hint t come -

now meet comfi ... pect i -1 told n ever;

of rer

"U

ежрес

. (

will c " M retract insulte "A again?

" M well, p attend herit u your n son; bu not, aft an apol

"Iw apologie room.

"Stop, sir," said the general. "Stop one moment, if you please." I obeyed.

"Why did you put me out of temper? Answer me

"Allow me to observe sir, that I did not put you out or temper; and what is more, that I never lost my own temand unexpectedly have received."

"But that very keeping your temper made me more angry, sir."

"That is very possible; but surely I was not to blame The greatest proof of a perfect gentleman is, that he is able to command his temper, and I wished you to acknowledge that I was not without such pretensions."

"That is as much as to say that your father is no gen tleman; and this, I presume, is a specimen of your filial duty," replied the general warmly.

"Far from it, sir; there are many gentlemen who, unfortunately, cannot command their tempers, and are more to be pitied than blamed for it: but, sir, when such happens to be the case, they invariably redeem their error, apology.

"That is as much as to say, that you expect me to apologise to you."

"Allow me, sir, to ask you, did you ever know a De Benyon submit to an insult?"

" No sir, I trust not."

"Then, sir, those whose feelings of pride will not allow them to submit to an insult, ought never to insult others. If, in the warmth of a moment, they have done so, that pride should immediately induce them to offer an apology, not only due to the party, but to their own characters. There is ne disgrace in making an apology when we are in error, but there is great disgrace in withholding such an act of common justice and reparation."

"I presume that I am to infer from all this, that you expect an apology from me?"

"General De Benyon, as far as I am concerned, that is now of little importance; we part, and shall probably never meet again; if you think that it would make you feel more comfortable, I am willing to receive it."

" I must suppose by that observation, that you fully expect it, and otherwise will not stay?"

"I never had a thought of staying, general; you have told me that you have disinherited and discarded me for ever; no one with the feelings of a man would ever think of remaining after such a declaration."

"Upon what terms, then, sir, am I to understand that you will consent to remain with me, and forget all that has

"My terms are simple, general; you must say that you retract what you have said, and are very sorry for having insulted me."

"And without I do that, you will never come here

again?"

"Most decidedly not, sir. I shall always wish you well, pray for your happiness, be sorry at your death, and herit me. That is my duty, in regard for my having taken your name, and you having acknowledged that I am your son; but live with you, or even see you occasionally, I will not, after what has passed this day, without you make me

"I was not aware that it was necessary for a father to apologise to his son."

I made my father a profound bow, and was quitting the "I you wrong a stranger, you offer an apology; how much more is it due to a near relation?"

"But a parent has claims on his own son, sir, for which he is bound to tender his duty."

"I grant it in the ordinary course of things in this life; but, General De Benyon, what claims have you as a parent upon me? A son in most cases is indebted to his parents for their care and attention in infancy-his educationper during the insult and injury which I so undeservedly his religious instruction-his choice of a profession, and his advancement in life, by their exertions and interest; and when they are called away, he has a reasonable expectation of their leaving him a portion of their substance. They have a heavy debt of gratitude to pay for what they have received, and they are further checked by the hopes of what they may hereafter receive. Up to this time, sir, I have not received the first, and this day I am told that I need not expect the last. Allow me to ask you, General De Benyon, upon what grounds you claim from me a filial duty? certainly not for benefits received, or for benefits in expectation: but I feel that I : m intruding, and therefore sir, once more, with every wish for your happiness, I take my leave."

I went out and had half closed the door after me, when and amply so, by expressing their sorrow and offering an the general cried out, "Stop-don't go-Japhet-my son —I was in a passion—I beg your pardon—don't mind what I said—I'm a passionate old fool."

As he uttered these broken sentences, I returned to him He held out his hand. "Forgive me, boy-forgive your father." I knelt down and kissed his hand; he drew me towards him, and I wept upon his bosom.

It was sometime before we were sufficiently composed to enter into conversation, and then I tried my utmost to please him. Still there was naturally a restraint on both sides; but I was so particular and devoted in my attentions, so careful of giving offence, that when he complained of weariness, and a wish to retire, he stipulated that I should be with him to breakfast on the next morning.

I hastened to Mr. Masterton, although it was late, to communicate to him all that had passed; he heard me with great interest. "Japhet," said he, "you have done well—it is the proudest day of your life. You have completely mastered him. The royal Bengal tiger is tamed. I wish you joy, my dear fellow. Now I trust that all will be well. But keep your own counsel, do not let this be known at Reading. Let them still imagine that your father is as passionate as ever, which he will be, by-the-by, with every body else. You have still to follow up your success, and leave me to help you in other matters.'

I returned home to the Piazza, and thankful to Heaven for the events of the day, I soon fell fast asleep, and dreamed of Susannah Temple. The next morning I was early at the Adelphi Hotel; my father had not yet risen, but the native servants who passed in and out, attending upon him, and who took care to give me a wide berth, had informed him that "Burra Saib's" son was come, and he sent for me, His leg was very painful and uncomfortable, and the surgeon had not yet made his appearance. I arranged it as before, and he then dressed, and came out to breakfast. I had said nothing before the servants, but as soon as he was comfortable on the sofa I took his hand, and kissed attend your funeral as chief mourner, although you disin- it saying "Good morning, my dear father; I hope you do not repent your kindness to me yesterday?"

"Nu, no; God bless you, boy. I've been thinking of you all night."

"All's right," thought I, "and I trust to be able to keep it so.

I shall pass over a fortnight, during which I was in constant attendance upon my father. At times he would fly out in a most violent manner, but I invariably kept my temper, and when it was all over, would laugh at him, are sincere." generally repeating and acting all which he had said and done during his paroxysm. I found this rather dangerand it was wonderful how it acted as a check upon him. He would not at first believe but that I exaggerated when the picture was held up to his view, and he was again calm. My father was not naturally a bad tempered man, but having been living among a servile race, and holding greater proportion of good and honest people among its high command in the army, he had gradually acquired a multitudes; there is also, unfortunately, more misery and habit of authority, and an impatience of contradiction, more crime." which was unbearable to all around. Those who were high spirited and sensitive, shunned him; the servile and Mr. Cophagus has put off his plain attire?" the base continued with him for their own interests, but trembled at his wrath. I had, during the time, narrated presume he finds it necessary not to be so remarkable." to my father the events of my life, and I am happy to say, had, by attention and kindness, joined with firmness and say, Japhet, when I tell you that my own sister, born and his request, removed to the hotel, and lived with him alto. dress of the females of our sect?" gether. His leg was rapidly arriving at a state of convalesence, and he now talked of taking a house and setting up his establishment in London. I had seen but little of Mr. Masterton during this time, as I had remained in doors in attendance upon the general. I had written once to Mr. Cophagus, stating how I was occupied, but saying that there is vanity in descending to straw, which is a nothing about our reconciliation. One morning Mr. more homely commodity. But what reason has she Masterton called upon us, and after a little conversation given?" with the general, he told me that he had persuaded Mr. Cophagus to leave Reading and come to London, and that out with her in her quaker's dress.' Susannah Temple was to come with him.

"On a visit?" enquired I.

" No not on a visit. I have seen Cophagus, and he is determined to cut the quakers and reside in London altogether." me shew you a part of this great city."

"What! does he intend to return to the popms and vanities of this wicked world?"

"Yes, I believe so, and his wife will join him. She has no objection to decorate her pretty person,"

"I never thought that she had—but Susannah Tem-

"When Susannah is away from her friends, when she finds that her sister and brother-in-law no longer wear the dress, and when she is constantly in vain company, to all go home. She was not only annoyed but almost alarmed which please to add the effect I trust of my serious admonitions, she will soon do as others do, or she is no woman. This is all my plan, and leave it to me-only play your As soon as we returned, I sat down with her. part by seeing as much of her as you can."

" You need not fear that," replied I.

"Does your father know of your attachment? enquired Mr. Masterton.

"No, I passed her over without mentioning her name," replied I. "It is too soon yet to talk to him about my marrying; in fact, the proposal must, if possible, come from him. Could not you manage that?"

"Yes, I will if I can; but, as you say, wait a while. Here is their address—you must come to morrow if you Here is their address—you must come to murrow if you wear a dress so different from other people, you must excen; and do you think you can dine with me on Thurs-

send you word."

The next day I complained of a headach, and said that I would walk out until dinner time. I hastened to the address given me by Mr. Masterton, and found that Mr. garb of humility." Cophagus and his wife were out, but Susannah remained After our first questions, I enquired of her how she liked London.

"I am almost afraid to say, Japhet, at least to you; you would only laugh at me."

"Not so, Susannah; I never laugh when I know people

"It appears to me, then, to be a vanity fair."

"That there is more vanity in London, than any other ous ground at first, but by degrees he became used to it, city, I grant," replied I, "but recollect that there are more people, and more wealth. I do not think that there is more in proportion, than in any other towns in England, and if there is more vanity, Susannah, recollect also, that there is more industry, more talent, and I should hope, a

"I believe you are right, Japhet. Are you aware that

g

m

Wo

but

the

cer

hu

wes

will mise

pear

" you

you

een

I wa

since

pany

carfu

healt and a

have

out n

of an

"If it grieves you, Susannah, it grives me also; but I

"For him I could find some excuse; but what will you good temper, acquired a dominion over him. I had, at bred up to our tenets, hath also much deviated from the

" In what hath she made an alteration?"

"She has a bonnet of plaited straw with ribbons?"

"Of what colour are the ribbons?"

"Nay, of the same as her dress-of grey."

"Your bonnet Susannah, is of a grey silk " I do not see

"That her husband wills it, as he does not like to walk

" Is it not her duty to obey her husband even as I obey my father, Susannah? But I am not ashamed to walk out with you in your dress; so if you have no objection, let Susannah consented; we had often walked together in the town of Reading; she was evidently pleased at what I said. I soon excepted her to Oxford street, from thence down Bond street, and all the more frequented parts of the metropolis. Her dress naturally drew upon her the casual glance of the passengers, but her extreme beauty turned the glance to an ardent gaze, and long before we had finished our intended walk, Susannah requested that I would at the constant and reiterated scrutiny which she underwent, ascribing it to her dress and not to her lovely person.

"So I understand that Mr. Cophagus intends to reside altogether in London."

"I have not heard so: I understood that it was busi ness which called him hither for a few weeks." "I trust not, for I shall be unhappy here."

"May I ask why?"

" The people are rude-it is not agreeable to walk out." "Recollect, my dear Susannah, that those of your sect are not so plentiful in London as elsewhere, and if you them-it is you who make yourself conspicious, almost "Yes, if the general continues improving; if not, I will saying to the people by your garment, 'come and look at me.' I have been reflecting upon what Mr. Masterton The next day I complained of a headach, and said that said to you at Reading, and I do not know whether he was not right in calling it a garb of pride instead of a

"If I thought so, Japhet, even I would throw it off," replied Susannah.

" It certainly is not pleasant that every one should think that you walk out on purpose to be stared at, yet such is the ill-natured construction of the world, and they will never believe otherwise. It is possible, I should think, to dress with equal simplicity and neatness, to avoid gay colours, and yet to dress so as not to excite observation.

"I hardly know what to say; but that you all appear against me, and that sometimes I fear that I am too presumptuous in thus judging for myself."

"I am not against you, Susannah; I know you will do what you think is right; and I shall respect you for that, gaze, I should feel too jealous to approve of it. I do not therefore blame Mr. Cophagus for inducing his pretty wife rolled heavily; and, at times, the wind blew up in fitful, anbut I commend her for obeying the wishes of her husband. Her beauty is his, and not common property."

Susannah did not reply; she appeared very thoughtful-"You disagree with me, Susannah," said I, after a pause; " I am sorry for it."

myself, and be more ruled by the opinions and judgments

of others."

Mr. and Mrs. Cophagus then came in. Cophagus had resumed his coat and waistcoat, but not his pantaloens or Hessians; his wife, who had a very good taste in dress would not allow him. She was in her grey silk gown, but wore a large handsome shawl, which covered all but the skirts; on her head she had a Leghorn bonnet, and certainly looked very pretty. As usual, she was all good bumour and smiles. I told them that we had been walking out, and that Susannah had been much annoyed by the staring of the people.

"Always so," said Cophagus, "never mind—girls like it—feel pleased—and so on."

"You wrong me much, brother Cophagus," replied Susannah, " it pained me exceedingly."

"All very well to say so,-know better-sly puss wear dress—people say, pretty quaker—and so on." Susannah hastily left the room after this attack, and I told them what had passed.

"Mrs. Cophagus," said I, "order a bonnet and shawl like yours for her without telling her, and perhaps you will persuade her to put them on."

Mrs. Cophagus thought the idea excellent, and pro-mised to procure them. Susannah not making her reappearance, I took leave and arrived at the hotel in good time for dinner.

"Japhet," said the general to me as we were at table, "you have mentioned Lord Windermear very often, have you called upon him lately?"

" No, sir, it is now two years and more since I have seen him. When I was summoned to town to meet you. I was too much agitated to think of any thing else, and since that I have had too much pleasure in your com-

"Say rather, my good boy, that you have nursed me se carfully that you have neglected your friends and you Take my carriage to-morrow, and call upon him. and after that you had better drive about a little, for you have been looking pale these last few days. I hope to get out myself in a short time, and then we will have plenty of amusement together in setting up our establishment."

To be continued.

From the Naval Annual.

THE PIRATE .- BY CAPT. MARRYATT.

CHAPTER I.

THE BAY OF BISCAY.

It was in the latter part of the month of June, of the even if I disagree with you; but I must say, that if my year 179-, that the angry waves of the Bay of Biscay wife were to dress in such a way as to attract the public were gradually subsiding, after a gale of wind as violent as it was unusual during that period of the year. Still they to make some alteration in her attire, neither do I blame gry gusts, as if it would fain renew the elemental combat; but each effort was more feeble, and the dark clouds which had been summoned to the storm, now fled in every quarter before the powerful rays of the sun, who burst their masses asunder with a glorious flood of light and heat; and, as he poured down his resplendent beams, piercing deep into the waters of that portion of the Atlantic to which we now re-"I cannot say that I do, Japhet. I have learnt a lesson this day, and in future must think more humbly of fer, with the exception of one object, hardly visible, as at creation, there was a vast circumference of water, bounded by the fancied canopy of heaven. We have said, with the exception of one object; for in the centre of this picture, so simple, yet so sublime, composed of the three great elements, there was a remnant of the fourth. We say a remnant, for it was but the hull of a vessel, dismasted, waterlogged, its upper works only floating occasionally above the waves, when a transient repose from their still violent undulation permitted it to reassume its buoyancy. But this was seldom; one moment it was deluged by the seas, which broke as they poured over its gunwale; and the next, it rose from its submersion, as the water escaped from the port-holes at its sides.

How many thousands of vessels-how many millions of property-have been abandoned, and eventually consigned to the all-receiving depth of the ocean, through ignorance or through fear! What a mine of wealth must lie buried in its sands, what riches lie entangled amongst its rocks, or remain suspended in its unfathomable gulf, where the compressed fluid is equal in gravity to that which it encircles, there to remain secured in its embedment from corruption and decay, until the destruction of the universe, and the return of chaos. Yet, immeuse as the accumulated loss must be, the major part of it has been occasioned from an ignorance of one of the first laws of nature, that of specific gravity. The vessel to which we have referred, was, to all appearance, in a situation of as extreme hazard as that of a drowning man clinging to a single rope-yarn; yet, in reality, she was more secure, from descending to the abyes below than many gallantly careering on the waters, their occupants dismissing all fear, and only caculating upon a quick arrival into port. The Circassian had sailed from New Orleans, a gallant and well-appointed ship, with a cargo, the major part of which consisted of cotton. The captain was, in the usual acceptation of the term, a good sailor; the crew were hardy and able seamen. As they crossed the Atlantic, they had encountered the gale to which we have referred, were driven down into the Bay of Biscay, where, as we shall hereafter explain, the vessel was dismasted, and sprang a leak, which baffled all their exertions to keep under. It was now five days since the frightened crew had quitted the vessel in two of her boats, one of which had swamped, and every soul that occupied it had perished; the fate of the other was

We said that the crew had deserted the vessel, but we did not assert that every existing being had been removed

out of her. Had such been the case, we should not have child to look at it, and whose powers were sinking fast. taken up the reader's time in describing inanimate matter. "Poor lilly Massa Eddard, him look very bad indeed-him It is life that we portray, and life there still was, in the die very soon, me fear. Look, Coco, no ab breath." shattered hull thus abandoued to the mockery of the ocean. in the cubosse of the Circassian, that is, in the cooking and life appeared to be extinct. house, secured on deck, and which fortunately had been so two first mentioned were of that inferior race which have, pull." for so long a period, been procured from the sultry Afric now, indeed, deadly pale, as it attempted in vain to draw oder side." sustenance from its exhausted nurse, down whose sable cheeks the tears coursed, as she occasionally pressed the down her cheek; she was aware that nature was exhausinfant to her breast, or turned it round to leeward to screen ted. "Coco," said she, wiping her cheek with the back of it from the spray, which dashed over them at each return- her hand, "me give me heart blood for Massa Eddard; ing swell. Indifferent to all else, save her little charge, but no ab milk-all gone." she spoke not, although she shuddered with the cold, as the water washed her knees each time that the hall was was used by Judy, gave an idea to Coco. He drew his careened into the wave. Cold and terror had produced a knife out of his pocket, and very coolly sawed to the bone change in her complexion, which now wore a yellow, or of his fore-finger. The blood flowed and tricled down to sort of copper hue.

The male, who was her companion, sat opposite to her fant. upon the iron range, which once had been the receptacle "See, Judy, Massa Eddard suck-him not dead," cried of light and heat, but was now but a weary seat to a Coco, chuckling at the fortunate result of the experidrenched and worn-out wretch. He, too, had not spoken ment, and forgetting, at the moment, their almost hopeless for many hours; with the muscles of his face relaxed, his situation. displaying little but their whites, he appeared to be an ob- finger with a certain degree of vigour. ject of greater misery than the female, whose thoughts "Look, Judy, how Massa Eddard take it," continued were directed to the infant, and not unto herself. Yet his Coco. "Pull away, Massa Eddard, pull away. Coco ab feelings were still acute, although his faculties appeared to ten finger, and take long while suck em all dry." But the

be deadened by excess of suffering.

"Eh, me " cried the negro woman faintly, after a long Judy. silence, her head falling back with extreme exhaustion. Her companion made no reply, but, roused at the sound The negro again crawled out, and again he scanned the of her voice, bent forward, slided open the door a little, horizion.
and looked out to windward. The heavy spray dashed "So help me God, this time me tink, Judy—yes, so help into his glassy eyes, and obscured his vision; he groaned, me God, me see a ship!" cried Coco joyfully and fell back into his former position. "What you tink, "Eh!" screamed Judy, faintly, with delight; "den Coco?" inquired the negress, covering up more carefully Massa Eddard no die." the child, as she bent her head down upon it. A look of "Yes, so help me God-he come dis way?" and Coco, despair, and a shudder from cold and hunger, were the who appeared to have recovered a portion of his former only reply.

swell of the ocean was fast subsiding. At noon the warmth chief, with the hope of attracting the attention of those of the sun was communicated to them through the planks on board; for he knew that it was very possible that an of the caboose, while its rays poured a small stream of object floating little more than level with the water's survivid light through the chinks of the closed panels. The face might escape notice. negro appeared gradually to revive: at last he rose, and As it fortunately happened, the frigate, for such she was, with some difficulty contrived again to slide open the continued her course precisely for the wreck, although it door. The sea had gradually decreased its violence, and had not been perceived by the look-out men at the mastbut occasionally broke over the vessel; carefully holding heads, whose eyes had been directed to the line of the on by the door-jambs, Coco gained the outside, that he horizon. In less than an hour, our little party were might survey the horizon.

face during the morning.

"What you tink um like Coco?"

resuming his seat upon the grate with a heavy sigh.

"Eh, me!" cried the negress, who had uncovered the on board of a man-of-war, although, at the same time, it

The child's head fell back from the breast of its nurse,

" Judy, you no ab milk for piceaninny; suppose um no well fixed as to resist the force of the breaking waves, re- ab milk, how can live? Eh! stop, Judy, me put lilly finmained three beings-a man, a woman, and a child. The ger in um mouth; suppose Massa Eddard no dead, him

Coco inserted his finger into the child's mouth, and felt coast, to toil, but reap not for themselves; the child which a slight drawing pressure. "Judy," cried Coco, "Massa lay at the breast of the female was of European blood, Eddard no dead yet. Try now, suppose you ab lilly drop e pdJ ti rein

he

an ton

roo

sing val. his

the

bec

ble.

new ther

butt

his

the l

arra

his I

arm

to n

ton s

fell b

terw

tion : the C

him :

of Y

allotte

cian l

The :

count

suit h

mould

sure t

would

it was VOL.

W

Th

Poor Judy shook her head mournfully, and a tear rolled

This forcible expression of love for the child, which the extremity, which he applied to the mouth of the in-

thick lips pouting far in advance of his collapsed cheeks, The child revived by the strange sustenance, gradually his high cheek-bones, prominent as budding-horns, his eyes recovered its powers, and in a few minutes it pulled at the child was soon satisfied, and fell asleep in the arms of

"Coco, suppose you go see again," observed Judy, strength and activity, clambered on the top of the caboose, It was then about eight o'clock in the morning, and the where he sat, cross-legged, waving his yellow handker-

threatened with a new danger, that of being run over by "What you see, Coco?" said the female, observing the frigate, which was now within a cable's length of from the caboose that his eyes were fixed upon a certain them, driving the seas before her in one widely extended foam, as she pursued her rapid and impetuous course. Co "So help me God, me tink me see something; but ab co showed to his utmost, and fortunately attracted the no so much salt water in um eye, me no see clear," replied tice of the men who were on the bowsprit, stowing away Coco, rubbing away the salt, which had crystallized on his the foretopmast-stay-sail, which had been hoisted up to dry after the gale.

"Starboard, hard!" was roared out.

"Only one bit cloud," replied he entering caboose, and "Starboard it is," was the reply from the quarter-deck, and the helm was shifted without inquiry, as it always is satisfactory explanation.

fore-sail shivered, and the jib filled as the frigate rounded to, narrowly missing the wreck, which was now under the ted waters, that it was with difficulty that Coco could, by clinging to the stump of the main-mast, retain his elevated position. The frigate shortened sail, hove to, and lowered down a quarter-boat, and in less than five minutes, Coco, Judy, and the infant, were rescued from their awful situation. Poor Judy, who had borne up against all for the sake of the child, placed it in the arms of the officer who relieved them, and then fell back in a state of insensibility, in which condition she was carried on board. Coco, as he took his place in the stern-sheets of the boat, gazed wildly round him, then broke out into peals of extravagant laughter, which continued without intermission, and were the only replies which he could give to the interroga-tories of the quarter-deck, until he fell down in a swoon, and was intrusted to the care of the surgeon.

CHAPTER II.

THE BACHELOS.

On the evening of the same day on which the child and the two negroes had been saved from the wreck by the fortunate appearance of the frigate, Mr. Witherington, of Finsbury Square, was sitting alone in his diningroom, wondering what could have become of the Circassian, and why he had not received intelligence of her arrival. Mr. Witherington, as we said before, was alone; he had his port and his sherry before him; and although the weather was rather warm, there was a small fire in the grate, because, as Mr. Witherington asserted, it looked comfortable. Mr. Witherington having watched the ceiling of the room for some time, although there was certainly nothing new to be discovered, filled another glass of wine, and then proceeded to make himself more comfortable by unbuttoning three more buttons of his waistcoat, pushing his wig further back off his head, and casting loose all the buttons at the knees of his breeches; he completed his arrangements by dragging towards him two chairs within his reach, putting his legs upon one while he rested his arm upon the other: and why was not Mr. Witherington to make himself comfortable? He had good health, a good conscience, and eight thousand a-year.

Satisfied with all his little arrangements, Mr. Witherington sipped his port wine, and putting down his glass again, fell back in his chair, placed his hands on his breast, in-the Circassian.

We will leave him to his cogitations while we introduce him more particularly to our readers.

The father of Mr. Witherington was a younger son of one of the oldest and proudest families in the West Riding ington considered this a comfortable income, and he thereof Yorkshire: he had his choice of the four professions fore retired altogether from business, allotted to younger sons whose veins are filled with patri.

During the lifetime of his parents cian blood-the army, the navy, the law, and the church. to one or two matrimonial scenes, which had induced him The army did not suit him, he said, as marching and to put down matrimony as one of the things not comfortacounter-marching were not comfortable; the navy did not ble; therefore he remained a bachelor. suit him, as there was little comfort in gales of wind and sure that he would be at ease with his conscience, which suitors, or from the same dislike to matrimony as her would not be comfortable; the church was also rejected, as brother had imbibed, it is not in our power to say. Mr. it was, with him, connected with the idea of a small sti- Witherington was three years younger than his sister; and, VOL. XXVIII. FEBRUARY, 1836 .- 23.

behoves people to be rather careful how they pass such an | pend, hard duty, a wife and eleven ohildren, which were order, without being prepared with a subsequent and most anything but comfortable. Much to the horror of his family he eschewed all the liberal professions, and em-The topmast studding-sail flapped and fluttered, the braced the offer of an old backslider of an uncle, who proposed to him a situation in his banking-house, and a partnership as soon as he deserved it: the consequence was, bows, rocking so violently in the white foam of the agita- that his relations bade him an indignant farewell, and then made no further inquiries about him: he was as decidedly cut as one of the female branches of the family would have been had she committed a faux pas.

Nevertheless, Mr. Witherington senior stuck diligently to his business, in a few years was a partner, and, at the death of the old gentleman, his uncle, found himself in possession of a good property, and every year coining money at his bank.

Mr. Witherington senior then purchased a house in Finsbury Square, and thought it advisable to look out for Having much of the family pride in his composition, he resolved not to muddle the blood of the Witherington by any cross from Cateaton Street or Mincing Lane; and, after a proper degree of research, he selected the daughter of a Scotch earl, who went to London with a bevy of nine in a Leith smack to barter blood for wealth. Mr. Witherington being so fortunate as the first-comer, had the pick of the nine ladies by courtesy; his choice was lighthaired, blue-eyed, a little freekled, and very tall, by no means bad looking, and standing on the list in the family Bible No. IV. From this union Mr. Witherington had issue; first, a daughter, christened Moggy, whom we shall soon have to introduce to our readers as a spinster of fortyseven; and second, Anthony Alexander Witherington, Esquire, whom we just now have left in a very comfortable position, and in a very brown study.

Mr. Witherington senior persuaded his son to enter the banking-house; and, as a dutiful son, he entered it every day, but he did nothing more, having made the for-tunate discovery that "his father was born before him;" or, in other words, that his father had plenty of money, and would be necessitated to leave it behind him.

As Mr. Witherington senior had always studied comfort, his son had early imbibed the same idea, and carried his seelings, in that respect, to a much greater excess: he divided things into comfortable and uncomfortable. One fine day, Lady Mary Witherington, after paying all the household bills, paid the debt of Nature; that is, she died: her husband paid the undertaker's bill, so it is to be presumed that she was buried.

Mr. Witherington senior shortly afterwards had a stroke of apoplexy, which knocked him down. Death, who has no feelings of honour, struck him when down. And Mr. terwove his fingers; and in this most comfortable posi- Witherington, after having laid a few days in bed, was by tion recommenced his speculations as to the non-arrival of a second stroke laid in the same vault as Lady Mary Witherington: and Mr. Witherington junior (our Mr. Witherington), after deducting 40,000l. for his sister's fortune, found himself in possession of a clear 8,000l. per annum, and an excellent house in Finsbury Square. Mr. Wither-

During the lifetime of his parents he had been witness

His sister Moggy also remained unmarried; but whether mouldy biscuit; the law did not suit him, as he was not it were from a very unprepossessing squint which deterred eccentricity and benevolence: eccentric he certainly was, tler sex: it is wonderful how the ladies pumice a man and over with the rest of his species, jostling but not few hundreds in his new occupation of mourning the loss wounding his neighbours, as the waves of circumstance bring him into collision with them.

Mr. Witherington roused himself from his deep reverie, and felt for the string connected with the bell-pull, which it was the butler's duty invariably to attach to the arm of room; for, as Mr. Witherington very truly observed, it was culated the advantages and disadvantages of having a air the newspapers, and cut the leaves of a new novel.

When, however, he called to mind that she could not the top of the hearse. always remain at that precise age, he decided that the suce of comfort was against it.

a brown study.

serving that his master was occupied, he immediately stop- he had served and he had buried Mr. Witherington his faped at the door, erect, motionless, and with a face as ther, and Lady Mary his mother; he feet that he had strong melancholy as if he was performing mute at the porch of claims for such a variety of services, and he applied to the thing that the greater the rank of the defunct, the longer butler-incumbent was just about to commit the same folly must be the face, and, of course, the better must be the as Jonathan had done before, and Jonathan was again in-

and Mr. Jonathan will stand as long as a hackney-coach from habit Jonathan still carried himself as a mute on all horse, we will just leave them as they are, while we intro-duce the brief history of the latter to our readers. Jona-to mirth, except when he perceived that his master was in than Trapp had served as footboy, which term, we believe, high spirits, and then rather from a sense of duty than is derived from those who are in that humble capacity re- from any real hilarity of heart. ceiving a quantum suff. of the application of the feet of then as footman, which implies that they have been pro- the English of all the Latin mottoes which are placed upon moted to the more agreeable right of administering instead the hatchments; and these mottoes, when he considered for promotion could go no higher in the family, he had standing at the door; he had closed it, and the handle still Witherington senior. Jonathan then fell in love, for button, after a long pause—"I wish to look at the last lers are guilty of indiscretions as well as their masters: letter from New York, you will find it on my dressingneither he nor his fair flame, who was a lady's maid in table." another family, notwithstanding that they had witnessed the consequences of this error in others, would take warn- reappearance with the letter. ing: they gave warning, and they married.

Like most butlers and ladies' maids who pair off, they set up a public house; and it is but justice to the lady's letter.
maid to say, that she would have preferred an eating house,
"Y but was overruled by Jonathan, who argued, that although ler in a low tone, half shutting his eyes. people would drink when they were not dry, they never would eat unless they were hungry.

Now, although there was truth in the observation, this is certain, that business did not prosper; it has been surmised the sea." that Jonathan's tall, lank, lean figure, injured his custom, as people are but too much inclined to judge of the goodness of the ale by the rubicund face and rotundity of the landlord; and therefore inferred that there could be no out an heir, and shall be obliged to marry, which shall be good beer where mine host is the picture of famine,-There certainly is much in appearances in this world; and t appears, that in consequence of Jonathan's cadaverous dead. In cale quies."

although he had for some time worn a wig, it was only be appearance, he very soon appeared in the gazette: but what cause he considered it more comfortable. Mr. Withering- ruined Jonathan in one profession procured him immediate ton's whole character might be summed up in two words employment in another. An appraiser, upholsterer, and undertaker, who was called in to value the fixtures, fixed as most bachelors usually are. Man is but a rough pebble his eye upon Jonathan, and knowing the value of his pewithout the attrition received from contact with the gen- culiarly lugubrious appearance, and having a half-brother of equal height, offered him immediate employment as a down into a smoothness which occasions him to roll over mute. Jonathan soon forgot to mourn his own loss of a of thousands; and his erect, stiff, statue-like carriage, and long melancholy face, as he stood at the portals of those who had entered the portals of the next world, were but too often a sarcasm upon the grief of the inheritors. Even grief is worth nothing in this trafficking world unless it is his master's chair previous to his last exit from the dining- paid for. Jonathan buried many, and at last buried his wife. So far all was well; but at last he buried his masvery uncomfortable to be obliged to get up and wring the ter, the undertaker, which was not quite so desirable.—bell; indeed, more than once Mr. Witherington had cal- Although Jonathan wept not, yet did he express mute sorrow as he marshalled him to his long home, and drank to daughter about eight years old who could ring the bell, his memory in a pot of porter as he returned from the funeral, perched, with many others, like carrion crows on a h th m ai ci la to

ing

eve

wa rac

plie

her

the

in I

but

mor

with nine

were Was up to found

mart

mit !

of tv

ering

self i had b

ted, e

he wa

Temp

lingly

And now Jonathan was thrown out of employment from a reason which most people would have thought the highest Mr. Witherington having pulled the bell again, fell into recommendation. Every undertaker refused to take him, because they could not match him. In this unfortunate Mr. Jonathan, the butler, made his appearance; but ob- dilemma, Jonathan thought of Mr. Witherington junior; ome departed peer of the realm; for it is an understood bachelor. Fortunately for Jonathan, Mr. Witherington's Now, as Mr. Witherington is still in profound thought, and have nothing more to do with ladies' maids. But stalled, resolving in his own mind to lead his former life,

Jonathan was no mean scholar for his station in life, and, those above them to increase the energy of their service; during his service with the undertaker, he had acquired of receiving the above dishonorable applications; and lastly, them as apt, he was very apt to quote. We left Jonathan been raised to the dignity of butler in the service of Mr. remained in his hand, "Jonathan," said Mr. Withering-

Jonathan quitted the room without reply, and made his

"It is a long time that I have been expecting this vessel, Jonathan," observed Mr. Witherington, unfolding the

"Yes, sir, a long while; tempus fugit," replied the but-

"I hope to God no accident has happened," continued Mr. Witherington; "my poor little cousin and her twins, e'en now that I speak, they may be all at the bottom of

"Yes, sir," replied the butler; "the sea defrauds many an honest man of his profits.'

" By the blood of the Witheringtons! I may be left withvery uncomfortable."

"Very little comfort," echoed Jonathan-" my wife is fixed upon the ceiling.

having less to care about, and not being puffed up with more, with Coco as a male servant, embarked on board of their own consequence, they are not so selfish, and think the ship Circassian, A. I., bound to Liverpool. much more of the lady than of themselves. Young ladies, also, who fall in love, never consider whether there is sufficient to "make the pot boil"-probably because young ladies in love lose their appetites, and not feeling inclined soon afterwards. This was precisely the case with Ceci. shall pass over the voyage, confining ourselves to a description of the catastrophe. had changed her name the day before. It was also the continued for three days, and by which the Circassian had was, that the messman's account, for they lived in bar. o'clock at night, a slight lull was perceptible. The capplied to her family, who very kindly sent her word that mate. "Oswald," said Captain Ingram, "the gale is sent her word that he should be most happy to receive me if there be any change." them at his table, and that they should take up their abode Oswald Bareth, a tall, sinewy-built, and handsome speciin Finsbury Square. This was exactly what they wished; men of transatlantic growth, examined the whole circumferbut still there was a certain difficulty—Livut. Temple-ence of the horizon before he replied. At last his eyes were more's regiment was quartered in a town in Yorkshire, which was some trifling distance from Finsbury Square, "I see no signs of clearing off, to leeward; only a hall for and to be at Mr. Witherington's dinner-table at six r. n., relief, and a fresh hand at the bellows, depend upon it." with the necessity of appearing at parade every morning at "We have now had it three days," replied Captain Ingnine A. M., was a dilemma not to be got out of. Several letters ram, "and that's the life of a summer's gale," were interchanged upon this knotty subject; and at last it was agreed that Mr. Templemore should sell out, and come don't blow back again. "I don't like the look of it, sir; up to Mr. Witherington with his pretty wife : he did so, and and have it back we shall, as sure as there's snakes in Virfound that it was much more comfortable to turn out at ginny." nine o'clock in the morning to a good breakfast than to a "Well, so be if so be;" was the safe reply of the cappride and independence of character which would not per-leave the deck to call me; send a hand down." mit him to eat the bread of idleness, and, after a sojourn The captain descended to his cabin. Oswald looked at

"Well, we must hope for the best: but this suspense is Mr. Templemore was active and intelligent; their affairs anything but comfortable," observed Mr. Witherington, at prospered; and, in a few years, they anticipated a return to ter looking over the contents of the letter the twentieth time. Pheir native soil with a competence. But the autumn of "That will do, Jonathan; I'll ring for coffee presently:" the second year after their arrival proved very sickly; the and Mr. Witherington was again alone and with his eyes vellow fever raged; and, among the thousands who were carried off, Mr. Templemore was a victim, about three A cousin of Mr. Witherington, and a very great favour. weeks after his wife had been brought to bed of twins. ite, (for Mr. Witherington having a large fortune, and not Mrs. Templemore rose from her couch a widow and the having any thing to do with business, was courted by his mother of two fine boys. The loss of Mr. Templemore relations,) had, to a certain degree, committed herself; that was replaced by the establishment with which he was is to say, notwithstanding the injunctions of her parents, connected, and Mr. Witherington offered to his cousin she had fallen in love with a young lieutenant in a march. that asylum which, in her mournful and unexpected being regiment, whose pedigree was but respectable, and reavement, she so much required. In three months her whose fortune was anything but respectable, consisting affairs were arranged; and, with her little boys hanging merely of a subaltern's pay. Poor men unfortunately at the breasts of two negroe nurses, for no others could be always make love better than those who are rich, because, procured who would undertake the voyage, Mrs. Temple-

CHAPTER III.

THE GALE.

Those who, standing on the pier, had witnessed the to eat at that time, they imagine that love will always

THOSE who, standing on the pier, had witnessed the supply the want of food. Now, we will appeal to the married ladies whether we are not right in asserting, that, al. to the winds, little contemplated her fate: still less did though the collation spread for them and their friends on those on board; for confidence is the characteristic of seathe day of the marriage is looked upon with almost loath. men, and they have the happy talent of imparting their ing, they do not find their appetites return with interest confidence to whomever may be in their company. We

It was during a gale from the north-west which had even during his days of courtship; and the consequence been driven into the Bay of Biscay, that, at about twelve racks, was, in a few weeks, rather alarming. Cecilia ap. tain, who had remained on deck, sent down for the chief she might starve: but the advice neither suiting her nor breaking, and I think before morning we shall have had her husband, she then wrote to her cousin Antony, who the worst of it. I shall lie down for an hour or two: call martial parade. But Mr. Templemore had an honest tain. "You must keep a sharp look out, Bareth, and don't of two months in most comfortable quarters without a the compass in the bittacle—spoke a few words to the man messman's bill, he frankly stated his feelings to Mr. With. at the helm-gave one or two terrible kicks in the ribs to erington, and requested his assistance to procure for him-self an honourable livelihood. Mr. Witherington, who well—put a fresh quid of tobacco into his check, and then had become attached to them both, would have remonstra. proceeded to examine the heavens above. A cloud, much ted, observing that Cecilia was his own cousin, and that darker and more descending than the others which obhe was a confirmed old bachelor: but in this instance, Mr. scured the firmament, spread over the zenith, and based Templemore was firm, and Mr. Witherington very unwil. itself upon the horizon to leeward. Oswald's eye had been lingly consented. A mercantile house of the highest re-fixed upon it but a few seconds, when he beheld a small spectability required a partner who could superintend their lambent gleam of lightning pierce through the most opaque consignments to America. Mr. Witherington advanced part; then another, and more vivid. Of a sudden the the sum required; and, in a few weeks, Mr. and Mrs. Tem. wind lulled, and the Circassian righted from her careen.

Again the wind howled.

down to her bearings by its force : again another flash of enabled them to perceive their situation : and, awful us it

watching the heavens

Oswald, walking aft.

poke a-weather."

"I'll have that trysail off of her, at any rate," continued the mate. "Aft, there, my lads! and lower down the try-Keep the sheet fast till it's down, or the flogging will frighten the lady-passenger out of her wits. Well, if ever I own a craft, I'll have no women on board. Dollars shan't tempt me.

The lightning now played in rapid forks; and the loud thunder, which instantaneously followed each flash, proved its near approach. A deluge of slanting rain descendedthe wind lulled-roared again-then lulled-shifted a point or two, and the drenched and heavy sails flapped.

"Up with the helm, Mat!" cried Oswald, as a near flash of lightning for a moment blinded, and the accompanying peal of thunder deafened, those on deck. Again the wind blew strong—it ceased, and it was a dead calm. The sails hung down from the yards, and the rain descended in perpendicular torrents, while the ship rocked to and fro in the trough of the sea, and the darkness became suddenly in-

"Down, there, one of you! and call the captain," said Oswald. "By the Lord! we shall have it. Main braces, there men, and square the yard. Be smart! That topsail should have been in," muttered the mate; "but I'm not captain. Square away the yards, my lad !" continued he ; "quick, quick !- there's no child's play here!"

Owing to the difficulty of finding and passing the ropes to each other, from the intensity of the darkness, and the deluge of rain which blinded them, the men were not able to execute the order of the mate so soon as it was necessary; and, before they could accomplish their task, or Captain Ingram could gain the deck, the wind suddenly burst upon the devoted vessel from the quarter directly opceite to that from which the gale had blown, taking her all a-back, and throwing her on her beam-ends. The man at the holm was hurled over the wheel; while the rest, who were with Oswald at the main bits, with the coils of ropes and every other article on deck not secured, were rolled into the scuppers, struggling to extricate themselves from the mass of confusion and the water in which they his companions. The last blow was given by Oswald—floundered. The sudden revulsion awoke all the men be. low, who imagined that the ship was foundering; and, from the only hatchway not secured, they poured up in their panions hastened from their dangerous position, and reem on-if fate permitted.

tain Ingram and some of the seamen also gained the helm, of the masts, which she towed with her by the lee-rigging. It is the rendezvous of all good seamen in emergencies blinding of the rain and salt spray-the seas checked in flames, darting down upon every quarter of the horizon, ted in the gale.

lightning, which was followed by a distant peal of thunder.

"Had the worst of it, did you say, captain? I've a notion that the worst is yet to come;" muttered Oswald, still been accustomed to the difficulties and dangers of a seafaring life, there are no lines which speak more forcibly " How does she carry her helm, Matthew?" inquired to the imagination, or prove the beauty and power of the Greek poet, than those in the noble prayer of Ajax.

> " Lord of earth and air, O King! O father! hear my humble prayer.
> Dispet this cloud, the light of heaven restore;
> Give me to see—and Ajax asks no more.
> If Greece must perish—we thy will obey:
> But let us perish in the face of day!"

Oswald gave the helm to two of the seamen, and with his knife cut adrift the axes, which were lashed round the mizen-mast in painted canvass covers. One he retained for himself,—the others he put into the hands of the boatswain and the second mate. To speak so as to be heard was almost impossible, from the tremendous roaring of the wind; but the lamp still burned in the bittacle, and, by its feeble light, Captain Ingram could distinguish the signs made by the mate, and could give his consent. It was necessary that the ship should be put before the wind, and the helm had no power over her. In a short time the lanyards of the mizen rigging were severed, and the mizen-mast went over the side, almost unperceived by the crew on the other parts of the deck, or even those near, had it not been for blows received by those who were close to it, from the falling of topsail-sheets and the rigging about the mast.

Oswald with his companions regained the bittacle, and for some little time watched the compass. The ship did not pay off, and appeared to settle down more into the water. Again Oswald made his signs, and again the cap-tain gave his assent. Forward sprang the undaunted mate, clinging to the bulwark and belaying pins, and followed by his hardy companions, until they had all three gained the main-channels. Here, their exposure to the force of the breaking waves, and the stoutness of the ropes yielding but slowly to the blows of the axes, which were used almost under water, rendered the service one of extreme difficulty and danger. The boatswain was washed over the bulwark and dashed to leeward, where the leerigging only saved him from a watery grave. Unsubdued, he again climbed up to windward, rejoined and assisted his companions. The last blow was given by Oswald disappeared in the fearning seas. Oswald and his comshirts, with their other garments in their hands, to put joined the captain, who, with many of the crew, still remained near the wheel. The ship now slowly paid off and Oswald Bareth was the first who clambered up from to righted. In a few minutes she was flying before the gale, leeward. He gained the helm, which he put hard up. Cap. rolling heavily, and occasionally striking upon the wrecks

Although the wind blew with as much violence as beof this description: but the howling of the gale—the fore, still it was not with the same noise, now that the ship was before the wind with her after-masts gone. their running by shift of wind, and breaking over the ship service was to clear the ship of the wrecks of the masts; in vast masses of water—the tremendous peals of thunder but, although all now assisted, but little could be effected un--and the intense darkness which accompanied these hor-til the day had dawned, and even then it was a service of rors, added to the inclined position of the vessel, which danger, as the ship rolled gunwale under. Those who perobliged them to climb from one part of the deck to ano formed the duty were slung in ropes, that they might not ther, for some time checked all profitable communication, be washed away; and hardly was it completed, when a Their only friend, in this conflict of the elements, was the heavy roll, assisted by a heavy jerking heave from a sea lightning (unhappy, indeed, the situation in which light-ning can be welcomed as a friend); but its vivid and forked the starboard cat-head. Thus was the Circassian dismas-

our havi plied SALL you' 4

th

T

it i

the

ing

cer

ah

..

wa

they

the

turr

4 duty the I hang 41 Its ji Bill? 45 Bill,

...

" B

pay."

wee

ing u tion, well s and b Carpe

of the susper percei ng th

CHAPTER IV.

THE LEAK.

ger was now considered to be over, and the seamen joked and laughed as they were busied in preparing jury-masts to enable them to reach their destined port.

"I wouldn't have cared so much about this spree," said than was produced by this appalling intelligence. the boatswain, "if it warn't for the mainmast; it was such There's not another stick to be found equal to it in the whole length of the Mississippi."

the see as ever came out of it, and as good sticks grow-the one plank "between them and death" is sound, and ing as ever were felled; but I guess we'll pay pretty dear they will trust to their own energies, and will be confident for our spars when we get to Liverpool-but what con- in their own skill, but spring a leak, and they are half cerns the owners

The wind, which, at the time of its sudden change to the southward and eastward, had blown with the force of little better than children. a hurricane, now settled into a regular strong gale, such oswald sprang to the pumps, when he heard the caras sailors are prepared to meet and laugh at. The sky penter's report. "Try again, Abel—it cannot be: cut was also bright and clear, and they had not the danger of away that line; hand us a here a dry rope-yarn." a lee shore. It was a delightful change after a night of darkness, danger, and confusion; and the men worked that results were the same. "We must rig the pumps, my they might get sufficient sail on the ship to steady her, and lads," said the mate, endeavouring to conceal his own enable them to shape a course.

"I suppose, now that we have the trysail on her forward, when she was on her beam-ends." the captain will be running for it," observed one who was turning in a dead eye.

"Yes," replied the boatswain; "and with this wind in our quarter we shan't want much sail, I've a notion."

"Well, then, one advantage in losing your masts-you

havn't much trouble about the rigging.

"Trouble enough, though, Bill, when we get in," replied the other gruffly: new lower rigging to parcel and sarve, and every block to turn in afresh."

"Never mind, longer in port—I'll get spliced."

"Why, how often do you mean to get spliced, Bill? you've a wife in every State, to my sartin knowledge."

"I arn't got one at Liverpool, Jack."

"Well, you may take one there, Bill; for you've been sweet upon that nigger girl for these last three weeks."

"Any port in a storm, but she won't do for harbour duty: but the fact is, you're all wrong there, Jack. It's the babbies I likes—I likes to see them both together hanging at the niggers' breasts. I always thinks of two spider monkeys nursing two kittens."

"I knows the women, but I never knows the children. Its just six of one and half-a-dozen of the other, an't it

"Yes; like two bullets out of the same mould: I say,

Bill, did any of your wives ever have twins?" "No; nor I don't intend, until the owners give us double

pay."

"By the by," interrupted Oswald, who had been standing under the weather bulk-head listening to the conversable ascertained was, whether she leaked through the top-Carpenter, lay down your adze and sound the well."

the dismasted vessel, was performing his important share It was ten minutes past seven when the half hour had exof the work, immediately complied with the order. He pired; the well was sounded, and the line carefully meadrew up the rope-yarn, to which an iron rule had been sured—seven feet six inches! So that the water had gainsuspended, and lowered down into the pump-well, and ed upon them notwithstanding they had plied the pumps perceived that the water was dripping from it. Imaginto the utmost of their strength.

A mute look of despair was exchanged among the crew, shipped over all, the curpenter disengaged the rope-yarn from the rule, drew another from the junk lying on the deck, which the seamen were working up, and then pro-The wreck of the foremost was cleared from the ship; ceeded to plumb the well. He hauled it up, and, looking the gale continued; but the sun shone brightly and warmly. at it for some moments against, exclaimed "Secon feet The Circassian was again brought to the wind. All danwater in the hold, by G—d!"

If the crew of the Circassian, the whole of which were on deck, had been struck with an electric shock, the sudden change in their countenances could not have been greater

Heap upon sailors every disaster, every danger which can be accumulated from waves, the wind, the elements, or the enemy, and they will bear up against them with a "Bah! man," replied Oswald, "there's as good fish in courage amounting to heroism. All they demand is, that paralyzed; and if it gain upon them they are subdued; for when they find that their exertions are futile, they are

Once more the well was sounded by Oswald, and the fears; "half this water must have found its way in her

This idea, so judiciously thrown out, was caught at by the seamen, who hastened to obey the order, while Oswald went down to acquaint the captain, who, worn out with watching and fatigue, had, now that danger was considered to be over, thrown himself into his cot to obtain a few hours' repose.

"Do you think, Bareth, that we have sprung a leak ?" said the captain earnestly; "she never could have taken in that quantity of 'water."

"Never, sir," replied the mate; " but she has been so strained that she may have opened her topsides. I trust it is no worse,"

"What is your opinion then?"

"I am afraid that the wreck of the masts have injured her: you may recollect how often we struck against them before we could clear ourselves of them; once, particularly, the main-mast appeared to be right under her bottom I recollect, and she struck very heavy on it."

"Well, it is God's will: let us get on deck as fast as

When they arrived on deck, the carpenter walked up to the captain, and quietly said to him, " Seven feet three, The pumps were then in full action; the men had divided, by the directions of the boatswain, and, stripped naked to the waist, relieved each other every two minutes. For half an hour they laboured incessantly.

tion, and watching the work in progress, "we may just as sides, and had taken in the water during the second gale; well see if she has made any water with all this straining if so, there was every hope of keeping it under. Captain and buffeting. By the Lord! I never thought of that. Ingram and the mate remained in silence near the capstern, the former with his watch in his hand, during the The carpenter, who, notwithstanding the uneasiness of time that the sailors exerted themselves to the utmost.

but it was followed up by curses and execrations. Cap-|which I understand very well. Sorry I shall be to tain Ingram remained silent, with his lips compressed.

" It's all over with us!" exclaimed one of the men.

have only to put her before the wind again, and have getting drunk every day, as soon as we get on shore another good spell at the pumps. When no longer strainagain? There's a time for all things; and I've a notion ed, as she is now with her broadside to the sea, she will this is a time to be a sober." close all up again."

the carpenter; "however, that's my notion too

"The Circassian is, sir, I am afraid," replied the mate: will become of my poor babes?" " pumping is of no avail; they could not keep her afloat till day-break. We must, therefore, trust to our boats, which I believe to be all sound, and quit her before night."

"Crowded boats in such a sea as this!" replied Captain

Ingram, shaking his head mournfully-

"Are bad enough, I grant; but better than the sea itself. All we can do now is to try and keep the men are more required than in a situation like the one which sober, and if we can do so it will be better than to fatigue we have attempted to describe. It is impossible to know them uselessly; they'll want all their strength before they the precise moment at which a water-logged vessel, in a put foot again upon dry land—if ever they are so fortunate. Shall I speak to them ?"

" Do, Oswald," replied the captain; " for myself I care

little, God know's; but my wife-my children!"

ference—"as for pumping any longer it would be only boat, and it was agreed that the larger receive Mrs. Tem-wearing out your strength for no good. We must now look to our boats; and a good boat is better than a bad Ingram. The number appointed to Oswald's boat being much for boats at present; we had therefore better stick laid to to leeward, waiting to keep company. Mrs. Temto the ship as long as we can. Let us set to with a will plemore came up with Captain Ingram, and was assisted and get the boats ready, with provisions, water, and what by him into the boat. The nurse, with one child, was at else may be needful, and then we must trust to God's last placed at her side; Coco was leading Judy, and the mercy and our own endeavours."

appealing to the men.

"Williams," said the mate, "a short life it may be have your blood, or that of others, on my hands; but as sure as there's a heaven, I'll cleave to the shoulder "Not yet, my lads; we have one more chance," said the first man who attempts to break into the spirit-Oswald; "I've a notion that the ships sides have been room. You know I never joke. Shame upon you! opened by the infernal straining of last night, and that she Do you call yourselves men, when, for the sake of a is now taking it in at the top-sides generally: if so, we little liquor now, you would lose your only chance of

As most of the crew sided with Oswald, the weaker "I shouldn't wonder if Mr. Bareth is not right," replied party were obliged to submit, and the preparations were commenced. The two boats on the booms were found to "And mine," added Captain Ingram. "Come, my be in good condition. One party was employed cutting men! never say die while there's a shot in the locker, away the bulwarks, that the boats might be launched over Let's try her again." And, to encourage the men, the side, as there were no means of hoisting them out. The Captain Ingram threw off his coat and assisted at the well was again sounded. Nine feet water in the hold, and first spell, while Oswald went to the helm and put the the ship evidently settling fast. Two hours had now pasship before the wind.

As the Circassian rolled before the gale, the lazy manner in which she righted proved how much water recovered its regular run. All was ready; the sailors, there was in the hold. The same created the sailors, there was in the hold. The scamen exerted themselves once at work again, had, in some measure, recovered their for a whole hour without intermission, and the well was spirits, and were buoyed up with fresh hopes at the slight gain sounded—right feet! The men did not assert that they would pump no two boats were quite large enough to contain the whole of longer; but they too plainly showed their intentions by the crew and passengers; but, as the sailors said among each resuming in silence his shirt and jacket, which themselves (proving the kindness of their hearts), "What he had taken off at the commencement of his exertions was to become of those two poor babbies, in an open boat "What's to be done, Oswald?" said Captain Ingram, for days and nights, perhaps?" Captain Ingram had gone as they walked aft. "You see the men will pump no down to Mrs. Templemore, to impart to her their melan-longer; nor, indeed, would it be of any use. We are choly prospects; and the mother's heart, as well as the mother's voice, echoed the words of the seamen, "What

It was not till nearly six o'clock in the evening that all was ready: the ship was slowly brought to the wind again, and the boats launched over the side. By this time the gale was much abated; but the vessel was full of water, and was expected soon to go down.

There is no time in which coolness and determination of mental fever, with the idea of their remaining in her so late that she will suddenly submerge, and leave them to struggle in the wave. This feeling actuated many of the crew of the Circassian, and they had already retreated to "My lads," said Oswald, going forward to the men, crew of the Circassian, and they had already retreated to who had waited in moody silence the result of the con. the boats. All were arranged; Oswald had charge of one Still, this gale and cross-running sea are rather too completed, he shoved off, to make room for the other, and other nurse, with the remaining infant in her arms, and "No boat can stand this sea," observed one of the men ; Captain Ingram, who had been obliged to go into the boat "I'm of opinion, as it's to be a short life, it may as well with the first child, was about to return to assist Judy with be a merry one. What d'ye say, my lads?" continued he, the other, when the ship gave a heavy pitch, and her fore-Several of the crew were of the same opinion : but Os. wale of the boat was stove by coming in contact with the wald, stepping forward, seized one of the axes which lay side of the vessel. "She's down, by God!" exclaimed the at the main-bitts, and going up to the seaman who had alarmed seamen in the boat; shoving off to escape from spoken, looked him steadfastly in the face;—

Captain Ingram, who was standing on the boat's thwarts to all of us, but not a merry one; the meaning of to assist Judy, was thrown back into the bottom of the

th

his liar nit

. . is it

abou

poor go i not e

replie A 10 . pair : .

40 death boat; and, before he could extricate himself, the boat was separated from the ship, and had drifted to leeward.

"My child!" screamed the mother; " my child!" "Pull to again, my lads!" cried Captain Ingram, seizing the tiller.

The men, who had been alarmed at the idea that the ship was going down, now that they saw that she was still afloat, got out the oars and attempted to regain her, but in vainthey could not make head against the sea and wind. Further and further did they drift to leeward, notwithstanding their exertions; while the frantic mother extended her arms, imploring and entreating. Captain Ingram, who had stimulated the sailors to the utmost, perceived that further attempts were useless.

"My child! my child!" screamed Mrs. Templemore, standing up, and holding out her arms towards the vessel. At a sign from the captain, the head of the boat was veered The bereaved mother knew that all hope was gone, and she fell down in a state of insensibility.

CHAPTER V.

THE OLD MAID.

ONE morning, shortly after the disasters which we have described, Mr. Witherington descended to his breakfast-room somewhat earlier than usual and found his green morocco easy-chair already tenanted by no less a personage than William, the footman, who, with his feet on the fender, was so attentively reading the newspaper that he did not hear his master's entrance. "By my ancestor, who fought on his stumps! but I hope you are quite comfortable, Mr. William; nay, I beg I may not disturb you, sir."

William, although as impudent as most of his fraternity, was a little taken aback: "I beg your pardon, sir, but Mr. Jonathan had not time to look over the paper."

"Nor is it required that he should, that I know of, sir." "Mr. Jonathan says, sir, that it is always right to look over the deaths, that news of that kind may not shock you."

Very considerate, indeed!"

"And there is a story there, sir, about a shipwreck."

"A shipwreck! where, William? God bless me where is it?"

"I am afraid it is the same ship you are so anxions about, sir,-the -; I forget the name, sir."

Mr. Witherington took the newspaper, and his eye soon caught the paragraph in which the rescue of the two negroes and child from the wreck of the Circassian was fully detailed.

"It is, indeed!" exclaimed Mr. Witherington; "my poor Cecilia in an open boat! one of the boats was seen to saved. Mercy on me! where's Jonathan?"

"Here, sir," replied Jonathan, very solemnly, who had not of death.

"I must go to Portsmouth immediately after breakfast

-shan't eat though—appetite all gone."
"People seldom do, sir, on these melancholy occasions replied Jonathan; "will you take your own carriage, sir, or a mourning coach ?"

" A mourning coach at fourteen miles an hour, with two pair of horses! Jonathan, you're crazy.'

"Will you have black silk hatbands and gloves for the coachman and servants who attend you, sir?"

"Confound your shop! no; this is a resurrection, not a death: it appears that the negro thinks only one of the "More omais sincit," quoth Jonathan, casting up his eyes

"Never you mind that; mind your own business, That's the postman's knock-see if there are any letters,"

There were several; and, amongst the others, there was one from Captain Maxwell, of the Eurydice, detailing the circumstances already known, and informing Mr. Witherington that he had despatched the two negroes and the child to his address by that day's coach, and that one of the officers, who was going to town by the same conveyance. would see them safe at his house.

Captain Maxwell was an old acquaintance of Mr. Witherington-had dined at his house in company with the Templemores, and therefore had extracted quite enough information from the negroes to know where to direct

"By the blood of my ancestors! they'll be here tonight," cried Mr. Witherington; "and I have saved my journey. What is to be done? better tell Mary to get rooms ready: d'ye hear, William beds for one little boy and two niggers.

"Yes, sir," replied William; "but where are the black people to be put?"

"Put! I don't care; one may sleep with cook, the other with Mary."

" Very well, sir, I'll tell them," replied William, hastening away, delighted at the row which he anticipated in the kitchen.

"If you please, sir," observed Jonathan, "one of the negroes is, I believe a man."

" Well, what then?"

"Only, sir, the maids may object to sleep with him."

"By all the plagues of the Witheringtons! that is true; ell, you may take him, Jonathan-you like that colour."

"Not in the dark, sir," replied Jonathan, with a bow. "Well, then, let them sleep together: so, that affair is ett'ed."

"Are they man and wife, sir?" said the butler.

"The devil take them both! how should I know? let me have my breakfast, and we'll talk over the matter by and by."

Mr. Witherington applied to his eggs and muffin, eating his breakfast as fast as he could, without knowing why: but the reason was that he was puzzled and perplexed with the anticipated arrival, and longed to think quietly over the dilemma, for it was a dilemma to an old bachelor.

"By the blood of the Witheringtons! what am I, an old bachelor, to do with a baby and a wetnurse as black as go down,-perhaps she's dead-merciful God! one boy the ace of spades, and another black fellow in the bargain? Send him back again? yes, that's, best: but the childwoke every morning at five o'clock with its squallingust brought in the eggs, and now stood erect as a mute obliged to kiss it three times a day—pleasant!—and then behind his master's chair, for it was a case of danger, if that nigger of a nurse—thick lips—kissing child all day, and then holding it out to me-ignorant as a cow-if child has the stomach-ache she'll cram a pepper-pod down its throat-West India fashion-children never without the stomach-ache-my poor, poor cousin !--what has become of her and the other child, too ?-wish they may pick her up, poor dear ! and then she will come and take care of her own children—don't know what to do—great mind to send for sister Moggy—but she's so fussy—wont be in a hurry. Think again.

Here Mr. Witherington was interrupted by two taps at

"Come in," said he; and the cook, with her face as red as if she had been dressing a dinner for eighteen, made her appearance without the usual clean apron.

"If you please, sir," said she, curtseying, "I will thank the whole story, requesting her to come and superintend his you to suit yourself with another cook."

"Oh, very well," replied Mr. Witherington, angry at the the following reply:

"And, if you please, sir, I should like to go this very day-indeed, sir, I shall not stay."

"Go to the devil! if you please," replied Mr. Witherington, angrily; " but first go out and shut the door after you."

The cook retired, and Mr. Witherington was again alone.

"Confound the old woman-what a huff she is in! won't cook for black people, I suppose-yes, that's it."

Here Mr. Witherington was again interrupted by a second double tap at the door.

"Oh! thought better of it, I suppose. Come in."

It was not the cook, but Mary, the housemaid, that en-

"If you please, sir," said she, whimpering, "I should wish to leave my situation."

"A conspiracy, by heavens! Well, you may go."

" To-night, sir, if you please," answered the woman.

"This moment, for all I care!" exclaimed Mr. Witherington in his wrath.

The housemaid retired; and Mr. Witherington took some time to compose himself.

"Servants all going to the devil in this country," said he at last; "proud fools-wont't clean rooms after black people, I suppose-yes, that's it-confound them all, black and white! here's my whole establishment upset by the arrival of a baby-well, it is very uncomfortable-what shall I do ?-send for sister Moggy ?-no, I'll send for

Mr. Witherington rang the bell, and Jonathan made his

"What is all this, Jonathan!" said he; "cook angry

Mary crying-both going away-what's it all about ?"

"Why, air, they were told by William that it was your positive order that the two black people were to sleep with them; and I believe he told Mary that the man was to sleep with her."

"Confound that fellow! he's always at mischief; you know, Jonathan, I never meant that."

"I thought not, sir, as it is quite contrary to custom," replied Jonathan.

" Well, then, tell them so, and let's hear no more about

Mr. Witherington then entered into a consultation with his butler, and acceded to the arrangements proposed by him. The parties arrived in due time, and were properly accommodated. Master Edward was not troubled with right in hiring two black people to bring the child into your the stomach-ache, neither did he wake Mr. Witherington at five c'clock in the morning; and, after all, it was not so very uncomfortable. But, although things were not quite so uncomfortable as Mr. Witherington had anticipated, still they were not comfortable; and Mr. Witherington was so annoyed by continual skirmishes between his servants, complaints from Judy, in bad English, of the cook, who, it must be owned, had taken a prejudice against her and Coco, occasional illness of the child, et cetera, that he found his house no longer quiet and peaceable. Three months had now nearly passed, and no tidings of the boats had been received; and Captain Maxwell, who came up to see Mr. Witherington, gave it as his decided opinion that they must have foundered in the gale. As, therefore, there appeared to be no chance of Mrs. Templemore coming to house with all the nomp and protecting air of one who write to Bath, where his sister resided, and acquaint her with was the saviour of her brother's reputation and character.

domestic concerns. A few days afterwards he received

" Bath, August.

" MY DEAR BROTHER ANTONY,

"Your letter arrived safe to hand on Wednesday lastand I must say that I was not a little surprised at its con tents; indeed, I thought so much about it that I revoked at Lady Betty Blabkin's whist-party, and lost four shillings and sixpence. You say that you have a child at your house belonging to your cousin, who married in so indeco-rous a manner. I hope what you say is true; but, at the same time, I know what bachelors are guilty of; although, as Lady Betty says, it is better never to talk or even to hint about these improper things. I cannot imagine why men should consider themselves, in an unmarried state, as absolved from that purity which maidens are so careful to preserve; and so says Lady Betty, with whom I had a little conversation on the subject. As, however, the thing is done, she agrees with me that it is better to hush it up as well as we can.

"I presume that you do not intend to make the child your heir, which I should consider as highly improper; and, indeed, Lady Betty tells me that the legacy-duty is ten per cent., and that it cannot be avoided. However, I make it a rule never to talk about these sort of things. As for your request that I would come up and superintend your establishment, I have advised with Lady Betty on the subject, and she agrees with me that, for the honor of the family, it is better that I should come, as it will save appearances. You are in a peck of troubles, as most men are who are free-livers, and are led astray by artful and alluring females. However, as Lady Betty says, 'the least said the soonest mended.'

"I will, therefore, make the necessary arrangements for letting my house, and hope to join you in about ten days; sooner I cannot, as I find that my engagements extend to that period. Many questions have already been put to me on this unpleasant subject; but I always give but one answer, which is, that bachelors will be bachelors; and that, at all events, it is not so bad as if you were a married man; for I make it a rule never to talk about, or even to hint about these sort of things, for, as Lady Betty says, 'Men will get into scrapes, and the sconer things are hushed up the better.' So no more at present from your affectionate sister,

" MARGARET WITHERINGTON."

house, as it makes the thing look foreign to the neighbours, and we can keep our own secrets.

7

Un

Ca

gre

pro

tnii

but eno

wit

hole

and

hea

war

ture

ture

corp

capt

his .

capt:

strid

7

"Now, by all the sins of the Witheringtons, if this is not enough to drive a man out of his senses !- Confound the suspicious old maid !- I'll not let her come into this house. Confound Lady Betty, and all scandal-loving old tabbies like her! Bless me!" continued Mr. Witherington, throwing the letter on the table, with a deep sigh, " this is anything but comfortable."

But if Mr. Witherington found it anything but comfortable at the commencement, he found it unbearable in the sequel.

When the child was first brought down to her, instead of were sharp and lean as was his body, and were every apperceiving at once its likeness to Mr. Templemore, which pearance of a cross-grained temper. was very strong, she looked at it and at her brother's face with her only eye, and, shaking her finger, exclaimed-

"Oh, Antony! Antony! and did you expect to deceive me?—the nose—the mouth exact—Antony, for shame! fie, for shame!"

But we must hurry over the misery that Mr. Witherington's kindness and benevolence brought upon him. Not a day passed-searcely an hour, without his cars being galled with his sister's insinuations. Judy and Coco were sent back to America; the servants, who had remained so long in his service, gave warning one by one, and, afterwards, replied to by the captain with a "Very true." were changed as often almost as there was a change in the moon. She ruled the house and her brother despotically; and all poor Mr. Witherington's comfort was gone until the time arrived when Master Edward was to be sent to school Mr. Witherington then plucked up courage; and, after a few stormy months, drove his sister back to Bath, and once more found himself comfortable.

Edward came home during the holidays, and was a great favourite; but the idea had become current that he was the son of the old gentleman, and the remarks made were so unpleasant and grating to him, that he was not sorry, much as he was attached to the boy, when he declared his intention to choose the profession of a sailor.

Captain Maxwell introduced him into the service; and afterwards, when, in consequence of ill health and exhaustion, he was himself obliged to leave it for a time, he send him to the mast-head, he goes up laughing; if I call procured for his protege other ships. We must, therefore, him down, he comes down laughing; if I find fault with allow some years to pass away, during which time Edward him, he laughs the next minute: in fact, sir, he does Templemore pursues his career-Mr. Witherington grows nothing but laugh. I should particularly wish, sir, that older and more particular, and his sister Moggy amuses you would speak to him, and see if any interference on herself with Lady Betty's remarks, and her darling game your part-

During all this period, no tidings of the boats, or of Mrs. Templemore and her infant, had been heard; it was therefore naturally conjectured that they had all perished, and they were remembered but as things that had been.

CHAPTER VI.

THE MIDSHIPMAN.

The weather side of the quarter-deck of H. M. frigate Unicorn was occupied by two very great personages: Captain Plumbton, commanding the ship; who was very great in width if not in height, taking much more than his allowance of the deck, if it were not that he was the proprietor thereof, and entitled to the hon's share. Captain P. was not more than four feet ten inches in height; but then he was equal to that in girt: there was quite enough of him, if he had only been rolled out. He walked with his coat flying open, his thumbs stuck into the armholes of his waistcoat, so as to throw his shoulders back and increase his horizontal dimensions. He also held his head well aft, which threw his chest and stomach well forward. He was the prototype of pomposity and good nature, and he strutted like an actor in a procession

The other personage was the first-lieutenant, whom nature had pleased to fashion in another mould. He was as tali as the captain was short—as thin as his superior was corpulent. His long, lanky legs were nearly up to the captain's shoulders; and he bowed down over the head of his superior, as if he were the crane to hoist up, and the captain the hale of goods to be hoisted. He carried his hands behind his back, with two fingers twisted together; and his chief difficulty appeared to be to reduce his own stride to the parrot march of the captain. His features ficer?"
vol. xxviii. FEBRUARY, 1836—24.

pearance of a cross-grained temper.

He had been making divers complaints of divers persons, and the captain had hitherto appeared imperturbable. Captain Plumbton was an even-tempered man, who was satisfied with a good dinner. Lieutenant Markitall was an odd-tempered man, who would quarrel with his bread and butter.

"Quite impossible, sir," continued the first lieutenant,

to carry on the duty without support."

This oracular observation, which, from the relative forms of the two parties, descended as it were from above, was

"Then, sir, I presume you will not object to my putting that man in the report for punishment."

"I'll think about it, Mr. Markitall." This, with Captain Plumbton, was as much as to say, no.

"The young gentlemen, sir, I am sorry to say, are very troublesome"

"Boys always are," replied the captain.

" Yes, sir; but the duty must be carried on, and I cannot do without them."

"Very true-midshipmen are very useful."

" But I'm sorry to say, sir, that they are not. Now, sir, there's Mr. Templemore; I can do nothing with himhe does nothing but laugh."

" Laugh !- Mr. Markitall, does he laugh at you?"

"Not exactly, sir; but he laughs at every thing. If I "Would make him cry-ch? better to laugh than cry in this world. Does he never cry, Mr. Markitall?"

"Yes, sir, and very unseasonably. The other day, you may recollect, when you punished Wilson the marine, whom I appointed to take care of his chest and hammock, he was crying the whole time; almost tantamount-at least an indirect species of mutiny on his part, as it im-

" That the boy was sorry that his servant was punished; I never flog a man but I'm sorry myself, Mr. Markitall."

"Well, I do not press the question of his crying-that I might look over; but his laughing, sir, I must beg that you will take notice of that. Here he is, sir, coming up the hatchway. Mr. Templemore, the captain wishes to speak to you."

Now, the captain did not wish to speak to him, but, forced upon him as it was by the first-lieutenant, he could do no less. So Mr. Templemore touched his hat, and stood before the captain, we regret to say, with such a good-hu-moured, sly, confiding smirk on, his countenance, as at once established the proof of the accusation, and the enormity of the offence.

" So, sir," said Captain Plumbton, stopping in his rambulation, and squaring his shoulders still more, "I find that you laugh at the first-lieutenant."

"I, sir?" replied the boy, the smirk expanding into a

"Yes, you, sir," said the first-lieutenant, now drawing up to his full height; "why, you're laughing now, sir." "I can't help it, sir-it's not my fault; and I'm sure it's not yours, sir," added the boy, demurely.

"Are you aware, Edward-Mr. Templemore, I mean of the impropriety of disrespect to your superior of

can recollect, and that was when he tumbled over the messenger."

" And why did you laugh at him then, sir."

"I always do laugh when any one tumbles down," replied the lad; "I can't help it, sir."

"Then, sir, I suppose you would laugh if you saw me rolling in the lee-scuppers," said the captain.

" Oh!" replied the boy, no longer able to contain himself, "I'm sure I should burst myself with laughing-I think I see you now, sir."

I'm afraid, young gentleman, you stand convicted by your own confession."

"Yes, sir, of laughing, if that is any crime; but it's the inquiry. not in the articles of war."

to the mast-head."

"But I obey the order, sir, immediately-do I not, Mr. Markitall?"

"Yes, sir, you obey the order; but at the same time your laughing proves that you do not mind the punish- countenance, walked away. ment."

"No more I do, sir. I spend half my life at the masthead, and I'm used to it now."

"But, Mr. Templemore, ought you not to feel the disgrace of the punishment," inquired the captain, severely.

"Yes, sir, if I felt that I deserved it I should should not laugh, sir, if you sent me to the mast-head," replied the boy, assuming a serious countenance.

"You see, Markitall, that he can be grave," observed

the captain.

" I've tried all I can to make him so, sir," replied the first-lieutenant; "but I wish to ask Mr. Templemore what he means to imply by saying, 'when he deserves it.'-Does he mean to say that I punished him unjustly?"

"Yes, sir," replied the boy boldly; "five times out of six, I am mast-headed for nothing-and that's the reason why I do not mind it."

For nothing, sir! Do you call laughing nothing?"

ship's company laugh."

work all the better for being merry."

fere with me and the discipline of the ship, I beg you will be so lucky as to obtain it. see what effect your punishing will have upon him."

"Mr. Templemore," said the captain, "you are, in the first place too free in your speech, and, in the next place, too fond of laughing. There is Mr. Templemore, a time for all things-a time to be merry, and a time to be serious. The quarter-deck is not the fit place for mirth."

the boy.

" No-you are right, nor the gangway; but you may laugh on the forecastle, and when below with your messmates."

if he hears us laughing."

"I believe I am, sir; and if it's wrong I'm sorry to

"I never laughed at Mr. Markitall but once, sir, that I shines-I always feel so happy; but although you do mast-head me, Mr. Markitall, I should not laugh, but be very sorry, if any misfortune happened to you."

"I believe you would, boy-I do, indeed, Mr. Markitall." said the captain.

"Well, Sir," replied the first-lieutenant, "as Mr. Templemore appears to be aware of his error, I do not wish to press my complaint-I have only to request that he will never laugh again."

"You hear, boy, what the first-lieutenant says; it's very reasonable, and I beg I may hear no more complaints. "Do you indeed! I'm very glad that you do not; though Mr. Markitall, let me know when the foot of that foretopsail will be repaired-I should like to shift it to-night."

Mr. Markitall went down under the half-deck to make

"And, Edward," said Captain Plumbton, as soon as the "No, sir; but disrespect is. You laugh when you go lieutenant was out of ear-shot, "I have a good deal more to say to you upon this subject, but I have no time now. So come and dine with me-at my table, you know, I allow laughing in moderation."

The boy touched his hat, and with a grateful, happy

We have introduced this little scene, that the reader may form some idea of the character of Edward Templemore. He was indeed the soul of mirth, good-humour, and kindly feelings towards others; he even felt kindly towards the first-lieutenant, who persecuted him for his risible propensities. We do not say that the boy was right I in laughing at all times, or that the first-lieutenant was wrong in attempting to check it. As the captain said, there is a time for all things, and Edward's laugh was not always seasonable; but it was his nature, and he could not help it. He was joyous as the May morning; and thus he continued for years, laughing at everythingpleased with everybody-almost universally liked-and his bold, free, and happy spirit, unchecked by vicissitude or hardship.

He served his time-was nearly turning back, when he was passing his examination, for laughing, and then went laughing to sea again-was in command of a boat at the cutting out of a French corvette, and, when on board, was "I pay every attention that I can to my duty, sir; I so much amused by the little French captain skipping always obey your orders; I try all I can to make you about with his rapier, which proved fatal to many, that, at pleased with me—but you are always punishing me." last, he received a pink from the little gentleman himself, "Yes, sir, for laughing, and, what is worse, making the which laid him on the deck. For this affair, and in consideration of his wound, he obtained his promotion to the "They 'hanl and hold' just the same sir-I think they rank of lieutenant-was appointed to a line-of-battle ship in the West Indies-laughed at the yellow fever-was ap-"And pray sir, what business have you to think," re-pointed to the tender of that ship, a fine schooner, and was plied the first-lieutenant, now very angry. "Captain sent to cruise for prize-money for the admiral, and promo-Plumbton, as this young gentleman thinks proper to inter. tion for himself, if he could, by any fortunate encounter,

ne

in

ce

the

atr

Sh

nor

and ribs

topi

Wer and

sun

Wor

man

wate

CHAPTER VII

SLEEPER'S BAY.

On the western coast of Africa there is a small bay which has received more than one name from its occa-"I'm sure the gangway is not," shrewdly interrupted signal visitors. That by which it was designated by the adventurous Portuguese, who first dared to cleave the waves of the southern Atlantic, has been forgotten with their lost maritime pre-eminence; the name allotted to it "No, sir, we may not; Mr. Markitall always sends out by the woolly-headed natives of the coast has never, perhaps, been ascertained: it is, however, marked down in "Because, Mr. Templemore, you are always laughing." some of the old English charts as Sleeper's Bay.

The main-land which, by its curvature, has formed displease you, but I mean no disrespect. I laugh in my this little dent on a coast possessing, and certainly at presleep-I laugh when I awake-I laugh when the sun sent requiring, few harbours, displays, perhaps, the least inviting of all prospects; offering to the view nothing but discover the sandy bottom beneath her, and the anchor shelving beach of dazzling white sand, backed with a few which lay under her counter. A small boat floated astern, small hummocks beat up by the occasional fury of the Atlantic gales—arid, bare, and without the slightest appearance of vegetable life. The inland prospect is shrouded We must now go on board, and our first cause of sursome huge shark, either sluggishly moving through the mainboom. heated element, or stationary in the torpor of the mid-day human life, cannot well be conceived, unless, by flying to a carriage, revolving in a circle, and so arranged that in bad fixing cold, and " close-ribbed ice," at the frozen poles.

lenged the unanimous admiration of those who could applient, that, in the person of her commander, to the strictest preciate the merits of her build, had she been anchored in discipline there is united the practical knowledge of a the most frequented and busy harbour of the universe, thorough seaman. How, indeed, otherwise could she have So beautiful were her lines, that you might almost have so long continued her lawless yet successful career? How imagined her a created being that the ocean had been could it have been possible to unite a crew of miscreants, ordered to receive, as if fashioned by the Divine Archi-who feared nor Godor man, most of whom had perpetrated tect, to add to the beauty and variety of his works; for, foul murders, or had been guilty of even blacker iniquities? from the huge leviathan to the smallest of the finny tribe It was because he who commanded the vessel was so sustorm-where could be found, among the winged or fin. knowledge of his profession, in courage, and moreover in ned frequenters of the ocean, a form more appropriate, physical strength-which in him was almost Herculean. more fitting, than this specimen of human skill whose Unfortunately, he was also superior to all in villany, in beautiful model and elegant tapering spars were now all cruelty, a d contempt of all injunctions, moral and Divine. that could be discovered to break the meeting lines of the What had been the early life of this person was but imfirmament and horizon of the offing.

" Avenger."

instructions relative to this vessel, which had been so suc- vious to his seizing this vessel and commencing his reckcessful in her career of crime-not a trader in any por-less career. The name by which he was known to the tion of the navigable globe but whose crew shuddered at crew of the pirate vessel was "Cain," and well had he chothe mention of her name, and the remembrance of the sen this appellation; for, had not his hand for more than atrocities which had been practised by her reckless crew. three years been against every man's, and every man's She had been every where-in the east, the west, the hand against his? In person he was above six feet high, north and the south, leaving a track behind her of rapine with a breadth of shoulders and of chest denoting the utand murder. There she lay, in motionless beauty; her most of physical force which, perhaps, has ever been allotlow sides were painted black, with one small, narrow ted to man. His features would have been handsome, had riband of red-her raking masts were clean scraped-her they not been scarred with wounds; and, strange to say, topmasts, her cross-trees, caps, and even runnig-blocks, his eyes was mild, and of a soft blue. His mouth was well were painted in pure white. Awnings were spread fore formed, and his teeth of a pearly white; the hair of his and aft to protect the crew from the powerful rays of the head was crisped and wavy, and his beard, which he wore, sun; her ropes were hauled taut; and in every point she as did every person composing the crew of the pirate, coverwore the appearance of being under the control of sea-ed the lower part of his face, in strong, waving, and con-manship and strict discipline. Through the clear smooth tinued curls. The proportions of his body were perfect; water her copper shone brightly; and, as you looked over but, from their vastness, they became almost terrific. His her taffrail down into the calm blue sea, you could plainly costume was elegant, and well adapted to his form: linen over by a dense mirage, through which here and there prise will be the deception relative to the tonnage of the are to be discovered the stems of a few distant palm-trees, schooner, when viewed from a distance. Instead of a small so broken and disjoined by refraction that they present vessel of about ninety tons, we discover that she is upwards to the imagination anything but the idea of foliage or of two hundred; that her breadth of beam is enormous; and shade. The water in the bay is calm and smooth as the that those spars which appeared so light and elegant, are polished mirror; not the smallest ripple is to be heard on of unexpected dimensions. Her decks are of narrow fir the beach, to break through the silence of nature; not a planks, without the least spring or rise; her ropes are of breath of air sweeps over its glassy surface, which is heat. Manilla hemp, neatly secured to copper belaying-pins, and ed with the intense rays of a vertical noon-day sun, pour-coiled down on the deck, whose whiteness is well coning down a withering flood of light and heat; not a sea-trasted with the bright green paint of her bulwarks; her bird is to be discovered wheeling on its flight, or balancing capstern and binnacles are cased in fluted mahogany, and on its wing as it pierces the deep with its searching eye, ornamented with brass; metal stanchions protected the ready to dart upon its prey. All is silence, solitude, and skylights, and the bright muskets are arranged in front of desolation, save that occasionally may be seen the fin of the mainmast, while boarding-pikes are lashed round the

In the centre of the vessel, between the fore and main heat. A site so sterile, so stagnant, so little adapted to masts, there is a long brass thirty-two-pounder, fixed upon extremes, we were to portray the chilling blast, the trans-fixing cold, and "close-ribbed ice," at the frozen poles. side of her decks are mounted eight brass guns, of smaller At the entrance of this bay, in about three fathoms calibre and of exquisite workmanship. Her build proves water, heedless of the spring cable, which hung down as the skill of the architect; her fitting-out, a judgment in a rope which had fallen overboard, there floated, motion which naught has been sacrificed to, although everything less as death, a vessel whose proportions would have chal- has been directed by, taste; and her neatness and arrange--from the towering albatross to the boding peteral of the perior as to find in her no rivalry. Superior in talent, in perfectly known. It was undoubted that he had received Alas! she was fashioned, at the will of avarice, for an excellent education, and it was said that he was of an the aid of cruelty and injustice; and now was even more ancient border family, on the banks of the Tweed; by nefariously employed. She had been a slaver-she was what chances he had become a pirate-by what errors he now the far-famed, still more dreaded, pirate-schooner, the had fallen from his station in society, until he became an outcast, had never been revealed; it was only known that Not a man-of-war which scoured the deep but had her he had been some years employed in the slave-trade, pre-

Turkish skull-cap, handsomely embroidered; a pair of pistols, and a long knife in his sash, completed his attire.

The crew consisted in all of 165 men, of almost every nation; but it was to be remarked, that all those in authority were either Englishmen or from the northern countries: the others were chiefly Spaniards and Maltese.— Still there were Portuguese, Brazilians, negroes, and others, who made up the complement, which, at the time we now speak, was increased by twenty-five additional hands. These were Kroumen, a race of blacks well known at present, who inhabit the coast near Cape Palmas, and are often employed by our men-of-war stationed on the coast to relieve the English seamen from duties which would be too severe to those who are not inured to the climate. They are powerful, athlectic men, good sailors, of a happy, merry disposition, and, unlike other Africans will work hard. Fond of the English, they generally speak the language sufficiently to be understood, and are very glad to receive a haptism when they come on board. The name first given them they usually adhere to as long as they live; and you will now on the coast meet with a Blucher, a Wellington, a Nelson, &c., who will wring swabs, or do any other of the meanest description of work, without feeling that it is discreditable to sponsorials so grand.

It is not to be supposed that these men had voluntarily come on board of the pirate; they had been employed in some British vessels, trading on the coast, and had been taken out of them when the vessels were burnt, and the Europeans of the crew murdered. They had received a promise of reward, if they did their duty; but, not expecting it, they waited for the earliest opportunity to make their

The captain of the schooner is abaff, with his glass in no tell." his hand, occasionally sweeping the offing in expectation of a vessel heaving in sight; the officers and crew are lying down, or lounging listlessly about the decks, panting with the extreme heat, and impatiently waiting for rough beards and exposed chests, and their weather beaten, stupified and trembling from the violent concussion. herce countenances, they form a group which is terrible even in repose.

The fittings-up of this apartment are simple: on each side for your intimates, Francisco!" is a standing bed-place; against the after bulk-head is a "Rather, so much for your cruelty and injustice towards large buffet, originally intended for glass and china, but an unoffending man," replied Francisco, laying his book now loaded with silver and gold vessels of every size and on the table. "His question was an innocent one-for he description, collected by the pirate from the different ships knew not the particulars connected with the obtaining of which he had plundered; the lamps are also of silver, and that flagon." evidently have been intended to ornament the shrine of some Catholic saint.

shall now direct the reader's attention. The one is a plea- has prevented me, long before this, from throwing your sant-countenanced, good-humoured Krouman, who had body to the sharks." been christened "Pompey the Great;" most probably en account of his large proportions. He wears a pair of duck you I know not; I only regret that, in any way, she had trowsers; the rest of his body is naked, and presents a the misfortune to be connected with you." sleek and glossey skin, covering muscles which an ana-tomist or a sculptor would have viewed with admiration must have over a man when they have for years swung in The other is a youth of eighteen, or thereabouts, with an the same cot; but that is wearing off first. I tell you intelligent, handsome countenance, evidently of European so candidly; I will not allow even her memory to check blood. There is, however, an habitually mournful cast me, if I find you continue your late course. You have trowsers, and untanned vellow leather boots, such as are upon his features: he is dressed much in the same way made at the Western Isles; a broad-striped cotton shirt; as we have described the captain, but the costume hangs a red Cashmere shawl round his waist as a sash; a vest more gracefully upon his slender, yet well-formed limbs. embroidered in gold tissue, with a jacket of a dark velvet. He is seated on a sofa, fixed in the fore part of the cabin. and pendant gold buttors, hanging over his left shoulder, with a book in his hand, which occasionally he refers to, after the fashion of the Mediterranean scamen; a round and then lifts his eyes from, to watch the motions of the Krouman, who is busy in the office of the steward, arranging and cleaning the costly articles in the buffet.

"Massa Francisco, dis really fine ting;" said Pompey, holding up a splendidly embossed tankard, which he had been rubbing.

"Yes," replied Francisco, gravely; "it is, indeed, Pompey."

" How Captain Cain came by dis?"

Francisco shook his head; and Pompey put his finger up to his mouth, his eyes, full of meaning, fixed upon Francisco.

At this moment the personage referred to was heard descending the companion-ladder. Pompey recommenced rubbing the silver, and Francisco dropped his eyes upon the

What was the tie which appeared to bind the captain to this lad was not known; but, as the latter had always accompanied, and lived together with him, it was generally supposed that he was the captain's son; and he was as often designated by the crew as young Cain, as he was by his Christian name of Francisco. Still it was observed, that latterly they had frequently been heard in altercation, and that the captain was very suspicious of Francisco's movements.

"I beg I may not interrupt your conversation," said Cain, on entering the cabin; "the information you may obtain from a Krouman must be very important."

Francisco made no reply, but appeared to be reading his book. Cain's eyes passed from one to the other, as if to read their thoughts.

"Pray, what were you saying, Mr. Pompey?"

"Me say, Massa captain? me only tell young massa dis very fine ting; as where you get him-Massa Francisco

"And what might it be to you, you black secondrel?" cried the captain, seizing the goblet and striking the man with it a blow on the head which flattened the vessel, and at the same time felled the Krouman, powerful as he was, to the sea-breeze to fan their parched forcheads. With their the deck. The blood streamed, as the man slowly rose, Without saying a word, he staggered out of the cabin, and Cain threw himself on one of the lockers in front of the We must now descend into the cabin of the schooner, standing bed-place, saying, with a bitter smile, "So much

th

fo

his

fre

8 8

lat

fat

tra hap

boa

Wa boo

oth

the

did

his

spec

geni

then

gain mor

the c

the s a pir

"And you, I presume, do not forget them? Well be it so, young man; but I warn you sgain-as I have warned In this cabin there are two individuals to whom we you often-nothing but the remembrance of your mother

"What influence my mother's memory may have over

"She had the influence," replied Cain, " which a woman

plotting against me,"

Francisco, "when I witness such acts of horror, of cruelty cold-blooded cruelty, as lately have been perpetrated ?-Why did you bring me here? and why do you now detain All I ask is, that you will allow me to leave the vessel. You are not my father; you have told me so."

"No, I am not your father; but-you are your mother's

son."

"That gives you no right to have power over me, even if you had been married to my mother; which -

"I was not."

even greater disgrace."

"What !" cried Cain, starting up, seizing the young man released Francisco, and resumed his seat on the locker.

"As you plesne," said Francisco, as soon as he had reby your own hand, or launched overboard as a meal for the sharks; it will be but one more murder."

"Mad fool! why do you tempt me thus?" replied Cain,

again starting up and hastily quitting the cabin,

The altercation which we have just described was not unheard on deck, as the doors of the cabin were open, and erto saved his life. the sky-light removed to admit the air. The face of Cain men, who had been slumbering abait, with their beads looked into the cabin and beckoned with his finger. raised on their elbows, as if they had been listening to the conversation below.

" It will never do, sir," said Hawkhurst, the mate, shaking his head.

" No, replied the captain; " not if he were my own son. But what is to be done?-he knows no fear."

Hawkhurst pointed to the entering-port.

"When I ask your advice, you may give it," said the

captain, turning gloomily away.

In the meantime Francisco paced the cabin in deep forward on the birth deck, thought. Young as he was, he was indifferent to death; for he had no tie to render life precious. He remembered his mother, but not her demise; that had been concealed from him. At the age of seven he had sailed with Cain in a slaver, and had ever since continued with him. Until lately, he had been led to suppose that the captain was his and was sweeping along the surface to where the schooner father. During the years that he had been in the slave- was at anchor. The captain ordered a man at the crosstrade, Cain had devoted much time to his education: it so trees, directing him to keep a good look out, while he happened that the only book which could be found on walked the deck in company with his first mate. board of the vessel, when Cain first commenced teaching, "She may not have sailed until a day or two later," was a Bible belonging to Francisco's mother. Out of this said the captain, continuing the conversation; "I have book he learned to read; and, as his education advanced, made allowance for that, and depend upon it, as she makes other books were procured. It may appear strange that the eastern passage we must soon fall in with her; if she the very traffic in which his reputed father was engaged does not heave in sight this evening, by daylight I shall did not corrupt the boy's mind; but accustomed to it from stretch out in the offing: I know the Portuguese well. his infancy, he had considered these negroes as another The sea-breeze has caught our craft; let them run up the species,—an idea fully warranted by the cruelty of the Eu-inner jib, and see that she does not foul her anchor." ropeans towards them.

the slave-vessel was seized upon by Cain and converted into mast-head. a pirate. At first, the enormities committed had not been "There she is, by G-d!" cried the captain, jumping shown disaffection before the crew-you have disputed my so great; vessels had been seized and plundered, but life orders - and I have every reason to believe that you are now had been spared. In the course of crime, however, the descent is rapid: and as, from information given by those "Can I do otherwise than show my abhorrence," replied who had been released, the schooner was more than once in danger of being captured, latterly no lives had been spared: and but too often the murders had been attended with deeds even more atrocious.

> Francisco had witnessed scenes of horror until his young blood curdled: he had expostulated to save, but in vain. Disgusted with the captain and the crew, and their deeds of cruelty, he had latterly expressed his opinions fearlessly, and defied the captain; for, in the heat of an altercation, Cain had acknowledged that Francisco was not his son.

Had any of the crew or officers expressed but a tithe of " I thank God; for marriage with you would have been what had fallen from the bold lips of Francisco, they would have long before paid the forfeit of their temerity; but there was a feeling towards Francisco which could not be by the neck, and lifting him off his seat as if he had been stifled in the breast of Cain-it was the feeling of associaa puppet; "but no-I cannot forget your mother." Cain tion and habit. The boy had been his companion for years; and, from assuetude, had become, as it were, a part of himself. There is a principle in our natures which, covered himself; "it matters little whether I am brained even when that nature is most debased, will never leave us -that of requiring something to love-something to proteet and watch over: it is shown towards a dog, or any other animal, if it cannot be lavished upon one of our own species. Such was the feeling which so forcibly held Cain towards Francisco; such was the feeling which had hith-

After having paced up and down for some time, the was flushed as he ascended the ladder. He perceived his youth took his seat on the locker which the captain had chif mate standing by the hatchway, and many of the quitted: his eye soon caught the head of Pompey, who

> Francisco rose, and, taking up a flagon from the buffet which contained some spirits, walked to the door, and, without saying a word, handed it to the Krouman.

> "Massa Francisco," whispered Pompey, "Pompey say -all Krouman say-suppose they run away, you go too. Pompey say-all Krouman say-suppose they try kill you! Nebber kill you while one Krouman alive."

> The negro then gently pushed Francisco back with hishand, as if not wishing to bear his answer, and hastened

CHAPTER VIII.

THE ATTACK.

In the mean time the sea-breeze had risen in the offing

It was now late in the afternoon, and dinner had been sent There are some dispositions so naturally kind and in- into the cabin; the captain descended and took his seat at genuous that even example and evil contact cannot debase the table with Francisco, who ate in silence. Once or twice them: such was the disposition of Francisco. As he the captain whose wrath had subsided, and whose kindly gained in years and knowledge, he thought more and feelings towards Francisco, checked for a time, had returnmore for himself, and had already become disgusted with ed with greater force, tried, but in vain, to rally him into the cruelties practised upon the unfortunate negroes, when conversation, when the "sail, ho?" was shouted from the

from, and then, as if checking himself, immediately resum-schooner, finding she had met with an unexpected resist-

Francisco put his hand to his forehead, covering his eyes as his elbow leant on the table.

"A large ship, sir; we can see down the second reef of the topsails," said Hawkhurst, looking down the sky-light. the ship.

The captain hastily swallowed some wine from a flagon, ed on deck.

" He smart, lads!" cried the captain, after a few seconds' survey of the vessel through his glass; "that's her: furl to wait a little longer for their gold candlesticks."

centre had been cleared from the incumbrances which ship until daylight. surrounded it, the other guns had been cast loose, shot handed up, and everything propared for action, with all Indiaman; one of the very few that occasionally are sent the energy and discipline of a man of war. The chase out by the Portugues government to a country which had not been lost sight of, and the eves of the pirate-cap once owned their undivided sway, but in which, at pretain were fixed upon her through a night-glass. In about sent, they hold but a few miles of territory. She was an hour or more the schooner was within a mile of the bound to Goa, and had on board a small detachment of ship, and now altered her course so as to range up within troops, a new governor and his two sons, a bishop and his a cable's length of her to leeward. Cain stood upon the niece, with her attendant. The sailing of a vessel with gunwale and hailed. The answer was in Portuguese.

" Heave to, or I'll sink you!" replied he in the same sirates were wounded, some of them severely.

"Well done! John Portuguese," cried Hawkhurst; "by the holy poker! I never gave you credit for so much pluck."

"Which they shall pay dearly for," was the cool reply of Cain, as he still remained in his exposed situation.

mate, as he looked at the crimson rivulet trickling down the fingers of his left hand from a wound in his arm-"just tie my handkerchief round this, Bill."

In the interim, Cain had desired his crew to elevate their guns, and the broadside was returned.

"That will do, my lads: starb ard; ease off the boomsheet; let her go right round, Hawkhurst-we cannot afford to lose our men."

The schooner wore round, and run astern of her oppo-

ance, had sheered off, gave a loud cheer.

"The last you will ever give, my fine fellows!" observed Cain, with a sneer.

In a few minutes the schooner had run a mile astern of

"Now, then, Hawkhurst, let her come to and about; east a look of scorn and anger upon Francisco, and rush-man the long gun, and see that every shot is pitched into her, while the rest of them get up a new fore top-mast, and knot and splice the rigging."

The schooner's head was again turned towards the ship; the awnings, and run the anchor up to the bows: there's her position was right astern, about a mile distant, or more silver in that vessel, my lads, than your chests will rather more; the long 32-pounder gun a-midships was now hold; and the good saints of the churches at Goa will have regularly served, and every shot passing through the cabinwindows, or some other part of the ship's stern, raking The crew were immediately on the alert; the awnings her fore and aft. In vain did the ship alter her course, were furled, and all the men, stretching aft the spring and present her broad-side to the schooner; the latter was cable, walked the anchor up to the bows. In two minutes immediately checked in her speed, so as to keep the premore the Avenger was standing out on the starboard tack, scribed distance at which the carronades of the ship were shaping her course so as to cut off the ill-fated vessel, useless, and the execution from the long gun decisive, The breeze freshened, and the schooner darted the smooth The ship was at the mercy of the pirate; and, as may be water with the impetuosity of a dolphin after its prey. In expected, no mercy was shown. For three hours did this an hour the hull of the ship was plainly to be distinguish-murderous attack continue, when the gun, which, as before ed; but the sun was near to the horizon, and before they observed, was of brass, became so heated that the pirate could ascertain what her force might be, daylight had dis-captain desired his men to discontinue. Whether the ship appeared. Whether the schooner had been perceived or had surrendered or not it was impossible to say, as it was not it was impossible to say; at all events, the course of too dark to distinguish: while the long gun was served, the ship had not been altered, and if she had seen the the foretop-mast and main-gaff had been shifted, and all schooner, she evidently treated her with contempt. On the standing and running-rigging made good; the schooner board the Avenger they were not idle; the long gun in the keeping her distance, and following in the wake of the

We must now repair on board of the ship: she was an such a freight was a circumstance of rare occurrence; and was, of course, generally bruited about long before her departure. Cain had, for some months, received all A general discharge from a broadside of carronades, the necessary intelligence relative to her cargo and destiand a heavy volley of muskets from the Portuguese, was nation; but, as usual with the Portuguese of the present the decided answer; the broadside too much elevated to day, delay upon delay had followed, and it was not until hit the low hull of the schooner, was still not without ef- about three weeks previous that he had been assured of fect—the foretop-mast fell, the jaws of the main-gaff were her immediate departure. He then ran down the coast to severed, and a large proportion of the standing, as well as the bay we have mentioned that he might intercept her; the running-rigging, came rattling down on her decks. and, as the event has proved, showed his usual judgment The volley of musketry was more fatal: thirteen of the and decision. The fire of the schooner had been most destructive: many of the Indiaman's crew, as well as the troops, had been mowed down one after another; until, at last, finding that all their efforts to defend themselves were useless, most of those who were still unhurt had consulted their safety, and hastened down to the lowest recesses of the hold to avoid the raking and destructive shot. "Blood for blood! if I drink it," observed the second At the time that the schooner had discontinued her fire to allow the gun to cool, there was no one on deck but the Portuguese captain and one old weather-beaten seaman who stood at the helm. Below, in the orlop deck, the remainder of the crew and the passengers were huddled together in a small space: some were attending to the wounded, who were numerous; others were invoking the saints to their assistance; the bishop, a tall dignified person, apparently nearly sixty years of age, was kneeling in the centre of the group, which was dimly lighted by two or three lanterns, at one time in fervent prayer, at another, The Portuguese on board the ship, imagining that the interrupted, that he might give absolution to those wound-

th be pu

deg

tim lay cert

to h

wen

the

tear

who hasti

"Im " N

togetl

as he

Th the m

" M

op, " t

44]

brought down and laid before him by their comrades. On mercy of a pirate." one side of him knelt his orphan niece, a young girl of about seventeen years of age, watching his countenance calling upon their saints. as he prayed, or bending down with a look of pity and side of the bishop stood the governor, Don Philip de Ribiera, and his two sons, youths in their prime, and holding commissions in the king's service. There was melancholy on the brow of Don Ribiera; he was prepared for, and he anticipated the worst. The oldest son had his eyes fixed upon the sweet countenance of Terresa de Silvathat very evening, as they walked together on the deck, had they exchanged their vows-that very evening they had luxuriated in the present, and had dwelt with delightand return on deck.

The captain of the Portuguese ship had walked aft, and now went up to Antonia, the old seaman, who was standing at the wheel.

"I still see her with the glass, Antonio, and yet she has not fired for nearly two hours; do you think any accident has happened to her long gun? if so, we may have some

Antonio shook his head. "We have but little chance, I am afraid, my captain; I knew by the ring of the gun, when she first fired it, that it was brass; indeed, no schooner could carry a long iron gun of that calibre. Depend upon it, she only waits for the mettle to cool and daylight to return: a long gun or two might have saved us, but now, as she has the advantage of us in heels, we are at her mercy."

"What can she be-a French privateer?"

- "I trust it may be so; and I have premised a silver candlestick to St. Antonio that it may prove no worse : we then may have some chance of seeing our homes again; but I fear not."
 - "What, then, do you imagine her to be, Antonio?"
- "The pirate which we have heard so much of." " Jesu protect us! we must then sell our lives as dearly as we can."

"So I intend to do, my captain," replied Antonio, shifting the helm a spoke.

The day broke, and showed the schooner continuing her pursuit at the same distance astern, without any apparent movement on board. It was not until the sun was some degrees above the horizon that the smoke was again seen to envelope her bows, and the shot crashed through the timbers of the Portuguese ship. The reason for this de-lay was, that the pirate waited till the sun was up to ascertain if there were any other vessels to be seen, previous to his pouncing on his quarry. The Portuguese captain went aft and hoisted his ensign, but no flag was shown by the schooner. Again whistled the ball, and again did it tear up the decks of the unfortunate ship: many of those who had reascended to ascertain what was going on, now hastily sought their former retreat.

"I must go down and consult with the governor."

"Never fear, my captain; as long as these limbs hold together I will do my duty," replied the old man, exhausted as he was by long watching and fatigue.

The captain descended to the orlop-deck, where he found the major part of the crew and passengers assembled.

"My lords," said he, addressing the governor and bishop, " the schooner has not shown any colours, although our own are hoisted. I am come down to know your pleasure.

ed men whose spirits were departing, and who were Defence we can make none; and I fear that we are at the

"A pirate !" ejaculated several, beating their breasts and

"Silence, my good people, silence," quietly observed the tearful eyes on her expiring countrymen, whose last mo. bishop; "as to what it may be best to do," continued he, ments were gladdened by his holy offices. On the other turning to the captain, "I cannot advise; I am a man of peace, and unfit to hold a place in a council of war. Don Ribiera, I must refer the point to you and your sons. Tremble not, my dear Teresa; are we not under the protection of the Almighty?"

"Holy Virgin, pity us!" exclaimed Teresa.

"Come, my sons," said Don Ribiera, "we will go on deck and consult: let not any of the men follow us; it is useless risking lives which may yet be valuable."

Don Ribiera and his sons followed the captain to the ful anticipation on the future. But we must leave them quarter-deck, and with him and Antonio they held a con-

> "We have but one chance," observed the old man, after a time; "let us haul down our colours as if in submission; they will then range up alongside, and either board us from the shooner or from their boats; at all events, we shall find out what she is, and, if a pirate, we must sell our lives as dearly as we can. If, when we haul down the colours, she ranges up alongside, as I expect she will, let all the men be prepared for a desperate struggle."

> "You are right, Antonio," replied the governor; "go aft, captain, and haul down the colours ;-let us see what she does now. Down, my boys! and prepare the men to do their duty."

As Antonio had predicted, so soon as the colours were hauled down, the shooner ceased firing and made sail. She ranged up on the quarter of the ship, and up to her main peak soared the terrific black flag; her broadside was poured into the Indiaman, and before the smoke had cleared away there was a concussion from the meeting sides, and the bearded pirates poured upon her decks.

The crew of the Portuguese, with the detachment of troops, still formed a considerable body of men. The sight of the black flag had struck ice into every heart, but the feeling was resolved into one of desperation.

"Knives, men! knives!" roared Antonio, rushing on to the attack, followed by the most brave.

" Blood for blood!" cried the second mate, aiming a blow at the old man.

"You have it," replied Antonio, as his knife entered the pirate's heart, while, at the same moment, he fell and was himself a corpse.

The struggle was deadly, but the numbers and ferocity of the pirates prevailed. Cain rushed forward followed by Hawkhurst, bearing down all who opposed them. With one blow from the pirate-captain the head of Don Ribiera was severed to the shoulder; a second struck down the eldest son, while the sword of Hawkhurst passed through the body of the other. The Portuguese captain had already fallen, and the men no longer stood their ground. A general massacre ensued, and the bodies were thrown overboard as fast as the men were slaughtered. In less than five minutes there was not a living "Mind the helm, Antonio," said the Portuguese captain; Portuguese on the bloody decks of the ill-fated ship.

CHAPTER IX.

THE CAPTURE.

"Pass the word for not a man to go below, Hawkhurst!" said the pirate-captain.

"I have, sir; and sentries are stationed at the hatchways. Shall we haul the schooner off?"

shall have a calm in half an hour. Have we lost many percargo as to the contents of the vessel and her stowage, men?"

lace" (the second mate.)

"take a dozen of our best men and search the ship, there sword in his band, raised his arm and struck the pirate a are others alive yet. By the by, send a watch on board of blow on his head with the hilt, which, whether intended or the schooner; she is left to the mercy of the Kroumen, not, fractured his skull, and the man fell upon the deck.

"One who is better out of her," replied Hawkhurst "And those we find below-" continued the mate.

"True; we may else be puzzled where to find that por- the body of the man was dragged away. tion of her cargo which suits us," said Hawkhurst, going down the hatchway to collect the men who were plundering on the main deck and in the captain's cabin.

"Here, you Maltese! up, there! and look well round if

Before Hawkhurst had collected the men and ordered them on board the schooner, as usual in those latitudes, it troops-where are they?"

had fallen a perfect calm.

Where was Francisco during this scene of blood? He of the plate I know nothing; it is in some of the cases had remained in the cabin of the schooner. Cain had belonging to my lord the bishop." more than once gone down to him, to persuade him to come on deck and assist at the boarding of the Portuguese, see to the money ; in the mean time I will ask a few quesbut in vain-his sole reply to the threats and solicitations tions of this reverend father." of the pirate was,-

"Do with me as you please-I have made up my mind -you know I do not fear death-so long as I remain on board of this vessel I will take no part in your atrocities.

seek an honest and honourable livelihood."

These words of Francisco were ringing in the ears of Cain as he walked up and down on the quarterdeck of the shoals around the two vessels. Portuguese vessel, and, debased as he was, he could not help feeling that the youth was equal in animal, and his by the captain) joined by Francisco, who, hearing from superior in mental courage-he was arguing in his own the Krouman, Pompey, that there were prisoners still on mind upon the course he should pursue with respect to board, and amongst them two females, had come over to Francisco, when Hawkhurst made his appearance on deck, plead the cause of mercy. followed by his men, who dragged up six individuals who "Most reverend father," observed Cain, after a short had escaped the massacre. These were the bishop; his pause; "you have many articles of value in this vessel?" niece; a Portuguese girl, her attendant; the supercargo of the vessel: a sacristan; and a servant of the ecclesiastic: is indeed, beyond price, and will, I trust, be soon an angel they were hauled along the deck and placed in a row be. in heaven." fore the captain, who cast his eyes upon them in severe scrutiny. The bishop and her niece looked round, the one gatory which must be passed through previous to arrivproudly meeting the eye of Cain, although he felt that his ing there, and that girl may think death a blessing comhour was come; the other, carefully avoiding his gaze, and pared to what she may expect if you refuse to tell me glancing round to ascertain whether there were any other what I would know. You have good store of gold prisoners, and, if so, if her betrothed was amongst them; and silver ornaments for your churches—where are but her eye discovered not what she sought-it was met they?" only by the bearded faces of the pirate-crew, and the blood which bespattered the deck.

She covered her face with her hands.

" Bring that man forward," said Cain, pointing to the servant. "Who are you?"

"A servant of my lord the bishop."

"And you?" continued the captain.

- "A poor sacristan attending upon my lord the bishop."
- "And you?" cried he to the third. " The supercargo of this vessel."
- "Put him aside, Hawkhurst?" "Do you want the others?" inquired Hawkhust insignificantly.

away the sacristan and the servant. A stifled shrick and a heavy plunge in the water were heard a few seconds after.

"No, let her remain; the breeze is faint already: we During this time, the pirate had been questioning the suwhen he was suddenly interrupted by one of the pirates, who "Only seven, that I can reckon; but we have lost Wal- in a hurried voice, stated that the ship had received severa, shot between wind and water, and was sinking fast. Cain, "A little promotion will do no harm," replied Cain; who was standing on the slide of the carronade with his

> "Take that, babbler! for your diligence; if these men are obstinate, we may have worked for nothing."

> The crew, who felt the truth of their captain's remark. did not appear to object to the punishment inflicted, and

> "What mercy can we expect from those who shew no mercy to each other?" observed the bishop, lifting up his eyes to heaven.

"Silence!" cried Cain; who now interrogated the suthere is anything in sight," said the captain, walking aft. percargo as to the contents of the hold—the poor man answered as well as he could-"the plate! the money for the

"The money for the troops is in the spirit room, but

"Hawkhurst? down at once into the spirit-room and

"And the supercargo-do you want him any more?"

" No; he may go."

The poor man fell down on his knees in thankfulness what he considered his escape: he was dragged away If you do respect my mother's memory, suffer her son to by the pirates, and, it is scarcely necessary to add, that in a minute his body was torn to pieces by the sharks, who, scenting their prey from a distance, were now playing in

The party on the quarter-deck were now unperceived

"Most reverend father," observed Cain, after a short

"None," replied the bishop, "except this poor girl; she

"Yet is this world, if what you preach be true, a pur-

"They are among the packages intrusted to my care."

" How many have you in all?"

"A hundred, if not more."

"Will you deign to inform me where I may find what I

" The gold and silver are not mine, but are the property of that God to whom they have been dedicated," replied the bishop.

"Answer quickly; no more subterfuge, good sir. Where is it to be found?"

"I will not tell, thou blood-stained man; at least, in this instance, there shall be disappointment, and the sea shall swallow up those earthly treasures to obtain which thou "No." east so deeply imbrued thy hands. Pirate! I repeat it, I Hawkhurst gave a signal to some of the pirates who led will not tell."

To be continued.

AUTHOR OF YES AND NO.

and late Patentee of the Theatre Royal, with an Historical

THERE are, perhaps, few individuals, of intense personal but glittering stream of existence. feeling, whose lives, written by themselves, would be destitute of interest or of value. Works of this description only by reason of the superlative coxcombry which it exmost indispensable to the writer of such auto-biographies, or so pure as those which the noblest poetry inspires, be the world the depths and inmost recesses of his soul, than grave. They are elevated and softened into men. of his fond desires for the bright course of an actor-of in clear vision, the eternal rocks of defence for their nagood actor, which almost took away his breath, and fairly the same emotion, as the high grass of the meadow yields, to gather fresh courage from every slight, adding zest to equal in the mysterious sanctities of their being. Surely every success, until he arrived at the high dignity of "Pathe art that produces an effect like this—which separates, tentee of the Theatre Royal." When "he no revenue as by a divine alchemy, the artificial from the real in huwherever its stray gifts were found; sometimes in the gives the poorest to feel the old grandeur of tragedy, sweeptavera among the wits, but chiefly in the golden sphere of ing by with sceptered pall-which makes the heart of the VOL EXVIII. MARCH, 1836 .- 25.

An Apology for the Life of Mr. Colley Cibber, Comedian, perish with the chances of the world, and whose glories never grow dim. In reading his life, we become p View of the Stage in his own Time, written by Himself.

The Second Edition. London, 1740. that, in his age of happy trifling, floated along the shallow

The Life of Cibber is peculiarly a favorite with us, not enlarge the number of our intimacies without inconve- hibits, but of the due veneration which it yields to an art nience, awaken, with a peculiar vividness, pleasant recol- too frequently under-rated, even among those to whose lections of our own past career, and excite that fond and gratification it ministers. If the degree of enjoyment and gentle sympathy with the little sorrows, cares, hopes, and of benefit produced by an art be any test of its excellence, enjoyment of others, which infuses new tenderness into all there are few indeed, which will yield to that of the actor. the pulses of individual joy. The qualification which is His exertions do not, indeed, often excite emotions so deep is vanity. If he does not dwell with gusto on his own their general influence are far more widely extended. theme, he will communicate no gratification to his reader. The tenderest beauties of the most gifted of bards, find in He must not, indeed, fancy himself too outrageously what the bosoms of a very small number an answering sympa-he is not, but should have the highest sense of what he is, thy. Even of those who talk familiarly Spenser and Milthe happiest relish for his own peculiarities, and the most ton, there are few who have fairly read, and still fewer blissful assurance that they are matters of great interest to who truly feel their divine effusions. It is only in the the world. He who feels thus, will not chill us by cold theatre, that any image of the real grandeur of humanity generalities, but trace with an exquisite minuteness all the —any picture of generous heroism and noble self-sacri-felicities of his life, all the well remembered moments of fice—is poured on the imaginations, and sent warm to the gratified vanity, from the first beatings of hope and first hearts of the vast body of the people. There are eyes, taste of delight, to the time when age is gladdened by the familiar through months and years only with mechanic reflected tints of young enterprize and victory. Thus it toil, suffused with natural tears, engendered by sacred pity. was with Colley Cibber; and, therefore, his Apology for There are the deep fountains of hearts, long encrusted by his own life is one of the most amusing books that have narrow cares, burst open, and a holy light is sent in on ever been written. He was not, indeed a very wise or the long sunken forms of the imagination, which shone lofty character-nor did he affect great virtue or wisdom fair and goodly in boyhood by their own light, but have -but openly derided gravity, bade defiance to the serious since been sealed and forgotten in their "sunless treasupursuits of life, and honestly preferred his own lightness ries." There, do the lowliest and most ignorant catch of heart and of head, to knowledge the most extensive or their only glimpse of that poetic radiance which is the thought the most profound. He was vain even of his va- finest glory of our being. While they gaze on the wonnity. At the very commencement of his work, he avows drous spectacle, they forget the petty concerns of their own his determination not to repress it, because it is part of individual lot, and recognize and rejoice in their kindred himself, and therefore will only increase the resemblance with a nature capable of high emprise, of meekest sufferof the picture. Rousseau did not more clearly lay open to ing, and of defiance to the mortal powers of agony and the Cibber of his faibles and minikin weaknesses. The philo are carried beyond the ignorant present time; feel the sopher dwelt not more intensely on the lone enthusiasm of past and the future on the instant, and kindle as they gaze his spirit, on the alleviations of his throbbing soul, on the on the massive realities of human virtue, or on those fairy long draughts of rapture which he eagerly drank in from visions which are the gleaming fore-shadows of golden the loveliness of the universe, than the player on his early years, which hereafter shall bless the world. Their horispiring for scenic applause, and all the petty triumphs and zon is suddenly extended from the narrow circle of low mortifications of his passion for the favour of the town anxieties and selfish joys, to the farthest and most sacred How real and speaking is the description which he gives hills which bound our moral horizon; and they perceive, his light-hearted pleasure, when, in the little part of the ture, which the noblest spirits of their fellow men have Chaplain in The Orphan, he received his first applause been privileged to raise. While they feel that "which and of his higher transport, when the next day Goodman, gives an awe of things above them," their souls are exa retired actor of note, clapped him on the shoulder at a panded in the heartiest sympathy with the vast body of rehearsal, exclaimed, with an oath, that he must make a their fellows. A thousand hearts are swayed at once by drew tears into his eyes! The spirit of gladness which as a single blade, to the breeze which sweeps over it. Disgave such exquisite keenness to his youthful appetite for tinctions of fortune, rank, talent, age, all give way to the praise, sustained him through all the changes of his for-warm tide of emotion, and every class feel only as partak-tune, enabling him to make a jest of penury, assisting him ers in one primal sympathy, "made of one blood," and had but his good spirits to fied and clothe him," these were manity—which supplies to the artisan in the capital, the ample. His vanity was to him a kingdom. The airiest place of those woods and free airs and mountain streams, of town butterflies, he sipped of the sweets of pleasure which insensibly harmonize the peasant's character—which child leap with strange joy, and enables the old man to fancy the qualities of an actor, as his form and voice, are gifts himself again a child—is worthy of no mean place among of nature which imply no merit in their possessor. They the arts which refine our manners by exalting our conare no more independent of will, than the sensibility and

It has sometimes been objected to the theatrical artist, that he merely repeats the language and embodies the conceptions of the poet. But the allegation, though specious, is unfounded. It has been completely established, by a great and genial critic of our own time, that the deeper beauties of poetry cannot be shaped forth by the actor,* pear a paradox, but is nevertheless proved by experience, that the fanciful cast of the language has very little to do with the effect of an acted tragedy. Mrs Siddons would not have been less than she is, though Shakespear had never written. She displayed genius as exalted in the characters drawn by Moore, Southern, Otway, and Rowe, as in those of the first of human bards. Certain great situations are all the performer needs, and the grandest emotions of the soul all that he can embody. He can derive little aid from the noblest imaginations or the richest fantasies of the author. He may, indeed, by his own genius,—like the matchless artist to whom we have just al-luded—consecrate sorrow, dignify emotion, and kindle the spoken, but by the living magic of the eye, of the tone, quickening our sympathy with the most august instances of the action; by all those means which belong exclusively of human virtue, and enrichi to the actor. When Mrs. Siddons cast that unforgotten images of the majesty of old. gaze of blank horror on the corpse of Beverley, was she indebted to the play-wright for the conception? When, as Arpasia in Tamerlane, she gave that look of inexpressible anguish, in which the breaking of the heart raight be cumstances to counterbalance and alleviate the shortness seen, and the cold and rapid advances of death tracedand fell without a word, as if struck by the sudden blow of destiny—in that moment of unearthly power, when she astonished and terrified even her oldest admirers, and after which, she lay herself really senseless from the intensity of her own emotion-where was the marvellous stage-direction, the pregnant hint in the frigid declamatory text, from which she wrought this amazing picture, too perilous to be often repeated? Do the words "I'm atisfied," in Cate, convey the slightest image of that high struggle—that contest between nature long repressed and stoic pride-which Mr. Kemble in an instant embodied to the senses, and impressed on the soul forever? Or, to descend into the present time and the lower drama, does the perusal of The School of Reform convey any vestige of that rough sublimity which breathes in the Tyke of Emery? Are Mr. Liston's looks out of book, gotten by heart, invented for him by writers of farces? Is there any funcy of invention in their happiest moods—any tracings of mortal hands in books-like to the marvellous creations which Munden multiplies at will? These are not to be " constrained by mastery" of the pen, and defy not only the power of an author to conceive, but to describe them. The best actors indeed, in their happiest efforts, are little the grandest painters to history.

with which we are acquainted.

imagination of the bard. Our admiration is not determined by merit, but by beauty; we contemplate angelic beauty of soul with as tender a love as virtue, which has been reared with intense labour among clouds and storms, and follow with as delighted a wonder the quick glances of intuition as the longest and most difficult researches. The actor exhibits as high a perception of natural grace, and it is equally true, that the poet has little share in the hisbest triumphs of the performer. It may, at first, apstand for ages in marble, they live and breathe before us while they last-change with all the variations of passion -and "discourse must eloquent music." They sometimes, as in the case of Mr. Kemble's Roman characters, supply the noblest illustrations of history. The story of Coriolanus is to us no dead letter; the nobleness of Cato is an abstract idea no longer. We seem to behold even now the calm approaches of the mighty stoic to the endto look on him, maintaining the forms of Roman liberty to the last, as though he would grasp its trembling relics in his dying hands-and to listen to those solemn tones, now the expiring accents of liberty passing away, and anon the tremulous breathings of uncertain hope for the imagination as well as awaken the sympathics. But this future. The reality with which these things have been will be accomplished, not by the texture of the words presented to our youthful eyes is a possession for everof human virtue, and enriching our souls with palpable cumstances to counterbalance and alleviate the shortness of his fame. The anxiety for posthumous renown, though there is something noble in it as abstracted from mere personal desires, is scarcely the loftiest of human emotions. The Homeric poets, who breathed forth their strains to untutored ears and left no visible traces of their genius, could scarcely anticipate the duration of their works. Sheakspear seems to have thought little in his life-time of those honours which through all ages will accumulate on his memory. The best benefactors of their race have left the world nothing but their names, and their remembrances in grateful souls. The true poet, perhaps, feels most holily when he thinks only of sharing in the immortality of nature, and "owes no allegiance but the elements." Some feeling, not unallied to this, may solace the actor for the shortlived remembrance of his exertions. The images which he vivines are not traced in paper, nor diffused through the press, nor extant in marble; but are engraven on the fleshly tables of the heart, and last till "life's idle business ceases. To thousands of the young has been given their "first mild touch of sympathy and thought," their first sense of communion with their kind. As time advances. and the rank of his living admirers grow thin, the old tell of his feats with a tenderer rapture, and give such vivid hints of his excellence as enable their hearers richly to their minds at least, is like him. The sweet lustre of his memory thus grows more sacred as it approaches its close, and tenderly vanishes. His name lives still-ever pronounced with happiest feelings and in the happiest hours * See Mr. Lamb's Estay on the Tragedies of Shake- and excites us to stretch our thoughts backward into the spear, as adapted to representation on the stage,—a piece, which combines more of profound thought with more of deep feeling and exquisite beauty, than any criticism "till domerday," and the actor's fades away before most others, because it is the very reverse of his gloomy and a a the special specia

more indebted to the poet, than he is to the graces of na-ture which he seizes, than the sculptor to living forms, or Still less weight is there in the objection, that part of

fairest graces of nature—those touches of the ethereal scattered over the universe-pass away while they ravish admirers-if their images of beauty must fade into the atmosphere of town gaiety, until they only lend some delicate graces to those airy clouds which gleam in its distance, and which are not recognized as theirs, they can scarcely complain of a transitoriness which is necessarily connected with the living grace which belongs to no other order of artists.

The work before us, however, may afford better consolation than we can render to actors; for it redeems not the names, but the vivid images of some of the greatest artists of a century ago, from oblivion. Here they are not embalmed, but kept alive—and breathe in all the glory of their meridian powers before us. Here, Betterton's tones seems yet to melt on the entranced hearer-Nokes yet convulses the full house with laughter on his first appearance-and Mrs. Montfort sinks with her dainty, diving body to the ground, beneath the conscious load of her own The theatrical portraits in this work are drawn with the highest gusto, and set forth with the richest coloring. The author has not sought, like some admirable critics of this age of criticism, to say as many witty or eloquent things on each artist as possible, but simply to form the most exact likenesses, and to give to the drapery the most vivid and appropriate hues. We seem to listen to the prompter's bell-to see the curtain rise-and behold on the scene the goodly shapes of the actors and actresses of another age, in their antique costume, and with all the stately airs and high graces which the town knows no longer.

Betterton is the chief object of our author's admiration; but the account of his various excellencies is too long to extract entire; and perhaps, on account of the spirit of boundless eulogy in which it is written, has less of that with them in their coaches to Hyde Parke, in his theatrinicety of touch, which gives so complete an individuality to his pictures of other performers.

The following are, perhaps, the most interesting parts of the description:

"You have seen a Hamlet perhaps, who, on the first pearance of his father's spirit, has thrown himself into all the straining vociferation requisite to express rage and fury, and the house has thundered with applause; the the mis-guided actor was all the while (as Shake-spear terms it) tearing a passing into rags.—I am the more bold to offer you this particular instance, because the late Mr. Addison, while I sate by him, to see this The following account of this actor's performance in scene acted, made the same observation, asking with the now neglected character of Henry the Fourth, gives some surprize, if I thought Hamlet should be in so violent a passion with the Ghost, which, tho' it might have astonished, had not provoked him? for you may observe that in this beautiful speech, the passion never rises beyond an almost breathless astonishment, or an rises beyond an almost breathless astonishment, or an impatience, limited by filial reference, to enquire into the suspected wrongs that may have raised him from the suspected wrongs that may have raised him from the vulgar eye, requires thrice the skill and grace to behis peaceful tomb! and a desire to know what a spirit come and support. Of this real majesty, Kynaston so esseningly distrest, might wish or enjoin a sorrow-was entirely master; here every sentiment came from ful son to execute towards his future quiet in the grave?

durable creations. The theatrical picture does not endure This was the light into which Betterton threw this because it is the warmest, the most living of the works of art; it is short as human life, because it is as genial. Those ment! then rising slowly, to solemn, trembling voice, are the intensest enjoyment which soonest wither. The fairest graces of nature—those touches of the ethercal as to himself! and in the descriptive part of the natural emotions which the ghastly vision gave him, the bold-ness of his expostulation was still governed by decency, us. Could we succeed in giving permanence to the rainbow, to the delicate shadow, or to the moon-beam on the waters, their light and unearthly charm would be lost for ever. The tender hues of youth would ill exchange their evanescent bloom for an enamel which ages would not destroy. And if "these our actors" must "melt into air, thin air," leaving but soft trucings in the hearts of living

have yet equalled Betterton.

" A farther excellence in Betterton, was, that he could vary his spirit to the different characters he acted. Those wild impatient starts, that fierce and flashing fire, which he threw into Hotspur, never came from the un-ruffled temper of his Brutus; (for I have more than once, seen a Brutus as warm as Hotspur) when the Betterton Brutus was provoked, in his dispute with Cassius, his spirit flew only to his eye; his steady look alone supplied that terror, which he disdained an intemperance in his voice should rise to. Thus, with a settled dignity of contempt, like an unheeding rock, he repelled upon himself the foam of Cassius. the very words of Shakespear will better let you into my meaning:

Must I give way, and room, to your rash choler? Shall I be frighted when a madman stares? And a little after :

There is no terror, Cassius, in your threats! &c.

Not but in some part of this scene, where he re-proaches Cassius, his temper is not under this suppression, but opens into that warmth which becomes a man of virtue; yet this is that hasty spark of anger, which Brutus himself endeavours to execute."

The account of Kynaston, who, in his youth, before the performance of women on the stage, used to appear in fe-male characters, is very amusing. He was particularly successful in Evadne, in The Maid's Tragedy, and always retained "something of a formal gravity in his mien, which was attributed to the stately step he had been so early confined to" in his female attire: the ladies of quality, we are told, used to pride themselves in taking him cal habit, after the play, which then used to begin at the early hour of four. There was nothing, however, effeminate in his usual style of acting. We are told, that " He had a piercing eye, and in characters of heroic here had a piercing eye, and in characters of heroice, if a quick imperious vivacity in his tone of voice, that painted the tyrant truly terrible. There were two plays of Dryden in which he zhone, with uncommon lustre; in Aurenge-Zebe he played Morat, and in Don Sebastian, Muley Moloch; in both these parts, he had a fierce lion-like majesty in his port and utterance, that gave the spectator a kind of trembling admiration."

The following account of this actor's performance in us the most vivid idea of the grave yet gentle majesty and kingly pathos, which the part requires.

" But above this tyrannical, tumid superiority of cha-

They y and deterngelic h has orms, lances rches.

gifte

titude, do not ore us assion someacters. ory of f Cato

grace,

d even endliberty relics tones, y, and for the e been everstances alpable

us into ch will ny cirortness though ere pernotions. s to un-

s, could Sheakof those on his ve left brances t holily

nature, ne feele shorts which ugh the asiness' en their eir first dvances, old tell ch vivid ichly to hich, in re of his its close ver prohours into the rork, ac ers ever ere mos omy and were the real king he personated! a perfection so to wash off the guilt from vice and gave it charms and rarely found, that very often, in actors of good repute, merit. For the it may be a reproach to the poet, to a certain vacancy of look, inanity of voice, or super-draw such characters, not only unpunished, but reward-fluous gesture shall unmask the man to the judicious ed, the actor may still be allowed his due praise in his spectator; who from the least of those errors plainly excellent performance. And this is a distinction which, sees the whole but a lesson given him, to be got by when this comedy was acted at Whitehall, King Wilheart, from some great author, whose sense is deeper liam's Queen Mary was pleased to make in favour of than the repeater's understanding. This true majesty Monfort, notwithstanding her disapprobation of the Kynaston had so entire a command of, that when he whispered the following plain line to Hotspur,

He had besides all this, a variety in his genius, which

Send us your prisoners, or you'll hear of it!

he conveyed a more terrible menace in it, than the loud-

nature may fall to nothing.

But the dignity of this character appeared in Kythe king, and the Frince his son: there you saw manier, and gesture, was no longer Montfort, but anojesty, in that sort of grief, which only majesty could there person. There, the inspired, soft civility, the feel; there the paternal concern, for the errors of the elegant and formal mien; the drawling delicacy of voice, the stately flatness of his address, and the empty reproaches so just, yet so unmixed with anger (and therefore the more piercing) opening as it were the arms of nature, with a secret wish, that filial duty, and replicates awaked might fall into them with the secret intelligence awaked might fall into them with the secret intelligence and replicate a secret wish, that filial duty, or nature, had he not kept his judgment, as it were, a the King, and the Prince his son: there you saw maand penitence awaked, might fall into them with grace and honour. In this affecting scene, I thought Kvand honour. In this affecting scene, I thought Kynaston shew'd his most masterly strokes of nature; expressing all the various motions of the heart, with the same force, dignity, and feeling, the yare written; adding to the whole, that peculiar and becoming grace, which the best writer cannot inspire into any actor, that is not born with it."

Our author is even more felicitous in his description of the performers in low comedy and high farce. The following critique brings Nokes—the Liston of his age—so

How inimitably is the varied excellence of Monfort de picted in the following speaking picture:

"Monfort, a younger man by twenty years, and at this time in his highest reputation, was an actor of a very different style: of person he was tall, well made, and melodious: in tragedy he was the most affecting lover within my memory. His addresses had a resist-less recommendation from the very tone of his voice, says,

> Like flakes of feather'd snow, They melted as they fell !

ander, where the heroe throws himself at the feet as he was for it) the hard of him. After this, perhaps, it of Statira for pardon of his past infidelities. There scarce give us an idea of him. After this, perhaps, it we saw the great, the tender, the penitent, the despiring, the transported, and the amiable, in the have still the sound of every line he spoke, in my ear, highest perfection. In comedy, he gave the truest (which used not to be thought a bad one) yet I have oflife to what we call the Fine Gentleman; his spirit ten tried, by myself, but in vain, to reach the least dissions the brighter for being polished with decency: tant likeness of the viz comica of Nokes. Though this in scenes of gaiety, he never broke into the regard, that was due to the presence of equal or superior characters, was due to the presence of equal or superior characters, the course of the viz comica of Nokes. Though this may seem little to his praise, it may be negatively saying a good deal to it, because I have never seen any one tho' inferior actors played them; he filled the stage. tho inferior actors played them; he filled the stage, imitate, as to give you a more than tolerable notion of concerting their action, but they surpassing them, in his manner. But Nokes was so singular a species, and true and masterly touches of nature. He never laugh- was so formed by nature, for the stage, that I question ed at his own jest, unless the point of his raillery upon if (beyond the trouble of getting words by heart) it ever another required it.—He had a particular talent, in giving life to bon mots and repartees: the wit of the poet tion he had, and deserved. pened into more wit, from his brilliant manner of delivering it: he had himself a good share of it, or what is equal to it, so lively a pleasantness of humour, that wanton Wife, Sir Davy Dunce in The Soldier's Fortune, when sither of these fell into his hands upon the stage, he wantoned with them, to the highest delight of his acted them, is beyond the reach of criticism: but, to auditors. The agreeable was so natural to him, that instant, conceived it, as if he had lost the player, and even in that dissolute character of The Rover he seemed few capital actors have shewn, or perhaps have thought it any addition to their merit to arrive at; he could en-tirely change himself; could at once throw off the est intemperance of voice could swell to. But let the man of sense, for the brisk, vain, rude, and lively coxbold imitator beware, for without the look, and just comb, the false, flashy pretender to wit, and the dupe of elecution that waited on it, an attempt of the same his own sufficiency: of this he gave a delightful instance in the character of Sparkish in Wycherly's Country Wife. In that of Sir Courtly Nice his excelnaston still more shining, in the private scene between lence was still greater: there his whole man, voice, mien, and gesture, was no longer Montfort, but anocentinel upon himself, not to admit the least likeness of what he used to be, to enter into any part of his performance, he could not possibly have so completely finished it."

> Our author is even more felicitous in his description of vividly before us, that we seem almost as well acquainted with him, as with his delicious successor.

" Nokes was an actor of a quite different genius from any I have ever read, heard of, or seen, since or before his time; and yet his general excellence may be com-prehended in one article, viz. a plain and palpable sim-, and of an agreeable aspect: his voice clear, full, plicity of nature, which was so utterly his own, that he was often as unaccountably diverting in his common speech, as on the stage. I saw him once, giving an account of some table-talk, to another actor behind the which gave his words such a softness, that, as Dryden scenes, which, a man of quality accidentally listening to, was so deceived by his manner, that he ask'd him, if that was a new play he was rehearsing? It seems almost amazing, that this simplicity, so easy to Nokes, should never be caught by any of his successors. Leigh and Underhil have been well copied, tho' not equalled by All this he particularly verified in that scene of Mex-others. But not all the mimical skill of Estcourt (famed

"The characters he particularly shone in, were Sir

rd dis h, ilof

he ch ht n-

he X-

of n-, 8

el-

ce,

he of ty

nd ter

, a

of er-

of fol-

-50

ted om

ore mim-

he

non

acthe to,

hat

nost uld

and

by ned

uld

s, it h I ear, dis-

this

sayone

far

n of

and tion

ever

uta-

Ni-The une,

t, to

(which would sometimes hold him several minutes) been in one continued roar, for several minutes) before he could prevail with his courage to speak a word to him! Then might you have, at once, read in his face

treation, that his own measures, which he piqued himself upon, had failed:—enry, of his servant's superior the most exquisite of actresses: wit ;-distress, to retrieve the occasion he had lost ;shame, to confess his folly;—and yet a sullen desire to name of Verbruggen, was mistress of more variety of humour, than I ever knew in any one actress. This tragedy ever shew'd us such a tumult of passions, rising, at once, in one bosom? or what buskined heroe, eloquence, and piteous plight of his features?

"His person was of the middle size, his voice clear, and audible; his natural countenance grave, and sober; but the moment he spoke, the startled seriousness of his features was utterly discharged, and a dry. drolling, or laughing levity took such full possession of him, that I his aspect, and an aukward absurdity in his gesture, that had you not known him, you could not have be-lieved, that naturally he could have had a grain of common sense. In a word, I am tempted to sum up the

His life was laughter, and the ludicrous So mixed in him, that Nature might stand up, And say to all the world—This was an actor."

The portrait of Underhil has not less the air of exact resemblance, though the subject is of less richness.

sive colours, and in some of them, looked, as if it were it impossible the same creature could ever have been not in the power of human passions to alter a feature of recovered, to what was as easy to her, the gay, the lively, him. In the solemn formality of Obadiah in The Committee, and in the booby heaviness of Lolpoop in The sex; for, while her shape permitted, she was a more is not impossible: this then is all you will expect from | Squire of Aleatia, he seemed the immoveable log he is not impossible: this is an any you will expect troit spate of status, he seemed the immovestie log he me, and from hence i must leave you to gues at him.

"He scarce ever made his first entrance in a play, but the was received with an involuntary applause, not ed it: his face was full and long; from his crown to the end of his nose, was the shorter half of it, so that the partially prostituted, and bespoken; but by a general disproportion of his lower features, when soberly comparating the provided in the status of the graver was his look upon it; and sure, the ridiculous ever made beholders merry! not but, at other times, he solemnity of his features were enough to have set a could be wakened into spirit equally ridiculous.—In the whole bench of bishops into a titter, could he have coarse, rustic humour of Justice Clodpate, in Epsome been honoured (may it be no offence to suppose it) with Wells, he was a delightful brute! and in the blunt viva-such grave and right reverend auditors. In the ludicity of Sir Sampson, in Love for Love, he shewed all crous distresses, which, by the laws of comedy, folly that true perverse spirit, that is commonly seen in much is often involved in; he sunk into such a mixture of wit and ill-nature. This character is one of those few piteous pusillanimity, and a consternation so ruefully so well written, with so much wit and humour, that an ridiculous and inconsolable, that when he had shook actor must be the grossest dunce, that does not appear you, to a fatigue of laughter, it became a moot point, with an unusual life in it: but it will still shew as great whether you ought not to have pitied him. When he a proportion of skill, to come near Underhil in the debated any matter by himself, he would shut up his acting it, which (not to undervalue those who soon mouth with a dumb studious pout, and roll his full eye came after him) I have not yet seen. He was particuinto such a vacant amazement, such a palpable igno-larly admired too, for the Grave-digger in Hamlet. The rance of what to think of it, that his silent perplexity author of The Tatler recommends him to the favour of the town, upon that play's being acted for his benefit gave your imagination as fall content, as the most ab-gave your imagination as fall content, as the most ab-surd thing he could say upon it. In the character of leave the stage, he came on again, for that day, to per-Sir Martin Marr-all, who is always committing blunders form his old part; but alas! so worn and disabled, as if to the prejudice of his own interest, when he had he himself was to have lain in the grave he was digbrought himself to a dilemma in his affairs, by vainly ging: when he could no more excite laughter, his infirenceding upon his own head, and was afterwards mities were dismissed with pity: he died soon after, a afraid to look his governing servant and counsellor in superannuated pensioner, in the list of those, who were his face; what a copious and distressful harangue have supported by the joint shares, under the first patent I seen him make with his looks (while the house has granted to Sir Richard Steele."

We pass reluctantly over the account of Mrs. Barry, variety, too, was attended with an equal vivacity, which standing under the load of them, could have more effectually moved his spectators, by the most pathetic speech, than poor miserable Nokes did, by this silent which may be surrorising in a convergation and set by which may be surprising in a conversation, and yet be lost when brought to the theatre, which was the case of Estcourt already mentioned: but where the elocution is round, distinct, voluble, and various, and Mrs. Montfort's was, the mimick, there, is a great assistant to the actor. Nothing, tho ever so barren, if within the bounds of nature, could be flat in her hands. She can only refer the idea of him to your imagination. In some of his low characters, that became it, he had a coldly written, and often made an author vain of his some of his low characters, that became it, he had a coldly written, and often made an author vain of his shuffling in his gait, with so contented an ignorance in work, that in itself had but little merit. She was so fond of humour, in what low part soever to be found, that she would make no scruple of defacing her fair form to come heartily into it : for when she was eminent character of Nokes, as a comedian, in a parodic of what Shakespear's Mark Autony says of Brutus as a hero: higher life, she would be in as much fancy, when de-scending into the antiquated Abigail of Fletcher, as when triumphing in all the airs and vain graces of a fine lady; a merit, that few actresses care for. In a play of D'Ur-fey's, now forgotten, called The Western Lass, which part she acted, she transformed her whole being, body shape, voice, language, look, and features, into almost another animal; with a strong Devonshire dialect, a "Underhil was a correct and natural comedian; his broad laughing voice, a poking head, round shoulders, particular excellence was in characters, that may be called still-life, I mean the stiff, the heavy, and the stupid: to these he gave the exactest and most expresTrot. To have seen her here, you would have thought adroit pretty fellow, than is usually seen upon the stage: thusiasm to give vivid expression to the highest and most her easy air, action, mien, and gesture, quite chang'd honorable of human emotions.—Still can we boast of from the quoif, to the cocked hat, and cavalier in faone, whose rich and noble voice is adapted to all the most shion. People were so fond of seeing her a man, that when the part of Bays in The Rehearsal, had, for some time, lain dormant, she was desired to take it up, which I have seen her act with all the true, coxcombly spirit live and romantic-and who throws over his grandest

But what found most employment for her whole various excellence at once, was the Part of Melantha, in Marriage-Alamode. Melantha is as finished an impertinent, as ever fluttered in a drawing-room, and seems to found-whose bursts of passion almost transports us into contain the most complete system of female foppery, that could possibly be crowded into the tortured form of a fine lady. Her language, dress, motion, manners, soul, and body, are in a continued hurry to be something more than is necessary or commendable. And though I doubt it will be a vain labour, to offer you a just likeness of Mrs Montfort's action, yet the fantastick impression is still so strong in my memory, that I cannot help saying something, the' fantastically, about it. The first ridiculous airs that break fore they perish, that our successors may fix on them their from her, are, upon a gallant, never seen before, who retrospective eyes unblamed, and enrich with a review of delivers her a letter from her father, recommending him their merits some number of our work, which will appear, to her good graces, as an honourable lover. Here now, one would think she might naturally shew a little of the sex's decent reserve, tho' never so slightly covered ! No, sir; not a tittle of it; modesty is the virtue of a poor-souled country gentlewoman; she is too much a court lady, to be under so vulgar a confusion! she reads the letter, therefore, with a careless, dropping lip, and an erected brow, humming it hastily over, as if she were impatient to outgo her father's commands, by making a complete conquest of him at once; and that the letter might not embarrass her attack, crack! she crumbles it at once, into her palm, and pours upon him her whole artillery of airs, eyes, and motion; down goes her dainty, diving body, to the ground, as if she were sinking under the conscious load of her own attractions; then launches into a flood of fine language, and com-pliment, still playing her chest forward in fifty falls and risings, like a swan upon waving water; and, to and silent wood: the shadows of twilight were deepening complete her impertinence, she is so rapidly fond of over the scene, but the gentle Susan was a fearless girl. her own wit, that she will not give her lover leave The stillnes and the gloom of night were not dreaded by to praise it: silent assenting bows, and vain endea-yours to speak, are all the share of the conversation he is admitted to, which, at last, he is relieved from, by her engagement to half a score visits, which she swims from him to make, with a promise to return in a twinkling."

on familiar terms, with Wilkes and Dogget, and Boothdays of yore-and sit amidst applauding whigs and tories on the first representation of Cato. He may follow the "form and moving most express and admirable"-of en-return home" said she to her servant "by the road. The exquisite varieties of tenderness and passion-one, whose and humour that the sufficiency of the character required. pictures, tints so mellow and so nicely blended, that, with all their inimitable variety, they sink in perfect harmony into the soul.—Still have we a performer of intensity never equalled—of pathos the sweetest and the most proanother order of being, and whose flashes of genius cast a new light on the darkest caverns of the soul. If we have few names to boast in elegant comedy, we enjoy a crowd of the richest and most original humourists, with Munden-that actor of a myriad unforgotten faces-at their head. But our theme has enticed us beyond our proper domain of the past; and we must retire. Let us hope for some Cibber, to catch the graces of our living actors bein due course, in the twenty-second century.-[1820.]

> From the Album, 1823. A MURDERER'S DEATH-BED.

"O, gentle Lady,

"The repetition, in a woman's ear,
"The repetition, in a woman's ear,
"Macseth.

It was a beautiful summer evening, when Susan Lee left her father's vicarage to visit a sick girl, who resided at some distance from the wood behind the church at Linthorn. The sun was low in the sky, and its red and slanting rays streamed brightly through the rich foliage, lighting up many a long and winding glade of the now dark her. For the last week, her walk had been through Linthorn wood, and, although she had left home at a later hour than usual, this evening, James Allen accompanied her, and James Allen was her father's old and trusted servant; one whom she had seen daily since her childhood .- Susan had passed the wood, and the waving corn-In this work, also, the reader may become acquainted, fields beyond; she was walking quietly down a long and narrow lane, shadowed by the interlacing branches of the full in love with Mrs. Bracegirdle, as half the town did in tall elms which extended along its sides, and gazing upon the distant horizon, where the rich hues of sun-set had faded into one pale hue of clear cold amber, while every actors from the gorgeous scene of their exploits to their green tree and hedge-row had acquired a prevailing and private enjoyments, share in their jealousies, laugh with blackened colour. Susan Lee loosened the string of her them at their own ludicrous distresses, and join their large straw hat; for the day had been sultry, and the fanhappy social hours. Yet with all our admiration for the ning air felt delightful, as it met her face and stirred the theatrical artists, who yet live in Cibber's Apology, we re-soft rings of hair that hung round her neck. She walked joice to believe that their high and joyous art is not de-on; musing, as she walked, in a mood of pensive and clining. Kemble, indeed, and Mrs. Siddons, have forsaken dreamy pleasure. Suddenly a man leapt from the hedge, that stateliest region of tragedy which they first opened and stood still, at a few yards before her. Susan stopped our gaze. But the latter could not be regarded as be- too: she could not help doing so; she turned her head longing to any age; her path was lone as it was exalted, half-terrified, but James Allon appeared very near. Susan and she appeared, not as highest of a class which existed walked on, but trembled a little, as she passed the man, before her, but as a being of another order, destined " to and yet she stole a glance at his countenance; the little leave the world no copy," but to enrich its imaginations light, which still remained, showed nothing peculiar in that for ever. Yet have we, in the youngest of the Kemble countenance. When Susan was leaving the cottage of the line, at once an artist of antique grace in comedy, and a sick girl, she recollected another cottage, where her pre-tragedian of look the most chivalrous and heroic—of sence was hoped for by an afflicted family. "We will Martin." Although it was as dark as summer nights gen-with God No, no! nothing can save me, now." "While erally are, when she reached home, Susan did not regret life remains," replied Susan "there is hope, through our her long dark walk, for she had made "the widow's heart Saviour, with the worst sinner; and as for me, you are sing for joy."

of st se a-st h yy o-to st re re d n-ir er or e-ir

nntntng
rl.

ny
ner
ed
dnnd
he
on ad
ry
de ad
an
,tle

he re-

the room, and told her that a dying man had sent to enand wrinkled face wet with tears.

fistance is but little farther: I wish to visit poor widow forgiveness, and your prayers, may gain me some favour mistaken, you never injured me." The man, with an ex-Susan's father had been vicar of Linthorn but a few ertion of strength, that astonished Susan, raised himself up in the bed, and wiping away the cold sweat, that hung on months when she took the walk I have just mentioned. his forehead, started again at her, and said, "I can't be character which their conduct has since established in the conduct has since establis mistaken; your name is-" "Susan Lee," she anamong the parishoners was then scarcely known. Susan sweed The man tried to speak, but his mouth opened, Lee had resided at Linthorn about five years, when, as she land for some any naments he continued speak but his mouth opened. sat alone one cold autumn evening, James Allen entered and for some moments he continued speechless. At length he said, with difficulty, "you are in the same room treat that she would come to him. Her father was in Lon- fied Susan felt unable to stir, and sat in breathless horror. with the man who once tried to murder you:" the terrihad brought the message, he was an old white headed man; his only son was dying, and, while he spoke of his child's danger, he wept. "There were years in that child's man, "I have not told now feebly. "Ah!" replied the child a danger, he wept. - There were years in that child's man, "I have not told you yet! I had watched you pass life," he said "which might have been, he feared, years of that way for many evenings, it was too early then, but I wickedness. He had left home. a strong hearty man, wickedness. He had left home, a strong hearty man, waited till midnight for your return. Thank God, thank he had come back changed indeed, and he cannot die, Ma-God, you did not come back that way! I, and another you." Susan hesitated and looked at James Allen; the old servant had taken down the lanthorn. "I will go instantly," said Susan—Susan went forth in the dark cold struck to when the lanthorn is the dark cold struck to when the lanthorn is the dark cold struck to when the lanthorn is the dark cold struck to when the color of the village night, to visit the hut of the dying man. One deep dull struck twelve, we turned away, cursing you and swearing mass of clouds skirted the horizon, and shrouded the revenge." "Revenge:" inquired Susan, timidly but eamass of clouds skirted the horizon, and shrouded the whole sky; their path lay through the wood, and although the trees were nearly leafless, the gloom of the wood seemed quite impenetrable. The narrow path was scarcely visible by the partial gleam of the lanthorn, and the cutting wind swept through the forest, while the very stems of the trees seemed to bend beneath its force. All around her was dreary and dismal, yet Susan walked calmly, but not when energed. I sware to be revenged: hank God—thank when energed. was dreary and dismal, yet Susan walked calmly, but not when enraged. I swore to be revenged; thank God—thank cheerfully, for she was visiting a dying man. The path God, I did not do it!" he added, clasping his hands closely now turned away by the banks of a rushing stream; they passed over a narrow foot bridge, and then walked about a line, and Susan could not withdraw her eyes from graying. quarter of a mile, over an open heath, and arrived at a lone on him. Again his mouth opened, and his eyes glared vaing, and Susan could not withdraw her eyes from gazing hovel. A dim light twinkled at the upper casement, and, as Susan entered, she heard a faltering step descending the shattered stairs. A very infirm old woman appeared: the size villany. Wickedness seemed to have worn away to sight which she carried threw a fitful gleam on her thin have blotted out, every expression but that of dull vacancy; and, though his words were so expressive of his feelings, Susan waited a few minutes, and then, at the old man's his face seemed to have lost the powers of expression. There request she followed him to the chamber of his son; she was a dead silence. The man slowly recovered himself, and approached the low bed on which the dying man lay—said to her, "Can you forgive me now?" Susan could scarce—"Lift me up, father!" said he—The old man placed the ly articulate the word, "yes," in a low voice. "Oh," said he candle on a table near the bed, and with difficulty raised wildly, "now you are afraid of me! and no wonder; alone his son, propping up his head with the tattered clothes with such a devil. You cannot forgive, you cannot even which lay behind him. "Now, father," said the man speak to me." "I do forgive you, "said Susan instantly, "may "will you leave me alone with the lady?" A faint feeling God forgive you as freely as I forgive you with my whole heart: of horror crept through the gentle girl's heart, as she saw may God bless you." "Bless me! can you say so? Yes, the old man quit the room, and listened to his feet, till they I know you can; for it was but the next day after that sounded on the last stair. The dying man looked round cursed evening, that I entered the cottage of the woman the room, and, in a low voice, requested Susan to close the who betrayed us. She was the wife of my companion, door. She trembled, as she did so, and, half unwillingly, and I heard your voice in the upper chamber, where the returned to his bedside. The man fixed his eyes earnestly woman was lying. I could not hear her speak, but you on her face: Susan drew back, but looked upon the counsaid to her, we should even pray for our murderers, and tenance before her. There was no particular expression you knelt down, and prayed with that poor creature; your on the feature; they were thick and heavy, and their exwords went to my very heart, I could not have hurt a pression was a dull blank. "You wished to see me," said hair of your head from that moment. I have often thought Susan, and knew not what more to say; "I did, I did," of you. That woman died, and I went away with her said he. "Promise me, Lady, not to leave me, till I have husband, for I was still hardened, and he had been long a promise me, " "I promise;" said Susan, and, putting away together across the country. Some months after-down the Bible, which she held, on the table, she opened the sacred volume, and sat bending over it. She lifted up sink of guilt, I sank deeper and deeper in infamy. But her eyes as the man began to speak, "I cannot die in peace" why should I go on with such a horrid tale? It can only said he, till you forgive me, till you pray for me. Your shock your pure cars. Young lady I have gone through—wickedness. I, a man, with a son, which Jesus Christ wept too, but prayed silently in her weeping. Lady, I'm not an ignorant man; I've had learning; I sin-him, "I will never mention to any person, what you ned against God with my eyes as open as they are now. have now confessed to me. Tell me nothing more, but go Tears of blood could not weep away my crimes." Susan down into the very depths of your heart and tell out every rose up, and, forgetting for uwhile, her former timidity, least crime to your Father, for he is your heavenly Fa-exclaimed, "There is one whose blood cleanseth from all ther, as if nothing there were known to him but your own sin. Who is the God, in whom the worst sinner may hope, confession; the more you accuse yourself now before God, but our God? Who shall cry unto Him in vain?" "Tell the less will be brought against you on the last and most me," said the man wildly; he stopt, and leaned his head awful day of God's judgment."out from the bed, as he looked round on every side, seeming to fear the presence of any other person;—"Come replied. "I have gone over in my thought, I have looked large heavy tears dropping from his vacant eyes; the thing, and to sink back into a sort of waking dream.— heart seemed to have wrung up some of its convulsed ago. That man was my first companion in guilt." nies into the face as he clasped his hands together, and I was horror-struck all over, but I think I was more cried out, "Thy will be done! It is but just that I should affected by the sight of another man whom I had also find pity with no one but God. And can I look to thee, known; he was an infamous wretch; but he came run-O God Almighty, without dreadful fear? Oh for one lit ning up the steps till they shook beneath his feet, he stood tle light of sweet, heavenly hope !" Susan let go the latch on the scaffold at his full height, and looked round boldly, of the door. She forgot all her weakness, and walked and spoke to the mob boldly and loudly. Oh, God! it was steadily to the bed; she stood still, and smiled upon the all forced; I could see his lips and his temples moving, heart-broken wretch; at least he thought, (for he had for and his hand twitching, all the time. The last who came the moment forgotten Susan, that an angel stood before out was a young lad, a beautiful lad of seventeen or eighhim, and smiled upon him. She stood there without move teen, one of whom I had known a dear, innocent child; ing, with her shining white garments, and her fair hair one who had sate upon my knee, and hung with his little flowing to her shoulders, her eyes beaming with the tenarms round my neek, and gone to sleep on my bosom. I derest pity. She knelt down there, and raising her pure can't speak of that boy without weeping," said the man, hands towards heaven, prayed aloud as for the life of her and his voice was choked with sobs, "he was born in this own soul: "O blessed Lord, the Father of mercies, and part of the country," he continued "poor dear boy; but the God of all comfort,"—she remembered parts of that his own father encouraged him to steal, and there he stood beautiful prayer, but language now flowed freely from her at last looking so young, so very young, to die. His heart heart,-"thy wrath lieth heavy upon him, and his soul is was touched, and he prayed aloud with the good clergyfull of trouble; teach him by the Holy Spirit to have a man; he came forward and spoke a few words to the mob, right understanding of himself, and of thy threats and pro- he seemed to look at me, and I pulled down my hat over mises; that he may neither give up his only comfort, his my eyes. I turned, and tried to get out of the crowd, but confidence in Thee, his hope in Thee, nor seek it any it was impossible; I saw their last struggles, then I did where but in Thee. Thou knowest the secrets of our escape. I never stopped as I rushed away. I never stophearts," she continued, "shut not thy merciful ears to our ped walking, or running, till I was many miles from Lopprayers, O holy and most merciful Saviour. Thou canst don. I left the high road, and crossed over the fields till abundantly pardon, for thy thoughts are not as our thoughts, I was far away from any house; I threw myself down in nor thy ways as our ways." The repentant murderer a ditch at the end of a lone field, and there I lay, I know fell back upon his pillow, and the very flood-gates of his not how long; I felt as if I could not rise up, I wished to grief were burst open, the voice of his companion was not die in that ditch. Oh how I wished myself at the bottom

Oh God of Heaven! what have I not gone through of heard, its sounds was lost in his loud weeping; Susan died upon the cross to save, a creature meant for Heaven! man had become in some manner composed, Susan said to nearer, lady, if I may ask you; do not yet go away; my back to the beginning of crimes, which are enough to heart is lighter, while I speak to you, and see your freeze even my blood to think upon. Wait-wait a little gentle looks. I never meant to speak of what I now am longer, I took you for an angel just now, and you are still going to confess to you; you will hear, and you will then like one to me. I have strength to tell you how my heart tell me if I may hope: I am known by God just as I am, of stone was first touched: I am better, so much better why should I be so fearful to let you know my heart?- now, do not go away." Susan sat down by the table, and This I now feel, that man, and all the shame which I leaned her head on her hand, while her eyes rested on the should have to meet among men, is nothing to the thought book of God. "I had been imprisoned, not for that murof God, as I now think of him at last. Blessed be God! der," said he "but for another crime; I was let out from

I feel this." The poor wretch drew down both his hands Horsemonger Lane Prison, and I slept that night at an on each side, and elenched them in the bed clothes, and, alchouse; when I went out the next morning, I observed stretching forth his head, said in a whisper. "There was crowds of persons thronging towards Newgate; I went a young girl, I knew her once as meek and innocent as along with them eagerly and pushed my way up to the you are; I made her as vile, as wicked, as myself; we scaffold, for six men were to be hung that morning. One were never married; she provoked me; and with these by one they came out upon the scaffold. I looked at every horrid hands," he said hiding still more under the clothes, face and I knew them all. The first man was obliged to as he looked down, "I cut her throat." Susan could hardly be supported as he walked on, and notwithstanding his drag one foot after the other, as she moved towards the deadly paleness, and his sunken checks, which shewed that door; she clasped the latch, and clung to it for support.— he had felt and felt most bitterly, he now seemed quite stu-She leaned against the wall, and was about to yield to her pified, his whole body shook violently, and they were womanly fears, and rush from the room, when she heard obliged to hold him and do every thing for him, as he stood a long heart-broken groan. She turned one look on the like a senseless creature. The clergyman came up to him murderer. There was now some light expression in his and spoke in the kindest manner; but the poor creature countenance, as he sat in the same motionless position, the only stared at him, and then seemed again to forget every even that grave. Once I made up my mind to kill myself, both departed. and I clutched hold of my throat, and tried, devil that I | The aged parents have not yet heard that their son was was! to strangle myself; then all at once the last words a murderer. of that poor young lad seemed to ring in my ears, and I dropped my hands, and prayed; yes, for the first time I prayed to God to look upon me, and break my hard heart so that it might but be changed. And then I thought I would give myself up to justice for that murder which had not yet been found out; but I hated to think that I should do with her as you please." be led forth to be stared at by all the careless mob. I feared man, and the love of life came rushing back with the bishop's robe. fresh force, as if to mock me by making my own feelings fears, and crept farther in among the bushes and hemlock dashed away the foremost. that grew over the ditch, for I listened till I fancied every streaming over my eyelids; but my sleep was heavy and ling maiden." I started up out of a horrid dream. The rain was over, poor wretch stopped; Susan reproached herself that she from what source could not be ascertained. had allowed her interest in his story to make her forget At this moment the interest of the scene was heightfor so short a time, that her father could be with him and the crew. pray with him .-

to

ou

go ry vn od,

he

ed

to

tle

ill

rt

er

nd be ır-

m

ed

nt

he

ne

ry

is

at

u-

re

m

re

y

ne do y, as g, ae hie I

is at ad at

b, er at d

One day when Mr. Lee had gone up to the chamber of hovel, and inquired if J- Nmother went out to them, and said, "I am his mother; arms. he is very, very bad. The old woman only was at home were well dressed, civil-spoken men, and the poor mother captain. tottered up the stairs to inform the clergyman of their arapproaching; and she was about to speak, when the men head. who were close behind her, bowed respectfully to the clergyman, and pitying the age of the poor woman, gently entreated her to return for a short time to the room below. and she, rather unwillingly, obeyed. When the men had sure." reached the chamber, the clergyman closed the door; they said nothing, but put into his hand a paper; he looked a the captain's feelings. moment at it, and beheld a warrant for the body of J-N— on a charge of murder. Thank God, said he, as is the treasure? trifle not, or, by heaven !"he pointed to the bed. The men approached the bed; but "Name not heaven," replied the bishop: they found there only a pallid corpse, with eyes yet un- had my answer." closed. They were humane men; five minutes had scarcely elapsed when they returned to the room below, Hawkhurst, who hastened below.

and one of them said kindly to the old weman, "We had "Remove that boy," said Cain to the pirates, point-VOL. XXVIII. MARCH, 1836-26, of a deep, deep grave, and the cold heavy earth pressed business with your son, but it is too late to settle it new." hard down upon me for ever, where no one might find out life put some money into her trembling hand, and they

From the Naval Annual.

Continued from last Number.

THE PIRATE—BY CAPTAIN MARRYATT.

"Seize that girl, my lads?" cried Cain ; "she is yours,

"Save me ! oh, save me!" shrieked Teresa, clinging to

The pirates advanced and laid hold of Teresa. Francontradict themselves, and I shook all over with cowardly cisco bounded from where he stood behind the captain, and

"Are you men?" cried he, as the pirates retreated. little noise the voice of some one in pursuit of me; then I "Holy sir, I honour you. Alas! I cannot save you," conheld in my breath and buried my hot face in the damp earth, tinued Francisco mournfully. "Yet will I try. On my my head seemed bursting asunder with scorching heat knecs-by the love you bore my mother-by the affec-At last those fears went away, and I turned round, for it tion you once bore me-do not commit this horrid deed. had begun to rain, and the sweet cool drops fell upon my My lads ?" continued Francisco, appealing to the pirates, head and soaked through my hair. I opened my shirt "join with me and entreat your captain; ye are too brave, collar, and spread open my hands, for every drop seemed too manly, to injure the helpless and the innocent-above to give me fresh life. I went to sleep, with the rain all to shed the blood of a holy man, and of this poor tremb-

There was a pause-even the pirates appeared to side the stars were shining above my head, but I was cold and with Francisco, though none of them dared to speak. The stiff; and so giddy, that I could hardly get up." Here the muscles of the captain's face quivered with emotion, but his illness. He gasped for breath: his eyes rolled, and he ened. The girl who attended upon Teresa, crouched on seemed overtaken by death. Susan called hastily to those her knees with terror, had been casting her fearful eyes below, and he again slowly revived, although he did not upon the men which composed the pirate-crew; suddenly appear to notice any one. Susan stole from the room, and she utterred a scream of delight as she discovered among immediately returned home; she was now too occupied by them one that she well knew. He was a young man, all that she had just heard to think of the dreary gloom about twenty-five years of age, with little or no beard. of the way, or indeed of any external objects. The next He had been her lover in his more innocent days; and she, day Susan's father returned from London, and he visited for more than a year, had mourned him as dead, for the the dying man, who survived for a few days longer. Su-vessel in which he sailed had never been heard of. It had san Lee blessed God that the murderer was spared even been taken by the pirate, and, to save his life, he had joined

"Filippo! Filippo!" screamed the girl, rushing into his arms. "Mistress! it is Filippo; and we are safe."

Filippo instantly recognised her: the sight of her the dying man, two strangers stopped at the door of the brought back to his memory his days of happiness and of - were at home. His innocence; and the lovers were clasped in each other's

"Save them! spare them!-by the spirit of my mother! that time: they begged immediately to see her son; they I charge you," repeated Francisco, again appealing to the

" May God bless thee, thou good young man," said the rival. Mr. Lee came out on the stairs when he heard her bishop, advancing and placing his hand upon Francisco's

Cain answered not; but his broad expanded chest heaved with emotion-when Hawkhurst burst into the group.

"We are too late for the money, captain; the water is Mr. Lee, who suspected the truth, joined in the request, already six feet above it. We must now try for the trea-

"This intelligence appeared to check the current of

"Now, in one word sir," said he to the bishop, "where

"Name not heaven," replied the bishop: "you have

The captain turned away, and gave some directions to

ing to Francisco. "Separate those two fools," continued but Pompey and the Kroumen, who had been attentive he, looking towards Filippo and the girl, who where to what was going on, had collected around Francisco, and sobbing in each other's arms.

" Never!" cried Filippo.

to be obeyed?" cried Cain, raising his cutlass.

Filippo started up, disengaged himself from the girl, plunge it in his bosom.

With the quickness of lightning the captain caught his uplifted hand, and, breaking his wrist, hurled him

"Indeed!" cried he, with a sneer.

"You shall not separate us," said Filippo, attempting to rise,

"I do not intend it, my good lad," replied Cain; "lash them both together and launch them overboard."

This order was now obeyed; for the pirates not only quailed before the captain's cool courage, but were inimpossible almost to separate them. In this state they were carried to the entering-port, and cast into the sea.

"Monster!" cried the bishop, as he heard the splash,

"thou wilt have a heavy reckoning for this."

voice.

The bishop and his niece were led to the gang-way.

fins of the sharks-eager in the anticipation of a further these poor limbs; but I see no monster like thyself. God, as well as a rewarding one."

the scene.

"You have your choice; first torture, and then your the girl, this moment I hand her over to my crew."

and plunging into the wave.

until the water was in a foam, and then the dark colour the deep.

catastrophe-" seize him !"

"Touch him not!" ericd Francisco, standing on the hammock-nettings; "touch him not! if you are men."

Boiling with rage, Cain let go the arm of the bishop, drew his pistol, and levelled it at Francisco. The bishop threw up the arm of Cain as he fired; saw that he had down to his cabin to consider upon what should be done. missed his aim, and clasped his hands, raising his eyes to heaven in thankfulness at Francisco's escape. In this position he was collared by Hawkhurst, whose anger overcome his discretion, and who hurled him through the entering port into the sea.

cried,-" Seize that boy and bring him here.

a scuffle ensued. The pirates, not being very determined, nor very anxious to take Francisco, allowed him to be hur-"Throw the girl to the sharks! Do you hear? am I ried away in the centre of the Kroumen, who bore him safely to the schooner.

In the mean time Hawkhurst, and the major part of the and, drawing his knife, rushed towards the captain to men on board the ship, had been tearing up the hold to obtain the valuables, but without success. The water had now reached above the orlop-deck, and all further attempts were unavailing. The ship was settling fast, and it became necessary to quit her, and haul off the schooner, that she might not be endangered by the vortex of the sinking vessel. Cain and Hawkburst, with their disappointed crew, returned on board the schooner, and, before they had succeeded in detaching the two vessels a cable's length, the ship went down with all the treasure so coveted, The indignation and rage which were expressed by the captain as he rapidly walked the deck in company with his dignant that his life had been attempted. There was first mate-his violent gesticulations-proved to the crew little occasion, to tie the unhappy pair together; they were that there was mischief brewing. Francisco did not relocked so fast in each other's arms that it would have been turn to the cabin; he remained forward with the Kroumen, who, although but a small portion of the ship's company, were known to be resolute and not to be despised.— It was also observed that all of them had supplied themselves with arms, and were collected forward, huddled to-"Now bring these forward," said Cain, with a savage gether, watching every motion and manœuvre, and talking rapidly in their own language. The schooner was now steered to the north-westward under all press of sail. The "What dost thou see, good bishop?" said Cain, point- sun again disappeared, Francisco returned not to the ing to the discoloured water, and the rapid motion of the cabin-he went below, surrounded by the Kroumen, who appeared to have devoted themselves to his protection,-Once during the night Hawkhurst summoned them on "I see ravenous creatures after their kind," replied the deck, but they obeyed not the order; and, to the expostubishop, "who will, in all probability, soon tear asunder lations of the boatswain's mate who came down, they made no reply. But there were many pirates in the schooner Teresa, dearest, fear not; there is a God, an avenging who appeared to coincide with the Kroumen in their regard for Francisco. There are shades of villany in the But Teresa's eyes were closed—she could not look upon most profligate of societies; and, among the pirate's crew, some were not wholly debased. The foul murder of a holy man-the cruel fate of the beautiful Teresa-and body to those sharks for your own portion: and, as for the barbarous conduct of the c. ptain towards Filippo and his mistress, were deeds of an atrocity to which even the "Never!" shricked Teresa, springing from the deck most hardened were unaccustomed. Francisco's pleadings in behalf of mercy were at least no crime; and yet they There was the splash of contention, the lashing of tails, considered that Francisco was doomed. He was a general favourite; the worst disposed of the pirates, with the exgradually cleared away, and naught was to be seen but ception of Hawkhurst, if they did not love, could not forthe pure blue wave and the still unsatiated monsters of bear respecting him; although, at the same time, they felt that if Francisco remained on board, the power even of Cain himself would soon be destroyed. For many months from him," cried the pirate-captain, turning to his crew, Hawkhurst who detested this youth, had been most earnwho, villians, as they were, had been shocked at this last est that he should be sent out of the schooner. Now he pressed the captain for his removal in any way, as necessary for their mutual safety, pointing cut to Cain the conduct of the Kronmen, and his fears that a large proportion of the ship's company were equally disaffected. Cain felt the truth of Hawkhurst's representation; and he went

i how fi gh fi ir ir

Vi

bi ch do yo

pi

an

I

ha

an sta

pro has

see

rep

It was past midnight, when Cain, worn out with the conflicting passions of the day, fell into an uneasy slumber.-His dreams were of Francisco's mother-she appeared to him pleading for her son, and Cain "babbled in his sleep." At this time Francisco, with Pompey, had crawled aft, "Officious fool!" muttered Cain, when he perceived that they might obtain, if they found the captain asleep, what the mate had done. Then, recollecting himself, he the pistols of Francisco, with some ammunition. Pompey slipped in first, and started back when he heard the cap-One or two of the crew advanced to obey his orders; tain's voice. They remained at the cabin-door listening.

"No-no," muttered Cain, "he must die-useless-plead not, woman !- I know I murdered thee-plead not, he

In one of the sockets of the silver lamp there was a shouted several voices at once. lighted wick, the rays of which were sufficient to afford a dim view of the cabin. Francisco, overhearing the words of Cain, stepped in, and walked up to the side of the bed. then, my men! and bring up Francisco." "Boy! plead not," continued Cain, lying on his back and murder him."

"Wretch," said Francisco, in a low solemn voice, " didst thou kill my mother?"

tive

and

ned,

ur-

im

the

l to ater

atand ner,

the sap-

fore

ole's

ted.

the

his

rew

rerou-

om-

d.—

em.

toinc

now

The

the

who

n.—

on

stu-

nade

oner

r re-

the

rew,

of a

-and

and

the

ings

they

neral

CX-

for-

felt

n of

nths

arn-

w he eces-

con-

rtion

n felt went lone.

con-

er.—

ed to

eep."

aft.

leep, npey

capning. "I did-I did," responded Cain, still sleeping.

"And why?" continued Francisco, who, at this acknowledgment on the part of the sleeping captain, was careless of discovery.

" In my mood-she vexed me," answered Cain.

"Fiend! thou hast then confessed it," cried Francisco but before his senses were well recovered, or his eyes opened so as to distinguish their torms, Pompey struck

"Who's there ?"-who's there? eried Cain.

The officer in charge of the deck hastened down.

" Did you call, sir ?"

"Call," repeated the captain-" I thought there was some one in the cabin. I want a light-that's all," continued he, recovering himself, as he wiped the cold perspiration from his forehead.

"In the mean time Francisco, with Pompey, had gained his former place of refuge with the Kroumen. The feelings of the young man changed from agony to revenge: his object in returning, from the cabin to recover his weapons had been frustrated, but his determination now was to take the life of the captain if he possibly could. The following morning the Krommen again refused to work or go on deck; and the state of affairs was reported by Hawkhurst to his chief. The mate now assumed another tone; for he had sounded not the majority but the most steady and influential men on board, who, like himself, were veterans

" It must be, sir; or you will no longer command this vessel. I am desired to say so."

"Indeed," repli d Cain, with a sneer; " perhaps you have already chosen my successor.'

Hawkhurst perceived that he had lost ground, and he changed his manner. "I speak but for yourself; if you do not command this vessel I shall not remain in her-if you quit her, I quit also; and we must find another.'

Cain was pacified, and the subject was not renewed. "Turn the hands up," at last said the captain. The pirate-crew assembled aft.

" My lads, I am sorry that our laws oblige me to make an example; but mutiny and disaffection must be punished. I am equally bound as yourselves by the laws which we have laid down for our guidance while we sail together; and you may believe that in doing my duty in this instance, I am guided by a sense of justice, and wish to prove to you that I am worthy to command. Francisco has been with me since he was a child; he has lived with me, and it is painful to part with him: but I am here to see that our laws are put in force. He has been guilty of assumed the attitude of defence. repeated mutiny and contempt, and-he must die."

-" death and justice!"

"No more murder!" said several voices from behind.

" Who's that-that speaks ?"

" Too much murder yesterday-no more murder !"

" Let the men come forward who speak," cried Cain, with a withering look. No one obeyed this order. " Down,

The whole of the pirate-crew hastened below, but with breathing heavily-"plead not-woman!, to-morrow he different intentions; some were determined to seize Frandies." A pause ensued, as if the sleeping man was listening to a reply. "Yes, as I murdered thee, so will I A confused noise was heard—the shouts of Down, and seize him! opposed to those of No murder! No murder!

Both parties had snatched up their arms; those who sided with Francisco joined the Kroumen, whilst the other also hastened below to bring him on deck. A slight scuffl ensued before they separated, and ascertained by the se paration the strength of the contending parties. Francisco, perceiving that he was joined by a large body, desired his men to follow him, went up the fore ladder, and took possession of the forecastle. The pirates on his side supplied in a loud voice, which awoke the captain, who started up, him with arms, and Francisco stood forward in advance. Hawkhurst, and those of the crew who sided with him, had retreated to the quarter-deck, and rallied round the capout the light, and all was darkness; he then put his tain, who leaned against the capstern. They were then hand to Francisco's mouth, and led him out of the cabin. able to estimate their comparative strength. The number, on the whole, preponderated in favour of Francisco; but on the captain's side were the older and more athletic of the crew, and, we may add, the more determined. Still, the captain and Hawkhurst perceived the danger of their situation, and it was thought advisable to parley for the present, and wreak their vengeance hereafter. For a few minutes there was a low consultation between both parties: at last Cain advanced.

> " My lads," said he, addressing those who had rallied round Francisco, "I little thought a firebrand would have been cast in this vessel to set us all at variance. It was my duty, as your captain, to propose that our laws should be enforced. Tell me, now, what it is that you wish. I am only here as your captain, and to take the sense of the whole crew. I have no animosity against that lad; I have loved him-I have cherished him; but, like a viper, he has stung me in return. Instead of being in arms against each other, ought we not to be united? have, therefore, one proposal to make to you, which is this: Let the sentence go by vote or ballot, if you please; and whatever the sentence may be, I shall be guided by it. Can I sav more ?"

"My lads," replied Francisco, when the captain had done speaking, "I think it better that you should accept this proposal, rather than blood should be shed. My life is of little consequence; say, then, will you agree to the vote, and submit to those laws which, as the captain says, have been laid down to regulate the discipline of the vessel!"

The pirates on Francisco's side looked round on their party, and, perceiving that they were the most numerous, consented to the proposal; but Hawkhurst stepped forward and observed; "Of course, the Kroumen can have no votes, as they do not belong to the vessel."

This objection was important, as they amounted to twenty-five, and, after that number was deducted, in all probability, Francisco's adherents would have been in the The pirates with Francisco objected, and again minority.

"One moment," said Francisco, stepping in advance; Death! death!" cried several of the pirates in advance "before this point is settled, I wish to take the sense of all of you as to another of your laws. I ask you Hawkhurst, not one law which is, Blood for blood."

"Yes-yes," shouted all the pirates.

"Then let your e ptain stand forward, and answer to my charge, if he dares."

Cain curled his lip in derision, and walked within two vards of Francisco.

"Well, boy, I'm here; and what is your charge?"

"First-I ask you, Captain Cain, who are so anxious that 'Blood for blood' is a just law?"

"Most just: and, when shed, the party who revenges is not amenable."

"Tis well: then, villain that thou art, answer-Didst Francisco." thou not murder my mother?"

Cain, at this accusation, started.

Francisco; "Did you not murder my mother?"

The Captain's lips and the muscles of his face quivered, Hawkhurst. but he did not reply.

"Blood for blood!" cried Francisco, as he fired a pistol at Cain, who staggered, and fell on the deck.

Hawkhurst and several of the pirates hastened to the captain and raised him.

"She must have told him last night," said Cain, speaking with difficulty, as the blood flowed from the wound,

"He told me so himself," said Francisco, turning round to those who stood by him.

Cain was taken down into the cabin. On examination, his wound was not mortal, although the loss of blood had been rapid and very great. In a few minutes Hawkhurst joined the party on the quarter-deck. He found that the tide had turned more in Francisco's favour than he had expected; the law of "Blood for blood" was held most sacred: indeed, it was but the knowledge that it was solemnly recognised, and that, if one pirate wounded another, that other was at liberty to take his life, without the cabin-you know which I mean." punishment, which prevented constant affrays between parties, whose knives would otherwise have been the answer to every affront. It was a more debased law of duelling, which kept such profligate associations on good terms. Finding, therefore, that this feeling predominated, even among those who were opposed to Francisco on the other articles had been put in. other question, Hawkhurst, thought it advisable to parley

"Hawkhurst," said Francisco, "I have but one request to make, which, if complied with, will put an end to this contention; it is, that you will put me on shore at the first land that we make. If you and your party engage to do this, I will desire those who support me to return to their obedience."

"I grant it," replied Hawkhurst; "and so will the others. Will you not, my men?"

"Agreed-agreed upon all sides," cried the pirates, throwing away their weapons and mingling with each other, as if they had not been opposed,

There is an old saying, that there is honour amongst thieres; and so it often proves. Every man in the vessel knew that this agreement would be strictly adhered to; posure as if nothing had occurred.

Hawkhurst, who was aware that he must fulfill his romise, carefully examined the charts when he went down below, came up and altered the course of the schooner two points more to the northward. The next morning he was up at the mast-head nearly half an hour, when he descended, and again altered the course. By nine o'clock, a low eandy island appeared on the lee bow; when within half a and all you who are now opposed to me, whether you have [mile of it, he ordered the schooner to be hore to, and lowered down the small boat from the stern. He then turned the hands up. "My lads, we must keep our promise, to out Francisco on shore at the first land which we made. l'here it is;" and a malicious smile played on the miscreant's entures, as he pointed out to them the barren sand-bank, which promised nothing but starvation and a lingering Several of the crew murmured; but Hawkhurst was supported by his own party, and had, moreover, taken that the laws should be enforced, whether you acknowledge the precaution quietly to remove all the arms, with the exception of those with which his adherents were provided.

"An agreement is an agreement; it is what he reuested himself, and we promised to perform. Send for

" I am here, Hawkhurst; and I tell you candidly, that desolate as is that barren spot, I prefer it to remaining in "Answer the truth, or lie like a recreant," repeated your company. I will bring my chest up immediately."

" No-no; that was not a part of the agreement," cried

"Every man here has a right to his own property. I appeal to the whole crew."

"True-true," replied the pirates; and Hawkhurst found himself in the minority.

" Be it so."

The chest of Francisco was handed into the boat.

"Is that all ?" cried Hawkhurst.

"My lads, am I to have no provisions or water?" inmired Francisco.

" No," replied Hawkhurst.

" Yes-yes," cried most of the pirates.

Hawkhurst did not dare to put it to the vote; he turned sulkily away. The Kroumen brought up two breakers of water, and some pieces of pork.

"Here, massa," said Pompey, putting into Francisco's hand a fishing-line with hooks.

"Thank you, Pompey; but I had forgot-that book in Pompey nodded his head, and went below; but it was some time before he returned, during which Hawkhurst became impatient. It was a very small boat which had been lowered down; it had a lug-sail and two pair of sculls in it, and was quite full when Francisco's chest and the

"Come! I have no time to wait," said Hawkhurst; "in the boat!"

Francisco shook hands with many of the crew, and wished all of them farewell. Indeed, now that they beheld the poor lad about to be cast on a desolate island, even those most opposed to him, felt some emotions of pity. Although they acknowledged that his absence was necessary, yet they new his determined courage; and with them that quality was always a strong appeal.

"Who will row this lad ashore and bring the boat off?"

"Not I," replied one; "it would haunt me ever afterwards."

So they all appeared to think, for no one volunteered .-Francisco jumped into the boat.

"There is no room for any one but me; and I will row and Francisco now walked the deck with as much com-myself on shore," cried he. "Farewell, my lads! farewell!"

"Stop! not so; he must not have the boat-he may escape from the island," cried Hawkhurst.

"And why shouldn't he, poor fellow?" replied the men; let him have the boot."

"Yes-yes, let him have the boat;" and Hawkhurst ras again overruled.

"Here, Massa Francisco-here de book."

"What's that, sir?" cried Hawkhurst, snatching the outside; and having thus formed for himself a sort of book out of Pompey's hand.

"Shove off!" cried Hawkhurst.

"Give me my book, Mr. Hawkhurst!"

" No!" replied the malignant rascal, tossing the Bible over the taffrail; he shall not have that. I've heard say that there is consolation in it to the afflicted."

Francisco shoved off his boat, and seizing his sculls, oushed astern, picked up the book, which still floated, and laid it to dry on the after-thwart of the boat. He then pulled in for the shore. In the meantime the schooner had let draw her foresheet, and had already left him a quarter of a mile astern. Before Francisco had gained the sandbank, she was hull down to the northward.

CHAPTER X.

THE SAND-BANK.

THE first half hour that Francisco was on this desolate spot he watched the receding schooner: his thoughts were unconnected and vague. Wandering through the various scenes which had passed on the decks of that vessel, and recalling to his memory the different characters of those on board of her, much as he had longed to quit her-disgusted as he had been with those with whom he had been forced to associate; still as her sails grew fainter and fainter to his view, as she increased her distance, he more than once felt that even remaining on board of her would have been preferable to his present deserted lot, "No, no!" exclaimed he after a little farther reflection, "I had rather perish here, than continue to witness the scenes which I have been forced to behold."

He once more fixed his eyes upon her white sails, and then sat dawn on the loose sand, and remained in deep and melancholy reverie until the scorehing heat reminded him of his situation; he afterwards rose and turned his thoughts upon his present situation, and to what would be the measures most advisable to take. He hauled his little boat still farther on the beach, and attached the painter to one of the oars, which he fixed deep in the sand; he then proceeded to survey the bank, and found that but a small portion was over it. The most elevated part was not more than fifteen wind disturbed the glassy wave-all nature appeared hushabout fifty feet in circumference.

took out of the boat the oars and little sail, which, He directed his view downwards to the horizon, and that, fortunately kad remained in her. His last object, to haul too, was, not to be defined; there was a dark bank all the little boat up to the same spot, was one which demand- around it He walked to the edge of the sand-bank; there ed all his exertion; but, after considerable fatigue, he con- was not even a ripple—the wide occan appeared to be in a trived, by first lifting round her bow, and then her stern, trance, in a state of lethargy or stupor. to effect his object.

little hillocks, so as to raise it above the level of the sand of Heaven. beneath it two or three feet; he spread out the sail from the keel above, with the thole-pins as pegs, so as to keep scanned the ocean, he perceived that there was a change off the rays of the sun. Dragging the breakers of water rapidly approaching. The dark bank on the horizon had and the provisions underneath the boat, he left his chest now risen higher up; the opaqueness was every where covering which would protect him from the heat of the "Him, messa, Bible." Francisco waited for the book. day and the damp of the night, he crept in, to shelter himself until the evening.

Although Francisco had not been on deck, he knew pretty well whereabouts he then was. Taking out a chart from his chest, he examined the coast to ascertain the probable distance which he might be from any prospect of succour. He calculated that he was on one of a patch of sandbanks, off the coast of Loango, and about seven hundred miles from the Isle of St. Thomas-the nearest place where he might expect to fall in with an European face. From the coast he felt certain that he could not be more than forty or fifty miles at the most; but could he trust himself among the savage nations who inhabited it? He knew how ill they had been treated by Europeans; for, at that period, it was quite as common for the slave-traders to land and take the inhabitants away as slaves by force, as to purchase them in the more northern territories; still, he might be fortunate enough to fall in with some trader on the coast, as there were a few who still carried on a barter for gold-dust and ivory.

We do not know-we cannot conceive a situation much more deplorable than the one we have just described to have been that of Francisco. Alone-without a chance of assistance-with only a sufficiency of food for a few days, and cut off from the rest of his fellow-creatures, with only so much terra-firma as would prevent his being swallowed up by the vast, unfathomable ocean, into which the horizon fell on every side around him, and his chance of escape how small! Hundreds of miles from any from whom he might expect assistance, and the only means of reaching them a small boat-a mere cockle-shell, which the first rough gale would inevitably destroy.

Such, indeed, were the first thoughts of Francisco; but he soon recovered from his despondency. He was young, courageous, and buoyant with hope; and there is a feeling of pride-of trust in our own resources and exertions, which increases and stimulates us in proportion to our danger and difficulty: it is the daring of the soul, proving its celestial origin and eternal duration.

So intense was the heat that Francisco almost panted uncovered at high-water; for, trifling as was the rise of for sufficient air to support life, as he lay under the shade the tide, the bank was so low that the water flowed almost of the boat during the whole of that day; not a breath of feet above high-water mark, and that was a small knoll of ed into one horrible calm. It was not until the shades of night were covering the solitude, that Francisco ventured To this part he resolved to remove his effects: he re- forth from his retreat; but he found little relief; there was turned to the boat, and, having lifted out his chest, the an unnatural closeness in the air-a suffocation unusual water, and provisions, with the other articles which he had even in those climes. Francisco cast his eyes up to the obtained, he dragged them up, one by one, until they vault of heaven, and was astonished to find that there were were all collected at the spot he had chosen. He then no stars visible—a gray mist covered the whole firmament.

He parted the bair from his feverish brow, and once Tired and exhausted, he then repaired to one of the more surveying the horrible, lifeless, stagnant waste, his breakers of water and refreshed himself. The heat, as soul sickened, and he cast himself upon the sand. There the day advanced, had become intolerable; but it stimulat. he lay for many hours in a state bordering upon wild desed him to fresh exertion. He turned over the boat, and pair. At last he recovered himself; and, rising to his contrived that the bow and stern should rest upon two knees, he prayed for strength, and submission to the will

When he was once more upon his feet, and had again

ned s of ćo's

red

to

de.

it's

nk,

ing

rst

en

er.

đ.

for

hat

in

ied

1

und

in.

was urst had culls the

k in

" in and beand,

s of

was with ff?" fler-

d.row fare-

may

men; hurst And now the sounds increased—and here and there a parched to death—calling in his agony for water: and, as wild thread of air—whence coming, who could tell? and Francisco thought of this, he covered his face with his as rapidly disappearing, would ruffle, for a second, a por-hands, and prayed "Oh, God! thy will be done! but, in tion of the stagnant sea. Then came whizzing sounds of thy mercy, raise-still higher raise the waters!" moans, and then the rumbling noise of distant thunderloud and louder-yet-still louder-a broad black line is upon the isolated Francisco.

firm by its saturation with the element.

Francisco felt that he was drenched, and he raised his at the time, his own desolate situation. head. All he could discover was, that the firmament was mantled with a darkness, horrible from its intensity, and over this scene of anxiety and pain. On came the vessel, that the sea was in one extended foam—boiled every flying before the gale: while the seas chased her as it were, and white as milk—but still smooth, they would fain overwhelm her. It was fearful to see her as if the power of the wind had compelled it to be so; but scud-agonising to know that she was rushing to dethe water had encroached, and one half of the sand-bank struction. was covered with it, while over the other the foam whirled, each portion chasing the other with wild rapidity.

could gain a few paces on his hands and knees, another wave, as if it chased him in its wrath, repeated the warn- of death. ing of his extreme danger, and he was obliged to rise on his feet and hasten to the high part of the sand-bank, where he had drawn up his boat and his provisions.

Blinded as he was by the rain and spray, he could distinguish nothing. Of a sudden, he fell violently; he had struck against the sea-chest. Where, then, was the boat? it was gone!—it must have been swept away by the fury of the wind. Alas! then, all chance wes over! and, if not washed away by the angry waters, he had but to prolong his existence but for a few days, and then to die. The effect of the blow he had received on his forchead, with the shock of mind occasioned by the disappearance of the boat, overpowered him, and he remained for some time in a state of insensibility.

When Francisco recovered, the scene was again changed; the wide expanse was now in a state of wild and fearful commotion, and the waters roared as loud as did the hurricane. The whole sand-bank, with the exception of that part on which he stood, was now covered with tumultuous foam; and his place of refuge was occasionally invaded, when some vast mass o'erlording the other waves expended all its fury even to his feet. Francisco prepared to die!

But gradually the darkness of the heavens disappeared and there was no longer a bank upon the horizon; and Francisco hoped-alas! hoped what?-that he might be saved from the present impending death to be reserved for more dense; and low murmurs were heard, as if there one still more horrible; to be saved from the fury of the was wind stirring aloft although the sea was still glossy as waves, which would swallow him up, and in a 'ew seconds a lake. Signs of some movement about to take place were remove him from all pain and suffering, to perish for want evident, and the solitary youth watched and watched of sustenance under a burning sun; to be withered-to be

But the waters did not rise higher. The howling of the wind gradually decreased, and the foaming seas had obeyseen sweeping along the expanse of water-fearful in its ed the Divine injunction-they had gone so far, but no rapidity-it comes !-it comes !-and the hurricane burst, farther ! And the day dawned, and the sky cleared; and at once and with all its force, and all its terrific sounds, the first red tints, announcing the return of light and heat, had appeared on a broken horizon, when the eyes of the The first blast was so powerful and so unexpected that despairing youth were directed to a black mass on the trait threw him down; and produce dictated to him to remultuous waters. It was a vessel, with but one mast main in that position, for the loose sand was swept off and standing; rolling heavily, and running before the gale whirled in such force as to blind and prevent his seeing a right on the sand-bank where he stood; her hull one mofoot from him; he would have crawled to the boat for se. ment borne aloft, and the next disappearing from his view curity, but he knew not in which direction to proceed. But in the hollow of the agitated waters. She will be dashed this did not last; for now the water was borne up upon the to pieces, thought Francisco; she will be lost-they canstrong wings of the hurricane, and the sand was rendered not see the bank! and he would have made a signal to her, if he had been able, to warn her of her danger, forgetting,

As Francisco watched, the sun rose, bright and joyous,

At last he could distinguish those on board. He waved his hand, but they perceived him not; he shouted, but his And now the windows of heaven were opened; and the voice was borne away by the gale. On came the vessel, rain, mingled with the spray caught up by the hurricane, as if doomed. She was within two cables' length of the was dashed and hurled upon the forlorn youth, who still bank, when those on board perceived their danger. It is was too late!—they rounded her to—another and another den, a wash of water told him that he could there remain wave hurled her towards the sand. She struck !--her no longer: the sea was rising-rising fast; and, before he only remaining mast fell over the side-and the roaring waves hastened to complete their work of destruction and

CHAPTER IX.

THE ESCAPE.

Francisco's eyes were fixed upon the vessel, over which the sea now broke with terrific violence. There appeared stumbled over one of the breakers of water, and his head themselves under the weather bulwarks. Each wave, as it broke against her side and then dashed in a foam over her, threw her, with a convulsive jerk, still farther on a sandbank. At last she was so high up that their fury was partly spent before they dashed against her frame. Had the vessel been strong and well built; had she been a collier coasting the English shores, there was a fair chance that she might have withstood the fury of the storm until it had subsided, and that by remaining on board, the crew might have survived; but she was of a very different mould, and, as Francisco justly surmised, an American brig, built for swift sailing, very sharp, and, moreover, very slightly put together.

ti si wiir no wiir no wiir no wiir no me for Ti of me rot

Francisco's eyes, as may easily be supposed, were never removed from the only object which could now interest him-the unexpected appearance and imminent danger of his fellow-creatures at this desolate spot. He perceived that two of the men went to the hatches, and slid them over to leeward: they then descended, and, although the seas broke over the vessel, and a large quantity of water must have poured into her, the hatches were not put on again by those who remained on deck. But in a few minutes this mystery was solved; one after another at first, and then by dozens, poured forth out of the hold, the kid-) For an hour did he watch and reflect, and then he walknapped Africans, who composed her cargo. In a short ed again to where the men who had been rescued were time the decks were covered with them: the poor creatures sitting, not more than thirty yards from him; they were had been released by the humanity of two of the English sickly emaciated forms, but belonging to a tribe who sailors, that they might have the same chance with them inhabited the coast, and who having been accustomed, selves of saving their lives. Still, no attempt was made from their infancy, to be all in the water, had supported to quit the vessel. Huddled together, like a flock of sheep, themselves better than the other slaves who had been prowith the wild waves breaking over them, there they all cured from the interior, or the European crew of the vesremained, both European and African; and, as the heavy sel, all of whom had perished. blows of the seas upon the sides of the vessel careened and shook her, they were seen to cling, in every direction, with the sun, so oppressive to Francisco, and were now ex-

nds

ant

be

his

in

the

ey-

DO

nd

at,

the

in-

ast

ale

10-ew

red

m-

er,

ıg,

el,

er

de-

red

his

el, he

It

er

nd

ch

red red

it

er,

tly sel ng pht ed,

as for out

est of ed em

ter

on ew

and dashed about by the waves-so many fellow-beings three times before they had all been supplied: he then to the beach, forced on to it by some tremendous wave; at reflected that, without some precautions, the whole sustethe next, the receding water and the undertow swept them nance would soon be seized by them and devoured. half had disappeared to rise no more. Francisco watched breakers of water and the provisions, and, by the time he that none had yet gained the shore. At last he snatched still squatted together, the sun had sunk below the horizon. up the haulyards of his boat's sail which were near him, Francisco had already matured his plans, which were, to and hastened down to the spot to afford such succour as form a raft out of the fragments of the vessel, and, with might be possible; nor were his efforts in vain. As the the assistance of the negroes, attempt to gain the main seas washed the apparently inanimate bodies on shore, land. He lay down, for, the second night, on this eventand would then have again swept them away to return ful spot of desolation, and, commending himself to the Althem in mockery, he caught hold of them and dragged mighty protection, was soon in a deep slumber. them safe on the bank, and thus did he continue his exertions until fifteen of the bodies of the negroes were the eyes of the youth that he awoke, so tired had he been spread upon the beach. Although exhausted and sense, with the anxiety and fatigue of the preceding day, and the less, they were not dead, and long before he had dragged sleepless harrowing night which had introduced it; he up the last of their number, many of those previously saved rose and seated himself upon his sea-chest: how different had, without any other assistance than the heat of the sun, was the scene from that of yesterday! Again the ocean recovered from their insensibility.

but the parted vessel had now been riven into fragments by the force of the waves, and the whole beach was strewed rippled over the dark blue sea which now had retired to with her timbers and her stores, which were dashed on its former boundary, and left the sand-bank as extended shore by the waters, and then swept back again by the as when first Francisco had been put on shore. return. In a short time the severe blows he received from the beauty of the landscape terminated, the foreground these fragments disabled him from further exertion, and he was horrible to look upon; the whole of the beach was sank exhausted on the sand; indeed, all further attempts vere useless. All on board of the vessel had been launched into the sea at the same moment, and those who were not now on shore were past all succour. Francisco walked mangled the bodies of the many who had perished. up to those who had been saved: he found twelve of them were recovered and sitting on their hams: the rest were still in a state of insensibility. He then went up to the knoll, where his chest and provisions had been placed; and, throwing himself down by them, surveyed the scene.

The wind had lulled, the sun shone brightly, and the sea was much less violent. The waves had subsided, and, no longer hurried on by the force of the hurricane, broke majestically and solemnly, but not with the wildness and force which, but a few hours before they had displayed. The whole of the beach was strewed with the fragments of the vessel, with spars and water-casks; and every moment was to be observed the corpse of a negro turning round and round in the froth of the wave, and then disap-

The Africans appeared to recover fast by the heat of no distinction between the captured and their oppressors. changing a few words with each other. The whole of But this scene was soon changed; the frame of the ves. them had revived, but those who were most in need of aid sel could no longer withstand the violence of the waves; were neglected by the others. Francisco made signs to and, as Francisco watched, of a sudden it was seen to them, but they u derstood him not. He returned to the divide a-midships, and each portion to turn over. Then knoll, and pouring out water in a tin pan from the breaker, was a struggle for life; hundreds were floating on the raging brought it down to them. He offered it to one who seized element, and wrestling for existence, and the white foam it eagerly; water was a luxury seldom obtained in the of the ocean was dotted with the black heads of the ne- hold of a slave-vessel. The man drank deeply, and would groes who attempted to gain the bank. It was an awful, have drained the cup, but Francisco prevented him, and terrible scene, to witness so many at one moment tossed held it to the lips of another. He was obliged to refill it threatened with eternity. At one moment, they were close brought them a handful of biscuit and left them, for he all back; and, of the many who had been swimming, one buried half a foot deep, and covered over with sand the with agony as he perceived that the number decreased, and had finished this task unperceived by the negroes, who

It was not until the powerful rays of the sun blazed on slept, the sky was serene, and not a cloud to be distin-Francisco would have continued his task of humanity, guished throughout the whole firmanent; the horizontal line was clear, even, and well defined; a soft breeze just covered with the timbers of the wreck, with water-casks, and other articles, in some parts heaped and thrown up one upon another; and, among them, lay jammed and

> In other parts there were corpses thrown up high and dry, or still rolling and turning to the rippling wave: it was a scene of desolation and of death.

The negroes who had been saved were all huddled up together, apparently in deep sleep, and Francisco quitted his elevated position and walked down to the low beach to survey the means which the disaster of others afforded him for his own escape. To his great joy he found not only plenty of casks, but many of them full of fresh water, provisions also in sufficiency, and, indeed, every thing that could be required to form a raft, as well as the means of support for a considerable time for himself and the negroes who had survived. He then walked up to them, but they answered not, nor even moved. He pushed them, but in vain; and his heart beat quick, for he was fearful his foot to one of them, and it was not until he had used grateful that they had such an ample supply of provisions force, which in any other case he would have dispensed and water as to enable them to yield to a few days' conwith, that the negro awoke from his state of lethargy trary wind without danger of want. But the breeze conand looked vacantly about him. Francisco had some little tinued steady and fresh, and they were now crossing the knowledge of the language of the Kroumen, and he ad Bight of Benin; the weather was fine and the sea smooth; dressed the negro in that tongue. To his great joy, he the flying fish rose in shoals, and dropped down into the was answered in a language which, if not the same, had raft, which still forced its way through the water to the so great an affinity to it, that communication became easy. northward. With the assistance of the negro, who used still less ceremony with his comrades, the remainder of them were fortnight on the wide ocean without any object meeting awakened and a palaver ensued.

plaining to them that if they remained there, the water perceived two sail to the northward. and provisions would soon be exhausted, and they would all perish. The poor creatures hardly knew whether to consider him a supernatural being or not; they talked among themselves; they remarked at his having brought out to be a ship and a schooner hove to. them fresh water the day before; they knew that he did not belong to the vessel in which they had been wrecked, be, the sunset behind the two vessels, and, after it had sunk and they were puzzled.

Whatever might be their speculations they had one good effect, which was, that they looked upon the youth as a superior and a friend, and most willingly obeyed him, He led them up to the knoll, and desiring them to scrape away the sand, supplied them again with fresh water and biscuit. Perhaps the very supply, and the way in which it was given to them, excited their astonishment as much as any thing. Francisco ate with them, and selecting from his sea-chest the few tools in his possession, desired them to follow him. The casks were collected and rolled up; the empty ones arranged for the raft; the spars were hauled up, cleared of the rigging, which was carefully separated for lashings; the one or two sails which had been found rolled up on the spars were spread out to dry; and the provisions and articles of clothing, which might be useful, laid together on one side. The negroes worked willingly, and showed much intelligence: before the evening closed, every thing which might be available was secured, and the waves now only tossed about lifeless forms and the small fragments of timber which could not be ser-

It would occupy too much time were we to detail all the proceedings of Francisco and the negroes for the space of four days, during which they laboured hard. Necessity is truly the mother of invention, and many were the ingenious resources of the party before they could succeed in flames. He, therefore, continued his course, watching the forming a raft large enough to carry them and their provisions, with a must and sail well secured. At length it was accomplished; and, on the fifth day Francisco and his men embarked, and having pushed clear of the bank with poles, they were at last able to hoist their sail to a fine breeze, and steer for the coast before the wind at the rate of about three miles an hour. But it was not until they had gained half a mile from the bank that they were no longer annoyed by the dreadful smell arising from the putrefaction of so many bodies, for to bury them all would her mainmast; a volume of flame poured from her main have been a work of too great time. The last two days of their remaining on the island, the effluvia had become so huge mass of smoke by the wind a-head of her; the quarpowerful as to be a source of the greatest horror and disgust even to the negroes.

But before night, when the raft was about eight leagues that they were dead from previous exhaustion. He applied the land, but there was no help for it, and Francisco felt

Thus did Francisco and his negro crew remain for a their view. Day after day it was the same dreary "sky Francisco soon made them understand that they were and water," and by the reckoning of Francisco, they could to make a raft and go back to their own country; ex- not be far from the land, when, on the fifteenth day, they

Francisco's heart bounded with joy and gratitude to Heaven; he had no telescope to examine them, but he steered directly for them, and, about dark, he made them

As Francisco scanned them, surmising what they might below the horizon their forms were, for a few minutes, delineated with remarable precision and clearness. There could be no mistake. Francisco felt convinced that the schooner was the Avenger! and the first inpulse was to run the sweep with which they were steered, and put to the head of the raft again to the northward. A moment's reflection determined him to act otherwise; he lowered down his sail that he might escape observation, and watched the motions of the vessel during the few minutes of light which remained. That the ship had been captured, and that her capture had been attended with the usual scene of outrage and violence he had no doubt,-He was now about four miles from them, and just as they were vanishing from his straining eyes, he perceived that the schooner had made all sail to the westward. Francisco feeling then that he was secure from being picked up by her, again hoisted his sail with the hope of reaching the ship, which if not scuttled, he intended to remove on board of, and then make sail for the first port on the coast. But hardly had the raft regained her way when the horizon was lighted up, and he perceived that the pirates had set fire to the vessel. Then it was useless to proceed towards her; and Francisco again thought of putting the head of the raft to the northward, when the idea struck him, knowing the character and the cruelty of the pirates, that there might be some unfortunate people left on board to perish in the burning vessel; the flames increased in violence, mounted up to the masts and catching the sails one after the other. The wind blew fresh, and the vessel was kept before the wind-a circumstance that assured Francisco that there were people on board. At first she appeared to leave the raft, but, as her sails, one after another, were consumed by the element, so did she increase her speed, and Francisco, in about an hour, was close upon her counter.

The ship was now one mass of fire from her bows to hold, rising higher than her lower masts, and ending in a ter-deck was still free from fire, but the heat on it was so intense, that those on board were all collected at the taffrail; and there they remained, some violent, others in from the sand-bank it fell calm, and continued so for the mute despair, for the Avenger's people, in their barbarity, next day, when a breeze sprang up from the south-east, to had cut away and destroyed all the boats to prevent their which they trimmed their sail with their head to the north- escape. From the light thrown round the vessel, those on board had perceived the approach of Francisco to their res-This wind, and the course steered, sent them off from cue, and immediately that it was under the counter, and

Wh stated the W the na singula more, i how d nally b English threw Avenge

h fi h T w be be se to oll dis

th

til

the

and

anx

sel.

that

allo

trial

all o

for g

Cum

acro

of li

had !

low i

he ac

na, a

len ri

As

The have alr ong bra VOL 2

the sail lowered, almost all of them had descended by ropes, side. But in the numbers of their crew there was a great or the stern ladder, and gained a place in her. In a few disparity; the Enterprise not being manned with more from thence had sailed to the Canary isle, where he also such service, had property, in their way from Lisbon to South America. being a very fast sailer she had run down several degrees before she had been captured. When the pirate took post therefore gave the next vacancy to his own nephew, who, session, and found that she had little or no cargo of value the admiral quite forgot, was much younger. to them, for her hold was chiefly filled with furniture and then set fire to the vessel, taking care not to leave her unpeople to perish.

sel. The many who were now on board, and the time mand of the West India station. that he had already been at sea, obliged him to reduce the allowance of water. Fortune favoured him after all his trials; on the third day a vessel hove in sight, and they bling; for he was of a happy disposition, and passed a very were seen by her. She made sale for them, and took them happy sort of life. Mr. Witherington was very indulgent all on board. It was a schooner trafficking on the coast to him, and allowed him to draw liberally; he had plenty for gold-dust and ivory; but the magnificent offers of Don Cumanos induced them to give up their voyage and run he had plenty of amusement. Amongst other diversions, across the Atlantic to Carthagena. To Francisco it was he had fallen most desperately in love: for in one of his

had found a sincere friend.

e -y

o r,

d

y t-

e d

to 10

ht

ne ne ed

ar. he

re

he

by

00,

to

in

.

so off-

in ity,

03

res-

"You have been my preserver," said the Spaniard; "allow me to return the obligation—come and live with me."

As Francisco was equally pleased with Don Cumanos, he accepted the offer: they all arrived safely at Carthage na, and from thence proceeded to his estate on the Magdalen river.

CHAPTER XII.

THE LIEUTENANT.

When we last mentioned Edward Templemore, we stated that he was a lieutenant of the admiral's ship on the West India station, commanding the tender. Now the name of the tender was the Enterprise; and it was singular that she was one of two schooners built at Baltimore, remarkable for their beauty and good qualities: yet how different were their employments! Both had originally been built for the slave-trade; now one hoisted the English pennant, and cruised as the Enterprise; the other threw out the black flag, and scoured the seas as the monk had been left on board the leaky vessel; their was Avenger.

have already described her sister vessel,—that is, with one long brass gun a-midships, and smaller ones for her broad-lhis daughter.

VOL. EXVIII. MARCH, 1836 .- 27.

minutes, without scarcely an exchange of a word, they than sixty-five English sailors, belonging to the admiral's were all out of the brig, and Francisco pushed off just as the flames burst from the cabin windows, darting out in a ally were, sometimes carrying a tender made for a supply horizontal line like the tongues of fiery serpents. The raft, of provisions, or a tender of services, if required, from the now encumbered with twelve more persons, was then admiral; or, if not particularly wanted, with the important steered to the northward; and as soon as those who had charge of a tender billet-doux to some fair friend. But been saved had been supplied with some water which they this is a tender subject to touch upon. In the mean time, so much needed, Francisco obtained the intelligence which it must be understood that she had the same commission he desired. The ship was from Carthagena, South Ame- to sink, burn, and destroy, as all other of his Majesty's rica; had sailed from thence to Lisbon with a Don Cuma-vessels, if any thing came in her way; but, as she usually nos, who had large property up the Magdalen river. He carried despatches, the real importance of which were, of had wished to visit a part of his family at Lisbon, and course, unknown, she was not to go out of her way upon

Edward Templemore did, however, occasionally go a They had been beaten by stress of weather to the south-little out of his way, and had lately captured a very fine ward, and afterwards had been chased by the Avenger : privateer, after a smart action, for which he anticipated his promotion; but the admiral thought him too young, and

Edward laughed when he heard of it, upon his arrival other articles for the use of Don Cumanos, angry at their at Port Royal; and the admiral, who expected that he disappointment, they had first destroyed all their boats and would make his appearance pouting with disappointment, when he came up to the Penn to report himself, was so til all chance of the fire being put out was hopeless. And pleased with his good-humor that he made a vow that thus had these miscreants left innocent and unfortunate Templemore should have the next vacancy; but this he also quite forgot, because Edward happened to be, at the Francisco heard the narrative of Don Cumanos, and time it occurred, on a long cruise, -and "out of sight out then informed him in what manner he had left the schooner of mind" is a proverb so well established, that it may be and his subsequent adventures. Francisco was now very urged as an excuse for a person who had so many other anxious to make the land, or obtain succour from some ves. things to think of as the admiral intrusted with the com-

Lieutenant Templemore had, in consequence, commanded the Enterprise for nearly two years, and without grumof money for himself or for a friend who required it, and of little moment where he went, and in Don Cumanos he trips to the Leeward Isles (so called from their being to windward) he had succoured a Spanish vessel, which had on board the new governor of Porto Rico, with his family, and had taken upon himself to land them on that island in safety; for which service the English admiral received a handsome letter, concluding with the moderate wish that his excellency might live a thousand years, and Edward Templemore an invitation to go and see them whenever he might pass that way; which, like most general invitations, was as much a compliment as the wish which wound up the letter to the admiral. It did, however, so happen that the Spanish governor had a very beautiful and only daughter, carefully guarded by a duenna, and a monk who was the depository of all the sins of the governor's establishment; and it was with his daughter that Edward Templemore fell into the heresy of love.

She was, indeed, very beautiful; and, like all her country-women, was ardent in her affections. The few days that she was on board the schooner with her father, during the time that the Enterprise convoyed the Spanish vessel into port, were quite sufficient to ignite two such inflammable beings as Clara d'Alfarez and Edward Templemore. The no accommodation in the schooner for either him or the The enterprise was fitted much in the same way as we duenna, and Don Felix de Maxos de Cobas de Manilla d'Alfarez was too busy with his cigar to pay attention to

When they were landed, Edward Templemore was asked to their residence, which was not in the town, but must now get behind the headland." at a levely bay on the south side of the island. The town mansion was appropriated to business and the ceremony of the court: it was too hot for a permanent abode, and lying to with a lentern at her peak. the governor only went there for a few hours each day.

Edward Templemore remained a short time at the island, and, at his departure, received the aforementioned letter lieutenant. On his return, he presented the letter, and the admiral was satisfied with his conduct.

When ordered out to cruise, which he always was when there was nothing else to do, he submitted to the admiral whether, if he should happen to be near Porto Rico, he could not leave an answer to the Spanish governor's letter; and the admiral, who knew the value of keeping up a good understanding with foreign relations, took the hint, and on the part of the young lady; not so, however, on the part of the duenna and holy friar who confessed." their charge was in danger from heretical opinions.

Caution became necessary; and, as secrecy adds a charm to an amour, Clara received a long letter and a telescope from Edward. The letter informed her that, whenever he could, he would make his appearance in his schooner off the south of the island, and await a signal made by her at a certain window, acknowledging her recognition of his vessel. On the night of that signal, he would land in his boat and meet her at an appointed spot. This was all very delightful; and it so happened that Edward had four or five times contrived, during the last year, to meet Clara without discovery, and again and again to exchange his vows. It was agreed between them that when he quitted the station, she should quit her father and her home, and trust her future happiness to an Englishman and a heretic.

It may be a matter of surprise to some of our readers that the admiral should not have discovered the frequent visits of the Enterprise to Porto Rico, as Edward was obliged to bring his log for examination every time that he returned; but the admiral was satisfied with Edward's conduct, and his anxiety to cruise when there was nothing else for him to do. His logs were brought on shore to the admiral's secretary carefully rolled and sealed up. The admiral's secretary threw the packages on one side, and thought no more of the matter, and Edward had always a ready story to tell when he took his seat at the admiral's dinner-table; besides, he is a very unfit person to command a vessel who does not know how to write a log that will bear an investigation. A certain latitude is always allowed in every degree of latitude as well as longitude.

The Enterprise had been despatched to Antigua, and Edward thought this an excellent opportunity to pay a visit to Clara d'Alfarez; he therefore, upon his return, hove to off the usual headland, and soon perceived the white curtain thrown out of the window.

"There it is, sir," said one of the midshipmen who was near him-for he had been there so often that the whole crew of the Enterprise were aware of his attachment-"she has thrown her flag of truce."

"A truce to your nonsense, Mr. Warren;" replied Edmiral; you must be ready to proceed on service immediard, laughing; "how came you to know any thing about ately. We've found your match." ward, laughing; "how came you to know any thing about ately.

"I only judge by cause and effect, sir; and I know night."

"That's not unlikely; but let draw the foresheet; we

The youngster was right: that evening, a little before dark, he attended his commander on shore, the Enterprise

"Once more, dearest Clara!" said Edward, as he threw off her long veil and pressed her in his arms.

I c c t

b

fe b

th

W

me

al

an

ing

ble

bro

latt

bro

hou

the

atta

ten

Cur

imp

eme

boat

whi

supe

resp

vess

fore.

was

cisc

shou

Pedi

comi

since

befor

sever

locks

their

.

44

F

(

"Yes, Edward, once more-but I am afraid only once from the father to the English admiral, and an assurance more; for my maid, Inez, has been dangerously ill, and of unalterable fidelity from the daughter to the English has confessed to Friar Richardo, I fear much that, in her fright (for she thought she was dying), she has told all.-She is better now."

"Why should you imagine so, Clara?"

"Oh, you know not what a frightened fool that Inez is when she is ill. Our religion is not like yours.'

"No, dear, it is not; but I will teach you a better." "Hush, Edward, you must not say that. Holy Virgin! if Friar Richardo should hear you! I think that Inez

"That is his business, and I was obliged to confess to him last night. I told him a great many things, and then he asked me if that was all. His eyes went through me. I trembled as I uttered an untruth—for I said it was."

"I confess my sins but to my Maker, Clara; and I confess my love but to you. Follow my plan, dearest!"

"I will half obey you, Edward. I will not tell my

"And sins you have none, Clara; so you will obey me

"Hush, Edward, you must not say that. We all have sins; and, oh! what a grievous sin they say it is to love you, who are a heretic! Holy Virgin, pardon me! but I could not help it.

"If that is your only sin, dearest, I can safely give you

"Nay, Edward, don't joke, but hear me. If Inez has confessed, they will look for me here; and we must not meet again-at least not in this place. You know the little bay behind the rock-it is not much further off, and there is a cave where I can wait: another time it must be there."

"It shall be there, dearest; but is it not too near the beach? will you not be afraid of the men in the boat, who must see you?"

"But we can leave the beach. It is Richardo alone, that I am in dread of-and the Donna Maria. Merciful Heaven! should my father know it all, we should be lost! be separated forever!" and Clara laid her forehead on Edward's shoulder, as her tears fell fast.

"There is nought to fear, Clara. Hush! I heard a rustling in those orange-trees. Listen!"

"Yes! yes!" whispered Clara, hastily; "there is some one! Away! dear Edward away!"

Clara sprang from his side, and hastened up the grove. Edward made his retreat; and flying down the rocky and narrow path through the underwood, was soon on the beach and into his boat. The Enterprise arrived at headquarters, and Edward reported himself to the admiral.

"I have work for you, Mr. Templemore," said the ad-

"I hope I may find her, sir," replied the lieutenant.

"I hope so, too; for, if you give a good account of her, that I shall have to go on shore and wait for you to-it will put another swab on your shoulder. The pirate night." seen and chased, off Barbadoes, by the Amelia; but it ap- the projecting point,-distant about four miles. Francisco come near her unless it be the Enterprise. She has since hastened to the house, captured two West Indiamen, and was seen steering with them towards the coast of Guiana. Now, I am going to ring a small cup of chocolate, "what's the news this give you thirty additional hands, and send you after her." morning ?"

"Thank you, sir," replied Edward, his countenance beaming with delight.

"How soon will you be ready?" inquired the admiral.

"To-morrow morning, sir."

"Very good. Tell Mr. Hadley to bring me the order for the men, and your sailing orders, and I will sign them; customer. Be prudent-brave I know you to be."

Edward Templemore promised every thing, as most cople do in such cases; and, before the next evening, the vessel?" Enterprise was well in the offing, under a heavy press of

ise

ew

nd

her

z is

in!

nez

10

not

s to

hen

me.

con-

my

me ave

love

at I

you

has

not

the

and

st be

who

that ven!

epaard's

rust-

ome

rove.

and the nead-

ad-

nedi-

her,

irate been

CHAPTER XIII.

THE LANDING.

THE property of Don Cumanos, to which he had retired eye. with his family, accompanied by Francisco, extended from the mouth of, to many miles up, the Magdalen river. It was a fine alluvial soil, forming one vast strip of rich life upon it! Don Cumanos, you must be prepared. I meadow, covered with herds of cattle. The house was not know that they have long talked of a visit to this quarter, a hundred yards from the banks of this magnificent stream, and anticipate great booty; and they have those on board and a small but deep creek ran up to the adjacent build-who know the coast well. The disappearance of your two ings,—for Don Cumanos had property even more valua-ble, being proprietor of a gold-mine near the town of Jam-night to reconnoitre, and have captured them. Torture brano, about eighty miles farther up, and which mine had will extract the information which the pirates require; latterly become exceedingly productive. The oar was and I have little doubt but that an attack will be made, brought down the river in boats, and smelted in the out- when they learn how much bullion there is, at present, houses near the creek to which we have just referred.

It will be necessary to observe that the establishment of the noble Spaniard was numerous, consisting of nearly fully; "that is provided you are sure that it is the pirateone hundred persons, employed in the smelting-houses, or vessel."

attached to the household.

tented; he had become the confidential supervisor of Don At the distance of four miles, with such a glass as this, I Cumanos' household, proved himself worthy of a trust so can discover every little variety in her rigging, from other important, and was considered as one of the family.

One morning, as Francisco was proceeding down to the more looking through the telescope. smelting-house to open the hatches of the small decked boats which had arrived from Jambrino with ore, and superintendent above, to which Don Cumanos had a cor- run in in the schooner by daylight, and anchor abreast of us, responding key, one of the chief men informed him that a we should have but a poor chance. But they little think fore, and weighed again early that morning, and that she attack this night, I rather think." was now standing off and on.

" From Carthagena, probably, beating up," replied Fran-

Pedro, who went out to fish last night, as usual, instead of land more than from ninety to one hundred men, as some coming back before midnight, have not been heard of must remain in charge of the schooner; and we can mussince.

"Indeed! that is strange. Did they ever stay so long a reward, if they do their duty." before?"

"Never, sir; and they have fished together now for hereseven years.

locks of the hatches, and returned it.

pears that there is not a vessel in the squadron which can directed his eye towards her, and, without further remark,

"The Nostra Senora del Carmen and the Aguilla have arrived, and I have just unlocked the hatches. There is a vessel off the point which requires examination, and I have come for the telescope."

"Requires examination! Why, Francisco?"

"Because Giacomo and Pedro, who went fishing last but recollect, Mr. Templemore, you will have an awkward night, have not returned; and there are no tidings of

"That is strange! But how is that connected with the

"That I will explain as soon as I have had an examination of her," replied Francisco, who had taken up the telescope, and was drawing out the tube. Francisco fixed the glass against the sill of the window, and examined the vessel some time in silence.

"Yes! by the living God! it is the Avenger, and no other," exclaimed he, as he removed the telescope from his

"Eh?" cried Don Cumanos.

"It is the pirate vessel !- the Avenger !- I'll forfeit my on your premises."

"You may be right," replied Don Cumanos, thought-

"Sure, Don Cumanos I know every timber and plank For some time Francisco remained here happy and con- in her; there is not a rope or a block but I can recognize. craft. I will swear to her," repeated Francisco, once

"And if they attack, Francisco?"

"We must defend ourselves; and, I trust, beat them off. which were invariably secured with a padlock by the They will come in their boats, and at night. If they were to vessel had anchored off the mouth of the river the day be- that I am here, and that they are recognized. They will

"And what do you then propose, Francisco?"

"That we should send all the females away to Don Teodoro's-it is but five miles-and call the men to-"Valga me dios, if I know that, sir," said Diego. "I gether, as soon as possible. We are strong enough to should have thought nothing about it; but Giacomo and beat them off, if we barricade the house. They cannot ter quite as many. It may be as well to promise our men

"That is all right enough; and the bullion we have

"Here we had better let it remain; it will take too much Francisco gave the key to the man, who opened the time to remove it, and, besides, will weaken our force by the men who must be in charge of it. The out-houses "There she is!" cried the man; the head-sails making must be abandoned, and every thing which is of conse-their appearance as the vessel opened to their view from quence taken from them. Fire them they will, in all proif we begin at once."

"Well, Francisco, I shall make you commandant, and Don Isidora. Send for the men and speak to them; promise them rewards; and act as if you were ordering upon ladder, and went to examine their outposts. your own responsibility."

"I trust I shall prove myself worthy of your confidence, bank of the river, "at what hour is it your idea that these

sir," replied Francisco.

"Carambo! exclaimed the old don, as he left the room, "but it is fortunate you are here. We might all have been murdered in our beds."

Francisco sent for the head men of the establishment, and told them what he was convinced they would have to may not be so prudent."

expect; and he then explained to them his views. The "Holy Virgin! scnor, rest were all summoned; and Francisco pointed out to them the little mercy they would receive if the pirates by Don Cumanos if they did their duty.

Spaniards are individually brave, and, encouraged by Francisco, they agreed that they would defend the property you have once been a pirate."

to the last.

The house of Don Cumanos was well suited to resist an attack of this description, in which musketry only was expected to be employed. It was a long parallelogram of stone wall, with a wooden veranda on the first floor,-for it was one story high. The windows on the first story were more numerous, but at the basement there were but two, and no other opening but the door in the whole line of building. It was of a composite architecture, between the Morisco and the Spanish. If the lower part of the house, which was of stone, could be secured from entrance, the assailants would, of course, fight under a great disadvantage. The windows below were the first secured, by piling a heavy mass of stones in the interior of the rooms against them, rising to the ceiling from a base like the segment of a pyramid extending to the opposite side of the chamber; and every preparation was made for effectually barricading the door before night. Ladders were then fixed to ascend the veranda, which was rendered musket proof nearly as high as its railing, to protect the men. The Donna Isidora, and the women of the establishment were, in the afternoon, despatched to Don Theodoro's; and, at the request of Francisco, joined to the entreaties of Donna Isidora, Don Cumanos was persuaded to accompany them. The Don called his men, and telling them that he left Francisco in command, expected them to do their duty; and then shaking hands with him, the cavalcade was soon lost in the woods behind the narrow meadows which skirted the river.

There was no want of muskets and ammunition. Some were employed casting bullets, and others in examining the arms which had long been laid by. Before evening, all was ready; every man had received arms and ammunition; the flints had been inspected: and Francisco had time to pay more attention to the schooner, which had, during the day, increased her distance from the land, but was now again standing in for the shore. Half-an-hour before dust, when within three miles, she wore round, and if they are not occupied, they will prove a protection to put her head to the offing.

"They'll attack this night," said Francisco: "I feel almost positive; their yards and stay-tackles are up; all cisco immediately recognised to be that of Cain.

ready for hoisting out the long-boat."

"Let them come, senor; we will give them a warm reception," replied Diego, the second in authority.

It was soon too dark to perceive the vessel. Francisco and Diego ordered every man, but five, into the house; the back to the house.

door was firmly barricaded, and some large pieces of rock, "Now, my lads bability. At all events, we have plenty of time before us, which had been rolled into the passage, piled against it Francisco then posted the five men down the banks of the river, at a hundred yards distant from each other, to give leave the arrangements to you, while I go and speak to notice of the approach of the boats. It was about ten o'clock at night when Francisco and Diego descended the

"Senor," said Diego, as he and Francisco stood on the villians will make their attempt?"

"That is difficult to say. If the same captain commands them who did when I was on board of her, it will not be until after the moon is down, which will not be till midnight; but should it be any other who is in authority, they

"Holy Virgin! senor, were you ever on board that vessel?"

"Yes, Diego, I was, and for a long time too; but not were not repulsed, and the rewards which were promised with my own good will. Had I not been on board, I never should have recognised her."

" Very true, senor; then we may thank the saints that

"I hope I never was that, Diego," replied Francisco, smiling; "but I have been a witness to dreadful proceedings on board of that vessel, at the remembrance of which, even now, my blood curdles."

To pass away the time, Francisco then detailed many scenes of horror to Diego which he had witnessed when on board the Avenger; and he was still in the middle of a narrative when a musket was discharged by the foremost sentinel.

" Hark, Diego!"

Another, and another, nearer and nearer to them, gave the signal that the boats were close at hand. In a few minutes the men all came in, announcing that the pirates were pulling up the stream in three boats, and were less than a quarter of a mile from the landing place.

"Diego, go to the house with these men, and see that all is ready," said Francisco; "I will wait here a little longer:

but do not fire till I come to you."

Diego and the men departed, and Francisco was left on the beach alone.

In another minute the sound of the oars was plainly distinguishable, and Francisco's ears were directed to catch, if possible the voices. "Yes, thought he, you come with the intention of murder and robbery; but you will, through me, be disappointed. As the boats approached he heard the voice of Hawkhurst. The signal muskets fired, had told the pirates that they were discovered, and that, in all probability, they would meet with resistance; silence was, therefore, no longer of any advantage.

"Cars! my lads-oars!" cried Hawkhurst.

One boat ceased rowing, and soon afterwards the two others. The whole of them were now plainly seen by Francisco, at the distance of about one cable's length from where he stood; and the clear still night carried the sound of their voices along the water.

"Here is a creek, sir," said Hawkhurst, "leading up to those buildings. Would it not be better to land there, as,

us if we have a hard fight for it?"

"Very true, Hawkhurst," replied a voice, which Fran-

"He is alive, then," thought Francisco, "and his blood is not yet upon my hands."

"Give way, my lads?" cried Hawkhurst.

The boats dashed up the creek, and Francisco hastened " Now, my lads," said he, as he sprang up the ladder,

"you must be resolute; we have to deal with desperate men. I have heard the voices of the captain and chief mate; so there is no doubt as to its being the pirate. 'The the door while the veranda protected them from our sight. boats are up the creek, and will land behind the out-build. As soon as it is burnt we shall be able to drive them away ings. Haul up these ladders, and lay them fore and aft on from it. I will go up again and see how things are." the veranda; and do not fire without taking a good aim. Silence! my men-silence! Here they come."

came, it was only from the side of the veranda, at which safest, and more out of the way." not more than eight or ten men could be placed that the enemy could be repulsed. Francisco, therefore, gave orders that as soon as some of the men had fired they should could distinguish nothing. An occasional bullet whistled retreat and load their muskets, to make room for others.

When the pirates had advanced half way to the house, himself behind the wall between them. on the clear space between it and the out-buildings, Franmuch less than it really was. They now made other ported it. arrangements. They spread themselves in a semicircle in front of the veranda, and kept up a continued galling fire. discharge of one or two muskets told Francisco that he This was returned by the party under Francisco for nearly was perceived by the enemy. a quarter of an hour; and, as all the muskets were now called into action, the pirates found out that they had a the window; "and now do I not know whether the loss more formidable enemy to cope with than they had antici- of the 'eranda may not prove a gain to us.' pated.

through the wooden floor of it upon those above. Hawk- of the assailants. hurst hastened away, and returned with about half the nen, leaving the others to continue their attack as before. fire out of the windows.

But even this warfare did not continue; for the suporting pillars of the veranda being of wood and very dry, senor; how many hours until daylight?" said Diego. they were set fire to by the pirates. Gradually the flames wound round them, and their forked tongues licked the balustrade. At last, the whole of the yearnda was in flames. This was a great advantage to the attacking party, ing? who could now distinguish the Spaniards without their being so clearly seen themselves. wounded. The smoke and heat became so intense in the A few moments, and he could clearly make them out. upper story, that the men could no longer remain there; basement of the house.

"What shall we do now, senor?" said Diego, with a

"Do?" replied Francisco; "they have burned the veriver, and which had been sheltered by the veranda, randa, that is all. The house will not take fire; it is of solid stone; the roof indeed may; but still here we are. I "No-no; do not fire till your muzzles are at their do not see that they are more advanced than they were hearts. They cannot mount more than two at a time at before. As soon as the veranda has burnt down, we must each window. Recollect, my lads, that you must now fight return above, and commence firing again from the win-hard, for your lives will not be spared; they will shew no

" Hark, sir ! they are trying the door."

"They may try a long while; they should have tried

" No, senor, it is of no use. Why expose yourself now that the flames are so bright?"

The pirates were now seen advancing from the out-buildings in strong force. In the direction in which they the wounded men in the north chamber; it will be the "I must go and see if that is the case, Diego. Put all

> Francisco ascended the stone staircase, and gained the upper story. The rooms were filled with smoke, and he past him. He walked towards the windows, and sheltered

The flames were not so violent, and the heat more bearcisco gave the word to fire. The volley was answered by able. In a short time, a crash, and then another, told him another, and a shout from the pirates, who, with Hawk-that the veranda had fallen in. He looked through the hurst and Cain at their head, now pressed on, but not until window. The mass of lighted embers had fallen down in they had received a second discharge from the Spaniards, front of the house, and had, for a time driven away the and the pirates had fired in return. As the Spaniards assailants. Nothing was left of the veranda but the burncould not at first fire a volley of more than a dozen must ing ends of the joists fixed in the wall above the windows, kets at a time, their opponents imagined their force to be and the still glowing remains of the posts which once sup-

But the smoke from below now cleared away, and the

"The roof is safe," thought he, as he withdrew from

What were the intentions of the pirates it was difficult It was now quite dark, and not a figure was to be disto ascertain. For a time they left off firing, and Francisco tinguished, except by the momentary flashing of the fire- returned to his comrades. The smoke had gradually arms. Cain and Hawkhurst, leaving their men to con- cleared away, and they were able to resume their position tinue the attack, had gained the house, and a position above; but as the pirates did not fire, they, of course, could under the veranda. Examining the windows and door, know nothing, as it was only by the flashing of the muskets there appeared but little chance of forcing an entrance; that the enemy was to be distinguished. No further atbut it immediately occurred to them, that under the verandal tempts were made at the door or windows below: and their men would not be exposed, and that they might fire Francisco in vain puzzled himself as to the intended plans

Nearly half-an-hour of suspense passed away.

Some of the Spaniards were of opinion that they had The advantage of this manœuvre was soon evident. The retreated to their boats and gone away, but Francisco knew musket balls of the pirates pierced the flanks, and wounded them better. All he could do was to remain above, and many of the Spaniards severely; and Francisco was at occasionally look out to discover their motions. Diego, last obliged to order his men to retreat into the house, and and one or two more, remained with him; the other men were kept below that they might be out of danger.

"Holy Francis! but this has been a dreadful night,

"Two hours at least, I should think," replied Francisco " but the affair will be decided before that."

"The saints protect us! See, senor, are they not com-

Francisco looked through the gloom, in the direction of Many were killed and the out-buildings, and perceived a group of men advancing.

"Yes, truly, Diego: and they have made ladders, which and, by the advice of Francisco, they retreated to the they are carrying. They intend to storm the windows. Call them all up; and now we must fight hard indeed."

> The Spaniards hastened up and filled the room above, which had three windows in the front, looking towards the

"Shall we fire, now, senor?"

quarter and no mercy."

nidhey that

t it

the

rive

ten

the

the

ese nds

t be

i, I that sen, eed.

ich,

any hen le of nost

rave few ates less t all

ger:

t on inly i to ome

will, ched kets and nce;

two by from ound

p to , as, a to ran-

lood

ened dder.

ous mounting of the ladders.

musket aimed at him, and the ball whizzed harmless over away to the northward. the broad water of the river. Another step, and he would have been in, when Francisco fired his pistol: the ball en Francisco had been the cause of their defeat; and, although tered the left shoulder of Hawkhurst, and he dropped his this was only a surmise, still, as they considered that, had hold. Before he could regain it, a Spaniard charged at he not recognized the vessel, the Spaniards would not have him with his musket, and threw him back. He fell, bear-been prepared, they had good grounds for what had swelled ing down with him one or two of his comrades, who had into an assertion. He became, therefore, to many of them been following him up the ladder.

little consequence after the fall of Hawkhurst, whose voice they considered but the precursor of. he had recognised; and he hastened to the one on the left, as he had heard Cain encouraging his men in that direc- where Francisco sat on the chest. Francisco turned round tion. He was not wrong in his conjecture; Cain was at and beheld the Krouman, his old friend. the window, attempting to force an entrance, but was opposed by Diego and other resolute men. But the belt of cisco? the pirate captain was full of pistols, and he had already "All! no," replied the man, shaking his head; "some fired three with effect. Diego and the two best men were die-some get away-only four Kroumen left. Massa wounded, and the others who opposed him were alarmed Francisco, how you come back again." Every body tink at his giant proportions. Francisco rushed to attack him; you dead. I say no, not dead-ab charm with him-ab but what was the force of so young a man against the book." Herculean power of Cain? Still Francisco's left hand was at the throat of the pirate, and the pistol was pointed in cisco, taking the Bible out of his vest; for, strange to say, his right, when the flash of another pistol, fired by one Francisco himself had a kind of superstition relative to who followed Cain, threw its momentary vivid light upon that Bible, and had put it into his bosom previous to the the features of Francisco, as he cried out "Blood for blood!" attack made by the pirates. It was enough: the pirate captain uttered a yell of terror at the supposed supernatural appearance; and he fell from Here come Johnson-he very bad man. I go away." the ladder in a fit amongst the still burning embers of the veranda.

rushing at him, while the two parties were opposed muzzle with tenfold force; and since that period Cain had never amongst the pirates. "Secure him at all events," cried ferocious than before, and the men trembled when he ap-Hawkhurst, as they slowly retreated and gained the out-peared on deck. houses. Francisco was overpowered and hauled into one of the boats, all of which in a few minutes atterwards were pulling with all their might to escape from the muskets of the Spaniards, who followed the pirates by the banks of the river, annoying them in their retreat.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE MEETING.

on board, who were prepared to hoist in ingots of precious —with his hands so deeply imbrued in blood—at enmity metal, had to receive nought but wounded men, and many with all the rest of the world;—that one feeling burnt of their comrades had remained dead on the shore. Their bright and clear, and was not to be quenched. It might captain was melancholy and downcast. Hawkhurst was have proved a beacon-light to steer him back to repentance badly wounded, and obliged to be carried below as soon as and to good works.

The ends of the rude ladders now made their appear he came on board. The only capture which they had ance above the sill of each window. They had been hastil made was their former associate Francisco, who, by the ly, yet firmly, constructed; and were nearly as wide as last words spoken by Hawkhurst as he was supported to the windows. A loud cheer was followed by a simultane his cabin, was ordered to be put into irons. The bonts were hoisted in without noise, and a general gloom pre-Francisco was at the centre window, when Hawkhurst vailed. All sail was then made upon the schooner, and, made his appearance, sabre in hand. He struck aside a when the day dawned, she was seen by the Spaniards far

The report was soon spread through the schooner that an object of bitter enmity, and they looked forward with Francisco felt as if the attack at that window was of pleasure to his destruction, which his present confinement

"Hist! Massa Francisco!" said a low voice near to

"Ah! Pompey, afe you all still on board," said Fran-

" If that was my charm, I have it still," replied Franattack made by the pirates.

"Dat very good, Massa Francisco; den you quite safe.

In the mean time Cain had retired to his cabin with feelings scarcely to be analyzed. He was in a bewilder-The fall of their two chiefs, and the determined resist-ment. Notwithstanding the wound he had received by ance of the Spaniards, checked the impetuosity of the the hand of Francisco, he would never have sanctioned assailants. They hesitated; and they at last retreated, Hawkhurst putting him on shore on a spot which promised bearing away with them their wounded. The Spaniards nothing but a lingering and miscrable death. Irritated as cheered, and, led by Francisco, followed them down the he had been by the young man's open defiance, he loved ladders, and, in their turn, became the assailants. Still the him, loved him much more than he was aware of himself; pirates' retreat was orderly: they fired, and retired rank and when he had recovered sufficiently from his wound, behind rank successively. They kept the Spaniards at and had been informed where Francisco had been sent on bay, until they had arrived at the boats; when a charge shore, he quarrelled with Hawkhurst, and reproached him was made, and a severe conflict ensued. But the pirates bitterly and sternly, in language which Hawkburst never had lost too many men, and, without their commander, forgot or forgave. The vision of the starving lad haunted felt dispirited. Hawkhurst was still on his legs, and giv- Cain, and rendered him miserable. His affection for him, ing orders as coolly as ever. He espied Francisco, and now that he was, as he supposed, lost for ever, increased to muzzle, seized him by the collar and dragged him in been seen to smile. He became more gloomy, more

The apparition of Francisco after so long an interval, and in such an unexpected quarter of the globe, acted, as we have before described, upon Cain. When he was taken to the boat he was still confused in his ideas; and it was not until they were nearly on board, that he perceived that this young man was indeed at his side. He could have fallen on his neck and kissed him; for Francisco had become to him a capture more prized than all the wealth of the Indies. But one pure, good feeling was still unextin-THE pirates returned to their vessel discomfited. Those guished in the bosom of Cain; stained with every crime

the mind of the pirate captain. He knew Francisco's Francisco. firmness and decision. By some inscrutable means, which Cain considered as supernatural, Francisco had obtained with me," said Cain, again extending his hand. the knowledge, and had accused him, of his mother's death. Would not the affection which he felt for the blood," replied Francisco. young man be met with hatred and defiance? He was but too sure that it would; and then his gloomy, cruel dis-position would reassume its influence, and he thought of lest he should be overheard—"I am tired of this life revenging the attack upon his life. His astonishment at perhaps sorry for what I have done-I wish to leave itthe reappearance of Francisco was equally great, and he have wealth in plenty concealed where others know it not. trembled at the sight of him as if he was his accusing and Tell me, Francisco, shall we both quit this vessel, and live condemning spirit. Thus did he wander from one fearful together happily and without doing wrong? You shall fancy to another, until he at last summoned up resolution share all Francisco. Say, now, does that please you?" to send for him.

when he was before in the schooner, obeyed the commands for how has it been gained?" of the captain. The irons were unlocked, and Francisco was brought down into the cabin. The captain rose and it. I will, indeed, Francisco. I-will-repent:" again shut the door.

" I little thought to see you here, Francisco," said Cain. "Probably not," replied Francisco, boldly; "but you vengeance.

"I feel none, Francisco; nor would I have suffered you to have been put on shore as you were, had I known of it. Even now that our expedition has failed through your means, I feel no anger towards you, although I shall have some difficulty in preserving you from the enmity of others. Indeed, Francisco, I am glad to find that you are alive, and I have bitterly mourned your loss:" and Cain extended his hand.

But Francisco folded his arms, and was silent.

know that I tell the truth.

"I believe that you state the truth, Captain Cain, for you are too bold to lie; and, as far as I am concerned, you leave me now. have all the forgiveness you may wish: but I cannot take that hand-nor are our accounts still settled."

I do not ask you to remain on board. You are free to go before take notice of, now saluted him. The man who had where you please. Come, Francisco, take my hand, let us taken him out of irons looked round; he was a creature forget what is passed."

perhaps!" exclaimed Francisco-" Never!"

quit so bad as that. In my mood I struck your mother, I new second mate reported to him that there was a sail on grant it. I did not intend to injure her, but I did, and she the weather bow. died. I will not lie—that is the fact; and it is also the fact that I wept over her, Francisco, for I loved her as I do large schooner under all sail. Not wishing that any one you. (It was a hasty, bitter blow that," continued Cain, should enter the cabin but himself, be went down to the soliloquising, with his hand to his forehead, and uncon-cabin-door, and knocked before he entered, and reported scious of Francisco's presence at the moment. "It made the vessel. me what I am, for it made me reckless). Francisco," said "Thank you, Francisco; you must take Hawkhurst's Cain, raising his head, "I was bad, but I was no pirate duty for the present—it shall not be for long; and fear when your mother lived. There is a curse upon me; that not that I shall make another capture. I swear to you I which I love most I treat the worst. Of all the world, I will not, Francisco. But this schooner-I know very well loved your mother most—yet did she from me receive what she is: she has been looking after us some time; most injury, and at last I caused her death. Next to your and a week ago, Francisco, I was anxious to meet her that mother, whose memory I at once revere and love, and I might shed more blood. Now I will do all I can to tremble when I think of and each night does she appear avoid her, and escape. I can do no more, Francisco. I to me-I have loved you, Francisco-for you, like her, must not be taken. have an angel's feelings; yet have I treated you as ill. You thwarted me, and you were right. Had you been I should think; the Avenger outsuils every thing.' wrong I had not cared, but you were right, and it maddened me-your appeals by day-your mother's in my sel. By heavens! it's a fair match," continued Cain, his

But there were other feelings which also crowded upon was at least contrition. "Indeed, I pity you," replied

"You must do more, Francisco; you must be friends

"I cannot take that hand-it is too deeply died in

"Well, well, so would have said your mother. But hear

Yes; it pleases me to hear that you will abandon your A morose dark man, whom Francisco had not seen lawless life, Captain Cain: but share your wealth I cannot,

"It cannot be returned Francisco; I will do good with the hand was extended.

Francisco hesitated.

"I do-so help me God! I do repent, Francisco," exhave me again in your power, and may now wreak your claimed the pirate captain.

"And I, as a Christian, do forgive you all," replied Francisco, taking the still extended hand. "May God forgive you, too!"

"Amen!" replied the pirate, solemnly, covering his face

up in his hands.

In this position he remained some minutes, Francisco watching him in silence. At last the face was uncovered, and to the surprise of Francisco, a tear was on the cheek of Cain, and his eyes suffused with moisture. Francisco no longer waited for the hand to be extended; he walked "Are you then so unforgiving ?" said the captain; "you up to the captain, and, taking him by the hand, pressed it

"God bless you, boy! God bless you!" said Cain; "but Francisco returned on deck with a light and grateful heart. His countenance at once told those who were near "What would you more? Cannot we be friends again? him that he was not condemned, and many who dared not of Hawkhurst, and he knew not how to act. Francisco "The hand that is imbrued with my mother's blood, observed him, and with a wave of his hand ordered him to go below. That Francisco was again in authority was "Not so, by God!" exclaimed Cain. "No, no; not instantly perceived; and the first proof of it was, that the

"There I cannot blame you. To avoid her will be easy,

"Except, I believe the Enterprise, which is a sister vesfeelings of combativeness returning for a moment; "and Francisco's heart was softened; if not repentance, there it will look like a craven to refuse the fight: but fear not Francisco-I have promised you, and I shall keep my

"Yes, it must be her," said he aloud, so as to be heard by the pirates; "she has been sent out by the admiral on to think that we are an American vessel." purpose, full of his best men. What a pity we are so shorthanded !"

"There's enough of us, sir," observed the boatswain.

"Yes," replied Cain, "if there was any thing but hard See that that ensign blows out clear." blows to be got; but that is all, and I cannot spare more men. Ready, about?" continued he, walking aft.

The Enterprise, for she was the vessel in pursuit, was who was on a wind. As soon as the Avenger tacked, the weather-quarter of the Avenger, who now made all sail, other's sight, except with assistance of night-telescopes. The pirates, who had quite enough of fighting, and were not stimulated by the presence of Hawkhurst, or the Francisco. wishes of their captain, now showed as much anxiety to avoid as they usually did to seek a combat.

At the first trial of sailing between the two scho mers there was no perceptible difference; for half an hour they both continued on the wind, and, when Edward Templemore examined his sextant a second time, he could not perceive that he had gained upon the Avenger one cable's

"We will keep away half a point," said Edward to his second in command. "We can afford that, and still hold the weather-gage."

The Enterprise was kept away, and increased her speed; they neared the Avenger more than a quarter of a mile.

"They are nearing us," observed Francisco; "we must keep away a point."

Thus did they continue altering their course until the studding-sails below and aloft were set by both, and the position of the schooners was changed; the Enterprise now being on the starboard instead of the larboard quarter of the Avenger. The relative distance between the two schooners they were on the other tack. The Avenger also tacked was, however, nearly the same, that is, about three miles and kept close under the frigate's counter. and a half from each other; and there was every prospect vessels were now running to the eastward.

equally reason to expect that she would assist in their cap-sight of either vessel was equally astonished at the boldness ture. She had evidently perceived the two schooners, and of the supposed pirate. had made all sail, tacking every quarter of an hour so as to keep her relative position. The Enterprise, who had also to the first-lieutenant. made out the frigate, to attract her attention, although not within range of the Avenger, commenced firing with her he has: and some say there are three hundred men aboard,

This is rather awkward," observed Cain.

"It will be dark in less than an hour," observed Francis- give us a broadside, and be off in the wind's-eye again." co; "and that is our only chance."

Cain reflected a minute.

"Get the long-gun ready, my lads! We will return her take out the tompions. Pipe starboard-watch to quarters."
e, Francisco, and hoist American colours: that will puzfire, Francisco, and hoist American colours: that will puzzle the frigate at all events, and the night may do the rest." tending to run round her stern and bring to on the same

The long-gun of the Avenger was ready.

"I would not fire the long-gun," observed Francisco; "it will shew our force, and will give no reason for our at-Cain went on deck, and surveyed the vessel through the tempt to escape. Now, if we were to fire our broadside guns, the difference of report between them and the one of large calibre fired by the other schooner, would induce them

> "Very true," replied Cain; "and as America is at peace with all the world, that our antagonist is a pirate. Hold fast the long-gun, there! and unship the starboard ports.

The Avenger commenced firing an occasional gun from her broadside, the reports of which were hardly to be heard by those on board of the frigate; while the long-gun of the then about five miles distant, steering for the Avenger, Enterprise reverberated along the water, and its loud resonance was swept by the wind to the frigate to leeward.

Enterprise took in her topmast studding-sail, and hauled her wind. This brought the Enterprise well on the the wave, and darkness obscured the vessels from each

"What do you propose to do, Captain Cain?" said

"I have made up my mind to do a bold thing, I will run down to the frigate as if for shelter; tell him that the other vessel is a pirate, and claim his protection. Leave me to escape afterwards; the moon will not rise till nearly one o'clock."

"That will be a bold ruse indeed; but suppose you are once under her broadside, and she suspects you?

"Then I will show her my heels. I should care nothing for her and her broadside if the schooner was not here."

In an hour after dark, the Avenger was close to the frigate, having steered directly for her. She shortened sail gradually, as if she had few hands on board; and, keeping his men out of sight, Cain ran under the stern of the frigate.

"Schooner, ahoy! What schooner is that?"

"Eliza of Baltimore, from Carthagena," replied Cain, Away went the Avenger, and would have recovered her rounding to under the lee of the man-of-war, and then condistance, but the Enterprise was again steered more off the tinuing: "That vessel in chase is a pirate. Shall I send a boat on board?"

"No; keep company with us."

"Ay, ay, sir," replied Cain.

"Hands, about ship!" now resounded with the boatswain's whistles on board of the frigate, and in a minute

In the mean time, Edward Templemore and those on of a long and weary chase on the part of the Enterprise, board of the Enterprise, who by the course steered had who again kept away a point to near the Avenger. Both gradually neared them, perceiving the motions of the two other vessels, were quite puzzled. At one time they thought It was about an hour before dark that another sail hove they had made a mistake, and that it was not the pirate in sight right a-head of the Avenger, and was clearly made vessel; at another they surmised that the crew had mutinied out to be a frigate. The pirates were alarmed at this un and surrendered to the frigate. Edward hauled his wind, fortunate circumstance, as there was little doubt but that and steered directly for them, to ascertain what the real she would prove a British cruiser; and, if not, they had facts were. The captain of the frigate, who had never lost

"Surely the rascal does not intend to board us," said he

tit

n

"There is no saying, sir; you know what a character which is equal to our ship's company."

" Or, perhaps, sir, he will pass to windward of us, and

"At all events we will have a broadside ready for him," replied the captain. "Clear away the starboard guns, and tenant, as the schooner appeared skimming along about a stronger language than we are inclined to repeat, it was cable's length on their weather bow.

"And she is full of men, sir, said the master, looking at her through the night-glass.

"Fire a gun at her!" said the captain.

Bang! The smoke cleared away, and the schooner's foretopsail, which she was in the act of clewing up, lay over her side. The shot had struck the foremast of the MS, and furnished the subjects for the engravings.'-Me-Enterprise, and cut it in two below the catharpings. The trop. Mag. Nov. 1835, p. 81. Enterprise was, for the time, completely disabled.

"Schooner ahoy! what schooner is that?"

"His majesty's schooner Enterprise." "Send a boat on board immediately."

"Ay, ay, sir."

"Turn the hands up ! Shorten sail!"

The top-gallants and courses of the frigate were taken in, and the mainsail hove to the mast.

"Signalman, whereabouts is that other schooner now?"

"The schooner sir? On the quarter," replied the signalman, who, with every body else on board, was so misinformed as to the late viscount's sentiments, and that anxious about the Enterprise, that they had neglected to Captain Fleetwood Pellew was induced to revise, only when watch the motions of the supposed American. The man he found that he could not prevent the publication, from had replied at random, and he now jumped upon the sig- a very natural desire to see that it did not contain any misnal chests abaft to look for her. But she was not to be statement injurious to his father's memory. seen. Cain, who had watched all that passed between the other two vessels, and had been prepared to slip off at a rather of private delicacy than of literary interest, and we moment's warning, as soon as the gun was fired at the should certainly not have alluded to it at all, if the result other schooner, had wore round and made all sail on a did not seem to us to effect the value of the book itself. wind. The night-glass discovered her half a mile astern; No reader can have followed the course of Mr. Osler's and the ruse was immediately perceived. The frigate biography without observing this important drawback on filled and made sail, leaving Edward to return on boardfor there was no time to stop for the boat-tacked, and ticulars of Lord Exmouth's life as might naturally be supgave chase. But the Avenger was soon in the wind's eye of plied by the recollections of an elder brother, belonging to her; and at daylight was no longer to be seen.

the frigate as soon as he could set sail on his vessel, indig- and more distinguished portion of his lordship's public canant at his treatment, and vowing that he would demand reer, as well as in those points of private and personal ina court-martial. About noon the frigate rejoined him, terest which constitute the chief charm and value of biogwhen matters were fully explained. Annoyed as they all raphy as contradistinguished from history. We are by no felt at not having captured the pirate, it was unanimously means dissatisfied with the way in which Mr. Osler has, in agreed, that by his audacity and coolness he deserved to all other respects, performed his task, nor do we hesitate escape. It was found that the mast of the Enterprise to repeat the preference that we recently expressed in our could be fished and scarfed, so as to enable her to continue review of the Life of Mackintosh, for-cateris paribus-a her course. The carpenters of the frigate were sent on biography written by a pen more impartial than that of a board; and in two days the injury was repaired, and Ed near relative can ever be: but we are nevertheless of opi-

Avenger.

From the Quarterly Review.

The Life of Admiral Viscount Exmouth. By Edward Osler, Esq. London. 1835. 8vo.

WE have learned from several sources, but most distinctly from a paragraph in a clever contemporary magazine,* that this Life of Lord Exmouth, though 'undertaken,' as the preface announces, 'with the sanction of his elder and only surviving brother,' Mr. Samuel Pellew of Falmouth, has been written without the concurrence, and published against the wishes of his lordship's more immediate family -nay, that one of his lordship's son's, the Dean of Norwich, thad announced his intention of writing the life of

"He does not shorten sail yet, sir," said the first-lien this father-an intention which, as has been stated in hardly fair in Mr. Osler to forestall, and, as far as he could,

> To this Mr. Osler has replied, that besides the sanction of Mr. Samuel Pellew, 'the late viscount (the admiral's eldest son), knew and approved the intention; and that his second son, Captain Fleetwood Pellew, revised the whole

These statements a little surprise us, because we happen to know that the late viscount expressed a formal disapprobation of the early publication of any life of his father; and it is hardly possible that he and Captain Pellew should be ignorant of what had reached even us, that their brother. the Dean of Norwich, did intend to produce, in a fit season, a life of their father, and was, for that object, in possession of all the family papers, as well as of materials contributed by some of Lord Exmouth's private friends. We, therefore, suspect that Mr. Osler must have mistaken or been

But, however all this may be, the question would be one its merit—that while it is sufficiently copious in such para different profession, and now in his eighty-second year, In the mean time Edward Templemore had followed yet it is too obviously deficient in the details of the later ward Templemore once more went in pursuit of the nion that Mr. Osler would have acted with better taste, and have done more justice to himself and his hero, if he had not proceeded without the fuller 'sanction' and more substantial assistance of those members of Lord Exmouth's family who not only have the best right to sanction such a publication, but must also be in exclusive possession of all the documentary evidence of his public life, as well as of the most copious illustrations of his private character-by the absence of which, Mr. Osler's view and treatment of his subject has been, in our opinion, rendered, in some points, narrow and imperfect.

We regret the more this deficiency in Mr. Osler's materials, because his work proves that he would have made a satisfactory—though not brilliant—use of a larger store, He has considerable merits; his style is simple and clear -his feelings are amiable-his principles sound-he is ensible, impartial, and unaffected-he seems not unacquainted with the technicalities of a naval life, and is, upon the whole, no unworthy biographer of a British admiral. If he be in some points obscure, and in others mistaken,if he sometimes seems to expand trifles to the neglect of more important matters,-we think we can generally trace these blemishes to the state of his materials. Unfortu

* The Metropolitan Magazine for October last.

The Magazine says, the 'Bishop of Hereford,' but this is certainly a mistake for the Dean of Norwick, whose intention of writing his father's life we ourselves remember to have heard spoken of shortly after Lord Exmouth's death.

VOL. EXVIII. MARCH, 1836 .- 28.

It would far exceed both our limits and our object to beginnings may be ultimately destined. follow Mr. Osler through the details of his lordship's ser. When in his fourteenth year young Pellew, rather vices: a full account of them would be almost a general against his grandfather's wishes, but prompted by a haphistory of the naval wars of half a century: we shall se- py instinct, determined to be a sailor, and we have reason lect such events and passages only as appear to us to exhi. to believe, though Mr. Osler does not mention it, that the bit some peculiar touch of the individual character of the patronage of Lady Spencer (grandmother of the present man, with this additional reserve, that as we approach Lord) was exerted in his behalf. He was accordingly in more recent times we shall be shorter in our observations, the year 1770 received into his majesty's naval service, as the events must be fresher in the recollection of our on board the June, Captain Stott, which was commissioned from the lower ranks of society; and it is very certain, terranean. Captain Stott, who had been boatswain with and very honorable to him, that he was altogether the Boscawen, was an excellent seaman, but had, as is too maker of his own fortune-but he was of a gentleman's generally the case with persons thus promoted, retained family, t which had been for centuries settled in the west some habits not suited to his present rank. He kept a of Cornwall. The earliest, however, of the family, of mistress on board-a midshipman of the name of Cole, a whom any thing is certainly known, was distinguished special friend of young Pellew, happened to displease this for his loyalty and sufferings in the great rebellion, and a woman, and was in consequence irregularly and unjustismall antique piece of plate belonging to him, and bearing fiably turned out of the ship. Pellew, with the early firm the date of 1645, is still preserved. His son, Lord Exmouth's great-grandfather, was a captain in the navy. His with his oppressed friend and insisted on sharing his fate; grandfather was an extensive merchant and shipowner, they were both put on shore at Marseilles-penniless-but and a considerable landed proprietor both in Cornwall and their spirited conduct attracted the notice and approbation in Maryland-part of the town of Annapolis Royal stands of the late Captain Keppel and Lord Hugh Seymour, then on what was, before the revolt of the colonies, the estate of lieutenants in the Juno, and laid the foundation of a friendthe Pellews. The father, however, was the youngest of ship between them and Pellew which continued through six sons, and seems to have had no other patrimony than their lives. Lord Hugh even had the kindness to advance that great and bountiful field of English enterprise, the them money to bear their expenses home, and among the sea, which his forefathers had ploughed with respectable services rendered to his country by that amiable man and success, and from which his son was to reap so rich a har. distinguished officer, it is not the least that his sagacity and vest of affluence and honour. He himself does not seem generosity probably preserved Pellew to the naval glory of to have attained any higher station than the command of his country. Captain Stott, on reconsideration, appears to one of his Majesty's post-office packets on the Dover sta. have repented of his harshness, and he gave the lads such tion, where he died in 1765, leaving six children, of whom testimonials of their general good conduct and abilities, EDWARD, born on the 19th April, 1757, was the second as saved them from the ill consequences which would nately they are peculiarly observable towards the latter the protection of their grandfather, by whom Edward was parts of the volume, where Mr. Osler shews himself to be successively sent to the best schools of the country, where but imperfectly acquainted either with the details of that admirable system of discipline and economy with which construe Virgil, and obtained at least, to use Dr. Johnson's his lordship conducted the nautical duties of his command, phrase, 'Latin enough to grammaticise his English.'or with the vast variety of civil and political objects which, Slight and fugitive as may be the literary acquirements in those momentous times, enlarged the sphere, complicated which a boy can have made at the age when, to make him the duties, and surcharged the responsibility of the com-mander-in-chief of a British flect.* We shall have occa-calculable advantage to his future life, by predisposing sion to notice some of Mr. Osler's deficiencies and omis- him to cultivate his mind in intervals of leisure, and by sions on these points, in the course of giving our readers preparing him for that higher class of duties and that susome idea of his easy and pleasing narrative of the prin- perior station in society, for which-as in the case of so cipal events of Lord Exmouth's useful and honourable life. many of our naval heroes-a sailer boy of very humble for the Falkland Island armanent; and when she was paid It has been sometimes stated that Lord Exmouth sprang off he followed Captain Stott into the Alarm, in the Medi-The second marriage of their mother soon rendered otherwise have probably followed so unlucky a debût in a these children doubly orphans, but they had for some years service of which, after all, subordination is an indispensable requisite. It is delightful to find in the sequel a more The best unexceptionable proof of Pellew's magnanimity-many naval authority on such points (to whom we have been indebted for many valuable remarks) says, 'Mr. Osler he happened to fall in with a son of Captain Stott, then does not do full justice to Lord Exmouth's great talent in calling forth the resources of his fleet,—his tact in huser of the top of the proposed to fall in with a son of Captain Stott, then dead. He took the youth under his protection, and did calling forth the resources of his fleet,—his tact in huser of the store and his indepthier has been dead. At a banding the stores, and his indefatigable and successful later period, and after Lord Hugh Seymour's death, Pelexertions in keeping his fleet' [in India and the Mediterranean] in repair, and in constant readiness for immediate service, without the assistance of a dock-yard, and showing, by an amos and at a time of a great scarcity of naval stores. Too

It was now Pellew's good fortune to get into a better managed extensive diplomatic business in circumstan-school-at least of manners and morals. Captain Powces of great difficulty, when we had hardly a minister on noll, an officer of great professional merit and polished habits, received him into the Blonde.

the continent.'

and at a time of a great scarcity of naval stores. Too little notice is also taken of the manner in which he

* These are not the opinions of us alone.

t 'Originally Norman,' says Mr. Osler, but on no other authority, that we can discover, than that the name was mise of his midshipman, who returned his kindness formerly spelled 'Pelleu.' We rather believe the name with almost the affection of a son. Such mutual conand family to be aboriginal Cornish.

^{&#}x27; Captain Pownoll soon appreciated the merit and profidence and attachment between a captain and a mid-shipman has very rarely been met with; and it was pedetermined character, which, with a judgment not yet the American insurgents, it became expedient to have a matured by experience, might have carried him into mistakes, found a guide so kind and judicious as Cap. from the Blonds * under a liquidament and a senior mideline. tain Pownoll.

vas

ere

to n's

nts

im

in-

ing

by

80 ble

her

ap-

ion the ent in ce.

aid

di-

ith

ten

ned

t a

, a

his sti-

m-ase

te:

but

ion

en

nd-

gh

ice

the

nd

nd

of

to eh

es.

ald

.

ore

ny

in,

en

lid

t a

el-

in

er

ed

'Active beyond his companions, Mr. Pellew did the ship's duty with a smartness which none of them could equal; and as every one takes pleasure where he excels, he had soon become a thorough seaman. At the same time, the buoyancy of youth, and a naturally playful disposition, led him continually into feats of Blonde, and when he came alongside, the yards were manned to receive him. Looking up, he was surprised to see a midshipman on the yard-arm standing on his head. Captain Pownoll, who was at his side, soon quieted his approbensions, by assuring him that it was only one of the usual frolics of young Pellew, and that the General might make himself quite at ease for his flexible was again laid down, and by sunset all ber safety, for that if he should fall, he would only go under the ship's bottom, and come up on the other side. What on this occasion was probably spoken but in jest, was afterwards more than realized: he actually sprang from the fore-yard of the Blonde, while she was going fast through the water, and saved a man who had fallen overboard. Captain Pownoll reproached him for his rashness, but he shed tears when he spoke of it to the officers, and declared that Pellew was a noble fellow.'-p. 10—12.

This is the first of many instances in which Pellew distinguished himself-above any officer we have heard ofby his courage, skill, and humanity in saving the lives of his fellow-creatures. In each of these qualities Pellew had amongst his brother officers an abundance of rivals, but in him they happened to be combined in a remarkable There is in the hearts of we believe the majority of mankind-certainly of British sailors-an instinctive enthusiasm of humanity which prompts them to endeavour, at their own risk, to save a fellow creature; and besides this instinct, such an attempt is in itself so glorious a distinction, and the successful result is so gratifying to all the noblest feelings of our nature, that on board a British man-of-war such feats require rather to be repressed than encouraged. Frequent and lamentable are the instances in which inconsiderate impulses of this nature have occasioned double calamities. Those whose courage prompts them to jump overboard should, in a well-disciplined ship, be early taught that there is a rarer and higher, though less brilliant quality-presence of mind-which enables its fortunate possessors to appreciate, in the twinkling of an eye, the circumstances and contingencies of the case. Nor are mere spirit and coolness sufficient to form such an opinion; the probabilities of success must depend not merely on the personal powers of the individual, but on a vast variety of what we may call technical circumstances, of which none but what is emphatically called a thorough seaman can make an adequate estimate. Such a seaman was Pellew; and great as were his courage and his strength, and though he was in the sea

> -Like a creature native and endued Unto that element'-

yet it is the skill and judgment which he was wont to exercise on such occasions that we should chiefly inculcate as examples of intimation; and there was, as we shall see by and by, one instance at least, in which even his skill and judgment failed him.

In furtherance of the operations which Sir Guy Carleculiarly fortunate for Mr. Pellew, that his quick and ton, the commander in chief, was now carrying on against from the Blonde,* under a lieutenant and a senior midshipman, were ordered on this service. Pellew, at his earnest entreaty, was-fortunately-added to the party.

Mr. Osler swells out his book with much more of the details of this campaign than can possibly belong to the history of young Pellew. We shall only say that, by most extraordinary skill and exertions, under the superinmore than common daring. In the spring of 1775, tendence of Lieutenant (afterwards Admiral) Schanck, an General Burgoyne took his passage to America in the officer of great mechanical ingenuity, a little fleet was created on the inland waters-the keel and floor timbers of a ship of three hundred tons which had been laid at Quebec were taken to pieces and conveyed to the lake-

> former parts were put together, and a considerable quantity of additional timbers were prepared for her .-The progress of the work was like magic. Trees growing in the forest in the morning would form part of the ship before night. She was launched in twenty-eight days from laying her keel, and sailed next evening, armed with eighteen twelve-pounders, and fully equipped for service.'-p. 16.

> Two schooners and twenty-six other vessels and boats were equipped with equal celerity. The Blonde's party manned one of the schooners-the Carleton. In the first action, both his superior officers being wounded and disabled, Pellew succeeded to the command, and distinguished himself by that union of gallantry and seamanship which characterized his whole career.

'In attempting to go-about, being close to the shore covered with the enemy's marksmen, the Carleton hung in stays, and Pellew, not regarding the danger of making himself so conspicuous, sprang out on the bowsprit to push the jib over; some of the gun-boats now took her in tow-but so thick and heavy was the enemy's fire, that the tow-rope was cut with a shot. Pellew ordered some one to go and secure it, but seeing all hesi-tate—for indeed it looked like a death service—he ran forward and did it himself.'-p. 18.

This, in the lad's first action, is a striking exemplification of the homely but emphatic panegyric long after pronounced on him by the sailors, that 'The captain never desired any man to do what he was not able and ready to do himself.' His conduct in this whole affair was so much beyond his years and station as to attract extraordinary Sir Charles Douglas, Commodore in the St. Lawrence, wrote to him to say that his behaviour on board the Carleton, in the different actions on the lakes, gave him the warmest satisfaction, and that he would not fail to represent his gallantry in the strongest terms to Lord Howe, the Commander-in Chief, and Lord Sandwich, First Lord of the Admiralty, as deserving of promotion. Lord Howe immediately expressed his approbation, and promised him a lieutenant's commission whenever he might join the flag-the compliment of a voluntary letter from the First Lord of the Admiralty was more unusual.

'Admiralty Office, London, Jan. 5, 1777. Sir,-You have been spoken of to me by Sir Charles Douglas and Captain Philemon Pownoll, for your conduct in the various services upon Lake Champlain, in

^{*} See the admirable chapter entitled 'A Man Over-board,' in Captain Basil Hall's Fragments.

^{*} Mr. Osler does not state the amount of the detachment-we have heard that it consisted of about 60 men.

promoting you to the rank of lieutenant whenever you countenanced. —p. 39. come to England; but it is impossible to send you a Burgoyne paid him commission where you now are, it being out of the ju-him home with his despatches; and Sir Guy Carleton, to risdiction of the Admiralty.

SANDWICH.

The natural anxiety to obtain the rank thus nobly earned did not, however, induce Pellew to quit the anomalous but arduous service in which he was engaged. He was lected to accompany it with a body of scamen, and in mission in his Majesty's service for his good conduct. the operations along the Hudson he certainly prolonged Burgoyne's chances of escape by his courage and technical head of his sailors, attacked and recaptured her.

but too well that vanity and partiality often take an exag-gerated view of individual achievement; but the value of nual Register—had been enabled to give us some more Pellew's services on this trying occasion is preserved from particulars and details of the personal services of the extra-

young auxiliary-a Midshipman of Twenty.

together with those of the Army, for the important service executing those important services.

You have rendered them upon this occasion Pellew now received his lieuten

JOHN BURGOYNE.

Nor was this all ; as matters grew more desperate, Burgoyne assembled a council of his principal officers, amongst whom was included Mr. Pellew, as commanding the brigade of seamen; and, Mr. Osler justly remarks, 'no more ecisive testimony of his services, and of the confidence which he inspired, could be afforded than the unprecedented compliment of calling a midshipman, only twenty years of age, to sit in council with generals on such a vital pitulating, and was confident he could bring them off, shore, and the enemy was using every exertion to gain the and that without any reflection on the army. Soldiers are accustemed to act only in orderly masses, but sailors, in a peculiar degree, combine with discipline individual enterprize. Mr. Pellew's party had acted as pioneers but a most daring and almost desperate exploit. She and artificers to the army during its advance, and their cape would have caused a very undeserved discredit enemy's fire.

so handsome a manner, that I shall receive pleasure in on the army; and the proposal was very properly dis-

Burgoyne paid him the final compliment by sending the former testimonials of Pellew's extraordinary merit which we have quoted, added the following letter to Lord Sandwich:

' Quebec, November, 2, 1777.

'My Lord,-This will be presented to your Lordship now attached to the army unluckily confided to the presumptuous Burgoyne. Mr. Osler gives, in considerable ry and merit during two severe campaigns in this coundetail, the events of that gallant but unfortunate expeditry I cannot do justice. He is just now returned to me tion, which ended in Burgoyne's surrender. The flotilla from Saratoga, having shared the fate of that unfortukept with the army as far as the navigation extended; but nate army, and is on his way to England. I beg leave when it advanced overland to the Hudson, Pellew was se- to recommend him to your Lordship as worthy of a com-GUY CARLETOS.

He came home in a transport, which was chased by an resources. In the calamity of the reverse of the 7th of enemy's cruiser. Pellew, who had hitherto been only a Ostober, Pellew had more than a common share. His passenger, now insisted on taking the command, and fightbrother John-who, at the age of seventeen, had already ing the ship. He did so, engaged and beat off the pribecome aide-de-camp to General Phillips-was among the vateer; and so concluded a term of services, which, condead. In Burgoyne's attempt to retreat, the enemy, hav- sidering the youth and subordinate station of the officer, ing a superiority on the river, attacked and carried the the strangeness of the occasion, the paucity of his force, English bateaux, and particularly a vessel which contained and the combined gallantry and prudence by which he obthe small store of provisions for the army. This loss tained the unanimous approbation of the army and the would have deprived it of its last hope, but Pellew, at the navy, was, as Mr. Osler says, unprecedented, and-we believe we may add-remains unparalleled. We heartily The inevitable injustice of general history overlooks wish that Mr. Osler, instead of many pages dedicated to such subordinate affairs, and, on the other hand, we know General Burgoyne's strategies, which have no kind of relaoblivion by the incontestible evidence of the following letter, written by the Commander-in-chief of the army to his lew and his party threw a bridge across the Hudson'— 'Mr. Pellew and his party recaptured a victualler.'* order to understand the value, or at least the merit, of the Dear Sir,-It was with infinite pleasure that Gen-exploit, we should know with what means this youth coneral Phillips and myself observed the gallantry and ad-structed the bridge—with what force he recaptured the dress with which you conducted your attack upon the provision-vessel in the hands of the enemy. The gallantry of your little party was deserving of the success which attended it; and I send you my sincere thanks, by one side employed, and by the other not defeated, in Pellew now received his lieutenant's commission, but was appointed to a guard-ship—the convention of Saratoga preventing his active employment. Mr. Osler states Pellew's impatience at this restraint, but does not mention how it was removed: we find him, however, in 1777, lieutenant of the Licorne, where he had the good fortune to distinguish himself in an action with two of the enemy's cruisers. He soon after rejoined his old friend, Captain Pownoll, now of the Apollo, whose regard managed to secure for him the station of first lieutenant of the ship. He was too soon deprived of this valuable friend. On the morning of the 15th June, 1780, the Apollo, cruising in 'Pellew, as the youngest officer present, —one of the North Sea, fell in with the Stanislaus, French frigate, the youngest probably, since his brother's death, in the whole camp, 'was required to offer his opinion the first. body. Pellew hastened to catch him in his arms—the He pleaded that he and his own little party might not a included in the capitulation, but permitted to make. be included in the capitulation, but permitted to make ty's ship away,' and expired. They were close to the

is said strains and its control of the control of t

knowledge and resources would have given him great ple—the tow-rope was traice shot away, and twice re-facilities in making their way in a small body; but their placed by Pellew's swimming with it on board under the

and lugger, and drove them ashore under the batteries of he was at the topmast-head, and from thence by the toptheir own coast, in so gallant a style as to deserve the following letter from Lord Keppel:-

it

1-

1-

n

t-

i-

n.

r, e, bne ely

to

la-

n-

re

a-

el-

In

he

m-

he

ed

Te

in mt

ga

el-

on uto

y's

ain

se-

He

the

in

te. the

the

es-

the

the ief,

eo-

Admiralty Office, May 25, 1782.

received of your gallant and seaman-like conduct in nation will make them more intelligible:-While the seathe sloop you command, in your spirited attack on three privateers inside the Isle of Bass, and your success in driving them all on shore, that I am induced to bestow on you the rank of a post-captain in the service which himself down by a single rope to the outer end of the your universal good character and conduct do credit.

KEPPEL.

This promotion at this time was particularly fortunate for Pellew, and we will add for the country, as the peace which soon followed would otherwise have thrown him back, certainly for ten or twelve years, and probably for ever-in the hierarchy of the profession. During the the ship had been warped up to a chain-rock, and it bepeace in 1783 he married Susan, the daughter of J. Froud, came necessary to cast off the hawser attached to it, but Esq. of Wiltshire. That excellent lady is still living, and we hope capable of enjoying, in calm resignation, the post-humous fame, as she did, for so many years of vivid affection, the living glories of her illustrious humband down by the hawser, and cast it off," at the same time tion, the living glories of her illustrious husband.

In 1786 he commissioned the Winchelsea for the Newfoundland station:-the incidents of a peace command the attempt. In an instant the captain was seen clingare of too little interest to survive in public recollection, ing to the hawser, and proceeding to the rock; the hawbut Mr. Osler has been so lucky as to obtain from an officer, who was a midshipman in the Winchelsea, some an- he swung himself to the side of the ship, by the same ecdotes of Captain Pellew which will give our readers a means mounted the ship's side, and was again directing more lively idea of the skill, dexterity, and courage of this the duty going on. -pp. 63, 64. prime sailor, than the general encomiums which always accompany his name can do.

o'clock, when the captain was carrying on the duty, and presence of mind which gave effect to his courage and hushortening sail upon the quick approach of a severe manity. gale; and being an old soldier for my age, being then sixteen, he ordered me to the mizen-top, to close reef and furl the mizen-topsail; and this being done, from the increase of the gale, we had before twelve o'clock to take in successively every reef, furl most of the sails, and strike the top-gallant masts and other spars, to make the ship snug; the midshipmen being on the yards as well as the men, and the captain, when the gale became severe, at their elbow. In close reefing the main-topsail, there was much difficulty in clewing up the sail dined, and were at play on the spare anchor to leeward, for the purpose of making it quiet, and the captain issued his orders accordingly from the quarter-deck, and sent us aloft. On gaining the top-sail yard, the most active and daring of our party hesitated to go out upon it, as the sail was flapping about violently, making it a service of great danger. A voice was heard amidst the roaring of the gale from the extreme end of the yardarm, calling upon us to exert ourselves to save the sail.

shelter of Ostend, a neutral port; but Pellew drove her, which would otherwise beat to pieces. A man said, beaten and dismasted, on shore. For this exploit he received his next step of promotion, and was made complete. The fact was, that the instant he had given mander of the Hazard sloop of war, and soon after remov. us orders to go aloft, he laid down his speaking-trumpet, mander of the Hazard sloop of war, and soon after remov-and clambered like a cat by the rigging over the backs of the seamen, and before they reached the main-top, sail lift, a single rope, he reached the situation he was in.'-pp. 62, 63.

We know not whether our land readers will quite un-'Sir .- I am so well pleased with the account I have derstand these exploits; perhaps the following short explamen were hesitating to crawl out along the yard, the captain had ascended to the upper mast and thence swung vard, the post of greatest danger-whence he called to the men to execute the comparatively safe and easy task of coming forward to assist in the work.

Again. Working into St. John's harbour, Newfound-

'In the course of our progress against a strong wind, saying that a boat would soon be there to bring him on board again. The smartest seaman in the ship declined ser was cast off, and to the astonishment of every one,

Amidst several similar instances we select the following. which, though not so striking, is a perfect exemplification 'I remember relieving the deck one night after eight of what we recently said of the consummate skill and

> 'We had light winds and fine weather after making the coast of Portugal. On one remarkably fine day, when the ship was stealing through the water under the influence of a gentle breeze, the people were all below at their dinners, and scarcely a person left on the deck but officers, of whom the captain was one. Two little ship-boys had been induced, by the fineness of the weather, to run up from below the moment they had which overhangs the side of the ship. One of them fell overboard, which was seen from the quarter-deck, and the order was given to luff the ship into the wind. In an instant the officers were over the side; but it was the captain who, grasping a rope firmly with one hand, let himself down to the water's edge, and catching hold of the poor boy's jacket as he floated past, saved his life in as little time as I have taken to mention it. There was not a rope touched, or sail altered in doing this, and the people below knew not of the accident until they came on deck when their dinner was over. -pp. 67, 68.

> After the expiration of three years, the usual period of commonly unwelcome: - for his active mind, impatient of idleness, sought for employment in cultivating one of his elder brother's farms-with what success may be guessed. tural element. He was immediately appointed to the

^{*} The origin of this strange term post-captain, now abolished in the navy, we conceive to be this: Masters and commanders, or even lieutenants, commanding a vessel, though popularly called captains, have no claim to that title nor to regular advancement by seniority, but may a peace command, Captain Pellew was restored to the (to be promoted to the superior ranks over the heads of him) unwelcome shore—destined it seems to be more than their seniors—while the captain, properly so called, when once placed on the list, took his post, and proceeded to the rank of admiral by mere seniority, from which there could be no deviation : so that when an officer obtained that rank he was said to be posted; that But the French war relieved him from his very unprofita-is, placed beyond the reach of favour or other contin-ble plough, and restored him to what we may call his nagencies.

of men; of the action which ensued we need only give the of the westernmost squadron,-that nearest the enemy,circumstances, he then sent, with all Mullon's private pro- ments.* perty, 'what assistance his then very limited means allowed him to offer.'-p. 92. Madame Mullon's letter-or ra-French sensibility: there is more anxiety about the poor than we should have expected.

was pursued and captured by Sir Richard Strachan. Sir fatigable as to the captain's conduct in this difficulty. John Warren himself, in the Flora, who had gallantly led Babet, which had received the fire of the Arethusa in passing; one of the four French frigates escaped.

As soon as the enemy struck, the Commodore, in the and expressive note :-

'My dear Pellew-I shall ever hold myself indebted and under infinite obligations to you, for the noble and gallant support you gave me to-day. God bless you Your most sincere and affectionate and all yours.

Sir John's frigate-squadron had been so successful, that the Admiralty was led to increase the force and divide the command, and the second squadron was given to Sir Edward Pellew. On the 21st October, 1794, one of the squadron, the Artois, Captain Edward Nagle (knighted on this occasion), captured in an action fought singly, though the other British ships were in sight, La Révolutionnaire, the heaviest frigate (except the Pomone) which had yet been taken. We notice this capture, of which Pellew was no more than an admiring spectator, because La Révo lutionnaire was first commissioned in the British service by the Commodore's early friend and associate, Cole; and her last captain-before she was broken up in 1822 as wholly unfit for sea-was his second son, Captain Fleetwood Pellew.

On the 22d December, 1794, when Sir Edward's squadron was lying in Falmouth Roads, intelligence was received that the Brest fleet had put to sea. This informa-squadron.

Nymphe of thirty-six guns, a French frigate captured in tion was so important, says Mr. Osler, that Sir Edward the former war; and she was soon destined to have a com-thought it necessary to communicate it in person to the panion in her involuntary apostacy from her national service. On the 19th of June the Nymphe fell in with the There can be no doubt that Sir Edward did come to town, Cleopatra, of equal material force, but with a superiority but we cannot believe with Mr. Osler that the commodore succinct account of the French themselves-' Les Anglais would have left his ships merely to convey to town intellinous ont enlevé dernièrement la superbe frégate La Cléopatre gence which a subordinate officer could have carried quite —ella a été prise par une frégate d'ègale force.' The as well. It was highly probable that the Admiralty would Nymphe, out of a crew of two hundred and forty, had have had the news through some other channel;-in that fifty-the Cleopatra, out of a complement of three hundred case he ran the risk of crossing on the road his own sailand twenty, sixty-three killed and wounded. The proper-ing orders, and he might have been left behind. The tion killed and wounded attests the good training as well Admiralty, Mr. Osler insinuates, were not pleased with as the courage of the French. It was in all respects a Sir Edward's proceeding. No wonder-if it had no better well-fought action, and being the first frigate action of the motive than that suggested by Mr. Osler. He was, howwar attracted considerable notice. Pellew was knighted, ever, directed to return immediately to Falmouth and proand his brother Israel, a commander on half-pay, who had ceed to reconnoitre Brest,-which we think he would accompanied him as a volunteer, was promoted to post naturally have done in the first instance, if he had not captain. The captain of the Cleopatra, Mullon, was some infinitely more important motive for his unauthorized killed: he was buried at Portsmouth, with the honours journey to London than Mr. Osler assigns. Be that as it due to his rank and gallantry. One of Sir Edward's first may, Brest, which might have been reconnoitered by the acts was to write a letter of condolence to his widow, and 24th had Pellew sailed on the 22nd, was not reconnoitred as he learnt from her reply that she was left in narrow till the 5th January,-a serious interval in naval move-

Sir Edward was now (Feb. 1795) removed from the Arethusa into the Indefatigable, a sixty-four gun ship ther, we hope, the letter to which her name was affixed- lately cut down to a heavy frigate. In May, 1795, while of which Mr. Osler gives a copy, is not very creditable to chasing, by Admiral Waldegrave's signal, a small strange sail close in with the shore near Cape Finisterre, the Indecaptain's 'effects' and less gratitude for Pellew's generosity fatigable struck on a rock, and received so much damage, that the admiral ordered her into the Tagus to repair. The He now was placed in the Arethusa, a frigate of great-mischief was so serious that it was with great difficulty er force than the Nymphe, and bore a prominent part in that she was kept affoat, but the exact position and extent Sir John Warren's frigate action off the Isle of Bass, 22d of the injury were not discoverable. We should not do April, 1794. La Pomone, the largest frigate then afloat, justice to the peculiarity of Pellew's naval character if we struck to the Arethusa; L'Engageante, the commodore, omitted the statement of one of the officers of the Inde-

In order to ascertain whether both sides of the ship the attack and bore the first brunt of the enemy's fire, had been injured, Sir Edward resolved to examine the suffered severely, but was able to take possession of the bottom himself; and to the astonishment and admiration of everybody who witnessed this heroic act, he plunged into the water, thoroughly examined both sides, and satisfied himself that the starboard side only had been full warmth of his feelings, wrote to Sir Edward a short damaged. This saved much time and expense; for had not Sir Edward hazarded the experiment, the apparatus for heaving down must have been shifted over.'-p. 112.

> Three times during the few months he had commanded this ship he had risked his life to rescue others-once in Portsmouth harbour, where he was instrumental in saving two poor fellows-and again at Spithead, where one of the coxwains of his own ship fell overboard; the captain was instantly in the water, and caught the man just as he was sinking quite exhausted; life was apparently extinct, but by the usual means was happily restored. On the third oceasion, the attempt had nearly proved fatal to himself. Two men had been dashed overboard in a very heavy sea -Pellew jumped into a boat, and ordered it to be lowered in the attempt the ship happened to make a deep plunge the boat was stove to pieces, and the captain thrown out much bruised, his nostril slit by one of the tackles, and bleeding profusely; but his coolness and self-possession

^{*} We are, however, enabled to add, that the squadron was not wholly idle, but cruised in sight of land, to warn the merchant-ships from running down Channel, 'I remember,' says our informant. 'spending Christmas-day, on St. Antony's head, repeating signals from the

was hauled on board. Another boat was then lowered with better success, and the men (who seem to have supported themselves by the wreck of the first boat) were eventually saved.

This is the only one of the numerous exploits of this nature in which there seems any reason to question the judgment of Pellew in making the attempt. There were perhaps motives which operated on the emergency which are not reported, but he more probably acted on his noble principle, (which, however, is not always that which should guide a commanding officer,) of never exposing another to a danger which he himself could meet,

t

r

d d

it

d

e-

e

P

e e,

e

lo

p

n

d

d

d

18

2.

d

in

he

as as ut

rd

lf.

ea

ge

at

nd

on

on to el, ıs-

But there occurred about this time one instance of courage and humanity, whose splendour,' as Mr. Osler truly says, 'leaves all the others in the shade.'

On the 26th January, 1796, while the Indefatigable was refitting in Plymouth harbour, the Dutton, a large East Indiaman employed as a transport, with part of the 2nd Regiment on board, was forced into Plymouth Sound by stress of weather, and a few hours after was driven on shore under the citadel, where she lay beating and rolling in a tremendous and impassable surf. At this moment except the modesty of him who was the hero of it. Sir Edward was proceeding with Lady Pellew to dine at Indeed, upon all occasions, forward as he was to eulothe shore, and having learned the cause, Sir Edward sprang out of the carriage, and ran with them. We shall allow Mr. Osler to tell the rest of the story, and long as the extract will be, we think no reader could wish it shorter.

'Arrived at the beach, he saw at once that the loss of nearly all on board, between five and six hundred, was inevitable without some one to direct them. The principal officers of the ship had abandoned their charge, and got on shore, just as he arrived on the beach. Having urged them, but without success, to return to their duty, and vainly offered rewards to pilots and others belonging to the port to board the wreck, for all thought I will go myself!" A single rope, by which the officers [!!!] and a few others had landed, formed the only communication with the ship, and by this he was hauled on board through the surf. 'The danger was greatly increased by the wreck of the masts, which had fallen towards the shore; and he received an injury in the back, which confined him to his bed for a week, in consequence of being dragged under the mainmast. But disregarding this at the time, he reached the deck, declared himself, and assumed the command. He assured the people that every one would be saved if they quietly obeyed his orders; that he would himself be the last to quit the wreck, but that he would run any one through who disobeyed him. His well-known name, with the calmness and energy he displayed, gave confidence to the despairing multitude. He was received with three hearty cheers, which were echoed by the multitude on shore; and his promptitude at resource soon enabled him to find and apply the means by which all might be safely landed. His officers, in the meantime, though not knowing that he was on board, were exerting themselves to bring assistance from the Indefatigable. Mr. Pellowe, first lieutenant, left the ship in the barge, and Mr. Thomson, acting master, in the launch; but the boats could not be brought alongside the wreck, and were obliged to run for the Barbican. A small boat, belonging to a merchant vessel, was more fortunate. Mr. Edsell, signal midshipman to the portadmiral, and Mr. Coghlan, mate of the [merchant] vessel, succeeded, at the risk of their lives, in bringing her alongside. The ends of two additional hawsers were navy was not sufficient to allow his promotion in the got on shore, and Sir Edward contrived cradles to be ordinary course. Being advanced into the Renard

did not forsake him, and calling for a rope, he slung him-Islung upon them, with travelling ropes to pass forward self with one of the many which were thrown to him, and and backward between the ship and the beach. Each hawser was held on shore by a number of men, who hawser was need on some by a manner was watched the rolling of the wreck, and kept the ropes tight and steady. Meantime a cutter had with great difficulty worked out of Plymouth Pool, and two large boats arrived from the dock-yard, under the directions of Mr. Hemmings, the master-attendant, by whose caution and judgment they were enabled to approach the wreck, and receive the more helpless of the passengers, who were carried to the cutter. Sir Edward, with his sword drawn, directed the proceedings, and preserved order, a task the more difficult, as the soldiers had got at the spirits before he came on board, and many were drunk. The children, the women, and the sick were the first landed. One of them was only three weeks old, and nothing in the whole transaction impressed Sir Edward more strongly than the struggle of the mother's feelings before she would intrust her infant to his care, or afforded him more pleasure than the suc-cess of his attempt to save it. Next the soldiers were got on shore; then the ship scompany; and finally, Sir Edward himself, who was one of the last to leave her. Every one was saved, and presently after the wreck went to pieces.

'Nothing could equal the lustre of such an action, the Rev. Dr. Hawker's. Seeing crowds running towards gize the merits of his followers, Sir Edward was reserved almost to a fault upon everything connected with his own services. The only notice taken of the Dutton in the journal of the Indefatigable is the short sentence-"Sent two boats to the assistance of a ship on shore in the Sound;" and in his letter to Vice-Admiral Onslow, who had hoisted his flag at Plymouth a day or two be-fore, he throws himself almost out of sight, and ascribes the chief merit to the officer who directed the boats :-

Dear Sir,-I hope it happened to me this afternoon to be serviceable to the unhappy sufferers on board the Dutton; and I have much satisfaction in saying, that every soul in her was taken out before I left her, except the first mate, boatswain, and third mate, who attended the hauling ropes to the shore and they eased me on shore by the hawser. It is not possible to refrain speaking in raptures of the handsome conduct of Mr. Hemmings, the master-attendant, who, at the imminent risk of his life, saved hundreds. If I had not hurt my leg, and been otherwise much bruised, I would have waited on you; but hope this will be a passable excuse. I am, with respect, Sir, your most obedient, humble servant, "Thursday Evening. Ep. Pellew." " Thursday Evening.

'Services performed in the sight of thousands could not thus be concealed. Praise was lavished upon him from every quarter. The corporation of Plymouth voted him the freedom of the town. The merchants of Liverpool presented him with a valuable service of plate. On the 5th of March following he was created baronet, as Sir Edward Pellew, of Treverry, and received for an honourable augmentation of his arms a civic wreath, a standard ship for a crest, and the motto "Deo adjuvante Fortura sequatur." This motto, so modest, and not less expressive of his own habitual feeling, was chosen by himself, in preference to one proposed, which was more personally complimentary. 'Appreciating Mr. Coghlan's' services, and delight-

Now Captain Coghlan, posted in 1810. In 1800, in the Viper tender, to which Sir Edward had appointed him, Mr. Coghlan distinguished himself on the coast of France by a 'cutting out' of such eclat as procured him, we well remember, the applause of the whole country, and a commission of lieutenant by a special order in council; for his length of service in the royal officer has been worthy of his introduction to the navy.'

р. 116-121.

Mr. Osler has produced so few of Lord Exmouth's letters, that we are tempted to add to the foregoing detailed account a much shorter one from his own pen, written in 1810, to his amiable and able friend Mr. Locker (for many years his secretary, now one of the commissioners in Greenwich Hospital), and published by this gentleman in a very clever sketch of Lord Exmouth's life in the United Service Journal:-

'Why do you ask me to relate the wreck of the Dutton? Susan (Lady Exmouth) and I were driving to a dinner party at Plymouth, when we saw crowds running to the Hoe, and learning it was a wreck, I left the carriage to take her on, and joined the crowd. I saw scribe; nor need you, and consequently you will never

'This injunction,' Mr. Locker adds, 'has been scrupulously observed until now that the seal of secretary is removed by his death.'

On the appearance of Mr. Osler's work, two letters-one anonymous, and the other, we suspect pseudonymous-aptober, 1835, depreciating Sir Edward Pellew's merit in of the Dutton would have done just as well without Sir ly undiminished; besides, from the motion of the ship Edward's interference-and that, in truth, his personal ex- by rolling on the rocks, it was not possible to keep the ertions, so exaggerated by 'Osler's bombastic accounts,' ertions, so exaggerated by 'Osler's bombastic accounts,' rope equally stretched, and from this cause, as well as did not in any considerable degree contribute to the final from the sudden rising of the waves, you would at one with the General Ernouf, and subsequently, when captain of the Caledonia, under the flag of his patron, he, with his characteristic courage and zeal, headed a party of seamen and marines which landed and stormed Fort Cassio, near Marseilles. See 'James's Naval History,' iii. 64; iv. 185, 343; vi. 242, for these and other instances of what Mr. James justly calls the 'splendid' gallantry of this officer. Mr. James relates an anecdote which, notwithstanding the undue vigour of one of the expressions, we will venture to repeat. It is said that the commander of the General Ernouf hailed the Re. nard in English to strike. 'Strike!' replied Coghlan — that I will, and d-d hard!' He 'struck so hard,' that in thirty-five minutes his shot set the enemy on fire, and in ten minutes more she blew up with a tremendous explosion. True to the school in which he had been taught, Captain Coghlan now displayed equal board. He had his uniform coat on, and his sword energy in endeavouring to rescue the vanquished enemy, hanging by his side. I have not room to describe the and by great exertion 55 out of a crew of 160 men were particulars; but there was something grand and interultimately saved, ed with the judgment and gallantry he had displayed result. Now Mr. Osler's accounts of this or any other in-Sir Edward placed him on his own quarter-deck. It is cident are certainly not in any degree chargeable with unnecessary to add that the career of this distinguished bombast; and the whole statement in these letters is so obviously erroneous in fact, and so absurd in inference, that we should not have condescended to allude to them, but for the sake of producing another witness of this interesting scene, who writing on the spot, and at the moment, wholly unconnected and even unacquainted with Sir Edward Pellew, has left an account above all suspicion of partiality or mistake, and even, if possible, more honorable to Pellew than to Mr. Osler's own narrative-we mean a letter written to Northcote, the painter, by his brother, which Mr. Osler, in consequence of these attacks, has very properly extracted from 'Northcote's Conversations,' and published in the Times of the 15th October, 1835.

Plymouth, Jan. 28, 1796.

a man man the income

We have had a terrible succession of stormy weather the loss of the whole five or six hundred was inevitable of late. Thursday, immediately after dinner, I went without somebody to direct them, for the last officer to the Hoe, to see the Dutton East Indiaman, full of was pulled on shore as I reached the surf. I urged troops, upon the rocks directly under the flagstaff of the their return, which was refused, upon which I made citadel. She had been out seven weeks on her passage the rope fast to myself, and was hauled through the surf to the West Indies as a transport, with 400 troops on on board—established order, and did not leave her until board, beside women, children, and the ship's crew; every soul was saved but the boatswain, who would not and had just been driven back by stress of weather, go before me. I got safe, and so did he, and the ship with a great number of sick on board. You cannot went all to pieces; but I was laid in bed for a week by conceive anything so horrible as the appearance of conceive anything so horrible as the appearance of getting under the mainmast (which had faller towards things altogether which I beheld when I first arrived the shore); and my back was cured by Lord Spencer's on the spot. The ship had struck on sunken rocks, having conveyed to me by letter His Majesty's inten-tion to dub me baronet. No more have I to say, except bowsprit standing, and her decks covered with soldiers that I feit more pleasure in giving to a mother's arms a as thick as they could possibly stand by one another, dear little infant only three weeks old, than I ever felt with the sea breaking in a horrible manner all around in my life; and both were saved. The struggle she had them; and what still added to the melancholy grandeur to intrust me with the bantling was a scene I cannot de- of the scene was the distress-guns, which were fired now and then over our heads from the citadel. When I first came to the spot, I found they had by some means got a rope with one end fast to the ship, and the other held by people on shore, by which means they could yield as the ship swung. Upon this rope they had got a ring, which they could, by two smaller ropes, draw backwards and forwards from the ship to the shore. To this ring they had put a loop, into which each man peared in the Times of the 26th September and 5th Oc. put his arms, and by this means, and holding by the ring with his hands, he supported himself hanging to the ring, while he was drawn on shore by the people there; this transaction, and pretending to refute 'Osler's false and ring, while he was grawn on shore, and in this manner I saw a great many drawn on shore, bombastic accounts.' These letters have not the efficiency But this proved a tedious work; and though I looked time see a poor wretch hanging ten or twenty feet above sloop, he again distinguished himself in single action the water, and the next you would lose sight of him in the form of a wave, although some escaped better. But this was a scheme which the women and the helpless and many of the sick could not avail themselves of. I observed with some admiration the behaviour of a captain of a man-of-war, who seemed interested in the highest degree for the safety of these poor wretches. He exerted himself uncommonly, and directed others what to do on shore, and endeavoured in vain, with a large speaking-trumpet, to make himself heard by those on board; but finding that nothing could be heard but the roaring of the wind and ses, he offered anybody five guineas instantly who would suffer himself to be drawn on board with instructions to them what to do. And when he found that no one would accept his offer, he gave an instance of the highest heroism, for he fixed the rope about himself, and gave the signal to be drawn on esting in the thing, for as soon as they had pulled him row boats were arrived from the dock-yard, and a sloop time, without complaining, or taking any refreshment. had with difficulty worked out from Plymouth Pool. pp. 136, 37. He then became active in getting out the women and the sick, who were with difficulty got into the open boats, and by them carried off to the sloop, which kept celebrated attempt on Ireland. Its sortie was so mismanoff for fear of being stove against the ship, or thrown aged, that if an extraordinary series of accidents had not upon the rocks.

time, and stood with his drawn sword to prevent too they have ever gained. many rushing into the boats. After he had seen all the people out of the ship, to about ten or fifteen, he fixed himself to the rope as before, and was drawn on shore,

ith ce,

m, inat,

d-

of

rn-

an

er,

ry

nd

er nt of he

ge

on

v ;

er,

ot

of

s,

or

rs

er,

nd

ur

ed

en

ns

er

ld

ot

w

an

ng

ie

е;

e.

ed

it-

ip

as

ne

ve

in

ut

88

1

8. rs

a se ut

ve

m

he

on rd

On the 9th of March, Pellew and his squadron again put to sea, and on the 21st the Indefatigable fell in with and chased three corvettes, one of which she destroyed. On the 13th April, Captain Cole in the Revolutionnaire took L'Unité French frigate, Captain (afterwards Admiral) Linois, after a short fight; and Pellew had the satisfaction of putting in its fullest light the merit of his early friend-too soon lost to the public service; for he died at Plymouth in 1799, almost under Pellew's eyes. A few days after, the Indefatigable engaged and disabled the Virginie, Captain Bergeret, who fought his ship with great skill and gallantry, and did not surrender till another of the British squadren came up. No one could do more justice to Bergeret than Pellew; the prisoner became his guest; and the British Government paid this brave Frenchman the compliment of offering him in exchange for Sir Sydney Smith, lately made prisoner at Havre. Bergeret was sent to France on parole to effect this object; but not rived late in the evening of the 29th. -p. 138-140. having succeeded, he honourably returned to England. Sir Sydney, however, in about two years after, having made his escape, the British Government set Bergeret immediately at liberty. We shall meet him again.

The probability of the invasion of Ireland from Brest now induced the Government to watch that port with peculiar attention, and a large share of this important duty was intrusted to Sir Edward Pellew. We can find room for but two extracts concerning that long and arduous blockade, every day and hour of which was an exertion of naval skill and moral perseverance.

'Knowing how much depended on his vigilance, Sir Edward had watched Brest with the most anxious attention. The wind blew generally from the eastward, at times so strong that the line-of-battle ships would be under a close-reefed maintop-sail and reefed fore-sail; and the weather was intensely cold : yet he went every morning to the mast-head, where he would remain mak-into the wreck, he was received with three vast cheers one his observations for a considerable part of the day, by the people on board, and these were immediately one of the older midshipmen being usually with him echoed by those who lined the shore, the garrison walls, "Well I remember," writes one of his officers, "that on and lower batteries. The first thing he did was to rig being one day relieved to go down to my dinner, I was out two other ropes like the first, which I saw him most obliged to have some of the maintop-men to help me active in doing with his own hands. This quickened down the rigging, I was so benumbed with the intense the matter a good deal; and by this time two large open cold; yet the captain was there six or seven hours at a

At last, in December, 1796, the French fleet made its prevented a meeting, the British arms would probably 'He suffered but one boat to approach the ship at a have had a more decisive and less difficult victory than any

'Sir E. Pellew had stood in that morning [Dec. 16,] with the Indefatigable and Revolutionnaire, and at noon where he was again received with shouts. Upon my came in sight of the enemy. At a quarter before five, inquiring who this gailant officer was, I was informed it when they had all got under way, he sent off Captain was Sir Edward Pellew." observe and embarrass their movements. With a boldness which must have astonished them, accustomed though they had been to the daring manner in which he had watched their port-under easy sail, but with studding-sails ready for a start, if necessary-he kept as close as possible to the French admiral, often within half-gun shot; and as that officer made signals to his fleet, he falsified them by additional guns, lights, and rockets. At half past eight, when the French ships were observed coming round the Saintes, he made sail to the north-west, with a light at each mast-head, constantly making signals for Sir J. Colpoys, by firing a gun every quarter of an hour, throwing up rockets and burning blue-lights. At midnight, having received no answer, he tacked, and stood to the southward until six o'clock. Still seeing nothing of the admiral, and reflecting on the importance of conveying the information quickly to England, he gave up the hope of distinction to a sense of duty, and made sail for Falmouth. He ar-

The fate of that fleet-its good fortune in escaping the British, and its disastrous contest with the elements-is well known. One of the two-deckers, Les Droits de l'Homme, after having been blown out of Bantry Bay, had arrived, on the 13th of January, within a few leagues of her own coast, when-late in the evening-Sir Edward Pellew, with the Indefatigable and Amazon, fell in with and immediately attacked her. It was blowing a gale, with a heavy sea: this was in favour of the frigates, as it impeded the line-of-battle ship in the use of her lower-deck guns. The Indefatigable fought her single-handed for more than an hour before the Amazon could come up. The gale and the battle lasted all night. The damage done to the frigates by the heavier metal of the ship, made more serious by the violence of the weather, required all the resources of seamanship to enable them to keep close to the enemy. The action had now lasted eleven hours, when-about five in the morning-the officer and the men who were on the look out in the Indefatigable descried the land through the "At a public dinner given to Sir Edward at Ply- look out in the Indefatigable descried the land through the mouth, immediately after the event, were recited gloom; her course was immediately altered, and the night-some stanzas which are now inscribed on Lord Ex- signal of danger was made to the Amazon, which with the verses were very well—but they are hardly deserving of monumental preservation—except, indeed, the concluding line, which is remarkable for its appropriate vigour and piety:

May thy Redeemer with triumphant arm

VOL. XXVIII. MARCH, 1836.-29

mouth's tomb. For the occasion which produced them, equal promptitude were to the northward. The enemy did

From the cast werek of all things—rescue THER! destructive broadship since the wounded, struck the hull, all the three lower masts were wounded, and an infinity of damage was done to the other spars and an infinity of damage was done to the other spars and son,† the acting-master, by great courage and exertion 157. saved the main-top-mast, and very probably the ship.

The ships were in the Bay of Audierne, [a situation. little to the southward of Brest,] close in with the surf, with the wind blowing a heavy gale dead on the shore, To beat off the land and a tremendous sea rolling in. would have been a difficult and doubtful undertaking for the best and most perfect ship. The Indefatigable had four feet water in the hold, and her safety depended on her wounded spars and damaged rigging bearing the press of sail she was obliged to carry; while the crew, thus summoned to renewed exertion, were already quite worn out with fatigue. The fate of the other ships was certain; for the Amazon had all her principal sails disabled, and the Droits de l'Homme was unmanageable.

'The Indefatigable continued standing to the southward until the captain of the mizen-top gave the alarm of breakers on the lee bow. The ship was immediately wore in eighteen fathom, and she stood to the northward till half-past six, when land was again seen close Humbert, commander of the troops, and three British In-a-head on the weather-bow, with breakers under the fantry Officers* (prisoners), remained on the wreck till the Droits de l'Homme, lying on her broadside in the surf, at the distance of about a mile, but without the possibility Her own situation, of giving the smallest assistance. indeed, was almost hopeless; and Sir Edward Pellew himself was deeply affected when, all having been done which seamanship could accomplish, he could only commit to a merciful Providence the lives of his gallant crew, all now depending upon one of the many accidents to the masts and rigging which there was so taken by the Indefatigable after a chase of twenty-four much reason to apprehend. Happily the sails stood hours. She was bound to Cayenne with prisoners, amongst well; the Indefatigable continued to gain by every tack; and at eleven o'clock, with six feet water in the hold, she passed about three-quarters of a mile to windward of the Penmarcks; enabling her officers and men, 3000l. Sir Edwa d and his officers vied in attention to after a day and night of incessant erxetion, at length to rest from their toil, and to bless God for their deliverance.

The Amazon struck the ground about ten minutes ter she ceased firing. Her crew displayed the admiafter she ceased firing. Her crew displayed the admi-rable discipline which British seamen are accustomed to maintain under such circumstances; more creditable to prize of the crew. them if possible, than the seamanship which saved the Indefatigable. From half-past five until nine o'clock they were employed in making rafts, and not a man moval (no active captain ever considers it an advancement) was lost, or attempted to leave the ship, except six, into an line-of-battle ship, and 'he was complimented with who stole away the cutter from the stern, and were the command of the Impétueux, the most beautiful, and drowned. Captain Reynolds; and his officers remained probably the finest, ship of her class. 'H But Mr. Osler tells by the ship until they had safely landed, first the wounded, and afterwards every man of the crew. Of course they were made prisoners, but they were treated rigging. Mr. Gaze,* a master's-mate, and Mr. Thomp- well, and exchanged not many months after.'-pp. 154-

The fate of the Droits de l'Homme was an awful con-None at this time knew how desperate was their trast indeed to that of the Amazon. Four dreadful days and nights of cold, thirst, hunger, and-the main cause and greatest scourge of all-indiscipline and confusion tortured her miserable crew. When the danger was first seen they gave the alarm to fifty five English prisoners, officers and men, the crew and passengers of a letter-of-marque taken few days before: these seem to have preserved their senses, and to have been mainly instrumental in saving such as were saved. By the close of the third day, nine hundred had perished; on the fourth morning a consultation was held to sacrifice some one to be food for the remainder-the cannibal-die was about to be cast when two vessels approached, and rescued the survivors: of a total number between 1500 and 1600-crew, troops, and prisoners—it would seem that not so many as 400 were saved. Commodore Lacrosse, captain of the ship, General Humbert, commander of the troops, and three British In-Running again to the southward, she passed the last:-they were taken off on the fifth morning, exhausted to the last extreme, but all recovered.

The years 1797 and 1798 were passed in the blockade of Brest and other Channel services, with great perseverance and so much success, that in the course of 1798 alone Sir Edward's squadron took no fewer than fifteen of the enemy's cruizers. One of the captures was of more than common interest. It was La Vaillante, a national corvette, whom were twenty-five priests; and as passengers, the wife and family of an exiled deputy, M. Rovere, who were proceeding to join him, with all they possessed-about he gave them a supply for their immediate wants; to Madame Rovere he restored the whole of her property, and

Sir Edward's standing now required-according to the wise, and indeed necessary, gradation of service-his reprobably the finest, ship of her class.' But Mr. Osler tells us that, before he relinquished his frigate command, he had proposed to the First Lord of the Admiralty to run with his little squadron into Brest hurbour, and destroy the dismantled fleet. If Sir Edward made such a propo-

+ Mr. Thompson afterwards rose to the rank of postcaptain, and married, we believe, a lady of Lord Ex-mouth's family.

*Captain Reynolds one of the earliest and closest friends of Lord Exmouth, perished by a not less distressing shipwreck, that of the St. George, on her return the Impétueux was a third-rate, taken on the 1st of from the Baltic, in the disastrous winter of 1811. She and June, but she cannot be properly said to have belonged the Defence which attended to assist her, were wrecked to a class, for she bore the singular denomination of a 78. on Christmas-day, and only eighteen men of the two Mr. Osler is also occasionally negligent of his dates. It ships were sayed. captain remained at their posts till they sunk from the so often neglect to favour their readers with a running inclemency of the weather—stretched on the quarter date, instead of, or in addition to the running title, deck, hand-in-hand, they were frozen to death together. which latter in such works is quite superfluous.

*One of those, Lieutenant Pipon, published, in the Naval Chronicle, vol. vii. p. 465, a most horribly interesthe who carried the Queen Charlotte in such admirable ing account of this shipwreck. See al-o James, vol. ii. style to her position off Algiers. Lord Exmouth knew p. 16, &c., for a detailed account of this remarkable p. 16, &c., for a detailed account of this remarkable fight and its consequences.

We must take this occasion, once for all, to remark Mr. Osler's repeated negligence in omitting to state the force of the ships he has occasion to mention. mon reader has no means of supplying the deficiency -we have had some little trouble in ascertaining that Rear-Admiral Reynolds and his seems to us surprising that historians and biographers b to to V mai o a b fi of te T es at nitie E fo de conception is, as he admits, 'daring in so high a degree,' have indicated at least the authority on which he has made the statement.

^{*} Mr. Gaze is now master-attendant at Sheerness. That able officer was rewarded for his conduct on this occasion with a master's warrant, and continued with Lord Exmouth to the last day of his public life. It was how to choose his friends, and never deserted them.

Before Pellew left the Indefatigable, he was tried in a new meral opinions which Mr. Osler reports of Sir Edward Pellew, or suggests from himself, as to the causes of, and conduct of Government in, that alarming crisis: we shall confine our notice to Sir Edward's practical treatment of When the Indefatigable was to be under sailing orders submit, and allow the ship to be carried to the eastward.

Again. The ship's company of the Impetueux, which from below to the quarter-deck. belonged to Lord Bridport's fleet, were peculiarly ill affected, and supposed that Sir Edward Pellew had been for turned quietly to their duty. The plot was thus entirely that very reason selected to command them, his frigate disconcerted; for the crews of the other ships, who had not actually mutinied: this impression—and a mis. for the example of the Impétueux, followed her when taken pride—confirmed their spirit of revolt. This false she obeyed the admiral's signal '—p. 189-192. feeling would probably have worn out at sea as they had become better acquainted with their new captain; but, un Gardner's squadron, into the Mediterranean, where Siz of the line, in Bantry Bay :-

Here the bad spirits of the fleet had leisure for mischief, and facilities to communicate with one another. A general mutiny was planned, and the disgraceful distinction of setting the example was assigned to the 54-

con-

lays

and

red

hey

and

ken

heir

ing

ine

lta-

re-

two

otal

pri-

ere

eral

In-

the sted nde verthe

han

tte. our gst the

ere

out to nd, fa-

and

the

the

rent)

ith

nd

elle

he

un

roy po-

the

etii. ble

the

m-cy at

of

It

ers

On Thursday, the 30th of May, at noon, Sir Edward, being engaged to dine with Sir Alan Gardner, had gone who have encouraged your shipmates to the crime by which to dress in his cabin, leaving orders with the officer of they have forfeited their lives, it shall be your punishment to the watch to call all hands at the usual time, one watch hang them. -p. 195. to clear the hawse, and the other two to wash decks. after, signal was made to unmoor, upon which a noise of "No-no-no," was heard from the main hatchway, and the seamen came pressing forward in great num-bers; those in the rear-crying "Go on-go on!" The first lieutenant, Ross, and Lieutenant Stokes, the officer of the watch, demanded what was the matter, and, after some murmuring, was told that there was a letter. The officers asked for it, that it might be given to the captain; but the cry of " No-no-no! was immediately renewed. Lieutenant Ross then desired Lieutenant Stokes to inform the captain, upon which the mutineers shouted, "One and all-one and all!" Edward instantly ran out in his dressing-gown, and of the Channel fleet, and the peace of Amiens soon placed found between two and three hundred on the quarter- her in ordinary, and her captain on half-pay. deck. On his appearance the clamour was increased, sition, we agree with Mr. Osler (p. 175), that it affords a mingled with cries of ' A boat-a boat!" He asked strong presumption that he would have succeeded; but the what was the matter, and was told they had a letter to send to Lord Bridport, complaining of tyranny and hard and so near to 'impossibility,' that we think he ought to usage. He demanded the letter, declaring that he would immediately carry it himself, or send an officer with it to the admiral; but all cried out, " No, no-a boat of our own!" He persisted in his endeavours to pacify them as long as a hope remained of bringing and more difficult duty than he had yet experienced, them to reason, intreating them not to forfeit their cha.

The mutinies broke out. We shall not examine (though racter by such shameful conduct. But when some of But when some of they well deserve the attention of naval authorities) the the ring-leaders declared, with oaths, that they would general opinions which Mr. Osler reports of Sir Edward have a boat, and would take one, he quietly said, "You will, will you?"-gave a brief order to Captain Boys, of the marines, and sprang to the cabin for his sword. The marines, who had previously withstood every atthe cases that occurred to him. The Indefatigable and duty, now displayed that unwavering loyalty and Phobe, Captain Barlow, were lying in Falmouth harbour prompt obedience, for which, in the most trying circumstances, this valuable force has always been distingot under weigh, the lieutenant complained to the captain guished. Sir Edward returned instantly, determined that the men were sulky and would not go round with the to put to death one or more of the ringleaders on the capstan: Sir Edward instantly came forward, and told the spot, but the evident irresolution of the mutineers men that he was aware of their mutinous design—then, drawing his sword, he ordered the officers to follow his example: 'You can never die so well,' he said, 'as on your own quarter-deck in quelling a mutiny; and now, if a man hesitate to obey you, cut him down without a word.' The capenter, in the meantime, ran to Sir Edward's hesitate to obey you, cut him down without a word.' The capenter, in the meantime, ran to Sir Edward's cabin, and brought swords for the officers, who, at the first alarm, had hastened to place themselves at their their officers,' says Mr. Osler,—awed, we should say, by leantain's side. The mutineers, after a moment's hesitheir officers, says Mr. Osler,—awed, we should say, by captain's side. The mutineers, after a moment's hesi-the decision of their captain,—at once returned to their tation, run off the quarter-deck, and threw themselves duty, and the Indefatigable was soon under sail. Not so down the hatchways, exclaiming to put out all lights the Phæbe; Captain Barlow—who wished rather to be sunk in her by the fire of his commodore—was obliged to closely, and soon secured the ring-leaders. Sir Edward sunk in her by the fire of his commodore—was obliged to himself seized one of the most violent, and threatening himself seized one of the most violent, and threatening up him with instant death if he resisted, dragged him up The letter, an unsignhaving been almost the only ship on a home-station which knew nothing of the attempt and its failure, but waited

The Impetueux was immediately ordered, with Lord fortunately, Lord Bridport anchored his fleet, of twenty sail Edward Pellew-in determined opposition to the more temporising policy of Lord St. Vincent, the commanderin-chief-insisted on the trial of the mutineers, of whom there were three capitally convicted and executed. At the moment of execution, Sir Edward addressed a few words, first to his faithful followers from the Indefatigable, and afterwards to the rest of the crew : 'Indefatigables,' he said, stand aside! not one of you shall touch the rope. But you to clear the nawse, and the order was given, it was obeyed by all the wice, and attached to the expedition against Ferrol. To marines, but by scarce any of the sailors. Very shortly Sir Edward Pellew was committed the landing of the army, which he accomplished, after silencing a formidable battery, without the loss of a man; and when the military commander resolved to abandon the attempt, Sir Edward, who took a very different view of the case, entreated to be allowed to lead on with his sailors, for he was satisfied the town would yield. Whether this was rashness, or only a more enlightened and bolder judgment, must remain undecided; but again the whole course of Sir Edward's life inclines us to be of his opinion.

The Impétueux now subsided into the ordinary routine

But his active mind sought for employment, and the character (and we suppose the affluence) which he had pher, Cole, (the youngest brother of his early friend,) who acquired enabled him to aspire to a higher occupation than distinguished himself, in 1810, by the capture of Banda a repetition of his farming adventure. At the general by storm-and was knighted for that brilliant exploit. Sir election of 1802 he was solicited to stand for Barastaple, Edward Pellew had not been long in the East when he and was, after a sharp contest, returned by a great majori- was surprised by the arrival of Sir Thomas Troubridge ty. In the House of Commons, for the short time that he attended it, he took little share-his political predilections more desirable portion of the station. were in favour of Mr. Pitt. and he would therefore have been naturally disposed to give his confidence to Mr. Adhis unwelcome errand, Sir Edward inquired if he had dington, who had lately been by Mr. Pitt's advice placed at brought out his own letters of recall. Finding that the the head of the government: but Mr. Addington had also been one of Sir Edward's carliest friends, so that his pri-them, he declared that till they arrived he could not vate feelings as well as his public principles attached him resign any part of his command; he was charged with to that gentleman; and when Mr. Pitt and his own per-it by the King, and was required by the regulations of sonal friends afterwards appeared disposed to oppose Mr. the service to hold it till recalled by the same authority.

Addington, Sir Edward Pellew disdained to shift his co. Sir Thomas thought that a commission was cancelled lours. He adhered to Mr. Addington to the close of his administration, and preserved for Lord Sidmouth to the last a warm and reciprocal private friendship.

But, next to total inactivity, he disliked the House of Commons, and 'availed himself of the earliest opportunity wit and natural eloquence, and it was much applauded by and upon his own dictatorial responsibility, such judges as Sheridan and Courtenay-the latter of whom said, that as long as eloquence shall consist in cor of all Sir Edward Pellew's actions, but like all the others, rect judgment and forcible expression, it will be admitted it was fully successful. The government at home, though that the gallant officer has shown rhetorical powers of no politically hostile to Pellew, were satisfied by his reasons; ordinary quality."

Sir Edward to the rank of Rear-Admiral of the White, ginal command, and appointing Sir Thomas Troubridge and he was immediately appointed Commander in Chief to that of the Cape of Good Hope, which, however, this

with an order to assume the command of the eastern and

When Sir Thomas went on board the Culloden on Admiralty had overlooked the essential step of sending by a posterior one, without a direct recall; but Sir Edward, who was equalled by few in his knowledge of naval law, found it easy to convince him to the contrary, or at least to refute his arguments.'-p. 229.

This explanation of one of the most critical and questo escape from it :' on the very day when the King's mes, tionable actions of Lord Exmouth's life is, we believe, ensage was delivered, which indicated a renewal of hostilities, lively erroneous. In the first place, there are some formal he solicited employment; and on the 11th March, 1803, errors in this statement, which, however trivial they might was appointed to the Tonnant, 80, in which he hoisted a be on other occasions, are of importance when the whole broad pendant, and with a small squadron, for many ar. case is rested on a mere formality. There is no such thing duous and anxious, though uneventful winter-months block. in the naval service as letters of recall-nor are naval comaded the enemy's squadron in Ferrol. From this duty he missions granted by the King-but, passing over these was recalled for the catenaible purpose of being consulted verbal mistakes, we think we may assert that Mr. Osler is with on the state of our naval defences—at that period a substantially wrong. We remember the affair, and it was most important subject—but with no doubt the ulterior canvassed with great interest at the time, and we never view of having the weight of his opinion in parliament in heard the allegation of any defect of official form. Sir opposition to a motion of censure against Lord St. Vincent Edward's original commission was cancelled not merely and his naval administration, which had been announced by the new commission to Sir Thomas Troubridge for by Mr. Pitt, and which was to be supported by a kind of part of the station, but by another new commission to Sir coalition between him and Mr. Fox. Sir Edward did not Edward himself for the remaining part, and both these deceive the expectation of his friends. Though he had no commissions were from the same authority and in the same personal obligations to Lord St. Vincent, and though he form as the original commission, so that the quibble menadmired Mr. Pitt, he did justice to the former, and could tioned by Mr. Osler would have been absurd. We have not, as a sea-officer, approve the counter-system of naval always understood that Sir Edward Pellew rested his mapolicy proposed by the latter: his speech utterly defeated nifest and perilous disobedience of orders on the high the musquito fleet, as he pleasantly and effectively nick. ground of political expediency—on the force of the enemy named the gun-boat system* which Mr. Pitt had recoming in those seas—on the state of his own preparations for mended; and the opinion of so eminent an officer, fresh opposing that force-neither of which, he alleged, could and triumphant from the practical exercise of his opinions, have been known to the Admiralty at the time they had had in all points of the question its due weight with the despatched Sir Thomas Troubridge to divide the station House and the country, and even-as it appeared by his in which the operations were to be carried on, and the measures when he soon after came into power-on Mr. forces by which only they could be effected. He, accord-Pitt himself. The style of the speech seems to have been ingly, not only retained his entire command, but took, afnot unequal to its matter. We remember to have heard ter a violent contest, the intended commander in-chief, and it spoken of at the time as a strong specimen of mother. the ships that had accompanied him, under his own orders

This was undoubtedly-in our judgment-the boldest dinary quality.'

A general promotion now (April 23, 1804) advanced quarter of the world by continuing Sir Edward in his oriin the East Indian seas. He hoisted his flag in the Cul-gallant officer was doomed never to reach. His ship, the loden, appointed as his captain, Captain, now Sir Christo-Blenheim, had been ashore, and was considered not seaworthy. Sir Edward Pellew entreated him to accept any When Sir Edward Pellew heard one of his naval other ship on the station for his flag, and send the Blenfrigate, and after the 5th of February, 1807-when they friends expatiating on the effect with which gun-boats heim to be docked at Bombay; but Sir Thomas placed a might be employed against a line-of-battle ship, he drily fatal reliance, says Mr. Osler, (p. 233,) on his own judg-replied, I should choose to be in the line-of-battle ment. The Blenheim sailed in company with the Java ship. -p. 216.

parent distress-neither was ever again heard of.

he

ge

nd

ad

he

ng

ot th

of

ed

d-

aу,

18-nal

ht

ole

ng

m-

80

is 18

er

Sir

ly

or

Sir

se

ne

m.

ve

18-gh

ny

for ıld

ad

on

he

d-

af-

nd

ers

est

gh

ıs; at ri-

ge nia he

eany

m-

. g-VB his old acquaintance and former opponent in the Virginie, his phial was gone, and unfortunately he took his candle was again taken in a privateer frigate of thirty-six guns, but of the lanthern to look after it; a spark fell on the after a most gallant defence against the superior force of dried solution, which blazed up and set fire to some comthe St. Fiorenzo, and brought on board the Culloden. The bustible matters, (indeed, what on board ship except the meeting, under such circumstances, was very affecting, guns-is not combustible?) and the ship was in a moment and Sir Edward treated Bergeret with the most friendly on fire, and, we need not add, in the most alarming quarter. and consolatory attention.

them all. On one of these occasions he had the happiness fidence which alone could have saved them. to witness the gallantry of his second son, Captain Fleetwood Pellew, of the Terpsichore, who, with 500 picked ashore, but the evacuation of the Scheldt having given batteries of Batavia.

'The decision of Captain Pellew, which scarcely al-He boarded the Phænix, whose crew quitted her on his approach; turned her guns on the there was an alarm of the enemy's putting to seaother armed vessels; burnt all the shipping, except three merchant-vessels, which were brought away; and in less than two hours returned with the boats, having effected the whole service with no greater loss than one man killed, and four wounded.'-p. 243.

extremity of the Island.

Mr. Osler produces abundant testimony to Sir Edward's less striking, though not less valuable, services in the protection of our immense commerce in those extensive seas. At last, the time of his service having expired, he sailed homewards from India in February, 1809. Off the Isle of France, the Culloden and a fleet of Indiamen under her convoy encountered a violent hurricane-four of the convoy foundered-the Culloden was only saved by great exertion-but before she arrived in England had an even more narrow escape from fire. She had once before been on fire on the coast of Malabar, when the admirable presence of mind of the admiral saved her. The details of this event were related by an eye-witness in the Paisley Advertiser of the 2d February, 1833, which we rather one remarkable fact-at the appalling cry of 'The magazine is on fire!' and before the conduct of the admiral had inspired confidence in the ship's company, about a dozen had jumped overboard—they were picked up—but when the danger was over, Sir Edward caused them to be pun ward had not before an opportunity of displaying:ished at the gangway for their insubordination and pusallanimity. 'We were all,' he said to the offenders, 'in equal diplomatic responsibility was imposed, than the comdanger; but if all had behaved like you, where would have mander in the Mediterranean. It formed by much the been the ship and the lives of all? The second fire hap largest, and most anxious portion of Collinwood's dupened the day before her arrival at Plymouth—a gunner's ties; and the greatness of the trust—the impossibility mate, finding they were near home, thought it high time of confiding it to another than the commander on the (not being it seems a very rapid penman) to prepare a station,—and the uncommon ability with which Collingletter to his wife announcing his return—but ink being uneasiness when the state of that officer's health threat-parted company from Harrier in a gale of wind and ap- were thus employed, some accident (perhaps the roll of the ship) threw down and broke the phial of factitious ink, Of the events of Sir Edward's Indian command we and as the weather was very hot the solution soon dried. shall only mention two. The French Captain Bergeret, When the man returned after service to begin his letter, On this occasion, too, the admiral's conduct was equally While in the Tonnant he had gone in quest of a Dutch prompt, cool, and effective, and those who saw him on both aquadron of three sail of the line and several frigates, des- these occasions, declare that they never were so struck by tined for the East Indies, but was unable to come up with his superiority as in the tranquil and almost indifferent air them. He now found that they had reached Java; and in which he assumed on these trying occasions, and by which his series of judicious operations he captured and burned he imparted to the ship's company that calmness and con-

On his return to England he remained a short time men in the boats of the whole squadron, was sent to de the North Sea squadron a great importance, Sir Edward stroy the Phoenix, a forty-gun frigate, two corvettes, two Pellew was selected to command it, and he hoisted his sloops of 20 guns, and three brigs of 14, which—at the flag on board the Christian VII. The prudence of the sight of the British-had run ashore under the extensive enemy gave him no opportunity for any peculiar exploit. The only anecdote which Mr. Osler gives is one which we quote only to contradict. He states that the northern lowed them time to man their guns, made their fire al. pilots having one day refused, on account of the state of the weather, to take the fleet out of the Downs, when

> ' Pellew then enforced his order to sail, declaring that he would hang the pilot who should run his ship on shore; and to give effect to this threat, he caused gantlets to be rove to the yard-arms. -p. 264.

The line-of-battle ships were taken and destroyed in the Such a menace would have been absurd on the face of it. following year, at Griessee, a fortified harbour at the other and we can venture to state that nothing whatsoever of the kind occurred. The pilots certainly represented the difficulty of the case; but,-they nevertheless promising to do their utmost to secure the safety of the ficet,-Sir Ed. ward with his usual decision, at once took upon himself the whole responsibility. Not even a verbal threat was used, Indeed we wonder that a a man of Mr. Osler's good sense should have repeated so idle a story.

In the spring of 1811 Sir Edward Pellew succeeded Sir Charles Cotton in the Mediterranean command. The magnitude and state of readiness of the Toulon squadron, and the symptons of resistance to the despotism of Buonaparte which began to exhibit themselves on all the European shores of that sea, rendered this now in every point of view the most important of our naval commands. The events are too recent to need, and too various and compliwonder Mr. Osler has not inserted. We notice them for cated to admit, any illustration from us; we must, however, observe that as to this most important part of Sir Edward's life, Mr. Osler seems very imperfectly informed, and gives us very little detail. The following passage is almost all that he says to illustrate a species of merit which Sir Ed.

' Perhaps there was no ambassador on whom a greater wood sustained it, gave the British Government such wanting, he diluted a little gunpowder with vinegar in a phial, which he hung on a nail in the magazine passage, materially in extent and importance after Sir Edward while—it being Sunday—he, with the rest of the ship's company, attended divine worship on deck. While they the French in Russia opened a prospect of deliverance to all the states along the shores of the Mediterranean, presented him with a large and beautiful piece of plate exe-including the southern provinces of France itself. Sir loated in Paris, bearing a medilion of the noble admiral Edward exerted himself unceasingly to prepare them for this consummation, and to encourage them to seize the first opportunity to effect it; and the judgment he displayed in these services obtained from a British Cabinet Minister the declaration that, " Great as he may be as a sea-officer, he is still greater as a statesman.' pp 278, 279.

All this diplomatic honour he would have gladly exchanged for what he called 'one glorious day' with the Toulon fleet; and once or twice he had, by the extraordinary skill and boldness with which the inshore squadron was directed by him, and managed by its officers, a chance of bringing them to action-but the affairs of Buonaparte had now become too critical to allow him to run the risk of a naval defeat, and, accordingly, the magnificent array of twenty-too sail of the line including six large threedeckers-which he had collected in Toulon, remained idle spectators of the waning fortunes of their master. One of the last blows struck was the capture of Genoa by a land-force under Lord W. Bentinck and a squadron of Sir of battle-ships rendered resistance unavailing—the city dom—an outrageous assumption, in which, however, we in our service under the appropriate name of the Genoa .-Thus it was Sir Edward's good fortune to give to the British navy the first prize of the Revolutionary war and the last! and to have received, also, the first and the last title with whom they were actually at war. We do not say of honour which had been conferred for naval services.

Even before his arrival in England he was created Bathe Bath, the Cross of Knight Commander. Some surprise were founded on a principle which she herself always has been expressed, and Mr. Osler seems to share it, that maintained. This and the complicated connexion of the Lord Exmouth did not at once receive the Grand Cross; Barbary states with the Turkish empire, and the fearbut it is to be observed, that in the first instance the se. now so fully justified .-- of disturbing the balance of powcond cross was given to all those officers who had pre- er in the Mediterranean, and of exposing those African and that it was, as Sir Edward Pellew, that he was made, causes which for so long a time inclined England-and anaccording to the general rule, a Knight Commander .-Next year his general services were most properly ac tem of nonintervention with the Barbary states. But our knowledged by the further distinction of the Grand Cross.

tish force in the Mediterranean, and Lord Exmouth was war as slaves, which, though consistent with the ancient again selected for this service, and again he performed law of nations, and still practised by the Arabs and other with his usual prudence and energy all the duties which orientals, had never been admitted by civilized Europe.the position of affairs required or admitted.

Marseilles had shown some disposition to the Bourbons, and Marseilles Brune was marching from Toulon upon that city, avowedly to destroy it. Lord Exmouth on this emergency took upon himself to embark about 3000 men, part of the garrison of Genoa, with which he sailed to Marseilles and landed in time to defeat the intentions of Brune. Forty years before he had landed at Marseilles a poor penniless boy turned out of his ship-he now entered it a British admiral and peer, and, what was still more gratifying to him, a conqueror and deliverer! The inhabitants grateful for their preservation, were unceasing in their attentions to the fleet and army, and, as a mark of Philippe with the strongest personal pleages of sincerity their sense of his important services to their city, they and good faith. Yet see the result!

cuted in Paris, bearing a medallion of the noble admiral and a view of the port of Marseilles, and the Boyne, his flag-ship, entering it full sail, with this simple and expressive inscription-" A l'Amiral Lord Exmouth-La Ville de Marseilles reconnoissante." '-p. 292.

Peace now having been restored on the European continent, the British Government took advantage of the large fleet which had been assembled in the Mediterranean to put a check upon the piratical oppressions of the Barbary powers, 'to which,' says Mr. Osler, 'all the maritime population of the smaller Mediterranean states were continually exposed, while the great naval powers were deterred from exterminating these pirates, either by more pressing concerns, or by the failure of different expeditions which had been attempted.' This is not, we conceive, an exact statement of the case, which was not quite so clear in principle as Mr. Osler seems to think-the Barbary cruisers were indeed commonly called pirates, and undoubtedly their vessels were often, particularly in former times, guilty of piratical practices, but they effected to recognize the theory, at least, of international law, and to Edward's fleet under Commodore Sir J. Rowley. All capture the subjects only of states with which they should the places of strength round the Gulf of Spezzia capitulated, be at war. This principle, which no maritime nation and preparations were making for the attack of the town, could deny, the Barbary states abused by maintaining, from when the arrival of Sir Edward himself with several line-the earliest times, perpetual hostilities against all Cristensurrendered-four gan-brigs were taken, and a fine 64 on fear, Christendom was the first aggressor, for it had from the stocks was completed and launched, and still remains the times of the Crusade professed everlasting war to all infidels. This abuse, however, had been gradually corrected by both parties in modern times, and latterly the Barbary states affected only to capture the subjects of those bona fide at war, for these wars were for the most part only pretexts for piratical practices, and of course were ron Exmouth of Canonteign, a mansion and estate in the made only against the weaker powers. The interests of South of Devon which he had purchased for a family pro. England are so identified with the maintenance of the perty, and the pension was settled on him which is usually maritime right of belligerents, that it was neither her granted when a peerage is conferred for eminent public duty nor her policy to volunteer the redressing of the services. He also received, on the extension of the Order of abuses of a system which did not injure her, and which viously received the distinction of knighthood for service, ports to attempts on the part of France, have been the alogous feelings probably operated with France-to a sysstatesmen had observed these mal-practices with increasing The return of Napoleon from Elba soon required a Bri-disgust, and particularly that of treating their prisoners of Our ministers therefore were, we presume, not sorry when the possession of Malta and the Ionian Islands, and our alliances with Sardinia and Naples, not only gave them

> *The English government seems to have become quite indifferent to the occupation of Algiers by the French, and to have lost sight of all the strange circumstances attending it. Let it, however, not be forgotten, that the Duke of Wellington's ministry—though it could not object to a fair belligerent attack on Algiersinsisted upon and maintained from Charles X.'s government an assurance that it was not to be held as a possession, and that this assurance was repeated by Louis the right, but imposed the duty, of interference; and Lord looked Lord Castlereagh's assertion, which is recorded in Exmouth was accordingly directed, as Mr. Osler states, to the same page, and which seems to us somewhat at variliberation of all Ionian captives as British subjects, and to ing of some explanation when the rest of the debate is so insist on peace between them and Sardinia and Naples, minutely alluded to; our own impression, however, is that and a liberation of captives on exchange or ransom. This Mr. Osler's view of the matter is substantially correct. was easily arranged at Algiers. On proceeding to Tunis, However this may have been, all these proceedings at

is cs-

lle

nhe

in

r-

ne

n-

le-

re

di-

n-

te

he

er e-

to m m-ve m all

reserved by the served by the

ne n-n, it

'accident gave an entirely new character to the subsequent proceedings. Lord Exmouth had directed the interpreter to tell the Bey that it would be very agreeable to the Prince Regent if slavery were abolished; but the interpreter, by mistake, said that the Prince Regent the interpreter, by measure, it. Upon this, the negocia-tion was ansneaded: and the Divan assembled. Lord Exmouth soon became aware of the mistake, and availing himself of the important advantage which it gave him, he allowed them two hours for deliberation, and retired to the consul's house to await the result. fore the time expired, he was sent for, and informed that the Divan had deliberated on his proposal, and would comply with it. Proceeding to Tripoli, he made a similar demand, and it was there submitted to without hesitation,'-p. 299.

had occasion to return to Algiers for another object-to when they got to the ships-the state of the wind rendering it impossible to attack the town-a negociation was sidered by him. commenced, which postponed the question to the result of ulterior communications to be held with the Ottoman P rte and the Cabinet of St. James's, If Mr. Osler's information be correct, and these proceedings were not justified by the English Admiral's instructions, Lord Exmouth did indeed here incur a great responsibility by taking so serious a step in consequence of so slight an accident, and by attempting to vary the basis of the amicable arrangement so recently concluded, and to impose on Algiers the results of the mistake of his interpreter at Tunis. The object in the eye of humanity was so desirable and so consonant with the established international principles of Europe, that it cannot be doubted that Lord Exmonth was fully justified in taking advantage of the disposition in which he found the governments of Tunis and Tripoli: and when he perceived that Algiers was a more difficult task, he seems to have escaped from his difficulty with considerable address. Mr. Osler, after thus stating that Lord Exmouth exceeded his powers, adds, that he was probably indebted for the subsequent approbation of the government at home to a speech made before his return by a member of the House of Commons in reprobation of the Algerine slave-trade. We do not understand why he chooses to conceal the name of the member-Mr. Brougham -but Lord Castlereagh's answer, as we find it in the Parliamentary Debates, seems to imply not only that Lord Exmouth had not exceeded his powers, but that they enabled and authorized him to carry the stipulations to a point beyond what Mr. Osler states; Lord Castlereagh, after refusing to produce the documents called for, as the negociations were not yet concluded, says that the Dey of Algiers had for the first time agreed that the captives should be considered and treated on the European footing as prisoners of war and set at liberty at the conclusion of every peace. —Par. Deb., June 19, 1816.

roceed to the three Regencies to demand the immediate ance with Mr. Osler's statement, and at all events deserv-Algiers turned out to be fruitless, except indeed as to the more accurate knowledge which the sharp-sighted admiral had obtained of the local defences,

On the 23d May, while Lord Exmouth was yet at Algiers, 'the crews of the coral fishing vessels' had landed at Bona to attend mass, it being Ascension-day, when they were attacked by a large body of troops and most barbarously murdered .- p. 306.

As Mr. Osler states this outrage as the grounds of the subsequent expedition against Algiers, he ought to have been a little more particular in explaining an event which led to such important results. What were the coral fishing vessels? were the crews British subjects or allies?had they any right to land to celebrate their mass at Bona? -was it not possible that the excitement which had taken place at Algiers might also have extended to Bona, and This accidental success induced Lord Exmouth-who that the landing of the Christians might have borne the appearance of an attack combined with Lord Exmouth's endeavour to carry the same point there, but he failed; his renewed demonstration of hostility? These are questions, own person and those of his officers who happened to be some of which we know might be satisfactorily answered. on shore, were insulted, and their lives endangered; and but all of which are important to the state of the question as Mr. Osler puts it, and therefore should have been con-

> As Bona is two hundred miles from Algiers, the circumstances of this massacre were not known before Lord Exmouth's departure, though the news reached England a few days before he did; and it seems to have quickened, if it did not create the determination of the government to reject the proposition for settling the slavery question by negociation, and to fit out at once a force which should obtain from the Dey by intimidation, or by actual violence. reparation for the late outrage, and for the future a general and unconditional abolition of Christian slavery for ever, and the substitution in all cases, and for all nations, of the European system of prisoners of war.

This resolution seems to have been communicated to Lord Exmouth the day of his arrival in London-the command of the intended expedition was naturally offered to him, and he as readily accepted it. He had carte blanche for the amount, species and equipment of force which he deemed necessary to the object, and some surprise was excited when he contented himself with five sail of the line. These, with five frigates, four bombs, and five gunbrigs, were commissioned, fitted, and manned with volunteers within a month-an unexampled celerity: within another month the battle was fought; and, to use his own

'My thanks are justly due for the honour and confidence his Majesty's Ministers have been pleased to repose on my zeal on this highly important occasion. The means were by them made adequate to my own wishes, and the rapidity of their measures speaks for itself. Not more than a hundred days since, I left Algiers with the British fleet, unsuspicious and ignorant of the atrocities which had been committed at Bona. That fleet, on its arrival in England, was necessarily disbanded, and another, with proportionate resources, created and equipped; and although impeded in its progress by calms and adverse winds, it has poured the vengeance of an insulted nation, in chastising the cruelties of a ferocious We do not understand how the biographer, who refers to Government, with promptitude beyond example, and and quotes Mr. Brougham's expressions, should have overhighly honourable to the national character, eager to

рр. 432, 433. those under its protection

Mr. Osler mentions—in, we think, too cursorily a way an instacce of magnanimity in Lord Exmouth. Every body unhappily knows how often it has happened when -he would not even reserve the power of doing so.

'He wrote to the Admiralty before he left England, declaring himself fully satisfied with all the arrangements, and taking on himself the responsibility of the result.'-p. 310.

This appears to us as high a trait of moral and political courage as any officer ever displayed. It was equalled by the consummate skill and inspiring bravery with which he conducted the action. In no battle that ever was fought did it fall to the lot of one man and one ship to be so preeminently distinguished as Lord Exmouth and the Queen Charlotte were on that day-every man, every officer, every ship in the fleet did their duty nobly in the several stations assigned them, but Lord Exmouth used his privilege of commander-in-chief to take for himself the LION'S SHARE of the difficulty and danger. The Queen Charlotte led in -and under the admirable guidance of Mr. Gaze-now, and, as his lordship in his public despatch calls him, 'for twenty years, his companion in arms, -was anchored on the very spot which had been designed-within fifty yardof the Mole-head-the very horns of the bull-and with but two feet water to spare. We need not give any account of this so recent and so glorious battle, but we cannot resist presenting what we wonder Mr. Osler should have omitted, a portrait of the personal bearing of the admiral in the naire and graphic description of Mr. Salamé, his Arabian interpreter. Salamé had been sent with a flag of truce for the Dey's answer to Lord Exmouth's ultimatum, in which it had been stated that, if no answer was given within two hours, it would be taken as the signal of hostilities, Salamé waited three hours, and returned without the answer. The signal for action was immediately made; and 'now,' says Salamé, 'on getting on board the flagshin-

'I was quite surprised to see how his lordship we altered from what I left him in the morning, for I knew his manner was in general very mild, but now he seemed to me all-fightful, as a fierce lion which had been chained in a cage and was set at liberty. With all that his lordship's answer to me was-" Never mind-we shall see!" -and, at the same time, he turned towards the officers. saying, "Be ready," whereupon I saw every one standing with the match or the string of the lock in his hand, anxiously waiting for the word "Fire." During this time the Queen Charlotte, in a most gallant and astonishing manner, took, up a position opposite the head of the mole and at a few minutes before three, the Algerines, from the eastern battery, fired the first shot at the Impregnable, which was astern, when Lord Exmouch, having seen only the smoke of the gun, and before the sound reached him, said with great alacrity-" That will do! fire, my fine fellows." I am sure that before his lordship had finished these words our broadside was given with great cheering, which was fired three times within five or six minutes: and at the same instant the other ships did the same. This first fire was so terrible that they say five hundred of the enemy were killed or wounded by it.' - Salame's Expedition to Algiers, p. 39.

Arter describing (with most amusing candour and much good feeling) what he saw of the battle, Salamé proceeds to describe his meeting Lord Exmouth after it was over !-

resent oppression or cruelty, wherever practised upon 'When I met his lordship on the poop, his voice was quite hourse, and he had two slight wounds, one on his cheek and the other on his leg. Before I could pay my respects to him, he said to me in his usual gracious and mild manner:—" Well, my fine fellow, Salame, what think you now?" In reply, I shook hands with expediti no have tailed, that the government and officers his lordship, and said,-" I am rejoiced to see your lordemployed have imputed or insinuated against each other ship safe, and am so much rejoiced with this glorious the blame of the miscarriage-Lord Exmouth would not victory that I am not able to express the degree of my merely have di-dained to avail himself of any such excuse happiness." It was indeed astonishing to see the coat of his lordship how it was all cut up by the musketballs and by grape. It was as if a person had taken a After we had pair of scissors and cut it all to pieces. anchored, his Jordship-having ordered his steward in the morning to keep several dishes ready—gave a grand supper to the officers of the ship, and drank to the health of every brave man in the fleet. We also drank to his lordship's health, and then every body went to sleep like dead men.'-ib. p. 52, &c.

> There are traits of active courage and inspiring confidence in honest Salame's narrative of Lord Exmouth's deportment, which will not have escaped our readers. We shall add one other of Salame's quaint anecdotes :-

'The (Algerine) captain of the port [with whom Salamé was carrying on the negociation which ensued] asked me if this ship (the Queen Charlotte) was the Boyne in which Lord Exmouth had been before at Al-I told him, no; that his ship was a quite new riers. one and never had been in any action before, and that she is called by the name of her majesty our queen. He replied-"Then your queen must be of a very high star," (meaning fortune, because the Mahommedans believe that every body must have a star in heaven,) "since this ship, called by her name, the first day she has been in battle has gained this victory." '-ib. p. 77.

The results of this splendid achievement cannot be better told than in the General Order promulgated by Lord Exmouth himself to the fleet on the 30th August, which we extract from the London Gazette of the 15th September, 1816:-

'The commander-in-chief is happy to inform the fleet of the final termination of their strenuous exertions, by the signature of peace, confirmed under a salute of twenty-one guns, on the following conditions, dictated by His Royal Highness the Prince Regent of

1. The abolition, for ever, of Christian slavery 'II. The delivery, to my flag, of all slaves in the do-minions of the Dey, to whatever nation they may belong, at noon to-morrow.

· 111. To deliver also, to my flag, all money received by him for the redemption of slaves since the commencement of this year, at noon also to-morrow

'IV Reparation has been made to the British Consul for all losses he may have sustained in consequence of ti b si ti li

fu st to be re

his confinement.

V. The Bey has made a public apology, in presence of his ministers and officers, and begged pardon of the Consul, in terms dictated by the captain of the Queen Charlotte.

"The Commander-in-chief takes this opportunity of again returning his public thanks to the admirals, captains, officers, seamen, marines, royal marine artillery, royal sappers and miners, and the royal rocket corps, for the noble support he has received from them throughout the whole of this arduous service; and he is pleased to direct, that on Sunday next a public thanksgiving be offered up to Almighty God for the signal interposition of his Divine Providence during the conflict which took place on the 27th between his Majesty's fleet, and the ferocious enemies of mankind.

We cannot refrain from giving also Lord Exmouth's own account of the action written to his brother in an effusion of fraternal confidence, and never intended for the ditional motto; he received from his own sovereign a gold than any elaborate statement would have.

iy ie, th

d-

us at t-

a din din die k

to ñ.

e

m i] ie l-

wat

e-,) ie 7.

th

B-

s, of

d

al

of

e

n

of

p-v, or a-dee nk

rians. I never, however, saw any set of men more ob-the merits of the brave men who had served under him. rians. I never, however, saw any set of files more stinate at their gons, and it was superior fire only that could keep them back. To be sure, nothing could tive portion of Lord Exmouth's life, that we have room to stand before the Queen Charlotte's broadside. Every add little more than that he was appointed, in 1817, comthing fell before it; and the Swedish consul assures me see her flag towering on high, when she appeared to unemployed! be in the flames of the mole itself; and never was a ship nearer burnt; it almost scorched me off the poop; we were obliged to haul in the ensign or it would have caught fire. Every body behaved nobly. Admiral his family and his friends with a cheerful hospitality— Milnet came on board at two o'clock in the morning, and deficient in nothing suitable to his acquired station, but in kissed my hand fifty times before the people, as did the Dutch Admiral, Van Capellan. 1 was but slightly manners, and the constant modesty and moderation of his touched in thigh, face, and fingers—my glass cut in my hand, and the skirts of my coat torn off by a large shot; but as I bled a good deal, it looked as if I was badly Lords. Mr. Osler, on this subject, falls into the cant, very hurt, and it was gratifying to see and hear how it was received even in the cockpit, which was then pretty precarious wind along shore; and I was quite sure I should have a breeze off the land about one or two in the morning, and equally sure we could hold out that time. it of thunder, lightning, and rain, as heavy as I ever saw. Several ships had expended all their powder, and been supplied from the brigs. I had latterly husbanded, to his brother-350 barrels and 5420 shot, weighing above 65 tons of iron. Such a state of ruin of fortifications and houses mad; and where it will end, the Lord only knows; was never seen, and it is the opinion of all the consuls, but as sure as we live, the days of trouble are very fast that two hours' more fire would have levelled the town, approaching, when there will be much contention, and the walls are all so cracked. Even the aqueducts were broken up, and the people famishing for water. The The sea-defences, to be made effective, must be rebuilt from alty is all our duty, and we shall, no doubt, stick to it." the foundation. The fire all round the Mole looked like Pandemonium. I never saw any thing so grand and so terrific, for I was not on velvet, for fear they would drive on board us. The copper-bottoms floated full of fiery hot charcoal, and were red hot above the surface, so that we could not hook on our fire-grapnels to put the boats on, and could do nothing but push firebooms, and spring the ship off by our warps, as occasion required.'-pp. 336-38.

Lord Exmouth's services, and those of his fleet, were acknowledged as became such a victory; he was created a viscount, with an honourable augmentation to his already so honoured secuteheon, and the word Algiers as an adbance has vanished. VOL. XXVIII. MARCH, 1836 .- 30.

public eye, but which will, we believe, have more interest medals struck for the occasion, and from the kings of Holland, Spain, and Sardinia, the stars of their orders-a 'It has pleased God to give me again the opportunity sword from the City of London; -and, finally-what was of writing you, and it has also pleased him to give likely to please such a man most of all-an unusually success to our efforts against these hordes of barba-large proportion of distinction and promotion acknowledged

mander-in-chief of the Plymouth station, and had the pecuwe killed above five hundred at the very first fire, from the crowded way in which troops were drawn up, four liar satisfaction of exhibiting in the very scene of the most deep above the gun boats, which were also full of men. glorious of his early exploits the final and highest honours I had myself beckoned to many around the guns close of his profession. At the expiration of the usual time he to us to move away, previous to giving the order to fire; struck his flag, and terminated his naval service on the and I believe they are within bounds when they state 1st February, 1821. It was fifty years and three months their loss at seven thousand men. Our old friend John since he had first gone to sea, and in those fifty years, if Gaze was as steady as a rock; and it was a glorious we are not misinformed, there were but eight years—being sight to see the Charlotte take her anchorage, and to the aggregate of four intervals of peace-in which he was

He now resided principally in the pleasant neighbour-

He occasionally attended his duty in the House of inconsistent with his usual candour and good sense, of applanding him for not being a party man. Undoubtedly full. My thigh is not quite skinned over, but I am perfectly well, and hope to reach Portsmouth by the 10th of October. Ferdinand has sent me a diamond star. Wise behaved most nobly, and took up a line-of-battle dividuals-under his pendant or his flag he was of no ship's station ;-but all behaved nobly. I never saw party-but if Mr. Osler means to deny that he had, like such enthusiasm in all my service. Not a wretch shrunk most English gentlemen, strong and faithful political atanywhere; and I assure you it was a very arduous task, but I had formed a very correct judgment of certainly mistaken, and his own work is evidence against all I saw, and was confident, if supported, I should succeed. I could not wait for an off-shore wind to attack; the season was too far advanced, and the landwinds become light and calmy. I was forced to attack politically and personally; and looking still higher, he at once with a lee-shore, or perhaps wait a week for a maintained the strongest opinions on many of what were always called party questions, and was always ready to maintain what he thought the party of the constitution .-He never, we believe, either in the House of Commons or Blessed be God! it came, and a dreadful night with the House of Lords, gave one Whig vote. Amidst the party intoxication which misled and disgraced the country in 1820, he never wavered. During that turmoil he wrote

> 'The fact is, the people are mad; and the world is approaching, when there will be much contention, and much bloodshed, and changes out of all measure and human calculation. You and I have no choice. Loy--pp. 350, 351.

^{*} We cannot but notice the extraordinary skill with which the fac-simile of this medal has been engraved for Mr. Osler's work. It is indeed almost a fac-simile, and the appearance of metallic relief is preserved with an accuracy which could never be attained until this new method of engraving was invented, in France, we believe, within these few years. We cannot give equal tion, which was, during the whole of Lord Exmouth's command of the Conqueror, 74, at Trafalgar. Lord Expolitical life, the touch stone of party, Mr. Osler, after mouth, though he now travelled with difficulty and pain, stating his own very just opinion that it was a great mis- could not refuse himself the melancholy satisfaction of a take to expect peace from concessions extorted by violence, parting visit; their elder brother also came up from Faland calculated only to give increased power to the enemies mouth on this painful occasion; they all met for the last of existing institutions, adds-would become necessary in consequence. He well knew how feeble would be the restraint imposed by any conditions contemplated by the advocates of change; and in allusion to the remark of a nobleman of the highest rank, who had expressed a belief that he would think differently, when he saw the securities which would ac-company the concessions—" Securities!" he said, " it Osler's testimony as to the feelings on the most important is all nonsense! I never yet could see them, and I ne. of all concerns, which inspired and guided this admirable ver shall." While the question was in progress, he man-risibly in all times, but towards the close of his life wrote-" The times are awful, when the choice of two wrote—"The times are awful, when the choice of two exemplarily—when his heart had, as it were, leisure from evils only is left, a threatened rebellion, or the surrent the affairs of the world to develope its natural piety. der of our Constitution, by the admission of Catholics into parliament and all offices. I think even this will not satisfy Ireland. Ascendancy is their object. You may postpone, and by loss of character parry the evil for a short space; but not long, depend upon it. You entered the service, and though such principles and and I may not see it, but our children will, and be feelings could not be supposed then to be very strongly obliged to meet the struggle man to man, which we may fixed, yet he was guarded in his conduct, and always now shirk. By God alone can we be saved from such consequences: may He shed his power and grace upon us as a nation!" '--pp. 132, 133.

And again more recently-

Most painful, therefore, were his feelings, when revolt and anarchy in neighbouring countries were held up to be admired and imitated at home, until a praiseworthy desire of improvement had become a rage for destructive innovation. In a letter written at this time, Nov. 12, 1831, after alluding to his own declining strength, he thus proceeds:—"I am fast approaching that end which we must all come to. My own term I feel is expiring, and happy is the man who does not live to see the destruction of his country which discontent has brought to the verge of ruin. Hitherto thrice happy England, how art thou torn to pieces by thine own children! Strangers, who a year ago looked up to you as a happy exception in the world, with admiration, at this moment know thee not! Fire, riot, and bloodshed, are roving through the land, and God in his displeasure visits us also with pestilence; and in fact, in one short year, we seem almost to have reached the climax of misery. One cannot sit down to put one's thoughts to paper, without feeling oppressed by public events, and the Giver of victory was expressed in a manner the with vain thought of how and when will the evils terminate. That must be left to God's mercy, for I believe man is at this moment unequal to the task." '-pp. 356,

The truth is, that Lord Exmouth was not only a trueborn Englishman-a creature in whose composition party has always been an essential ingredient-but he was also, as our readers have seen, a man of natural sagacity and long experience, who saw the political storm approaching, and for more than thirty years had been a member of and thought that our best chance of weathering it was by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, which resisting all proposals for unseasonable innovations and he joined when the claims of the Society were so little experiments on the fabric, the fittings, or the discipline, of appreciated, that only principle could have prompted the the vessel of the state.

ter an extraordinary exemption from such trials in his threatened. But upon this subject his mind was firm; own family, he lost one of his grandchildren; on that own family, he lost one of his grandchildren; on that that occasion he wrote, 'We have been long mercifully spared: death has at last entered our family, and it behoves to the friend he was addressing, one of his old officers, me all to be waterful? In May following died his connection. us all to be watchful.' In May following died his younger he alludes to the cholera, then raging in his neighbourbrother, Rear-Admiral Sir Israel Pellew, who had shared hood; "which," he says, "I am much inclined to con-

Again, on the state of Ireland and the Catholic ques- guished himself on many occasions, particularly in the time. Lord Exmouth then returned home, never to leave Lord Exmouth held a very decided opinion upon it. He expired on the 23d January, 1833, placid and this point, and foresaw that strong coercive measures grateful, surrounded by his family, in the full possession of his faculties-in the soothing recollection of a glorious and a virtuous life, and in the still higher comfort and hope of a Christian spirit.

We should not do justice to Lord Exmouth's memory, nor to still more sacred interests, if we did not add Mr.

'That moral elevation, not always associated with powerful talent and splendid success, which forms the You most admirable part of Lord Exmouth's character, was feelings could not be supposed then to be very strongly prompt to check any irreverent allusion to serious subjects. His youth was passed in camps and ships, at a time when a coarse and profane conduct too much prevailed, now happily almost unknown; but he was never deterred by a false shame from setting a proper example. On board his first frigate, the Winchelsea, the duties of the Sunday were regularly observed. He always dressed in full uniform on that day, and, having no chaplain, read the morning service to his crew, whenever the weather permitted them to be assembled. Advancing in his brilliant career, the same feelings were more and more strikingly displayed. It was his practice to have a special and general service of thanks-giving after every signal deliverance or success. Too often is it found, that with the accession of worldly honours the man becomes more forgetful of the good Providence from which he received them. From this evil, Lord Exmouth was most happily kept; and additional distinctions only the more confirmed the unaffected simplicity and benevolence of his character. Finally, after the last and greatest of his services, a battle of al most unexampled severity and duration, and fought less for his country than for the world, his gratitude to most edifying and delightful.

But when external responsibilities had ceased to divert his attention from himself, his religious principles acquired new strength, and exercised a more powerful influence. They guided him to peace: they added dignity to his character: and blessed his declining years with a serenity, at once the best evidence of their truth, and the happiest illustration of their power.

'He cherished a very strong attachment to the church; step. It might therefore be expected that he would The closing scene is now arrived. Early in 1832, af- feel deep anxiety, when the safety of that church was much of Lord Exmouth's public service, and had distin- sider an infliction of Providence, to show his power to world will see that his mighty arm is not shortened, nor his power diminished. I put my trust in Him, and not in man; and I bless Him, that he has enabled me to see the

the

Cx. in,

f a

al-

ast

ive

nd of us

pe

ry, dr.

nt

ble

life

OFFE

ith

he

as

rst

nd

rly

IVS ib-

me

ed, er-

le.

of

Der

acore to

ng

he

ice

ord

18-

maf-

al

ht

to

he

di-

les

ful

ig-

th,

h;

of ch

tle

he

ald

as

n;

uost.

ns rs,

urn-

to

noblest triumph. "Every hour of his life is a sermon." confidence of a Christian to his last conflict, and when brilliant and important service, with a death more happy, and not less glorious, than if he had fallen in the hour of victory.'-pp. 353-361.

'They that go down to the sea in ships and occupy their business in the great waters, these men see the works of the Lord and his wonders in the deep !"*

From the Quarterly Review.

- 1. African Sketches. By Thomas Pringle. 12mo. London. 1834.
- 2. Ten Years in South Africa, including a particular Dedon. 1835.

These are interesting books, containing the history of these exiles of Teviotdale attached themselves. experiments in South African colonization, made by two which circumstances had induced them to undertake. We he says :are sorry to say that one of the authors, Mr. Thomas Pringle, died not long after his 'Sketches' were published. He was a man of great worth and of very considerable natural current of the benevolent affections—kind, generusual in persons of their perilous and precarious proous and high of soirit—an enthusiastic philanthronist—fessions. There were numerous groups of pale-visaged ous, and high of spirit-an enthusiastic philanthropistin the purest sense of the all-comprehensive word, a Chris-No one can consider either his earliest or his latest publications without feeling that he had in him some sparks of true genius; and yet such is the hurry and tumult of competition in these our days, that we fear his rangements, and discontented and uncourteous in name, too, may soon be buried and forgotten. We distheir demeanour. Lastly, there were parties of pauper charge a pleasing duty in endeavouring, so far as in us lies, to keep the grass from his tombstone.

contrived, with the noble ambition so usual among that class of men, to give the youth, hopelessly lame from infancy in both his nether limbs, such an education as might qualify him for holding a place in some respectable sedentary profession. He passed through his academical ed of some worldly substance; but that the remaining studies with credit, and on their completion obtained what two-thirds were composed of individuals of a very unno doubt seemed to his friends a situation adequate to all promising description-persons who had hung loose his reasonable hopes—that of a parochial schoolmaster in upon society—low in morals or desperate in circum-his native district. Here, however, he soon wrote some stances. Enterprise many of these doubtlessly poshis native district. Here, however, he soon wrote some poetical pieces, among the rest his 'Scenes in Teviotdale,' which attracted considerable notice, as they well deserved to do; and in a particular manner interested one ever watchful to encourage rising ability—the "Great Minstrel their future conduct and destiny, or of the welfare of the Border." Elevated by such approbation, Mr. Printh se who had collected them in England, and whose

the discontented of the world, who have long been He removed to Edinburgh, devoted himself to literature as striving against the government of man, and are com-mencing their attacks on our church. But they will by any man who did not live to repent it—and, among fail! God will never suffer his church to fall; and the other adventures, became successively the editor of two magazines. The first of these-that which afterwards took the name of its proprietor, the late Mr. Blackwooddifference between improvement and destruction."

Sustained by the principles which had guided him so long, his death-bed became the scene of his best and such a business—we suppose the two men soon discovered. moreover, that their feelings on political subjects were irsaid an officer who was often with him; "I have seen reconcileable. On this rupture, Mr. Pringle assumed the him great in battle, but never so great as on his death- management of a rival journal in the same city, which Full of hope and peace, he advanced with the did not prosper under his superintendence, and has since been abandoned altogether. He, in short, became thoroughnature was at length exhausted, he closed a life of ly disgusted with Edinburgh and with magazines, and was ready to embrace any prospect that might present itself of transferring his energies to a new country and a different species of occupation. In 1819 the government resolved to send out some 5000 new settlers to the Cape of Good Hope, and parliament voted 50,000l. to defray the charges of their conveyance. Mr. Pringle's father, though an old man, still in vigour, and perplexed with the difficulty of providing for half a dozen sons, all of whom, except Thomas, had been educated for agriculture only, was one of not a few heads of families in his condition of life who determined to take part in this enterprise. Thomas readily scription of the Wild Sports of that Country. By Lieut. offered himself to accompany his kindred; and his abilities J. W. D. Moodie, 21st Fusileers. 2 vols. 8vo. Lon- and attainments soon pointed him out as the natural intellectual leader and captain of the emigrant band to which

His description of the whole party, as they appeared respectable persons, both excellently qualified for describ when their disembarkation took place, is very good. Here ing human manners and natural scenery, though neither they are on the beach, waiting for their route from the auof them, we suspect, so well fitted for the practical tasks thorities of Cape-Town. Besides his own Scottish friends,

'There were respectable tradesman and jolly farmers, with every appearance of substance and snug English comfort about them. There were watermen, literary talents: an honest, warm-hearted man, in whom fishermen, and sailors, from the Thames and English woeful physical deformities had been unable to chill the sea-ports, with the reckless and weather-beaten look artizans and operative manufacturers from London and other large towns-of whom, doubtless, a certain proportion were persons of highly reputable character and steady habits; but a far larger portion were squalid in their aspect, slovenly in their attire and domestic aragricultural labourers, sent out by the aid of their respective parishes-healthier perhaps than the class just His father was a small farmer in Roxburghshire, who mentioned, but not apparently happier in mind, nor less generally demoralized by the untoward influence of their former social condition. On the whole, they formed a motley and unprepossessing collection of people. I should say that probably about a third part were persons of real respectability of character, and possesssessed in an emin at degree; but too many appeared to be idle, insolent, and drunken, and mutinously disposed towards their masters and superiors. And with such qual ties it was not possible to augur very favourably of gle began to look on his position as unworthy of him. success in occupying the country depended entirely on their steady industry.'-pp. 130, 131.

This band, the first detachment of the 5000, arrived in ^{*} Psalm cvii. 23.

a lively and picturesque narrative of the fortunes of Mr. Pringle and his immediate connexions down to 1827, when he returned to England. 'The volume affords, moreover, a great deal of curious and highly-interesting information concerning the state of society and mauners, with many beautiful transcripts both in prose and in verse of external ecenery in the wild and remote district where the author found his allotted dwelling-place, and which it would have been happy for him if he had never abandoned.

The Teviotdale detachment presently had their location assigned them,-and with Pringle in the van, after a fatiguing journey of several hundred miles, they at length that followed:

reached it in safety :-

At length, after extraordinary exertions and hairbreadth escapes-the breaking down of two wagons and the partial damage of others-we got through the last poort of the glen, and found ourselves on the summit of an elevated ridge, commanding a view of the extremity of the valley. " And now, mynheer," said the Dutch-African field-cornet who commanded our escort, " daar leg uwe celd-there lies your country." in the direction where he pointed, we beheld, extending to the northward, a beautiful vale, about six or seven miles in length, and varying from one to two in breadth. It appeared like a verdant basin, or cul de sac, surrounded on all sides by an amphitheatre of steep and sterile mountains, rising in the back-ground into sharp cuneform ridges of very considerable elevation-their summits being at this season covered with snow, and estithe bottom of the valley, through which the infant river meandered, presented a warm, pleasant, and secluded aspect-spreading itself into verdant meadows, sheltered and embellished, without being encumbered, with " Sae quaggas-pasturing in undisturbed quietude. that's the lot o' our inheritance, then?" quoth one of maun say the place looks no sae mickle amiss, and may suit our purpose no that ill, provided thae haughs turn out to be gude deep land for the pleugh, and we can but contrive to find a decent road out of this queer hiecountry." '-p. 152.

It was on a Saturday evening that they first outspanned (i. e. unyoked) on the turf of the valley to which Pringle gave the name of Glen-Lynden. The account of the next day is in our author's best manner.

Having selected one of the hymns of our national church, all united in singing it to one of the old pathetic melodies with which it is usually conjoined in the sab-bath worship of our native land. The day was bright and still, and the voice of psalms rose with a sweet and touching solemnity among those wild mountains, where the praise of the true God had never, in all human probability, been sung before. The words of the hymn (composed by Logan) were appropriate to our situation, and affected some of our congregation very sensibly :

"O God of Bethel! by whose hand thy people still are fed:

Who through this weary pilgrimage hast all our fathers led:

Through each perplexing path of life our wandering footsteps guide;

provide :-

the colony early in 1820; and the 'African Sketches' give O! spread thy covering wings around, till all our wanderings cease,

And at our Father's loved abode our souls arrive in peace.'

'While we were singing, an antelope (oribi), which appeared to have wandered down the valley without observing us, stood for a little while on the opposite side of the rivulet, gazing at us in innocent amazement, as if yet unacquainted with man, the great destroyer. On this day of peace it was, of course, permitted to depart unmolested. --pp. 156, 157.

Such was their first peaceful Sunday,-now for the night

'The night was extremely dark, and the rain fell so heavily that, in spite of the abundant supply of dry firewood which we had luckily provided, it was not without difficulty that we could keep one watch-fire burning. Having appointed our watch for the night, (a service which all the male adults, masters as well as servants, agreed to undertake in rotation,) we had retired to rest, and, excepting our sentinels, were all buried in sleep, when about midnight we were suddenly roused by the roar of a lion close to our tents: it was so loud and tremendous, that for a moment I actually thought a thun-derstorm had burst upon us. But the peculiar expression of the sound-the voice of fury as well as of power instantly undeceived me; and instinctively snatching my loaded gun from the tent pole, I hurried out, fancying that the savage beast was about to break into our camp. Most of our men had sprung to their arms, and were hastening to the watch-fire with a similar apmated to be from 4000 to 5000 feet above the level of prehension. But all around was utter darkness; and the sea. The lower declivities were sprinkled over, scarcely two of us were agreed as to the quarter whence though somewhat scantily, with grass and bushes. But the voice had issued. This uncertainty was occasioned the hottom of the valley, through which the infant river partly perhaps by the peculiar mode this animal often has of placing his mouth near the ground when he roars -so that the voice rolls, as it were, like a breaker along the earth : partly, also, to the echo from a mountainrock which rose abruptly on the opposite bank of the groves of mimosa trees, among which we observed in rock which rose abruptly on the opposite bank of the distance, herds of wild animals—antelopes and river; and, more than all, to the confusion of our senses in being thus hurriedly and fearfully aroused from our slumbers. Had any one retained self-possession suffithe party. "Aweel, now that we've really got till't, I cient to have quietly noticed our looks on this occasion, I suspect he would have seen a laughable array of pale or startled visages. The reader who has only heard the roar of the lion at the Zoological Gardens, can have but a faint conception of the same animal's voice in his state of freedom and uncontrolled power. Novelty in our case, no doubt, gave it double effect on our thus hearing it for the first time in the heart of the wilder-ness. However, we resolved to give the enemy a warm reception; and having fired several volleys in all directions round our encampment, we roused up the half-extinguished fire to a roaring blaze, and then flung the flaming brands among the surrounding trees and bushes. And this unwonted display probably daunted our grim visiter, for he gave us no further disturbance that night.' pp. 158, 159.

The party being mostly composed of expert and sturdy sheep-farmers, were well qualified for encountering the difficulties of their new position. At first they were sorely annoyed by the wild beasts, and still more so by the predatory visits of Caffres and Bushmen; but brave hearts and strenuous hands eventually triumphed over these and all other enemies. As for Thomas Pringle himself, he was the schoolmaster, the account-keeper, the lay-chaplain, and moreover he was the chief carpenter and upholsterer

of Glen-Lynden.

'I found employments to occupy my leisure time agreeably. I had brought out a little assortment of carpenter's tools, the use of which, when a boy, had Give us each day our daily bread, and raiment fit been one of my favourite amusements. I was therefore not altogether unprepared to act the Robinson Cruof my garden. After being properly plastered and ing a sphere more worthy of his talents in the capital of paved within, it proved an excellent oven, and served the colony. all the hamlet to bake their household bread in for a couple of years.'-pp. 167.

He again alludes to this oven in some pleasing verses, entitled 'The Emigrant's Cabin,' which present us with a by no means unsavoury bill of fare :-

- First, here's our broad-tailed mutton, small and fine, The dish on which nine days in ten we dine Next, roasted springbok, spiced and larded well; A haunch of hartebeets, from Hyndhope Fell; A paauw, which beats your Norfolk turkey hollow; Korhaan, and Guinea-fowl, and pheasant follow;
- 'Kid carbonadjes, á-la-Hottentot, Broil'd on a forked twig; and peppered hot With Chili pods, a dish called Caffer-stew; Smoked ham of porcupine, and tongue of gnu. This fine white household bread (of Margaret's baking) Comes from an oven too of my own making, Scoop'd from an ant-hill. Did I ask before If you would taste this brawn of forest-boar?
- Our fruits, I must confess, make no great show : Trees, grafts, and layers must have time to grow. But here's green roasted maize, and pumpkin pie, And wild asparagus. Or will you try A slice of water-melon-fine for drouth, Like sugar'd ices melting in the mouth-?
- But come, let's crown the banquet with some wine What will you drink? Champagne? Port? Claret? Stein? Well, not to teaze you with a thirsty jest, Lo, there our only vintage stands confest, In that half-aum upon the spigot-rack; And, certes, though it keeps the old Kaap smaak, The wine is light and racy; so we learn, In laughing mood, to call it Cape Sauterne.'

Pringle, in a word, was the chief man of the settlementand, whenever there was no particular pressure of business, he could mount his horse, and give still more pleasure than British neighbours, missionaries, and others, of this pichome, and his frequent excursions, convey the impression, have continued all his earthly days at Glen-Lynden? any change. Persons born and reared in a humble class paper had stripped him of property worth 1000L of society, who attract any notice beyond that sphere by their literary attainments, may be easily excused if they pears to have dealt kindly by Mr. Pringle. He understood come to take rather too high an estimate of their own im- well the views and tempers of colonial adventurers of all portance. Acquirements and performances which, how- classes; and respecting the intentions of the man, was litever meritorious, would not in a higher circle of life excite the disposed to think harshly of his imprudences. any thing like astonishment, are in their case regarded at as much for Pringle as he could have done without achome, and by all the immediate personal observers, as tual injustice to the much-calumniated Governor, who things almost out of the usual course of nature. The fa- would fain have continued to be Pringle's benefactor.

soe in a small way; and, besides commodiously fur-I dazzled and inflated. Such had been the fate of Pringle nishing my own cabin, I succeeded in manufacturing a in his Roxburghshire valley, and such was once more his rustic arm-chair and table for my father—an achievemisfortune among the simple hinds and rude boors of his ment of which I was not a little proud. But my chef Cafferland exile. He grew weary of the pastoral life, and d'auvre at this time was the construction of an oven-which I contrived to scoop out of a huge ant-hill, that happened to stand under an old mimosa-tree at the head described, and quitted 'Glen-Lynden' in the hope of find-

The Governor, Lord Charles Somerset, to whom at his first coming Mr. Pringle had been warmly recommended by Sir Walter Scott, and who had consequently favoured him and his friends very bountifully as respected their 'location,' was now well disposed to remember that introduction-and his lordship, when Pringle reached Cape Town, gave him the appointment of librarian to the public library, and moreover promised to patronize him strenuously in the school which he had resolved to set up. Pringle accepted the librarianship, of which the duties were light, and the emoluments not inconsiderable, and his school, under such protection, throve and prospered for a season. He was again, and for the third time, in possession of that chance which mostly comes but once to any man in our busy and bustling age; but once more poor Pringle was visited by the demon of restless ambition, and once more he threw the chance away. He set up first a magazine and then a newspaper, in which, by degrees, his wellmeant but narrow-minded views of colonial policy began to show themselves, so as to displease and even alarm the local government. He attacked the slave-system of the Cape, which wanted indeed improvement, but which the circumstances of the colony rendered extremely unfit to be the weekly and monthly theme of such discussion on the spot; nay, these journals began to develope views of a far more dangerous description still, hinting perpetually, if not openly announcing the belief, that no real good need be looked for at the Cape until the population should be represented fairly in a free South-African parliament. Any man who from a distance contemplates the past history of that colony, the recent date of its acquisition by us, and the utter want of all sympathy and cohesion down to this hour between the various classes of its population, Aboriginal, Dutch, and English, will smile at such a scheme; he will consider it as only less wild and ridiculous than that which has since been put into agitation for a free parliament (an upper house, we suppose, included) at Botany Bay. But Mr. Pringle had eyes for none of these difficulties; or rather, we suspect, certain cunning he received by making a progress among his hospitable local intriguers, whose views went far beyond his, were able to blind him by flattery. He persisted; lost his lituresque frontier; and his accounts, both of his life at brarianship; found his school dwindle to nothing; grew more bitter, and infused hourly increasing rancour into throughout several chapters, of a mind variously stimula- his newspaper, until that was at length summarily supprested, active, and happy. Thus occupied and amused, thus sed. He then, considering himself as the pure martyr esteemed and honoured, why might not this amiable man of philanthropy and freedom, returned to this country, and claimed compensation from the Colonial Office for what But no-all these things, after a season, lost their relish he called the tyrannical injustice of Lord Charles Somer--once more Pringle became discontented and ready for set's proceedings. He alleged that the breaking up of his

The late Lord Bathurst, then Colonial Secretary, aptal word 'genius' is rung about the village, and the clearest a word, the Earl very intelligibly signified, that if he head and the humblest heart run a great risk of being chose to return to the Cape, resume his position at Glen-

ht 50 .

n-

in ch

de 28

n

irt

hıg. ts, st, ep, he

-97 ın-68er hut. ito

ns, nd ice ed en ars

ng inhe ses me flion. ale he

ve his in ius errm ecex-

the es.

im

at. rdy the ely oreirts

and he ain, erer

me of reru-

Lynden, and remain there quietly for a time, the government at home would keep him in mind, and embrace some early opportunity of serving him. But this did not satisfy Pringle; he remained in London-piled memorial on memorial, all in vain-and at length found an establishment in the city as Secretary to one of the Anti-Slavery Societies. Devoted to the duties of this new office, it was only in connexion with them that for some years he had ever been heard of, until shortly before his death these 'Sketches' were published. We presume their appearance followed immediately the dissolution of the Anti-Slavery Society, which again threw him on his literature for daily support. But he was, by this time, less than ever qualified for the anxious existence of a mere literary adventurer in a great capital. His health, never strong, began to give way; he sickened and died—we believe in about the forty-fifth year of his age—early in the spring of this year; and it is at once sad and pleasing to have to relate that his long illness was relieved of much misery that must otherwise have overclouded it, by the ever-ready bountifulness of that admirable institution, The Literary Fund of London. A gentler or kinder heart has not often been stilled. His history abounds in matter of encouragement for persons of his original class, but not less surely in matter of

He wrote many verses while in Africa,—and by these he will be, at all events remembered among the colonists; but he little deserves to be forgotten elsewhere. What strikes us as most remarkable in Pringle's poetry is its almost constant elegance. Nothing could be more remote from the image of conventional elegance than the appearance, the manners, the spoken language even, of the man himself: yet there is rarely in his prose, and almost never in his verse, anything with which the most fastidious reader can have the smallest right to be offended. We think the following lines in their style almost faultless:—

'The sultry summer-noon is past;
The mellow evening comes at last,
With a low and languid breeze
Fanning the mimosa trees
That cluster o'er the yellow vale,
And oft perfume the panting gale
With fragrance faint: it seems to tell
Of primrose-tufts in Scottish dell,
Peeping forth in tender spring
When the blithe lark begins to sing.

'But soon, amidst our Libyan vale,
Such soothing recollections fail;
Soon we raise the eye to range
O'er prospects wild, grotesque and strange;
Sterile mountains, rough and steep,
That bound abrupt the valley deep,
Heaving to the clear blue sky
Their ribs of granite, bare and dry,
And ridges, by the torrents worn,
Thinly streaked with scraggy thorn,
Which fringes Nature's savage dress,
Yet scarce relieves her nakedness.

'But where the Vale winds deep below,
The landscape hath a warmer glow:
There the spekboom spreads its bowers
Of light-green leaves and lilac flowers;
And the aloe rears her crimson crest,
Like stately queen for gala drest;
And the bright-blossomed bean-tree shakes
Its coral-tuits above the brakes,

Brilliant as the glancing plumes Of sugar-birds among its blooms, With the deep-green verdure blending, In the stream of light descending.

'And now, along the grassy meads, Where the skipping reebok feeds, Let me through the mazes rove Of the light acacia grove; Now while yet the honey-bee Hums around the blossomed tree; And the turtles softly chide Wooingly on every side; And the clucking pheasant calls To his mate at intervals; And the duiker at my tread Sudden lifts his startled head, Then dives affrighted in the brake, Like wild-duck in the reedy lake.

'My wonted scat receives me now—
This cliff with myrtle-tufted brow,
Towering high o'er grove and stream,
As if to greet the parting gleam.
As if to greet the parting gleam.
With shattered rocks besprinkled o'er,
Behind ascends the mountain hoar,
Whose crest o'erhangs the Bushman's Cave,
(His fortress once, and now his grave,)
Where the grim satyr-faced baboon
Sits gibbering to the rising moon.
Or chides with hoarse and angry cry
The herdsman as he wanders by.

'Spread out below in sun and shade, The shaggy glen lies full displayed-Its sheltered nooks, its sylvan bowers, Its meadows flushed with purple flowers; And through it like a dragon spread, I trace the river's tortuous bed. Lo there the Chaldee-willow weeps, Drooping o'er the headlong steeps, Where the torrent in his wrath Hath rifted him a rugged path, Like fissure cleft by earthquake's shock, Through mead and jungle, mound and rock. But the swoln water's wasteful sway, Like tyrant's rage, hath passed away; And left the ravage of its course Memorial of its frantic force. Now o'er its shrunk and slimy bed Rank weeds and withered wrack are spread, With the faint rill just oozing through, And vanishing again from view; Save where the guana's glassy pool Holds to some cliff its mirror cool, Girt by the palmite's leafy screen, Or graceful rock-ash, tall and green, Whose slender sprays above the flood Suspend the loxia's callow brood In cradle nests with porch below, Secure from winged or creeping for Weasel or hawk, or writhing snake; Light swinging as the breezes wake, Like the ripe fruit we love to see Upon the rich pomegranate-tree.

'But lo, the sun's descending car Sinks o'er Mount-Dunion's peaks afar; And now along the dusky vale The homeward herds and flocks I hail, Returning from their pastures dry Amid the stony uplands high. First, the brown Herder with his flock Comes winding round my hermit-rock; His mien and gait and vesture tell, No shepherd he from Scottish fell; For crook the guardian gun he bears, For plaid the sheep-skin mantle wears; Sauntering languidly along, Nor flute has he, nor merry song, Nor book, nor tale, nor rustic lay, To cheer him through his listless day. His look is dull, his soul is dark; He feels not hope's electric spark; But, born the White Man's servile thrall, Knows that he cannot lower fall.

Next the stout Next-herd passes by, With bolder step and blither eye; Humming low his tuneless song, Or whistling to the horned throng. From the destroying foeman fled, He serves the Colonist for bread : Yet this poor beathen Bechuan Bears on his brow the port of man: A naked, homeless exile he, But not debased by Slavery.

' Now, wizard-like, slow Twilight sails With soundless wing adown the vales, Waving with his shadowy rod The owl and bat to come abroad, With things that hate the garish sun, To frolic now when day is done. Now along the meadows damp The enamoured fire-fly lights his lamp; Link-boy he of woodland green, To light fair Avon's Elfin Queen: Here, I ween, more wont to shine To light the thievish porcupine, Plundering my melon-bed,-Or villain lynx, whose stealthy tread Rouses not the wakeful hound As he creeps the folds around.

But lo! the night-bird's boding scream Breaks abrupt my twilight dream; And warns me it is time to haste My homeward walk across the waste, Lest my rash tread provoke the wrath Of adder coiled upon the path, Or tempt the lion from the wood, That soon will prowl, athirst for blood. Thus, murmuring my thoughtful strain, I seek our wattled cot again.'

pp. 21-27.

Pringle, however, could sound a more stirring note. No one who ever conversed with him but must have been struck with the sudden fire which could occasionally flash from his soft, large, benignant eye; never was a countenance more indicative of manly mettle than his, when there was any thing to call forth such expression. But What a glorious lion!—what sinews—what claws we really could have formed no notion, until we read these Sketches, of the gallant and heroic daring of which Pringle, in his own feeble person, was capable, when thrown among scenes of excitement and peril; or how well his with the spoils of the leopard and buffalo bull, verse could keep pace with such ardours. Small, weak, and distorted as he was, utterly helpless in case of the And talk of our deeds o'er a flask of old wine.'—pp. 28-31.

most trivial accident to the horse he mounted, Pringle could never be kept from taking his fair share in thos most hazardous expeditions after elephants and lions which formed the most lively feature in the life of the Glen-Lynden settlers. We have not room for his prose sketches of such doings, though they are extremely good, but must not pass over the following lyric, in which, we think, every one will agree with us that Pringle has caught and transferred to a far different scene not a little of the old Border

'Mount—mount for the hunting—with musket and spear! Call our friends to the field, for the Lion is near! Call Arend and Ekhard and Groepe to the spoor; Call Muller and Coetzer and Lucas Van Tuur.

Ride up Eildon-Cleugh, and blow loudly the bugle: Call Slinger and Allie and Dikkop and Dugal; And George with the elephant-gun on his shoulder,-In a perilous pinch none is better or bolder.

In the gorge of the glen lie the bones of my steed, And the hoofs of a heiter of fatherland's breed; But mount, my brave boys! if our rifles prove true, We'll soon make the spoiler his ravages rue.

'Ho! the Hottentot lads have discovered the track-To his den in the desert we'll follow him back : But tighten your girths, and look well to your flints, For heavy and fresh are the villain's foot-prints.

Through the rough rocky kloof into grey Huntly-Glen, Past the wild olive-clump where the wolf has his den, By the black eagle's rock at the foot of the fell, We have tracked him at length to the buffalo's well.

Now mark yonder brake where the blood-hounds are howling:

And hark that hourse sound-like the deep thunder growl-

"Tis his lair-'tis his voice !- from your saddles alight; He's at bay in the brushwood, preparing for fight.

Leave the horses behind-and be still every man: Let the Mullers and Rennies advance in the van: Keep fast in your ranks ;-by the yell of yon bound, The savage, I guess, will be out with a bound.

'He comes! the tall jungle before him loud crashing, His mane bristled fiercely, his fiery eyes flashing; With a roar of disdain he leaps forth in his wrath, To challenge the foe that dare 'leaguer his path.

He couches-ay now we'll see mischief I dread: Quick—level your rifles—and aim at his head: Thrust forward the spears, and unsheath every knife-St. George! he's upon us!-Now fire, lads, for life!

He's wounded-but yet he'll draw blood ere he falls-Hah! under his paw see Bezuidenhout sprawls-Now, Diederik! Christian! right in the brain Plant each man his bullet-Hurra! he is slain!

Bezuidenhout-up, man !- 'tis only a scratch-(You were always a scamp, and have met with your match !) And seven-feet-ten from the rump to the jaws!

settlement :-

ance, have also lately joined them.

duly and purely maintained among them. They have altogether. Such, or nearly similar, was, in all likelihood, now a parish minister (the Rev. Alexander Welsh, a clergyman of the Scottish Church) established in the valley of Glen-Lynden, with a decent stipend from the Government, augmented by their own voluntary contributions. tributions.

On the whole, I have great cause to bless God, both as regards the prosperity of my father's house, and in many respects also as regards my own career in life, (whatever may be my future worldly fortunes,) that His good Providence directed our emigrant course fourteen years ago to the wilds of Southern Africa.'-p. 498.

honour the name of Thomas Pringle.

pressure of debts, that they were obliged to make up their minds to part with the extensive property in that remote!

We subjoin the last paragraph of this interesting volume region which had descended to them from the period of it gives us the author's general view of the Glen-Lynden Norse dominion. But how the debts and difficulties had accumulated to this grievous extent he does not explain, Under the blessing of Providence, its prosperity has nor had we any particular right to expect that he should been steadily progressive. The friends whom I left there, do so. We know nothing from any other source of the though they have not escaped some occasional trials and particular case; but we are but too well acquainted with disappointments-such as all men are exposed to in this the causes of the ruin that about that time overtook many uncertain world-have yet enjoyed a goodly share of of the most ancient and distinguished families in the "health, competence, and peace." As regards the first of Hebridean and Orkney Islands, as well as on the other these blessings, one fact may suffice: Out of twenty-three Highland coasts of Scotland, and the kindred shores of souls who accompanied me to Glen-Lynden fourteen years Connaught and Ulster. The high price of kelp during the ago, there had not, up to the 24th of January last, occur- war swelled their rentals to an amount of which their red (so far as I know) a single death-except one, namely, forefathers never had had the remotest anticipation. The that of Mr. Peter Rennie, who was unfortunately killed by rise was of the same kind with that in agricultural rentals the bursting of a gun, in 1825. My father, at the patri-throughout the kingdom generally, but far more extravaarchal age of eighty years, enjoys the mild sunset of life gant. Like the other landlords of the time, these gentlein the midst of his children and grand-children; the latter, men accommodated their modes of living to this extraorof whom there is a large and rapidly increasing number, dinary change; but the imprudence was more than usually having been, with a few exceptions, all born in South Af-absurd on their part, in consequence of the obviously frail The party have more than doubled their original tenure on which the increased annual income depended. numbers, by births alone, during the last twelve years. When the peace disturbed their fragile monopoly, they did Several additional families of relatives, and old acquaint not at once comprehend that it was in reality gone for ever, at least for their life-time; and they continued to live Without having any pretensions to wealth, and with on as they had done during the war, in the vain hope of very little money among them, the Glen-Lynden settlers better days coming back to them. But, indeed, it would may be said to be in a thriving, and, on the whole, in a not have been easy, even for the most prudent persons in very enviable condition. They are no longer molested their situation, to change their habits suddenly. A young by either predatory Sushmen or Caffers;—they have generation, unaccustomed to the frugal manners of the abundance of all that life requires for competence and old time, had grown up—new houses had been built, on for comfort; and they have few causes of anxiety about the scale of great English mansions—the whole arrangethe future. Some of them, who have now acquired ments of every domain, as well as household, had been framed according to the luxurious style of modern Engrospect of attaining by degrees to moderate wealth. They have excellent means of education for their chillish life. It costs years of struggling and shifting before they have excellent means of education for their chillish life. dren; they have a well-selected subscription library of the stern hand of necessity was able to enforce its painful about four hundred volumes; and, what is still more lessons; and in numerous and notorious instances the important they have the public ordinances of religion ancient property in the soil had at last to be abandoned

> By stack, and by skerry, by noup, and by roe, By sir, and by wick, and by helyer, and gio, And by every wild shore which the northern winds know.'s

The young laird of Mailsetter, his land having been disposed of, determined on removing to the Cape colony; With these words this amiable man closes his volume, and he assembled about him some two hundred Scotch He had, before his last illness overtook him, resolved on families of the common sort, who were willing to place making his way back to Glen-Lynden, never again to be themselves under his guidance, and who entered into regutempted out of that dear retirement; and we believe his lar indentures, by which, in return for the expenses of their wife and children are ere now on their way to rejoin there exportation and outfit, they bound themselves to work for the affectionate kindred whose remote descendants will Mr. Moodie on a certain fixed rate of wages, during a certain number of years after their arrival in South Africa, We now come to the work of Lieutenant Moodie, of or to buy up their indentures at a reasonable rate, also the 21st Fusileers, who, like Pringle, left this country for fixed and determined beforehand. The ex-laird, however, the Cape, in 1819, and, like him, abandoned the colony made a sad mistake in this matter, or rather a whole heap after a residence and struggle of ten years. This gentleman, however, had no immediate connexion with the own part of Scotland, but from the neighbourhood of Government scheme for which 50,000l. were granted by Edinburgh; and thus, neither had they that attachment Parliament in the year above-mentioned. His attempt and respect for his person which he would probably have was dependent on the isolated experiment of the family to found in a similar congregation of Orcadians, nor had be which he belongs—a family which had for ages held a that intimate acquaintance with their manners and habits high station among the gentry of the Orkney Islands.

The lieutenant informs us, that soon after the peace of nial settlement. Moreover, while they had no habitual 1815, his family found their resources so straitened by the veneration for him, they were closely allied with each other

t a covide of the west Lde gw

^{*} Pirate, vol. i. p. 344.

temptation with himself, the austere and sanctimonious in all but a very few cases, the result.

of

ad in.

ald he

ith

nv

the

her

of the

eir

he als

va-

tle-

or-

lly

rail

led.

did

for live

of

pla

in

ing the

on

ge-

een

ng-

ore

nful

the

ned

ood,

r to

the

inds

een

ny;

otch

lace

egu-

heir

for

g a rica,

also

ever,

heap

his

i of

nent

have

l he bits

colo-

itual

ther

Mr. Moodie had not been long in South Africa before the great majority of his people broke all their contracts, abandoned him for ever, and scattered themselves over the vast colony-wherever they could get good wages-without the least regard to his interests, and in such a manner as to baffle him and his agents most completely. The laird, however, was not wholly out of his element as the master of a huge grazing district, in whatever part of the world it might be placed: some of his people did keep their faith, and by their assistance, and that of Hottentots hired in the room of the fraudulent fugitives, he by degrees overcame the worst difficulties of his new position. His country education and previous habits were in no small degree adapted to the colonial existence-his old experience as a justice of peace was found valuable-and he have earned for himself great personal consideration among all classes of his neighbours. So much for the laird.

His two younger brothers—the one a naval, the other a military officer-had both been reduced to half-pay about the same time when his rental sustained its cruel reduction. These gentlemen no sooner heard of his African scheme than, from opposite points of the compass, they both hastened to join him in his new location of the penates; and the soldier it is whose narrative now lies before us.

The laird was near enough failing: we have noticed some of the circumstances to which he owed his escape; but perhaps the main secret, after all, was that, however reduced, he had still some considerable capital at his back. The cadets wanted this important ally, as well as his habits of rural life and practical acquaintance with farming and grazing operations. Under such circumstances, one would naturally expect to find them placing themselves under the elder brother's experienced eye, and as near him as possible; but though the whole book seems full of proofs of strong fraternal affection among the three Moodies, such was not the case. Even the soldier and sailor, though they pitched their tents together for a time, soon parted company also. The latter is now, it appears, settled in a respectable station in the civil service of the colony-we infer that, in some way or other, all his farming attempts had failed before he solicited such employment. As for our author, the gallant Fusileer, his book contains a very full and particular account of all his ups and downs; but we must be contented with mentioning two of the leading occurrences.

First, then, the grant of land which he originally obtained, and on which he built his house and settled his tablishment, had been marked out for him at the time when Sir Rufane Donkin filled the situation of acting-governor in the absence of Lord Charles Somerset; and when Lord Charles returned to the colony, he found that his deputy had made a serious blunder-the said grant, and a great number of grants besides, being within a district as neutral-which in short, had never been ceded. Lord grants on the most interesting subjects.

VOL. XXVIII. MARCH, 1836 .- 31.

he was like the foreign captain of a troop raised all in Charles considered that faith had been broken, though of the same village. Mr. Moodie relied implicitly on the course undesignedly, and would not continue to protect solemn contracts entered into with these people—he had these new settlers. He withdrew the troops which had been careful in admitting none who could not produce cer- been stationed for their defence against the forays of the tificates of good character, and would not suspect that, indignant Caffres, and they were soon obliged to abanden once removed from the eyes of all neighbours and con-their houses and farms entirely. We certainly think that, nexions, except those who were exposed to exactly the same as the acting-governor could have been guilty of nothing worse than an oversight, he ought to have been reprimade presbyterian could make up his mind to a deliberate fraud indeed, but the poor settlers, who had laid out time and -indeed, a plain theft and robbery. Such, however, was, money in reliance on his geographical and official authority, should have been compensated in some way for the losses thus sustained. Lieutenant Moodie, however, says, that all their petitions to this effect were fruitless. Lord Charles thought they might have taken the trouble to examine the map before cutting out their farms and erecting their houses; and they were left to select new settlements for themselves, at their own discretion, and on the usual terms. The lieutenant chose a very beautiful place, by a fine stream, and not far from the sea-coast, though on a remote part of the colony; and he hired some servants, and reared a cottage, and for a time his herds multiplied about him, and all seemed to go well.

But presently the distance and solitude of the location became distasteful to his servants, and one by one they all left him. For some weeks the poor gentleman remained actually alone in the midst of the woods and wilds, with seems, ere he had been many years in South Africa, to five hundred head of cattle to take care of. Under such circumstances, the courage even of a Fusileer might pardonably give way; and though a lucky accident brought him help and company, and he once more resumed his efforts, yet he seems never to have quite recovered the shock of his Robinson Crusoe desertion, and to have, in short, contracted a fixed disgust for the very name of Southern Africa. The lieutenant sold his lot and stock came over to England, and wrote his book-but before it could be published he was already on his way to Upper Canada. We sincerely hope he may have better luck there than at the Cape, but there seems some reason to fear that he is of an unsettling disposition. We doubt if he will reclaim any considerable section of the Canadian forests; but he will, if his views are moderate, find his half pay a very comfortable income, and certainly he will be at no loss either for hearty cheer or jolly company, if he chooses to locate himself within dining distance of that epicurean of the woods, Dr. Dunlop.*

We must now give a specimen or two of Lieutenant Moodie's descriptions and anecdotes; of his historical and philosophical disquisitions the less that is said the better: it is enough to mention, as to the former department, that he opens a paragraph with a statement that ' Egypt was indebted for the first germs of her improvement to Juden' (p. 301)-and as to the latter, any one may see that before he entered the Fusileers he must have been unfortunate enough to attend at Aberdeen or elsewhere some of those dreary drivellings which Sir James Mackintosh's friend Dunbar used to call lectures on ethics, so luxuriantly does he flourish about 'the hunter and shepherd

^{*} We allude to the author of ' Notes by a Backwoodsman,' published two or three years ago-in which he gives some specimens of a cookery book that might have found favour with Polyphemus, and records sundry post-prandial exercitations on a corresponding scale. We are far, however, from wishing to speak lightly of the work as a whole. On the contra y, the doctor's ludicrous anecdotes, and the broad humour of his own great number of grants besides, being within a district style throughout, only set off to more advantage the which the English Government had, by treaty, recognised sterling sense and shrewdness of his advice to the emi-

Dutch graziers of the interior, a neighbour of his brother in being beforehand with time. the laird, seems to us the best thing that ever was published on the subject of these greasy barbarians.

'Among the neighbours whom he visited in the course of our rides in the vicinity of Groot Vaders Bosch was an old man of the name of Botha. His house stood in a plain, surrounded on all sides by high hills; and in front, towards the mountains, a scene met the eye which for wild and savage magnificence could hardly be exceeded in nature. A river pent up among the mountains had in the lapse of ages worn a perpendicular chasm through the centre of a naked precipice several hundred feet in height. The stream, being obstructed in its course by a ledge of rocks at the mouth of this superb portal, formed a pool, which extended some hundred yards between the perpendicular sides of the chasm, overhung by trees and shrubs which had taken root in the crevices of the rocks; but, by climbing along the projecting shelves, access could with difficulty be gained to the source of the river, in a deep and woody amphitheatre among the mountains. The sides woody amphitheatre among the mountains. The sides of this valley are so high and steep, that the only way the valuable timber it contains can be got out is, by rolling the logs into the bed of the stream, where they remain until they are floated out when the river is swelled into a torrent after heavy rains.

scenery than Martinus Botha; nor could be conceive what pleasure we experienced in its contemplation. All that he knew or cared for was, that he had a constant run of water for his mill; but whether it came from a romantic chasm, or a muddy lake, was to him a matter of the greatest indifference. I am rather inclined to think that he had a secret suspicion that he himself, was the object of my frequent visits to his abode. He was one of those monsters of obesity who are so often to be seen in this colony, and of whose appearance we can form but a faint conception from any common instance of the kind in England. He was literally a martyr to corpulence, his prodigious powers of digestion having nearly destroyed the exercise of his mental faculties.

'For several years Martinus Botha had not been able to lie down in his bed for fear of suffocation, and the only way he could get any sleep was by leaning his head on the table before him: in this manner he could procure a little rest, which was only for a few minutes at time. It is difficult to describe his person, for shape he had hardly any. A huge bag of fat hung below his chin, and the flesh of his ankles hung down till it touched his shoes. Notwithstanding his enormous size, he was a great gourmand, and thought little of devouring several pounds of mutton at a meal, after which he could sometimes drink a bottle of brandy without being affected by it. He was at this period beginning to feel some alarm at his increasing dimensions, and took from time to time a journey in his wagon to Swellendam to consult the wadded was titled. sult the medical practitioner on his case. On these occasions, he would call on his way at Groot Vaders Bosch; but the doctor, who had killed many men without intending it, could not succeed by any means in checking the growth of his unwieldy patient, who began to fancy that he was afflicted with dropsy; and he was confirmed in the idea by the opinions of his family and neighbours.

'Of all people I

'In a country where it is found most convenient to bury the dead as speedily as possible, it is common for elderly people to keep a coffin in their houses ready for their own use, or to lend to any of their neighbours who may chance to die before him. In travelling object may be often seen lying across the beams; and less refined then the Hottentots. so far from exciting any unpleasant feelings, it has often been pointed out to me by the old farmers with great state, &c. &c. &c. His account of one of the great self-complacency, as a proof of their good management

Our bulky friend arrived one day at Groot Vaders Bosch in his wagon, accompanied by two of his sons. After sitting for some time and drinking a glass of brandy, he informed us that he had come to get a coffin made for his own use, as he had the "water," and did not expect to live long, and had moreover grown to such a size that none of his neighbours had any large enough to hold him. "That's true father, what you replied one of the young men, without altering a muscle of his countenance.

'My brother had two carpenters in an adjoining outhouse employed in making up various articles of furniture for sale among the farmers; and to their workshop I accompanied our visiter. Jamie Learmouth, a little sly drunken body, was hard at work at his bench, and singing one of our favourite Scotch songs, in a manner that showed he was more occupied with the words and the recollections to which they gave rise than the modu-lation of his notes. He had just come to

"We twa hae paidled in the burn," when we entered his shop. Observing the lusty custo-mer who darkened his door, Jamie quitted his plane, and addressed him, with a sly twinkle, in a jargon in which Dutch and broad Scotch were curiously interwhich Duten and Good Scotch were curiously interest which the week which the week were curiously interest which the day ?"—"I come, anywheer Botha in his own language, "to have a coffin made."—"I can shune do that hat pleasure we experienced in its contemplation. If or ye," replied Jamie: "but is't for yoursel'?"—"Yes, ll that he knew or cared for was, that he had a concert and the knew or cared for was, that he had a concert and provided which we have a coffin made."—"I can shune do that for ye," replied Jamie: "but is't for yoursel'?"—"Yes, certainly."—"Faith, ye'll need a gude big ane," said the carpenter; "but if ye'll joost lay yersel' oot on the bed there, I'll shune tak yer measure."

'Jamie cast a sly look at me as he made this proposal; for he knew it was easier said than done. However, with the assistance of his sons, the old farmer, who had seated himself on the side of the bed, was gradually lowered down on his back, to the great danger of the conscious bedstead, which uttered sundry discontented creaks at the unusual weight imposed on it, which seemed to excite Jamie's fears not a little for his hastily. constructed couch. Poor Botha's sufferings in this po-sition were so great, that if the carpenter had not completed his measurement with expedition, he must infallibly have died of suffocation on the spot. His respiration ceased almost entirely as long as he lay in a horizontal position; and it was not until he was again raised up that the air pent up in his lungs found a passage, when it rushed out like the blowing of a porpoise when he comes to the surface of the water. When Martinus could collect his thoughts, he again addressed the workman. "Hear, James, you must make my coffin roomy enough, for I'll swell up very much when I am dead.

While he was retiring to his wagon, his son took Jamie by the arm, and begged him to make the coffin close in the joints; "for," he added, father will per-haps run out after he is dead." The perfect apathy and sang froid with which these serious arrangements were made were highly characteristic of the people.'-vol, i. p. 151.

Mr. Moodie says elsewhere, and we can well believe

fid no cir no the com his milble

fe

an

tu

'Of all people I have ever seen, the Cape-Dutch are the coarsest and least polished in their manners. The conversation of both sexes is marked by an almost total absence of common decency: the most disgusting oaths are used on all occasions by the men; and the women do not even feel ashamed to talk on the most through this part of the colony, if you cast your eyes indeficate subjects, hardly condescending to use any upwards in a "boer's" house, this rather melancholy circumlocution. In this respect, indeed, they are even

The gallant Fusileer was, of course, an activ parof lion and elephant hunting are really quite admirable. my accounts with this world; but, owing to the roundness. One passage must suffice, and that we tried to curtail, but of her foot, I generally managed, by twisting my body found it impossible to do so without diminishing the ef. and limbs, to escape her direct tread. fect. It includes the account of one of the most remarkable escapes that ever mortal man owed, under Providence, to cool self-possession; and the whole story is told with a did of a reighbouring bill ever of white the result of the residual of a reighbouring bill ever of white the refrom the manly simplicity which commands implicit credence.

not overtake the hunters until they had driven the ele- I escaped her observation.

phants from their first station.

rs

of fbe to ge

DUL

ng

atni-

op

tle

nd

er

nd

lu-

tone, in

er-

ou

nhat es,

the

al;

er,

lly

the ted ich ilv. poom-

faliraorised ige, hen nus

the

ffin am

offin

per-

and vere ol. i.

lieve

The

total ting

the

most

anv even parheard the firing, when I was saddenly warned of ap-heard the firing, when I was saddenly warned of ap-proaching danger by loud cries of "Pas op," (look out,) coupled with my name in Dutch and English! and, at for I saw his brains." He afterwards heard from others the same moment, heard the cracking of broken branch- he met on the way that I was the unlucky person, and es, produced by the elephants bursting through the wood and their angry screams resounding among the precipitous, banks of the river.

two hundred yards off, and were proceeding directly ing the ordeal I had gone through. Being alone, and in the middle of a little open plain, I saw that I must inevitably be caught should I fire in this position and my shot not take effect.

'I therefore retreated hastily out of their direct path, thinking they would not observe me, until I should find that I had just escaped from, had been infuriated by the a better opportunity to attack them. But in this I was mistaken; for, on looking back, I perceived, to my dismay, that they had left their former course, and were rapidly pursuing and gaining ground on me. Under these circumstances, I determined to reserve my fire as a last resource; and, turning off at right angles in the opposite direction, I made for the banks of the small me; all of them screaming so tremendously, that I was distance to be of any service to the unfortunate man. almost stunned by the noise. I immediately turned round, cocked my gun, and aimed at the head of the security from their numbers, for, as soon as the elephant

the ball merely grazed the side of her head.

them for a little space; I was scarcely in a condition to compute the time very accurately, but, judging from hight, he turned in the opposite direction, and, being my feelings, it appeared an intolerably long one, and I without his coat and waistcoat, his white shirt immediately. had great reason to complain of the "leaden-footed" minutes, which seemed to be hours in my uncomforta-

Once she pressed her foot on my chest with such ferce that I felt the bones bending under the weight: people broke this male elephant's left fore-leg, which and then she trod on the middle of my arm, which fortunately lay flat on the ground at the time. During sion, we witnessed a touching instance of affection and this rough handling, however, I never entirely lost my respectively.

taker in the 'Wild Sports of the South:' his descriptions collection, else I have little doubt she would have settled side of a neighbouring hill, one of which hit her in the shoulder; and at the same time her companions retir-'The beautiful stream called by the Kaffres the Gua- ing and screaming to her from the edge of the forest, lana, after leaving the village, took its course through she reluctantly left me, giving me a cuff or two with an extensive wood or jungle, and again made its appearance in an open meadow, running close under the and staggered away as fast as my aching bones would high hills on one side of the valley for several hundred allow me; but, observing that she turned round, as if ards, when it again entered a long strip of jungle. meditating a second attempt on my life before entering In consequence of losing my way in the jungle, I could the bush, I lay down in the long grass, by which means

'On reaching the top of the hill I met my brother, 'On getting out of the wood I was proceeding who had not been at this day's hunt, but had ran out through the meadow to a kloof, or ravine, where I on being told by one of the men. "Sir. I saw somehods." on being told by one of the men, "Sir, I saw somebody was of course not a little surprised at seeing me with whole bones, though plastered with mud from head to foot. My face was a little scratched, indeed, by the ele-'Immediately a large female, accompanied by three others of a smaller size, issued from the jungle which skirted the river margin. As they were not more than squeeze of it; but these were trifling injuries considersqueeze of it; but these were trifling injuries consider-

' While my brother and I were yet talking of the adventure, an unlucky soldier of the Royal African Corps, of the name of M'Clare, attracted the attention of a large male elephant. The ferocious animal, which, like opposite direction, I made for the banks of the small triver, with the view to take refuge among the rocks on the other side, where I should have been safe.

Before I got within fifty yards of the river, the elementary of the river of the river, the elementary of the river, the elementary of the river of the river of the river of the river of the top of a high bush. While this tragedy was going on, my brother and I scrambled down the rocky hill and of her, apparently with the intention of making sure of the furious animal: but we were at too great a me; all of them screaming as the order of the same of the surface of the same of the surface of the same of largest—the female. But the gun, unfortunately, from gave them chase, they retreated as fast as their legs the powder being damp, hung fire till I was in the act would carry them up the side of the hills, and the ani-of taking it from my shoulder, when it went off, and mal, seemingly puzzled which to wreak his vengeance on, after pursuing them for two or three hundred yards, 'Halting only for an instant, the animal again rushed would stop short, and return to the wood for security.

When the function of the wood for security would stop short, and return to the wood for security. We betide the luckless wight who lags too far behind down by her trunk or not. She then made a thrust at the rest! It happenened thus to the poor fellow whose me with her tusk. Fortunately for me she had only fate I have recorded. Getting tired of the sport, he one, which, still more luckily, missed its mark. Seiz-ing me with her trunk by the middle, she threw me be-tention of returning to the village, just at the moment neath her fore-feet, and knocked me about between when the male elephant was making a charge on his pursuers. Instead of following the others in their ately attracted the animal's attention, when he was about to retreat to the wood, and he caught him as I have related.

lustrates the character of this noble animal.* Seeing should much prefer either the Cape or Canada to any of the distress of her mate, the female from which I so the Australian colonies. narrowly escaped, regardless of her own danger, quitting her shelter in the wood, rushed out to his assistance walked round and round him, chasing away the assailants, and still returning to his side and caressing him. Whenever he attempted to walk, she placed her flank missionary, 1 vol. 12mo. We cannot say much for either or her shoulder to his wounded side, and supported him. This scene continued nearly half an hour, until the fe-male received a severe wound from Mr. C. Mackenzie, of the Royal African Corps, which drove her again to the bush, where she speedily sank exhausted from the loss of blood; and the male soon afterwards received a mortal wound from the same officer.'-vol. ii. p. 79, 87.

Here we close our extracts from one of the most amusof depending, as to serious colonial questions, on the opi. ed eagerly by the more intelligent of the Dutch farmers in nions of persons who have been unfortunate in their own that neighbourhood, bids fair to extend, ere long, over the Moodie's severe strictures, either on the missionaries among has hitherto been its chief impediment, namely, the want him, so many focuses of hypocrisy and disaffection,-or May we not anticipate advantages beyond all price, for the on the growth of dissenting chapels in the various towns African continent in general, from the ultimate systematic of the Cape Colony, which he ascribes to the 'decidedly application of this invention?* republican principles of all our countrymen of the middling and lower orders.' The Lieutenant's refractory Hottentot servants seem to have found, on various occasions, shelter and protection at missionary stations; and we have seen how severely the elder Moodie suffered by the unprincipled desertion of the long-faced artizans who formed the bulk of his followers from Scotland. To these, and other personal circumstances, the Lieutenant's bitter diatribes must no doubt be mainly ascribed. On the other Windormear's. He was at home, and I gave my name to hand, from considerations of a different sort, which we the servant as Mr. De Benyon. It was the first time that need not waste time in expounding, we set little value on I had made use of my own name. His lordship was alone the pro-missionary and pro-methodist statements of Mr. when I entered. He bowed, as if not recognising me, and Pringle. We can accept neither of these writers as a safe waved his hand to a chair. authority on subjects of this kind.

exactly the same conclusion-namely, that a family in I was Japhet Newland." middle life whose habits have been agricultural, who have some little capital at command, and who are willing to sacrifice everything in the likeness of civilized society, be. you again." yond the pale of their own settlement,-cannot in any of our colonies find a situation where they might be more you of what had taken place." sure of a coarse abundance soon, and-by-and-bye of accumulated wealth: while there is a vast and daily increasing demand for mere labour of every sort, so that individuals can manage to pay the passage to the Cape, and will serve steadily for a very few years, may count to a perfect certainty on realizing property enough to elevate them in their turn to the class of landed yeomen. Even at Albany, for instance, according to the latest accounts we have seen, mechanics were receiving at least 5s. a-day; farm labourers 3e. 9d. a-day; and house servants, besides food and lodging, from 20L to 30L per annum. We confess that, were we called on to advise any individual in either of these classes, when hesitating between the Cape and Canada, we should feel it very difficult to decide. But assuredly we

Two other new books on South Africa have reached us the 'Wanderings' of Mr. Steedman, in 2 vols. 8vo., and of them-quotations from their pages after Pringle and Moodie would hardly be endurable. Still any one thinking of settling in those regions will do well to possess him-self of these works also. They both contain some details which such a reader will esteem valuable. One fact, of real moment, we owe to the missionary ;-namely, that the system of Artesian wells has recently been introduced by some of the English emigrants in the district of Albany, ing books we have lately met with. We are always shy and being attended with signal success, and already adoptlocations; and therefore we shall not quote any of Mr. colony, and thus relieve South African agriculture of what the Hottentots, whose little settlements are, according to of water for the purposes of irrigation. (Kay, p. 440.)

From the Metropolitan.

JAPHET IN SEARCH OF A FATHER,

BY THE AUTHOR OF "PETER SIMPLE," &c.

(Continued from p. 175.)

I took the carriage the next day, and drove to I ord

"My lord, I have given my true name, and you treat With regard to the general question of South African me as a perfect stranger. I will mention my former name, and I trust you will honour me with a recognition.

> "My dear Mr. Newland, you must accept my apology; but it is so long since we met, and I did not expect to see

"I thought, my lord, that Mr. Masterton had informed

"No; I have just come from a visit to my sister's in Westmoreland, and have received no letters from him."

"I have, my lord, at last succeeded in finding out the of the working order, whether in town or country, who object of my mad search, as you were truly pleased to call it, in the Honorable General De Benyon, lately arrived from the East Indies,"

"Where his services are well known," added his lordship. "Mr. De Benyon, I congratulate you with all my heart. When you refused my offers of assistance, and left us all in that mad way, I certainly despaired of ever seeing you again. I am glad that you reappear under such fortunate auspices. Has your father any family?"

"None, my lord, but myself; and my mother died in the East Indies."

"Then I presume, from what I know at the board of control, that you may now safely be introduced as a young gentleman of large fortune; allow me at least to assist your father, in placing you in your proper sphere in society. Where is your father?"

"At present, my lord, he is staying at the Adelphi hotel,

[.] We are told by another recent traveller, that the Caffres, while engaged in a conflict with the elephant, always keep addressing him as, 'Mighty Lord,' 'High Chief,' 'Illustrious Noble,' and so forth;—and that, when one is slain, none of the Caffre chiefs partake in the banquet of elephant steaks, because the animal is considered as of their own rank !

^{*} See on this subject a very luminous chapter in Sir Francis Head's recent Life of Abyssinian Bruce.

few days, he will be able to come out."

"Will you offer my congratulations to him, and tell which avail nothing." him, that if he will allow me, I will have the honour of paying my respects to him? Will you dine with me on ready, Japhet; so has that pleasant friend of thine, Mr. Monday next?"

I returned my thanks, accepted the invitation, and took my leave; his lordship saying as he shook hands with me, "You don't know how happy this intelligence has made me. I trust that your father and I shall be good father will be impatient for my return. I will order friends."

of us

nd a

nd

k-

m-ila of

he

by

ıy,

pt.

in

he

at

int 0.)

he

tic

ord

to

hat

one

ind

eat

ner

on.

у;

see

ned

in

the call

om

rd-

my and

ver

der

7"

in

i of

ung sist

80-

tel,

Sir

When I returned to the carriage, as my father had dethe room.

"Susannah," said I, "I know you do not like to walk take an airing in the carriage; my father has lent it to me

Will you come?-it will do you good." "It is very kind of you, Japhet, to think of me

"But what?" replied Mrs. Cophagus. "Surely thou wilt not refuse, Susannah? It would savour much of ingratitude on thy part."

" I will not then be ungrateful," replied Susannah, leaving the room; and in a short time she returned in a Leghorn bonnet and shawl like her sister's. " Do not I prove that I am not ungrateful, Japhet, since to do credit to thy carriage, I am content to depart from the rules of our persuasion?" said Susannah, smilling.

"I feel the kindness and the sacrifice you are making to please me, Susannah," replied I; " but let us loose no

time."

I handed her down to the carriage, and we drove to the Park. It was a beautiful day, and the Park was filled with pedestrians as well as carriages. Susannah was much astonished, as well as pleased. "Now, Susannah," said I, "if you were to call this Vanity Fair, you would not be far wrong; but still, recollect that even all this is productive of much good. Reflect how many industrious people find employment and provision for their families by the building of these gay vehicles, their painting and ornamenting. How many are employed at the loom, and at the needle, in making these gay dresses. This vanity is the cause of wealth not being hoarded, but finding its it?" way through various channels, so as to produce comfort and happiness to thousands,"

"Your observations are just, Japhet, but you have lived in the world, and seen much of it. I am as one just burst from an egg-shell, all amazement. I have been by a mist of ignorance, and not being able to penetrate farther, have considered myself wise when I was not."

"My dear Susannah, this is a chequered world, but not a very bad one-there is in it much of good as well as The sect to which you belong avoid it-they know -and they are unjust towards it. During the time that I lived in Reading, I will candidly state to you that ward appearance and hypocrisy, what they wanted in their conduct towards their fellow creatures. Believe me, Su- help it." sannah, there are pious and good, charitable and humane, conscientious, and strictly honorable people among those who now pass before your view in such gay procession; nah disengaged herself. but society requires that the rich should spend their mo-

confined to his room by an accident, but I trust that, in a ney in superfluities, that the poor may be supported. Be not deceived, therefore, in future, by the outward garments, Masterton, who has twice called since we have been in London; but is it not time that we should return?"

"It is indeed later than I thought it was, Susannah," replied I, looking at my watch, "and I am afraid that my

them to drive home."

As we drove along, leaning against the back of the carsired me to take an airing, I thought I might as well have riage, my hand happened to touch that of Susannah, which a companion so I directed them to drive to Mr. Cophagus's. lay beside her on the cushion; I could not resist taking The servant knocked, and I went in as soon as the door it in mine, and it was not withdrawn. What my thoughts was opened. Susannah and Mrs. Cophagus were sitting in were, the reader may imagine; Susannah's I cannot acquaint him with; but in in that position we remained in silence until the carriage stopped at Cophagus's door .out, so I thought, perhaps, you would have no objection to I handed Susannah out of the carriage, and went up stairs for a few moments. Mrs. Cophagus and her husband were out.

> "Susannah, this is very kind of you, and I return you my thanks. I never felt more happy than when scated with you in that carriage,"

"I have received both amusement and instruction, Japhet, and ought to thank you. Do you know what passed in my mind at one time?"

" No-tell me."

"When I first knew you, and you came among us, I was, as it were, the guide, a presumptuous one perhaps to you, and you listened to me-now it is reversed-now that we are moved, and in the world, it is you that are the guide, and it is I who listen and obey."

"Because, Susannah, when we first met I was much in error, and had thought too little of serious things, and you were fit to be my guide: now we are mixing in the world, with which I am better acquainted than yourself. You then corrected me, when I was wrong; I now point out to you where you are not rightly informed : but Susannah, what you have learnt of me is as nought compared with the valuable precepts which I gained from your lips-precepts which, I trust, no collision with the world will ever make me forget."

"Oh! I love to hear you say that; I was fearful that the world would spoil you, Japhet; but it will not-will "Not so long as I have you still with me, Susannah ; but if I am obliged to mix again with the world, tell me, Susannah, will you reject me ?-will you desert me ?will you return to your own people, and leave me so exposed? Susannah, dearest, you must know how long, how living in a little world of my own thoughts, surrounded by a mist of ignorance, and not being able to penetrate been sent for, and obliged to obey the message, that I would have lived and died content with you. Will you not listen to me now, or do you reject me !

I put my arm round her waist, her head fell upon my shoulder, and she burst into tears. "Speak, dearest, this suspense is torture to me," continued I.

"I do love you, Japhet," replied she at last, looking I met with many who called themselves of the persuasion, fondly at me through her tears; "but I know not whether who were wholly unworthy of it, but they made up in out this earthly love may not have weakened my affection towards heaven. If so, may God pardon me, for I cannot

> After this avowal, for a minute, which appeared but a few seconds, we were in each other's arms, when Susan-

"Dearest Japhet, thy father will be much displeased."

"I cannot help it," replied I; "I shall submit to his forget the apology at all events: I shall be unhappy untif displeasure."

" Nay, but Japhet, why risk thy father's wrath ?"

- "Well, then," replied I, attempting to reach her lips, "I will go."
- "Nay, nay-indeed, Japhet, you exact too much-it is not seemly."

"Then I won't go."

"Recollect about thy father."

"It is you who detain me, Susannah."

willed."

"God bless you, Susannah," said I, as I gained the contested point, and hastened to the carriage.

I half pacified him by delivering Lord Windermear's polite message; but he continued his interrogations, and aldozen on this occasion; but I consoled myself with the having called you an old thief of a lawyer, of which he reflection, that in the code of honour of a fashionable man, was totally ignorant until I reminded him of it to to-day. he is bound, if necessary, to tell falsehoods where a lady is concerned; so I said that I had driven through the streets, looking at the houses, and had twice stopped and had gone in to examine them. My father supposed that I had been nately they were job horses; had they been his own. Sunday; do you go to meeting or to church?" I should have been in a severe scrape. Horses are the only part of an establishment which the gentlemen have any consideration for, and on which ladies have no mercy.

I had promised the next day to dine with Mr. Master-ceived an invitation to go to church," replied I. ton. My father had taken a great aversion to this old "You will hear an extra gentleman until I had narrated the events of my life, in Susannah and the Elders." which he had played such a conspicuous and friendly part. Then, to do my father justice, his heart warmed towards him.

"My dear sir, I have promised to dine out to-day."

"With whom, Japhet?"

"Why, sir, to tell you the truth, with that 'old thief of

"I am very much shocked at your using such an expression towards one who has been such a sincere friend, Ja-lafter I had introduced him to my "governor," we retired phet and you will oblige me, sir, by not doing so again in to talk without interruption. my presence."

thought to please you."

"Please me! what do you think of me? please me,

" My dear father, I borrowed the expression from you. You called Mr. Masterton 'an old thief of a lawyer' to his face: he complained to me of the language before I had the highest respect, love, and gratitude towards him. Have, I your permission to go?"

" Yes, Japhet," replied my father, looking very grave "and do me the favour to apologise for me to Mr. Masterton for my having used such an expression in my unfortunate warmth of temper-I am ashamed of myself."

"My dearest father, no man need be ashamed who is so ready to make honourable reparation :--we are all a little but who I little imagined to be the little girl that you had out of temper at times."

a good son," replied my father with some emotion. "Don't extreme interest relative to you, evinced by both the mother

it be made,"

I arrived at Mr. Masterton's and walked into his room, when whom should I find in company with him but Har-

" Japhet, I'm glad to see you: allow me to introduce you to Mr. Harcourt-Mr. De Benyon," and the old gentleman grinned maliciously; but I was not to be taken

"Harcourt," said I, extending my hand, "I have to "I must not injure thee with thy father, Japhet; it apologise to you for a rude reception and for unjust suspiwere no proof of my affection-but, indeed, you are self-cions, but I was vexed at the time-if you will admit that as an excuse."

"My dear Japhet," replied Harcourt, taking my hand and shaking it warmly. "I have to apologise to you for My father was a little out of humour when I returned, much more unworthy behaviour, and it will be a great reand questioned me rather sharply as to where I had been lief to my mind if you will once more enrol me in the list of your friends."

"And now, Mr. Masterton," said, I, " as apologies apthough I had pointed out to him that a De Benyon would pear to be the order of the day, I bring you one from the never be guilty of an untruth, I am afraid I told some half general, who has requested me to make one to you for Harcourt burst into a laugh.

"Well, Japhet, you may tell your old tiger that I did not feel particularly affronted, as I took his expression professionally and not personally; and if he meant it in looking out a house for him, and was satisfied. Fortu-that sense, he was not far wrong. Japhet, to-morrow is

"I believe, sir, that I shall go to church."

"Well, then, come with me :- be here at half-past two -we will go to evening service at St. James's."

"I have received many invitations, but I never yet re-

" You will hear an extra lesson of the day-a portion of

I took the equivoque, which was incomprehensible to Harcourt: I hardly need say, that the latter and I were on the best terms. When we separated, Harcourt requested leave to call upon me the next morning, and Mr. Masterton said that he should also pay his respects to the tiger, as he invariably called my most honored pa-

Harcourt was with me very soon after breakfast, and

" I have much to say to you, De Benyon," commenced "I really beg your pardon, general," replied I, "but I Harcourt; "first let me tell you, that after I rose from my bed, and discovered that you had disappeared, I resolved, if possible, to find you out, and induce you to come back .sir, by showing yourself ungrateful !- I'm ashamed of you, Timothy, who looked very shy at me, would tell me nothing but that the last that was heard of you was at Lady de Clare's, at Richmond. Having no other clue, I went down there, introduced myself, and, as they will tell you, candidly acknowledged that I had treated you ill. I then the pleasure of meeting you. I feel, and always shall feel, requested that they would give me any clue by which you might be found, for I had an opportunity of offering to you a situation which was at my father's disposal, and which any gentleman might have accepted, although it was not very lucrative,"

"It was very kind of you, Harcourt."
"Do not say that, I beg. It was thus that I formed an acquaintance with Lady de Clare and her daughter, whose early history, as Fleta, I had obtained from you, so generously protected; for it was not until after I had "You have been a kind friend to me, Japhet, as well as deserted you that you had discovered her parentage. The

and daughter, surprised me. They had heard of my prompted you to find me out, which introduced you to Cename from you, but not of our quarrel. They urged me, cilia, and I wish you joy with all my heart. This is a his shoulders. I returned to Richmond with the tidings are at Lady de Clare's; one story will do for all." of my ill-success about a week after I had first called there. Cecilia was much affected and cried very bitterly. I could ther, with whom I found Lord Windermear. not help asking Lady de Clare why she took such a strong interest in your fortunes. 'Who ought,' replied Cecilia, 'if lordship. "I have just been giving a very good charac his poor Fleta does not?" 'Good heavens! Miss de Clare, ter of you to the general; I hope you will continue to de are you the little Fleta whom he found with the gipsies, serve it." and talked to me so much about?" 'Did you not know it?" said Lady de Clare. I then explained to her all that if I did not, after my father's kindness to me. had latterly passed between us, and they in return communicated your events and dangers in Ireland. Thus was the intimacy formed, and ever since, I have been con-stantly welcome at their house. I did not, however, abandon my enquiries for many months, when I thought it was useless and I had to console poor Cecilia, who constantly mourned for you. And now, Japhet, I must make my story short; I could not help admiring a young person such personal attractions, but she was an heiress, and I was a younger brother. Still Lady de Clare insisted upon when the unfortunate death of my elder brother put me in a situation to aspire to her hand. After that, my visits were more frequent, and I was tacitly received as a suitor by Lady de Clare, and had no reason to complain of the shall take my leave and run away with your son." treatment I received from Cecilia. Such was the position and was anxiously awaiting an answer from her own dear being a degree of constraint on all sides at the interruption occasioned by the presence of one who had long been church door. Susannah had the same dress on as when ing upon the most important step of her life should feel through the responses with her reading out of the same confused and agitated at the entrance of a third party, book, and I never felt more inclined to be devout, for I was however dear he might be to her as a brother and a bene- happy, and grateful to Heaven for my happiness. When

til

ce

en

at

be

or

st

p-

or 18

y.

id

n

0

f

o

.

0

Ì

ì

"I am perfectly satisfied, Harcourt," replied I; "and I will go there, and make my peace as soon as I can."

"Indeed, Japhet, if you knew the distress of Cecilia, you would pity her, and love her more than ever. Her attractive, that you should make an appointment with Jamother is also much annoyed. As soon as you were phet to go to this church, and as I am very fond of a good gone, they desired me to hasten after you and bring you sermon I determined to come and hear it.' back. Cecilia had not yet given her answer; I requested it before my departure, but, I suppose to stimulate me, she declared she would give me no answer, until I reappeared with you. This is now three weeks ago, and I have not carriage." dared to go there. I had been trying all I could to see you again since you repulsed me at the Piazza, but with-out success, until I went to Mr. Masterton, and begged "Yes, punctually," rep him procure me an interview; thank God it has suc- off.

ing, if you please.

not been for you, I never should have known Cecilia; and more, were it not for your kindness, I might perhaps lose of the established church. To which do you give the

"Not so, Harcourt; it was your own good feeling! "I will not deny, sir, that I think, in departing from

and thanked me for proposing, to follow you, and find you strange world-who would have imagined that in little out; I did make every attempt. I went to Brentford, en- Fleta I was picking up a wife for a man whose life I quired at all the public-houses, and of all the coachmen nearly took away? I will ask my governor for his carwho went down the road, but could obtain no information, riage to-morrow, and will call and take you up at your except that at one public-house, a gentleman stopped with lodgings at two o'clock, if that hour will suit you. I will a portmanteau, and soon afterwards went away with it on tell you all that has passed since I absconded, when we

Harcourt then took his leave, and I returned to my fa-

"De Benyon, I am happy to see you again," said his

"I hope so too, my lord; I should be ungrateful, indeed,

Mr. Masterton was then introduced: Lord Windermear shook hands with him, and after a short conversation took

"Japhet," said Mr. Masterton aside, "I have a little business with your father; get out of the room any way you think best."

"There are but two ways, my dear sir," replied I, "the door or the windows: with your permission, I will select who showed so much attachment and gratitude, joined to the former, as most agreeable;" so saying, I went to my own room. What passed between the general and Mr. Masterton I did not know until afterwards, but they were my coming to the house, and I was undecided how to act, closeted upwards of an hour, when I was sent for by Mr.

"Japhet, you said you would go with me to hear the new preacher; we have no time to lose; so, general, I

I followed Mr. Masterton into his carriage, and we of affairs until the day on which you broke in upon us so drove to the lodging of Mr. Cophagus. Susannah was all unexpectedly, and at the moment that you came in, I had, ready, and Mr. Masterton went up stairs and brought her with the sanction of her mother, made an offer to Cecilia, down. A blush and a sweet smile illumined her features when she perceived me stowed away in the corner of the lips. Can you, therefore, be surprised, Japhet, at there chariot. We drove off, and somehow or another our hands again met and did not separate until we arrived at the considered lost to us? Or that a young person just decid-she had accompanied me in my father's carriage. I went the service was over, we were about to enter the carriage when who should accost us but Harcourt.

"You are suprised to see me here," said he to Mr. Masterton, "but I thought there must be something very Harcourt's ironical look told me all he would say. "Well," replied Mr. Masterton, "I hope you have been edified-now get out of the way, and let us get into the

"To-morrow at two, De Benyon," said Harcourt, taking

"Yes, punctually," replied I, as the carriage drove

"And now my dear child," said Mr. Masterton to Su-"Well, Harcourt, you shall see Cecilia, to morrow morn-sannah, as the carriage rolled along, "tell me, have you been disappointed or do you agree with me? You have Japhet, what obligations I am under to you! Had it attended a meeting of your own persuasion this morning -you have now, for the first time, listened to the ritual preference?"

support me in my judgment."

have proved that you can think for yourself; but observe, thing to her my child, I have persuaded you for once, and once only, to enter our place of worship, that you might compare as you please."

"I would that some better qualified would decide for me," replied Susannah, gravely.

"Your husband, Susannah," whispered I, " must take Susannah slightly pressed my hand, which held hers, and said nothing. As soon as we had conveyed her home, Harcourt to Lady de Clare's. I shall ask for the car-Mr. Masterton offered to do me the same kindness, which riage."

"Now, Japhet, I dare say that you would like to know of you; but here we are. God bless you, my boy." what it was I had so particular to say to the old general

"Of course I would, sir, if it concerned me."

"It did concern you, for we had not been two minutes in conversation, before you were brought on the tapis; he spoke of you with tears in his eyes-of what a comfort you had been to him, and how happy you had made him; and that he could not bear you to be away from him for half an hour. On that hint I spake, and observed, that title to illustration which is conferred upon a work, in unable, without giving offence, to refuse the numerous in- sical books which has ever been indited on military vitations which you would receive. In short, that it was science. As the production of some unknown and undisclety, and it was his duty to submit to it. The old gover- with a smile or dismissed with a sneer. In his scheme nor did not appear to like my observations, and said he for the new organization of armies, nothing would have expected otherwise from you. I replied, that it was im- been seen but the extravagance of innovation: in his repossible to change our natures, and the other sex would flections on the higher principles of the science, nothing naturally have attractions which you would not be able to discerned but the presumption of inexperience. But when resist, and that they would occupy a large portion of your all this wild theory of the author is identified with the time. 'The only way to ensure his company, my dear sober practice of the most successful general of his agewill find pleasure in domestic life. Then her husband easy to treat the most eccentric opinions of the victorious together. Your father agreed with me, and appeared world become sufficiently ready to recognise every exprivery anxious that it should take place. I then very clous sally of his fancy for the true inspiration of genius.

Without, however, exaggerating the merits either of she resided, and had made her acquaintance, and had been tice of their science. The real value of his authority as formed so high an opinion of, and so strong an attachment brief reference to the principal events in his brilliant cato her, and had felt so convinced that she was the very per- reer may aptly precede any analysis of his work. The son who would make you happy and domestic, that having same character, morcover, which belongs to his writings no family myself, I had some idea of adopting her. At all was conspicuous in his life; and he derived from his very events, that if she married you, I was determined to give birth not merely his peculiar position in society, but the her something very handsome on the day of the wed irregularity of his genius, of his disposition, and of his

"But my dear sir, why should you not have said that erty."

the forms of worship, those of my persuasion did not do "I am very glad to hear it, Japhet, and will not fail to wisely. I would not venture to say thus much, but you communicate all this to your father, but there is no reason why I may not do as I please with my own money-and "You have answered like a good, sensible girl, and I love that girl dearly. By the by, have you ever said any

"O yes, sir, we are pledged to each other."

"That's all right; I thought so, when I saw your finand judge for yourself; it now remains for you to decide gers hooked together in the carriage. But now, Japhet, I should recommend a little indifference—not exactly opposition, when your father proposes the subject to you. It will make him more anxious, and when you consent, more obliged to you. I have promised to call upon him that responsibility upon himself. Is he not the proper to-morrow, on that and other business, and you had better be out of the way."

"I shall be out of the way, sir; I mean to go with

" He will certainly lend it to you, as he wishes to get rid

(To be continued.)

From the Uinted Service Journal.

MAURICE DE SAXE.

The "REVERIES" of Marshal de Saxe claim that double he must not expect you to continue in retirement long, itself of great originality, by the still greater celebrity of neither must be blame you, that when he had set up his its author. Apart, indeed, from his fame as a commander, establishment, and you were acknowledged, that you it is doubtful what rank in professional estimation might would be as great a favourite as you were before, and be have been assigned to one of the most singular and whimnothing but right you should resume your position in so-tinguished dreamer, his Reveries might have been read sir, is to marry him to a steady, smiable young woman, when these speculations of the closet are associated with who, not having been thrown into the vortex of fashion, a splendid course of achievement in the field—it is not will become equally domestic, and you will be all very happy leader with the same unceremenious disdain; and the

you had a slight partiality in that quarter, highly commend. Marshal de Saxe or his book, the author of the "Reveing her beauty, prudence, &c. I stated that feeling an ries" may justly be ranked among the few commanders interest about you, I had gone down into the country where who have successfully illustrated both the theory and pracmuch pleased with her; that since she had come up to a writer is to be estimated in a great degree by the quality town with her relations, I had seen a great deal, and had of his exprerience and the amount of his exploits; and a sentiments.

Maurice, Comte de Saxe and, in the sequel, titular Duke. Susannah Temple was left an orphan at seven years old, of Courland and Semigallia, and Marshal-General of the and her fortune has accumulated ever since; it is by no French armies, was the natural son of Augustus II., Fiecmeans despicable, I understand from Mr. Cophagus; and tor of Saxony and King of Poland, by the celebra ed moreover, Mr. Cophagus intends to leave her all his pro-perty." Countess of Konigsmarck—that fair negociator, to a per-sonal encounter with whose dangerous fascination of mind

no I pont, mer the re-

CASTACHUL AND CASSES CASSES TO THE SECTION .

FRUE SUBERS OF PERSON

-and dany het, I by ophim better with car-

fail to eason

et rid

double k, in ity of ander, might whim-ilitary undis-read read have his rething
when h the ge—
with
not
rious
d the caprinius.
cr of Reveders
practy as tality
and a nt caThe

Pull

ti

e h a n o

HIS

very the his

Duke the Elec-ated per-mind

in 1708, he secretly left her, and proceeded on foot to join married a Saxon officer. the army of the allies, under the Duke of Marlborough, At the period of the Comte de Saxe's enrolment in the then engaged in the siege of Lisle, at which his royal army of a power to which, in the event, he was to render parent was present as a volunteer. Augustus allowed the such splendid and important services, France was enjoying youthful Maurice to serve with the Saxon contingent in a profound peace; and her new Maréchal-de-Camp, as if the Allied Army, with which he remained until nearly the with a prescience of the bright career which was to open close of the Succession War, witnessing the capture of its long vista before him, now applied himself with praise-Lisle and other fortresses, and the sanguinary battle of worthy diligence to study the theory of that science, in the Malplaquet. Thus the future marshal-general of the practice of which, since the age of twelve years, he had French armies made his first campaign against the troops been too actively engaged to supply the defects of an unof that nation; and the earliest professional lessons of the finished education. It was at this season of his life that conqueror of Fontenoy-the only commander of modern he began first to learn the mathematics and their applicatimes by whom an English army has been worsted in a tion to military purposes. His studies were pursued with ranged battle-were gained in the same ranks with Eng- so much assiduity and success that he became an excellent

m

ıy

I

p.

ŧŧ,

m

er

th

r-

n

of

r,

it

1-

y

8-

d

e

e

eg

31

h ot

18

e

i-

s.

of 18

c-

18

V

a

e

8

y

is

e

d

Charles," at Pultowa, having re-opened a theatre of action tained the command of armies, he was wont himself to for King Augustus in the north, he permitted his young direct in person all siege operations. He also associated son, in 1711, to join the Saxon troops in Pomerania; and much at this period of his life with the celebrated Chevaauthorised him to raise for the same service a regiment of lier de Folard, and other officers of similar tastes, who cavalry, at the head of which he made several campaigns brought to the study of tactics all the enthusiasm of genius, with increasing distinction, until the termination of hosti- and all the stores of antiquarian and professional learning. lities with Sweden. While the army was in winter quar- Nor were the practical details of military duty, meanwhile, ters in 1713, he married at Dresden, by his mother's de-neglected; for he actively employed himself in the supersire, the Countees of Loben. He had himself, as his intendence and organization of a German regiment of in-French biographer coolly informs us, no penchant for ma-fantry which he was allowed to enlist as its colonel into trimony, but was decided in favour of the match by the French service, and which he formed upon such prinname which his wife bore of Victoria. But as we learn that ciples as his experience had suggested. the lady was also rich, we may suspect this consideration had its weight in inducing him to form a mariage de convenance, ous episode in his life. The people of the duchy of Cour lities with Sweden, the Comte Saxe obtained his father's in that event, to unite their independent territory with the permission to serve as a volunteer in the Imperial Army kingdom of Poland as a lapsed fief of that crown, deterunder Prince Eugene, then engaged in the war against the mined to avert such a design by electing a successor to Turks. He arrived in July, 1717, at the camp of the Im- their prince. For this dignity the relationship of the perialists before Belgrade; was present throughout the ar- Comte de Saxe to King Augustus, as well as his high perduous siege of that place, and the total defeat of the Tur- sonal reputation, marked him as an eligible aspirant, and kish army which attempted its relief; and returned at the he was accordingly encouraged by a large party in the close of a brilliant campaign to Dresden.

uneasy a life through the jealous reproaches of his coun-espoused by the Princess Anne of Russia, dowager of a tess, for which he appears to have given sufficient cause, former duke of Courland, who saw and admired him, and that at length, in 1720, to escape the conjugal tempost, he agreed to give him her hand as the reward or price of his

and form the modern Scipio, Charles XII. of Sweden, ac- Paris, was readily induced to embrace an offer of the Recording to the well-known story, refused to trust his virtue, gent Duke of Orleans to enter the French service, with or at least to sacrifice his ambition. Maurice inherited the rank of Marechal de Camp. For this proposal, which some of the qualities of both parents—the prodigious per-decided the destiny of his subsequent life, he was honoursonal strength* and valour, the amiable temper and amo ably indebted to the impression of his professional merits rous susceptibility of his father; and the lively and intel- which had been made upon the Regent by the French lectual spirit of his mother, who is said herself to have princes of the blood, who had been his co-volunteers in superintended his early education, and to have instilled into the Turkish campaign. From King Augustus he without him the first aspirations of ambition and glory. He was difficulty obtained the necessary permission for this change born in the year 1696, and made so good a use of his of service, and the yet more agreeable licence for a divorce, mother's precepts that, at the early age of twelve years, by mutual consent, from his countess, who immediately lish soldiers and under the auspices of an English general, engineer officer; and so completely had he mastered that The disastrous defeat of his great enemy, "Swedish branch of his profession, that when he subsequently at-

In 1726 these occupations were interrupted by a curiwhich seems to have produced little happiness to either party. land, anticipating the dissolution of their infirm sovereign Tired of the repose produced by the cessation of hosti-without issue, and suspecting a project of the Polish Diet, duchy to offer himself as a candidate for the succession. Two years of inaction followed, during which he led so On his arrival from Paris, his cause was particularly determined upon visiting France; and after his arrival in clevation. By her exertions chiefly his election was carried in the states of the duchy, and a diploma was solemnly *Among other feats of his personal strength it is record-drawn up constituting him Duke of Courland and Semigallia in succession to the reigning sovereign. Nor was the Russian princess the only female advocate of the at-40,000 livres, and sent the supply to assist his necessition † Histoire de Maurice, Comte de Saxe, &c. par M. le Baron d'Espagnac, Gouverneur de l'Hotel Royal des opposed to his elevation proved too powerful for him to re-linvalides. Paris 1773. The biographer had served sist with success. While the Russian court insisted upon seven campaigns on the staff of his hero, and boasts of the election of some creature of its own, the Diet of Poland arbitrarily compelled King Augustus to declare

ed of him that he could break in two a horse-shoe in his hand, and twist a spike-nail with his fingers into a corkscrew. Being once insulted in the streets of London by tractive soldier: for Le Couvreur, the most celebrated a scavenger, he seized the fellow by the nape of the Parisian actress of her day, pledged her moveables for neck, and tossed him into the air, so as to fall into his own cart full of mud.

having enjoyed his personal confidence.

VOL. XXVIII. MARCH, 1836 .- 32

against his own son, and to forbid him to sustain his pre-from himself to his friend the Chevalier de Folard, detensions. On both hands the enemies of the new duke scribing the whole operation, which he had personally di-De Saxe made a gallant show of resistance to the last mo-scarp by capitulation. ment; but being overpowered by the Russians, and desertcettle as they might their conflicting interests.

the new Elector of Saxony, offered him the command of dertaking any operation, or recovering any advantage. his troops, he declined to quit the French service; and in that kingdom.

science of his profession.

the enterprise of De Saxe. Though commanding only a another officer of his staff for five hours, without their dis-proceeded to eject him by actual force of arms; and rected, is given in his memoirs, and may be cited as a mowhile the Russian troops besieged him in a post which he del for the clear and lively narration of military exploits. had attempted to fortify, a commission from the Polish The next successful achievement of the Comte de Saxe Diet entered Mittau, the capital of the duchy, with a body was the conduct of the siege of Egra, which was intrustof cavalry, and obliged the states to annul their election. ed wholly to his direction, and terminated on the counter-

During the reverses of the two following campaigrs his ed by his Courlanders, he was finally reduced to evacuate genius was repressed in subordinate commands under men the duchy, and leave his Russian and Polish enemies to every way his inferiors; but, even in the midst of the disasters which overwhelmed the French armies in Germany, But the most singular feature in this transient dream of the skilful operations and bold countenance with which he ducal sovereignty, was his neglected enjoyment and un-covered their successive retreats were the theme of general conscious loss of a far more brilliant provision. The admiration. His conduct in these trying circumstances Princess Anne of Russia, who was to have shared his du-so confirmed and enhanced his reputation, that, early in cal throne, discovered, while he was her guest at Mittau, 1744, he was raised to the dignity of a Marshal of France, that among other infidelities, he was carrying on an in- and appointed to the command of a corps of observation trigue in her own palace with one of the ladies of her in Flanders, which was destined to cover the siege operahousehold. Piqued at these proofs that his addresses to tions of the main army under the old Marshal de Noailles, herself were wholly those of political interest, Anne broke with which Louis XV. had determined to serve his first off all negociations for their marriage: nor was De Saxe campaign. Fortunately for De Saxe, the passage of the made sensible, until the sudden and unexpected succession Rhine by the Austrians obliged Nosilles, after the capture of the princess to the crown of Russia, within two years, of a few fortresses, to march away with the King from the that his inconstancy had cost him no less than the loss of Netherlands to the defence of Alsace; and the New Maran imperial consort and a matrimonial throne. But all shal, thus freed from the trammels of juniority, was left in his subsequent efforts were vain to rekindle in the breast uncontrolled command of the French forces in the Nethof the Empress the passion which he had outraged. The erlands. Here, though his inferiority in numbers to the double defeat of his views upon the duchy of Courland, enemy obliged him to act on the defensive during the reand the hand of the Russian princess, was followed by the mainder of the campaign, his masterly movements comdeath of both his parents, and the disruption of his con-pletely paralyzed the efforts of the Allies, kept them in nexion with his native country: for though his half-brother, continual alarm, and effectually prevented them from un-

He had now won the unbounded confidence of the 1733 be finally returned to France, and thenceforth de- French court and sovereign; and it was at the head of a voted himself wholly to the prosecution of his fortunes in magnificent army, including the household troops of the erown, and honoured by the presence of the monarch, that From this epoch the biography of the Counte de Saxe he opened the campaign of 1745, memorable for the battle merges into the military history of Europe. The short of Fontenoy. Every other object of the war was sacrificed war between France and the Emperor Charles VI., which to cast a brilliant distinction on the operations which the broke out in 1733, gave him his first opportunity of dis- King had resolved to witness in person; and it is a retinguishing himself in the service which he had embraced, markable proof of the chivalric eagerness of the French Even in the inclusive campaigns on the Rhine of that and officers to distinguish themselves in the presence of their the two following years, he found means to signalize his sovereign, or of the enthusiastic hopes inspired by the new talents; and before the close of the war he was raised to commander, that the veteran Marshal de Nouilles claimed the rank of Lieutenant-General. It was during the in-permission to waive his seniority, and served as a simple terval of peace which followed that, in 1738, he composed volunteer under the orders of De Saxe. It is no part of his famous "Reveries," which, we are assured by his our present business to repeat the well known details of French biographer, "cost him no more than eight days of the battle of Fontenoy; but some of the circumstances unlabour :" an assertion which, if credible at all, must refer der which it was fought have a connexion with the foronly to the time consumed in transferring to paper reflectunes and character of De Saxe, too intimate and interesttions long entertained, and details already digested on the ing to be here altogether overlooked. At the moment when he was about to grasp the highest prize of a soldier's The commencement of the war of the Imperial Suc- ambition, disease and languor had poisoned its anjoyment: cession soon summoned him again, in 1741, to renew in he was in an advanced stage of dropsy; and when, in the field his application of these principles; and now be-conversation with him, Voltaire expressed fears for his life gan effectually that brilliant career, through which he if he attempted to quit Paris in his dangerous state, he raised himself, in six years, to the summit of his glory, calmly replied, "That it was not a question of living, but In the first campaigns of that chequered war, the Gallo of setting out for the army." A few weeks before the Bavarian army overran Austria and Bohemia; and the battle he underwent the operation of tapping, and on the capture of the Bohemian capital, its crowning event, was same morning transacted business with his biographer and division of the French auxiliaries, he earnestly suggested covering by a muscle of his countenance the severe trial to the Elector of Bavaria, and, having with difficulty won which he had suffered. He was so reduced in strength, his consent, himself boldly executed a project for the esca-that, on the eve of the battle, he was obliged to be carried lade of Prague. It was effected at a most critical moment, in a sort of osier litter, mounting his horse only when the when the Austrians were on the point of throwing 14,000 action began; and during its continuance his disorder men into the place. A highly-interesting private letter, racked him with an agonizing thirst, which he dered not indulge, and vainly endeavoured to assuage by keeping a battle, "Sire, I must take the reproach of one fault to ous as ever.

l, de-

y di-

moloits.

Saxe

rust-

nter-

s his

nien disanv.

h he neral

nces

y in ance,

ation

pera-

illes, first f the

pture

n the Mar-

eft in

Veth-

the

e re-

com-

m in

un-

the

of a f the that

nttle

ficed

the

a re-

ench

their

new

imed

mple rt of ils of

s un-

forrest-

ment lier's

ent:

o, in life.

, he

. but the the and dis-

trial

ngth,

rried

the.

order d not

two lines into a dense and elongated mass of narrow passage had already been rendered impracticable. Front;—yet still, disjointed not disordered, preserving its With more truth perhaps, but not without some ing infantry," which has in our own days again displayed which its very nature is certain to expose it. the same hereditary national qualities on the crests of Alof the British column at Fontenoy did not exceed 15,000 the remainder of the war. In 1746 he prevailed at Roumen; and it is fair to remember that its glory was shared by five battalions of Hanoverianst, worthy of the race with British soldiers, and emulated their spirit in the hap-successive campaigns; and in three years the French pier companionship of victory.

The admitted and imminent danger of defeat to which the French army was exposed at Fontenoy by the unex-bristled with many of the most celebrated fortresses in pected boldness of the English advance, has sometimes provoked a question on the skill of De Saxe's dispositions. The peace of Aix-la-Chapelle alone arrested the course of

* The reader who wishes to believe the interesting, but not very probable, tale related by Voltaire, of the reciprocal courtesy of the French and British guards in the heat of the action, may find it circumstantially supported by the biographer of De Saxe, who was himself vision was made for his residence at his chateau of Cham-present at the battle. The officers at the head of the bord in almost regal state. His own regiment of cavelry British column, on approaching within fifty paces of the were stationed there to furnish a daily guard of honour to French Guards, saluted their opponents by taking off his person; cannon taken from the enemy were mounted their hats; the French officers, stepping forth to the front, before his gate; and captured standards and other trophics returned the compliment! Lord Charles Hay, a captain in the English Guards, then advanced from the ranks, and cried "Gentlemen of the French Guards, fire!" Comte d'Anteroche, a lieutenant of grenadiers, replied in a loud voice, "Gentlemen fire yourselves—
we never fire first!" The British poured in a fire so destructive that nineteen officers of the French Guards de Saxe, it is not easy to distinguish between the portion and eleven of the Swiss fell before it; six hundred men of his signal successes which he owed to his intrinsic of the same corps were killed and wounded; and the abilities, and that for which he was indebted to the errors Swiss regiment of Courten, which had joined the French and imbecility of his opponents. Frederic of Prussia, in-Guards, was annihilated.

ball of lead in his mouth. Yet his calmness, self-pos-myself: I ought to have placed another redoubt between session, and habitual liveliness of spirit, were as conspicu- the wood of Barri and Fontenoy; but I did not imagine there were generals hardy enough to attempt the passage The battle itself was one of the most singular in the an- at that spot." To which it has been retorted, that a comnals of modern warfare. There is no other example on mander ought always to suppose his enemy both able and record of a body of unsupported infantry penetrating a bold. But it is surely more just to interpret De Saxe's position in the face of a force five times as numerous, un-speech rather as a censure on the illijudged and fatal der the cross fire of redoubts full of heavy artillery, over-temerity of his opponent: he was not bound to anticipate throwing successive charges of horse and foot, annihila-the madness of the English general which had precipitated ting whole regiments by its rolling volleys of musketry— his infantry on their destruction; and the event itself itself, by the contraction of the ground, compressed from proved that to the utmost efforts, even of such troops, the

With more truth perhaps, but not without some inconstern, undaunted aspect, and pursuing its daring, deliberate sistency, is another error imputed by Grimoard to the conadvance. The bravest efforts of the chivalric nobility of duct of De Saxe during the battle, amounting in substance France, of the gallant troops of the royal household,* of to this :-- that he neglected at once to seize the victory, the flower of the national cavalry and infantry, and even which his previous dispositions had secured; and that he of the ill-fated 1rish brigade, were in succession and in suffered the fate of the day to be long held in suspense, vain employed to arrest its progress; and when at length and great loss to be incurred by his troops in partial in the heart of the enemy's position, its ranks mowed charges, before the general and successful assault which down by artillery, and overwhelmed in front and on both would at an earlier stage have proved equally decisive. It flanks by a simultaneous onset of all the cavalry and in-seems probable that the Marshal was for some time too fantry whom it had previously repelled, the whole mass much overpowered with surprise by the incredible rashness was finally crushed, cut down, and swept bodily off the of the British advance to act as promptly as he might field, without a sign of dismay or an effort to disperse, it have done; but if so, enfeebled as he was by disease, his may be felt how full well the men who had fought in those energies rose with the occasion; and his final attack was ranks deserved the splendid eulogy of an enemy, that not only a triumph of skilful concert over desperate gal "they had quitted the field of battle without tumult and lantry, but might serve practically to refute by anticipation without confusion, and were vanquished without disho one of the boasted dogmas of later strategy. It proved nour." No other troops in the world would have been the incapacity of any formation in dense order or column capable of such desperate perseverance but that "astonish- to resist the simultaneous assault in front and flank to

The same genius or fortune, through which De Saxe had buers and under the walls of Badajos. The whole force triumphed at Fontenoy, was faithful to his standard during coux; the year after at Lawfeldt; Tournay, Ghent, Ostend, and Brussels; Antwerp, Mons, and Namur; and Bergenwhich has so often since been mingled in the same ranks op Zoom, the master-piece of Coehorn, were the prizes of armies under De Saxe had completed the conquest of the Austrian Netherlands and of Dutch Brabant,-provinces Europe, and defended by the best troops of the Allies. He himself is known to have said to Louis XV. after the the victorious general under the walls of Maestricht; and on the cessation of hostilities he returned to France crowned with glory, and already invested, as Marshal-General of the French camps and armies, with the highest military honours which their sovereign could confer. Provision was made for his residence at his chateau of Chamadorned his hall. But he did not long survive the conclusion of the war in the enjoyment of his dignities; and deed, characterized him as "the Turenne of the age of † The British contingent in the Allied Army consisted Louis XV.;" but certes the Duke of Cumberland was no of twenty-five squadrons and twenty battalions; the Hanoverian, of sixteen squadrons and five battalions; the Dutch of forty squadrons and twenty-six battalions; the Dutch of forty squadrons and twenty-six battalions; basides sight squadrons of Austrians. in the field: for the battles of Roucoux and Lawfeldt were extend the same eulogy to the written as to the oral lessons superiority of De Saxe was evinced in the secreey of his conjecture. But when De Saxe wrote his Reveries,- to supply his projected realm with subjects by coloniza- fabric would shortly fall and bury him in its ruins." tion, when the opposition of England and Holland frustrated his strange resolve. Both in this instance, however, and in that of the Courland succession, some allowance is due to the early impressions derived from birth and education; nor were his aspirations for dominion perhaps more than the natural growth of a generous ambition in so vigorous though wild a scion of a regal stock. This yearning after sovereign power, moreover, was less fatal to himself than his indulgence of a softer passion,-which rendered him, like another Samson, a contrast of physical strength and moral weakness,-which made him a dupe to every meretricious allurement, and a foil to his own greatness,-and which, in the premature evening of his days, left the sun of his glory to set only upon the ruins of intemperance.*

Yet even his errors were the inconsistencies of anoble being. His munificent generosity was the only quality in his nature which had no contrast. His spirit was fiery, but his temper gentle and humane; his principles of discipline were rigid, but their enforcement ever blended with mercy; and, in the seat of war, both in Germany and in the Netherlands, it was the singular happiness of his disposition to win alike the respect and affection of his very enemies, the love and fear of his own troops, and the confidence and gratitude of the inhabitants. So nicely, in a word, were all the qualities that may be commended and deplored balanced in the person of this extraordinary man, that his character is best summed up in the equivocal sentence which has been passed upon another here of not inferior eccentricity-" In eo, virtutes vitia superare viderenter."

The "REVERIES" of De Saxe are the only memorials which remain to the military world of the genius of a commander, to whose instructive discourses on the Art of War its greatest master in the same age was not too proud to acknowledge his obligations, and whom he emphatically pronounced "qualified to be the professor of all the generals of Europe." Whether the great Frederic meant to obstinately disputed and imperfectly won. But the real of his thus acknowledged preceptor, we presume not to designs, the rapidity of their combination, and the energy without the benefit, indeed, it must be remembered, of the of their execution. In these respects, many of his marches, accumulated experience of his ten last and most brilliant choices of position, and sieges, may be cited as splendid ex-years,-it is obvious that he meant to embody in his voamples of science; and, throughout his three last campaigns lume all his knowledge of a science which he had already in the Netherlands, the completion followed the conception studied and practised for thirty years; and the true princiof every enterprise with unerring precision and success. ples of which were as much the constant subject of his His character presented one singular contradiction: meditations, as its glories were the object of his passionate never was man more cool and clearsighted in warfare, or pursuit. The design proclaimed in the outset of his work apparently more full of foibles and destitute of judgment was to employ the fruits of his experience and reflection in the personal and ordniary relations of life. No project in proving the imperfection of the military system of his was too wild to captivate and mislead his imagination; own times; and with this view he proposed to begin hy and his whole life was passed in fruitless aspirations after developing the first principles of the art: declaring that sovereign station. He had reluctantly abandoned the hopes "though they who occupy themselves with details pass for which had been inspired by the affair of the Courland suc-persons of narrow capacity, he was convinced of the During the negociations which preceded the absolute necessity of such inquiries to the thorough attainpeace of Aix la Chapelle, he petitioned Louis XV. for the ment of any professional knowledge; just as a man might possession of the then desert isle of Tobago, with the design have a taste for architecture and drawing, might produce of making that barren and rocky spot, under a West a fair plan and design for a palace, and yet, when employed Indian sun, the seat of a sovereign principality; and, on to execute it, if he was ignorant how practically to prethe assent of the French King, he was, it is said, preparing pare his materials, and to lay his foundation, the whole

> So, regarding troops as the materials which the general has to use, and the good quality of their composition as the base of all success in warfare, he proceeds to consider the best method of levying, clothing, maintaining, forming, and training them for combat. This constitutes the subject of his first book. The second is devoted to what he terms "the sublime parts" of military science: in which he treats, in successive chapters, of fortification and the attack and defence of places, of warlike operations in general, of mountain warfare, of intersected countries, of the passage of rivers, of the choice of positions for encamping and fighting, of entrenchments and lines, of the attack of the same, of the advantage of intermingling redoubts in orders of battle, of spics and guides, of indications of the enemy's designs, and, lastly, of the qualities which the general of an army ought to possess. And the whole work concludes with a very strange essay "On the Propagation of the Human Species."

Through the prefatory part of the first book, there are scattered many very valuable maxims on the levying, clothing, maintenance, and training of troops, not unmixed with some eccentric proposals and notions. The author's remarks on the customs, too prevalent in his own as well as in later times, of enlisting men by fraud, and of subsequently violating faith with them in their terms of service, do honour to his humanity, and may be read not without profit in these days. His project for clothing the soldier, amidst much wholesome regard to his health and comfort, displays some whimsical details. For the head-dress, he recommends the hair to be cropped close, and a sort of Welsh wig of lambskin worn, for warmth's sake, under a Roman easque; for the body a vest, much like the jacket of our modern fashion, to be substituted for the lappelled coat of his own times, with what he calls a Turkish mantle, which appears by the plates to resemble an English smock-frock, to answer the purpose of a great coat; for the legs, leathern breeches and gaiters; for the feet, low heeled pumps or shoes and greased, without stockings, to be worn in wet weather in wooden soled sandals or galoshes, and in the cold season large woollen stockings with leathern soles to pass over the shoes and gaiters as t Letter from Frederic of Prussia to Voltaire, 15th high as the knee. He asserts, from his own experience, that, among the German troops, the use of woollen socks

July, 1749.

[·] He had lived too fast; and just before his death he said to his faithful physician, who had followed him through his campaigns-" Doctor, life is but a dream ! Mine has been a bright, but a short one.

paign, disabled numbers from marching.

attaches a purveyor, (vivandier), with four bullock cars, a fantry and 12,000 cavalry, with a train of fifty sixteen-huge common boiler for making soup and boulii, and other pounders, and twelve mortars,—a force with which he under-equipage: he endeavours to prove that this plan would takes to arrest the operations of one hundred thousand men. own service and times.

swivel musket of his invention, carrying a half pound ball, the health and preservation of his troops. proceeds to explain, in an essay entitled "Dissertation sur we are very much disposed to assent to the grave conclu-la Grande Manœuvre," his principles of array and move-ision of his Dutch editor, "Que Monsieur le Maréchal do ment, which are full of curious matter, but which we can-'Saxe etoit plus grand General que grand Legiste."

ext the feet had a vonomous effect on the skin, and con-inot of course attempt to analyze within our limits. But it stantly produced sores and ulcers which, in every came is observable that he does not hold the creed of Turenne, that Heaven is always on the side of great armies, since Under the head of maintenance, he proposes a system of he declares that he should not desire his army to consist of messing the troops in the field by centuries: to each of more than ten legions, eight regiments of cuirassiers, and which (consisting of one hundred and fifty men) he sixteen of dragoons: making a total of about 34,000 insecure healthy diet, and be attended with no inconvenience; Perhaps the second book of the Reveries, as being less and he advises that, while the transport of meat may be devoted to the projects, and referring more to the actual effected by droves of cattle accompanying an army, the experience of the author, is the more valuable of the two. troops shall always be accustomed to the use of biscuit Its first chapter on fortification, and the attack and defence instead of soft bread, as equally wholesome and much of places, contains much in which it is easy to recognise more portable. And, from the example of the Roman ser-the well-digested science and sound judgment of a practivice, he strongly advocates the issue of vinegar to the cal engineer. It offers some powerful arguments, dictated troops; and to the constant admixture of that article with both by humanity and prudence, against the conversion of water he attributes the freedom of the Roman armies from populous towns into fortresses; and recommends the prethe epidemics which desolate modern camps. On the sub-ference of situations for establishing places of arms, where ject of pay, he advances a doctrine from which few sons the nature of the ground may be brought to the aid of art, of the sword will be found to dissent; -that its rates ought and where no helpless population exists to suffer from the to be as high as possible. He maintains that if the pro-horrors of a siege, or to diminish the obstinacy of resistfession of arms be not made a respectable provision for ance. This chapter also contains many suggestions for officers, the ranks will be filled only "by the rich who seek improving the resources and arrangements of defence. On merely a resource for their idleness, and by wretches whose the use of retired casemates, in particular, on which he energies are paralyzed in poverty." The whole of his gives some hints and suggestions in a subsequent section, remarks under this head, on the ascendency which may we suspect that engineers of our own age have been more fairly be claimed by the aristocratic order in an army, and indebted to Marshal De Saxe than they would care to upon the limits which should regulate the pretensions of acknowledge, for the first idea of systems which they have birth, are singular as coming from a French officer of rank propounded as original inventions of their own. The under the ancien regime, and are not inapplicable to our chapter which, in the desultory manner peculiar to the whole work, is entitled "Reflections on War in General," After these introductory essays, the lively author pro is remarkable for broaching two doctrines which the ceeds to develope his plan for the organization of an army: author afterwards applied very efficiently to practice: the of which, upon the Roman model, he makes his "Legion" one on the facility of harassing an enemy by a wellthe base. This body he proposes shall consist of four arranged plan of partisan warfare; the other on the adregiments; each regiment to be composed of four centu-vantage of not taking the field, unless with some pararies of infantry, half a century of light infantry, and mount reason, too early in the year. In the campaign of another half century of cavalry. The war establishment 1747, when the Duke of Cumberland had drawn out his of each century, both of horse and foot, he fixes at one army from their winter quarters early in March, and exhundred and fifty, divided into ten companies, or rather posed them to all the inclemencies of the season, without squads, of fifteen men. He wisely deprecates the plan of any determinate object, Murshal de Saxe kept his troops levying new regiments at the opening of every war; and still in cantonments for six weeks, declaring that when the proposes that, during peace, all the legions shall be main-allies should be weakened by sickness and mortality, as tained on a reduced establishment. One curious feature of the event proved, he would then convince the English genhis plan is to furnish every century with a kind of long eral that the first duty of a commander is to provide for fixed on a light pair of wheels, and capable of being 'The titles which we have given of the remaining chaptransported and worked by two men, which he styles an ters of Marshal De Saxe's second book will sufficiently amusette. From this light artillery, with all the sanguine describe their contents, and answer the general purpose spirit of a projector, he an icipates extraordinary effects, proposed in these papers :- rather to introduce the military and seems to promise that it should almost supersede the student to the peculiarities of the old professional writers, necessity of heavier field-pieces: but he furnishes every and to afford for his guidance a general outline of their legion with two twelve-pounders, as many pontoons, and a most celebrated works, than to forestall the benefit of their light train of cars with intrenching tools, &c. His in- perusal. On the concluding and most singular and eccenfantry he forms four deep: the two front ranks armed tric portion of these Reveries-the Reflections on the with firelocks and bayonets; but the two rear also with Propagation of the Human Species-we cannot venture to pikes thirteen feet long, carrying their firelocks slung. He say more than that, although the worthy Marshal has provides every legionary also with a buckler, on the plan thought it well, "after treating of an art which teaches us recommended by Montecuculi. Besides the half centu-methodically to destroy the human race, to elucidate the ries, or troops of legionary cavalry, he proposes to form best means of repairing its losses," we by no means conregiments both of dragoons (in the old signification) and sider it our duty to follow his example; that his doctrines, of cuirassiers: the former armed with lance, firelock, and as a champion of the fair sex, on the propriety of tempobayonet, for service both mounted and dismounted; the rary marriages and freedom of choice, would appear latter in full armour, with the lance, straight cut-and-thrust equally terrifying to the disciples of Malthus, and repugsword, and carbine. Having thus organized his army, he nant to the moral and ecclesiastical law; and that, in fine, ss, he ort of ider a jacket pelled mansons

ot to

f the lliant

s vo-

rendy rincif his

onate

work

ection

f his

in by

that

ss for

f the

ttain-

night

duce

loyed

pre-

whole

eneral

n as sider ming,

subat he

which

d the

gen-

of the amp-

ttack

loubts ons of ch the whole

ropa-

re are cloth-

mixed

thor's vellas

gently

e, do

ithout

oldier,

mfort,

28.

nglish t; for t, low gs, to ls or kings

ers no

ience, socks From the United Service Journal.

JOURNAL OF AN EXCURSION IN CEYLON.

THE Government schooner, Fly, of eleven tons, left the of the Indian ocean.

smaller than the rest; it has four bastions, each sur-hundred and twenty-five feet from north to south. mounted by a round turret. With the exception of the are constructed of sand and turf. Near Negombo the cin- in their performance: there are also two hundred attendnamon plantations commence, and extend far beyond ant Brahmins. Highly delighted with our visit to this Colombo. From the sea we beheld a small island situated island, but our time not permitting us to make a longer in the mouth of the river, and covered with cocoa-nut stay, we weighed anchor at nine, and stood out to sea; trees; its appearance was exceedingly pleasing and re-got abreast of Delftal about twelve, and off Kayts at 4, freshing to the eye, beheld.

dhoney, (an Indian sloop,) into which I got, and went on a rock, and were almost wrecked, as the wind by this shore, for the purpose of obtaining coolies and lights, time had freshened into a gale. Having at last succeeded ceeded in obtaining a few of the former; but no lights about four miles. Finding that but little way was made, were forthcoming. Night coming on, I got on board we determined to walk to Jaffna, and at the same time the Fly, which was again afloat; dined, and turned into desired the servants to follow with the baggage in the bed.

towers of the pagoda had a very grand and imposing and dangers.

"On entering the west gate," (I quote Cordiner's June 3rd.of pillars on each side, leads down the centre of the building, after which it branches off in galleries similarly constructed, to the right and to the left, each extending one hundred and fifty feet, then running from west to east five hundred feet, and enclosing an oblong rectangular space;

representing gods and departed heroes, who paid obeisance, or performed pilgrimages to this Temple. On each side of the galleries, stone pavements are raised to the height of three feet, on which the pillars are erected, with Colombo Roads on the 31st of May, 1834, having on steps ascending to them. The roofs of the galleries are board myself and two others, determining on exploring flat, composed of stones reaching across from the projecsome of the beauties of these enchanting islands—the gem tion of the cornice to that of the other, eighteen feet broad in the centre walk, and the same on each elevated side, We intended to take for our route Ramisseram, Jaffna, so that every gallery is thirty-six fet wide; and the roof Anaradjapoorah, into Kandy, and accordingly weighed of the middle passage is raised thirty feet from the floor. anchor at half-past one, r.m., with a fine south-west wind, The number of pillars within the temple amounts to two and arrived off Negombo at four, but did not land. The thousand six hundred and twenty-eight. The edifice is enfort, which looks well from the sea, consists of five sides, closed in an area by a heavy stone wall, twenty feet high, four of which are equal, but the fifth is considerably eight hundred and thirty feet from east to west, and six

I saw twenty dancing girls attached to this temple, gateway and beliry, built of stone and mortar, the works some of whom really displayed much grace and elegance P.M., having got through the inner channel, par hazard, We now stood out to sea, going at the rate of about fortunately without striking on the rocks; and lucky nine miles an hour. It was one of these glorious evenings enough we were, for the water in the passage was barely so peculiar to the East, and which we in vain look for in sufficient to allow the Fly to float. Did not go on shore our own gloomy climate; a more beautiful sight than the at Kayts, but transferred ourselves on board a canoe with heavens presented to our view I never in my life before a house on it, which had been sent to take us to Jaffna. Scarcely had we been seated ten minutes, when, to our June 1st .- Wind still from the south-west, and blowing amazement and horror, we saw the outrigger in the air, strong; put out our tackle and caught a fine fish, of about and the canoe, consequently, almost over on the other fourteen pounds weight, which the men called a snook; side. We rushed out, leaned on the side of the boat at 2 r.m. made the coast of India, at a place called Killi- which was out of the water, and, to our great satisfaction, care, and at three wore off Ramisseram; took a pilot, got succeeded in righting it. The wind continuing to increase, through the passage, and stood for the Temple, which with tide against us, and our sails having become shreds even at that distance had a most magnificent appearance, and tatters, it was no wonder we run aground; the Immediately afterwards, the wind veering round, we ran dhoney, however, now overtook us; we got on and proaground of a coral-reef, but a canoe pushed off from a ceeded very well for about three miles, when we struck on After a long walk through the sand and jungle, I suc in getting off, we took down all sail, and poled along for dhoney. When arrived at our friend's house it was past June 2nd .- Having weighed anchor at six, we got off eleven, and we sat down to dinner at midnight, after hav-Ramisseram Temple at eight, and certainly the lofty ing passed a most fatiguing day, replete with difficulties

June 3rd .- Went to see the commodious fort of Jaffna. just and exact description of this temple,) "a low gallery, It is built in the figure of a pantagon, with five bastions, one hundred and forty-four feet in length, with three rows and furnished with broad ditches and extensive glacis. One side runs parallel to the strait which separates the peninsula of Jaffna from the remainder of Ceylon, while an open and well-cultivated plain environs the other sides. A large square occupies the centre of the fort, the interior of which is a plot of grass, enclosed with rails, and bounded the two ends of the pagoda exactly correspond. The gal- by streets of excellent houses, shaded by majestic trees. lery, at the same time, runs down the centre of the Tem- On one side of the square stands a large church of Dutch ple, seven hundred and eighty-feet; and entrances of a architecture, and built in the form of a cross. At right like nature, leading from the north and south, complete angles is situated the Commandant's house, a very roomy the figure of a cross over the ractangular oblong space. All and excellent building. The officers' quarters occupy the the galleries have on each side trible rows of massy stone third, and barracks for private soldiers the fourth side. pillars, of highly-wrought workmanship; those in the The town stands a quarter of a mile to the eastward, front line are the largest and most superb, having a huge The houses are neat and clean, and appear the more so lion, with the mouth wide open, sculptured in bas-relief, from the complete whiteness of the outer walls. The above three distinct capitals, over which stand a scroll, and principal street runs through the centre of the town, on a richly ornamented cornice. Statues of the size of life the high road from Jaffna to Trincomalce. It is finely are attached to many of those pillars, raised on pedestals, shaded on each side by rows of large trees, towering above are included under the description of Malabars; the most nity of exhibiting my skill which I could not resist. I swear him as a Protestant.

collecting the salt as it forms there. It is disposed of for house. 2d. the parah (forty pounds) to government, who afterwards sell the same quantity to the bazaar people for first Tappal or post station on our journey, at a distance about 2s. This monopoly extends over the whole island, of six miles from Doric. The road, for leagues and with the exception of the Kandyan provinces. The temp-leagues along the coast, is composed of broken cystertations to smuggling are very great, and consequently, on shells: dig as deep as you please, you will find the lowest the part of Government, the strictest vigilance is necessary, strata of the soil to consist almost entirely of them. Madras, Calcutta, and other parts of the Indian continent | Slept at Kalaar, and left on the 14th for Kallenesselle, import vast quantities of this salt.

mission; I examined the school, books, and philosophical come larger and more beautiful. At this village there is a apparatus, &c.: had the classes assembled, and was both phenomenon of a carious nature: close to a tank situated astonished and delighted at the information they displayed, in the vicinity, pioneers have dug to the depth of twenty-The pupils of the highest class would do credit to an es- five feet, and come to salt water, at a distance of twenty tablishment in England.

ach

the

ith

are ec-

de,

oof

or.

wo

engh, aix

ole,

ice

nd-

his er n;

4, rd,

ky

ly

re

th

ıa.

ur

ir,

er

at

n,

he o-

is

d

or

ie st

v.

e. n

A

s. h

t

y

which brought me, for about three shillings, to Ponnoryn, pretty little elephant about six months old, on which he the first stage on the Colombo road, six miles from Jaffna. rides. This is only one of the numerous instances of the The rest-house it possesses is an excellent building, and docility these animals display; but this gentleness is, I delightfully cool. Walked to the beach, and never had a believe, peculiar to the elephants of Ceylon, and on that more fatiguing expedition, short as it was, for the road account they are much prized on the continent of India. was nothing but loose with sand. Breakfasted, dined, and At Paomadoo I obtained some nuts of a very curious deslept at Ponnoryn, and started on Monday, the 11th, with scription, and which serve all the purposes of a filtering baggage, coolies, &c., for Polloirorogenpadoe, a distance machine; for if they be rubbed on the bottom of a chatty said to be only sixteen miles, but my experience tells me a (an earthen vessel to hold water) and the filthiest water be very different story.

We left this place at half-past two o'clock, I on horse-fectly clear. back, with chu'e-bearers and sixteen coolies. The greater part of this stage is sandy, with almost impenetrable jun-miles, where we arrived at ten o'clock. At this village gle on either side. At about half-past six we got into open the natives were extremely attentive; without any comcountry, where I had some splendid galloping after deer, pulsion exercised on our part, they built a little bungalow In my life I never met with so much game as I did this for us and stabling for our horses, and brought honey, day-the number completely bewildered me. I saw two rice, and cakes for us to eat. We passed by an old fort, extremely beautiful peacocks, and I determined to make one of those which the King of Kandy constructed round one of them my own, when at the moment I presented the neighbourhood of Anaradjahpoorah, to defend the about a dozen of hares jumped from under my feet, and a passes where the jungle is at all thin. The commands of fine deer bounded at the same instant from the jungle, these forts were vested in Singalese noblemen. On our Not being able to make up my mind at which to fire, I route to Anaradjahpoorah, where we arrived at six, we were did not fire at all. We arrived at Illipekadoeire, an awmet by the chief priest, the chief headman, a rebel, but who fully long twelve miles, at about nine. Started at six, r.s. had been pardoned in co. sideration of his after services, for Vertiltivoe, an indifferent rest-house, and had some and a posse of tom-tom beaters. capital shooting.

and a half; shot a fine peacock, some partridges, and hares, nasty. The remnants of this city strongly reminded me amid the plains and jungle. Arrived at Mantotte at nine; of those of the cities of Egypt, from the immense labour a good rest-house, originally part of a Portuguese church, and time that must have been consumed in constructing In the evening went to Aripo; saw a great quantity of those monuments of art, which are now but a mass of gigame, and killed some hares.

the houses, which are only one story high, but raised a within four miles of Aripo; you then come in sight of the few steps from the ground on a paved terrace. Although sea till you arrive at Bengalle, a village remarkable for the the country about Jaffna is flat, the richness of the soil virulence with which the cholera there rages. In a pond and the beauty of the scenery render its appearance ex- in its vicinity I saw some hundreds of alligators sporting ceedingly picturesque. The native inhabitants of Jaffna and amusing themselves; here was a favourable opportunumerous profess the Hindoo religion; the remainder took aim, fired, and I think did some execution. So consists of nominal Christians, with a small portion of occupied were we in our sport, that we missed our way, Mahometans. Of these nominal Christians-nominal in and did not arrive at the Doric, a mile and a quarter from the true sense of the word-Mr. North relates a curious the village of Aripo, till almost eight. The Doric was anecdote. In one of his progresses through the island, built by Governor North, twenty-five years ago, after a he had occasion to examine a man upon oath, and asked Doric temple. It is a very pretty and chaste piece of ar-him of what religion he was: he replied, "A Christian." chitecture, and was erected for the officers of the pearl "Of what sect?" "A Dutch Christian." "You believe, fishery. The exterior is covered with chunam, (a species then, in Buddah?" "Yes, certainly." Mr. North did not of lime made of burnt oyster-shells,) which has almost as good an effect as marble. The interior is small and in-June 5th .- At about five I drove out to see the Pans, convenient, and is now used not only for the purpose for situated at about two miles' distance, and found the men which it was originally intended but also as a rest-

On the morning of the 13th we started for Kalaar, the six miles farther on. Now the jungle assumes a totally June 6th .- I devoted this day to visiting the American different character-the iron, satin, and chony trees be-miles from the sea.

June 9th.—Left my friend's house, in his gig, at three, A.M., for the wharf, where I embarked on board a dhoney, of mine, stationed here with a division of pioneers, has a then poured in, the liquid will in a short time become per-

June 15th.-Left at six for Aleaporbe, distant sixteen

June 16th .- I was this day busily occupied in inspect-June 12th .- Pursued our way on to Mantotte, six miles ing the ruins of this ancient capital of the Kandian dygantic ruins. In the first place saw sixteen hundred pil-The road from Mantotte is chiefly over large plains, till lars which, tradition says, supported one of the palaces of the king, consisting of nine stories, the whole surmounted company are accounted, of all other, the greatest and by a brass roof. The next objects that engaged my atten-chiefest, each having his residence in a several pagoda: tion were the dagobahs, in number four, two of which are about 270 feet in height; they are solid structures of brick, in their hands, to scare away flies from them; but very at one time covered with chunain, but which has now al- fine as they can make themselves. most entirely fallen off. The solid contents of one of the largest is about 416,071 cubic yards; with the materials thousands of ladies and gentlewomen, such as are of the of which a wall might be built, twelve feet in height, two best sort of the inhabitants of the land, arrayed in the in breadth, and ninety-seven miles in length! This may bravest manner that their ability can afford, and so go give some idea of the labour that must have been expended hand in hand, three in a row; at which time, all the beau-in constructing some of the ornaments which adorned the ties in Zelone, in their bravery, do go to attend upon their ancient city of Anaradjahpoorah.

called "Neura Wera," or the king's tank, and the embank-top of them, and adorned with boughs and branches of ment with which it is surrounded bears testimony that the cocoa-nut trees, hanging like fringes, and lighted lamps builders must have been well acquainted with the general all along on both sides of the street both by day and night. laws of mechanics. Having had the jungle cleared away, we discovered, among other things, two large pillars, two see these festivals performed, with their soldiers after them; feet square; stone figures beautifully carved; a slab of and in this manner they ride all around about the city, stone twenty-four feet long; and two pieces of stone, once by day and once by night. This festival lasts from which some thought to resemble carees, and others ele- the new moon until the full moon. phant's trunks; the larger was sixty-one feet long.

On the 20th and 21st, thousands of persons came into the town, the majority women, chiefly from the seven Korles, with their offerings for the temples, and with hands uplifted, bearing leaves, they passed the day in going from temple to temple, paying their adorations to the god Boodh. thus describes the one he witnessed in Kandy:

"The priest bringeth forth a painted stick, about which strings of flowers are hung, and so it is wrapped in branched zeal and devotion would prompt them to do. silk, some part covered, and some not, before which the people bow down and worship, each one presenting him with an offering, according to his free will; these free-will honour; in the which there are several pieces of their suofferings being received from the people, the priest takes perstitious relics and a silver pot; which, just at the hour his painted stick on his shoulder, having a cloth tied about his mouth to keep his breath from defiling this pure piece of wood, and gets up upon an elephant all covered with white cloth, upon which he rides with all the triumph that king and kingdom can afford through all the streets of the city, but before him go first some forty or fifty elephants with brass bells hanging on each side of them, which tingle as they go.

"Next follow men dressed up like giants, which go dancing along agreeable to a tradition they have, that anciently they were huge men, that could carry vast burthens, and pull up trees by the roots, &c.; after them go a great multitude of drummers, trumpeters, and pipers, which make such a great and loud noise, that nothing else besides them can be heard; then followeth a company of men dancing along; and, after these, women of such castes or trades as are necessary for the service of the pagoda, as potters and washer-women; each caste goeth in companies by themselves, three and three in a row, holding one another by the hand, and between each company go drummers, pipers, and dancers.

"After these comes an elephant with two priests on his back; one whereof is the priest before spoken of, carrying the painted stick on his shoulder, who represents. 'Allout neur Dio;' that is, the God and Maker of heaven and earth. The other sits behind him, holding a round thing, like an umbrella, over his head to keep off sun and rain; then, within a yard after him, on each hand of him, follow two other elephants, mounted with two other priests, with a priest sitting behind, each holding umbrellas as the former; one of them represents 'Cotteragom Dio,' and the other, 'Potting Dio.' These three gods that ride here in and arrived there in a high fever.

"Behind go their cook-women with things like whisks

"Next, after the gods and their attendants, go some gods in their progress about the city. Now are the streets Among the numerous tanks in the neighbourhood, one also all made clean, and on both sides all along the streets was particularly remarkable for its immense size. It is poles stuck up, with flags and pennons hanging at the "Last of all go the commanders, sent from the king to

"Formerly the king himself in person used to ride on horseback, with all his train before him, in this solemnity,

but now he delights not in these shows.

"Always before the gods set out to take their progress, they are set in the pagoda door a good while, that the people may come to worship and bring their offerings unto This must have been the grand festival which, Knox says, them; during which time there are dancers playing and took place in June, and which is called the Perahar. He showing many tricks of activity before him; to see the which, and also to show themselves in their bravery, occasions more people to resort hither than otherwise their

> "Two or three days before the full moon, each of these gods hath a palanquin carried after them to add unto their of the full moon, they ride out into a river and dip full of water, which is carried back with them into a temple, where it is kept till the year after, and then flung away; and so the ceremony is ended for that year.'

> Such is Knox's description of this feast; the one I saw was, I must confess, sadly deficient in all the paraphernalia therein described, but we must recollect that the perahar he saw took place in the year 1664, when the interior of Ceylon was under a native sovereign, and almost all the Singulese professed the tenets of Buddhism; while the one I beheld took place, when no King of Kandy existed, and when Christianity had, in a measure, superseded the ancient religion of the country.

> June 19th.-Went up one of the dagobahs, from whose summit I had an extensive view and delightful prospect; inspected the ruins of the city, but discovered nothing of any very great interest or importance.

June 22nd.-We started for Mahantele, twelve miles from Anaradjahpoorah. I ascended the rock on which the temples are situated; saw many monuments and inscriptions.

June 23rd.—Reached the next stage, called Terrapan-Kadoerella, a most uninteresting spot.

June 24th.—Departed for Mannesvera, where I was obliged to get into a carriage, called a monsheel, as my head ached most violently.

June 25th .- Proceeded on to Nickrimaine; felt worse. June 26th.-Left for Dambool, and immediately I arrived there went to bed.

June 27th .- Started for Matelle; arrived there at twelve, and felt so unwell that I was obliged to have twenty-four ounces of blood taken from me. At five left for Kandy, From the New Monthly Magazine.

THE LAST IN THE LEASE.

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

news."

spin at the same time."

you tell us. Who ever expected you to read and spin at you see wrong in others, mend in yoursel?-what you see quired so earnestly if he was ill, and what troubled him, wrong in others, mend in yourself:-is that the news,

nd

ne

he

he

go

u-ir

tm

to

of

pe

it.

to 1;

y,

14

d

e

r

e

f

"Just let me go over it a bit first," said Grace, intending doubtless to refer to the paragraphs on fashion, as all hair, and at last came and stood at her side. girls in Ireland and out of Ireland invariably do. "Sure, I'm not so fond of spending my time at anything of the sort." She continued looking over column after column. Mick-he'll mind you, may be. until at last she came to a name she thought she had heard her uncle speak of.

"Did'nt you know one James Kenneth, uncle?"

"To be sure I did, Grace. What has honest Jemmy been after to be put on the paper?"

"He's dead, uncle."

"The Lord be good to us!" ejaculated the old man; "James Kenneth was fifteen years to the good younger than me !- My poor Grace !"

astonished at her uncle's earnestness.

"Not much to be sure, -and yet you had, Grace, as a body may say."-

"But what's very strange, uncle, is, that just under his death, is the death of his son Thomas,-a young man in his seventeenth year!"

Grace was so intent on the paragraph, for people are always touched by the deaths of those who are nearly their feelings taking another turn, and glad of escape by words own age, that she kept her eyes fixed on the paper, and it was some minutes before she perceived that a deadly palor had overspread her uncle's countenance. She sprang from her seat, when she looked up, and flinging her arms round his neck, inquired if he was ill.

I have observed the manifestations of joy and grief in the inhabitants of many lands. The Scotch are wisely taught from infancy to subdue their feelings; they bring them at an early period of life under a quaker-like subjection, which, though decidedly advantageous to them selves, shadows a coldness upon the feelings of others.-The expressions of English sympathy, or anxiety, though the sincerest in the world, are blunt and ungraceful. You you?" feel that those of French tenderness are tricked and garlanded with a view to effect; their tears are shed after a form-their sorrow is made picturesque. But the anxiety, omadawn as your brother!" the earnestness, the truthfulness of Irish sympathy -sorrow-tenderness-burst uncontrolable from the heart,the young heart I should say, for old hearts learn how to VOL XXVIII. MARCH, 1836-33.

regulate their feelings, and it is well they do, for otherwise they would go hackled and tortured to their grave. To one accustomed only to the well-bred griefs of modern society, the earnest and gushing sympathy with which an "Why, then, Grace, where was the good of all the Irish girl enters into the joys, griefs, hopes and fears of larning I gave you, girl darlint, if you won't read us what's those she loves, presents quite a new and delightful readon the paper; sure it's pleasant, at times to hear the ing of human nature,-it is most beautiful and eloquent in its character? She loses all consideration of self-"Uncle, dear, sure it's all the pleasure in life I'd have she weeps-she laughs-because those she loves weep or in accommodating you," replied Grace, still continuing to laugh. She forgets that she is a separate creation-and twirl her wheel. Only that, you see, I can't read and feels if created for her friends-friends?-the word is all too cold to express her devotion, it must be seen to be un-"What news you tell us," persisted Corny Burnett, or derstood-excited, or it can never be appreciated as it deas he was commonly called "Black Burnett;" "what news serves. Grace Brunett was a creature of smiles and tears -a sunbeam or a shadow. She had never been seen to the same time? And indeed, dear Grace, its glad of an frown, though she was often sad, because her uncle was excuse I'd be, set aside the reading, to get you from your at times moody, even to ill-temper-the neighbours said wheel; the bur and the twirl of it's never out of my eyes they sometimes pitied her: had they understood the happiness she felt in soothing his irrations, they would have "Read the news—read the news," reiterated the half enviced her delight when saying—"No one can please my idiot boy Michael, who had been staring into the turf fire, dear uncle half as well as I." Grace was proud of the his dog curled round his feet, and his long, bony fingers influence her affectionate gentleness had gained over Black clasped over his knees. "Read the news, Grace. What Burnett. And now, when she hung round him and inshe thought her heart would break at his silence; even her idiot brother seemed to sympathize with her-he fidgetted on his seat, looked at her, shuffled his fingers through his

> "Something's come entirely over him that I've no skill in," she said at last, despairingly .- " Mick, speak to him,

"What you see wrong in others, mend in yourself;" muttered the ideot.

"Ay, Grace-my poor Grace-and that's it sure enough;" said her uncle, recovering from his stupor,-" that's it !the sarmon that poor natural preaches was evermore in my ear, and may-be that was the reason it did not reach my heart- What you see wrong in others, mend in yourself.'-Wasn't I constant at Mr. Hanway of Mount Grove, to get a lease of years, instead of lives, for his farm ?-"Why, what had I to do with him?" inquired the girl, did'nt I worry Mr. Magnire till he had a lease properly drawn; -and when forty acres of the best arable land in the county went clean out of the hands of Nicholas Cruise, who passed so many censures on his carclessness as Black Burnett ?"

"What you see wrong in others, mend in yourself,"

again said Michael.

"By the blessed saints !" exclaimed Burnett, his agitated or violence, "if you repeat that to me again, you poor tantalizing ill-featured fool! I'll find if there's any brains in your skull!—I'ts a purty thing for you to be reproaching me, that nursed you since you come out of your shell." Michael and Snap paired off in the chimney-corner, and Grace burst into tears.

"Ay, cry ;-you may well cry, Grace, but it's no use. I'm ould, and almost helpless, and God only knows"continued the farmer, as he paced up and down the spacious kitchen, which his father and grandfather had trod before him-"God only knows how long I may be in the land of the living; and then, Grace, what is to become of

" Me, uncle ?"

"Ay, you, uncle !- why you're growing as great an

Grace feared to ask a question, but still the tears rained down her cheeks.

"Haven't you heard me say, that I had three lives in the Thomas,-Thomas, who was born the same year as you, sure to know them again." my poor Grace,-and-but the Lord forgive me, what an ould sinner I am !- Tom Kenneth cut off, as a body may thing here is to be liked -andsay, in the very bud of his youth-the same age as you, miliarly at Grace, "loved, for the matter of that-but-Gracy,-within a week the same age,-yet he is taken,a fine, strong, healthy boy—he is taken—and you, a deli "It's a wild night, and I'm t cate, weakly girl, but the delight and treasure of your an air of the fire," said Burnett. uncle's heart-you are left upon the earth, and in my own house, to bless it, as you have always done; —God the stranger, walking under the shadow of the wide chim-forgive me my sins!—but I was always a passionate man ney, and spreading out his hands to the heat, which Grace -hot, and hasty,-you'll forgive me, my child?"

adoption; and in the twinkling of an eye, the sorrow passed from her lovely face-quicker than she could wipe away

the tears.

"Sure, thanks be to God, I've heard you say that your inquired Burnett. own life's in the lease, and sure that's to the good still, and will be, please the Almighty, for many a long day to come. And, uncle dear, maybe the landlord would still renew it upon years ;-and even if he didnt, don't fret on our account, for-

Before she could finish her sentence there was a loud knock at the cottage door; Snap, in his cagerness to investigate the character and demands of the visiter, overturned the wheel, and without heeding the mischief he had done, poked his snub nose through an aperture in the post, and growled angrily. The doors of Irish cottages are seldom fastened; indeed, during the last month, notwithstanding what is called in England "the disturbed state of the country," I slept more than a week in the house of a Conservative gentleman, residing in the midst of a Catholic community, whose doors and windows were never disfigured by bolt, bar, or lock, though the house was known to contain much plate, and some fire-arms. I question if this could occur in any part of undisturbed England!

before Brunett had time to raise the latch, but Grace, as here as if I had lived in the parish all my life! Every her uncle turned to do so, made time enough to whisper stick of your furniture I feel as used to as if it had been Michael, "If you'll be a good boy, and not repeat what my own!" vexed uncle just now, for three days, I'll give you a rosycheeked apple, and butter to the potatoes for a week."just in time to say "Kindly welcome," illustrated by a holy water that hung at the head of her humble bed, sprinpretty curtesy to the muffled up stranger, who was now kied herself with it; wetting her fingers again, so that on standing in the midst of the apartment. He was a stout her return to the kitchen she might convey a few drops to thick-set man, whose blue great-coat, strong brogues, and her brother's person: her uncle wore a scapular, so she well fitting beaver, told of his belonging to the "warmer" considered him safe. portion of the commonalty;-his "shillclah" was more carved than as it is usually seen in a countryman's hand, information?" questioned Burnett, as he seated himself and when he politely removed his hat, his brown cluster opposite his mystifying guest, who on Grace's return was ing hair curled around a handsome, yet disagreeable coun- scated also. tenance; -at least, so Grace considered it, -she thought of the simile in the mock sermon she had just read, of "a ways the case, I'll answer you-I dreamt it!" Upon this look being as bad as a process;" and after dusting a chair there was a loud exclamation, and a general crossing sucwith her apron, and pushing it towards him, she waited, ceeded. Their visiter looked round and smiled. "Do not expecting that he would speak in reply to the friendly be ashamed of your religion, my good friends; I have greetings he had already received. He stood, however, been in many countries, and one religion's as good as in his old position, looking alternately at Burnett, at Grace, another if it's acted up to; that's my belief. Cross yourat Michael, and then investigating, with curious eye, every self again, my pretty maid, and you too, Master Burnett, article of furniture in the kitchen—the delf neatly ar- and I will tell you how it was; but first let me ask, is there ranged upon the dresser—the three deal chairs—the stools not a deep line of sand-pits near this, a little way off the and "bosses"—the noggins—the settle—the wheel, that road leading to the left? most unusual piece of furniture in an Irish cottage,-a small work-table, and a neat book-shelf " facing the dresser,"-all were carefully scrutinized-until at last Burnett tree a few perches farther on?" became annoyed at his visiter's rudeness, and in a rough "There is!" responded the same voices.

new lease of this place,-James Kenneth, and his son tone said, "he hoped he liked all he saw, for he would be

"Ay," replied the man; "like to be sure I do-every -" his eyes glanced fahe passed, and looked around again-and again.

" It's a wild night, and I'm thinking you'd better take

"Thank ye, so I will; it feels very comfortable," said had increased by the addition of some "sods" of turf .-The old man kissed the daughter of his heart and of "The boy-a natural-the dog," he continued, talking aloud, and yet as if to himself; "the dog-the pretty girl every thing exactly as I saw it-it is very strange!

" May I make so bould as to ask what is so strange?"

"Everything-everything here," he replied, turning his back to the fire, and again surveying the apartment.

"Nothing out of the common, Sir, barring Grace's little work-table-a compliment from the carpenter," observed the simple-minded man, while Grace blushed beautifully at the alluison to her-(truth will out)-her lover!

"Stranger and stranger still," resumed the traveller; and that that young lady's name should be Grace!"

"Young lady!" repeated Burnett; "she's an honest men's daughter, and a good little girl, but no lady."

" She's your niece, and that poor fellow's your nephew, and that dog's name is Snap, and your name is Corncy Burnett,commonly called Black Corney, or Black Burnett."

"Holy Mary defend us!" ejaculated Grace, crossing herself; even Mick opened his large brown eyes; while their uncle said, "Why then it's known you must be among the neighbours, though you're strange to me, and

"I have walked seventeen miles since I entered a house -I was never in this part of the world before-and I was The visiter opened the door at which he had knocked, born in foreign parts; and yet I am as much at home

Black Burnett crossed himself as he turned to look round his cottage, and Grace slid slily out of the kitchen into Mick laughed with delight, and Grace finished her speech her little chamber, and dipping her fingers in the vase of

"Why then, may I ask again how you gained your

"Indeed you may," he replied; "and what's not al-

"There is!" replied the uncle and niece together.

"And-now mark me! is there not a very large elin valley?"

" You do !"

with a bridge over it?"

"There did run a stream there," said Burnett; " but trary to nature and Act of Parliament; so that now there's a bridge without any water under it."

The traveller's countenance fell, but it brightened immeare the ruins of an old abbey; and under the south window of that abbey stands a broad, flat, marble stone?"

"Ay, true enough," said Burnett; "I've pegged my top on it many a time when I was a boy."

"Peter Pike, then, has not turned that stone into his milldam," persisted the stranger smiling; " and as it re- the direction of the gravel pits. mains there-why, my friend, our fortune's made-that's me into it yet," said Burnett.

"The time's not come for telling all; I have said enough to prove to you, that without ever having been here before, I knew exactly what I have told, and more too, which, when I have had some refreshments, you shall

What the Irish peasant has to give, he gives freely, be it much or little. Hospitality has been called the virtue of savage life; be it so; its exercise is delightful to the wayfarer. As the evening advanced, it was evident to be on the edge of the gravel pit, had you not better that notwithstanding Grace's desire to hear all the walk next to it? you know it, and I don't." stranger had to communicate, he was not disposed to gratify her curiosity, and she and her brother were soon dismissed to their beds. There was a half-finished closet inside Grace Burnett's little room, which served (if truth must be told) as the nursing chamber of a pet calf, which she was rearing with more than ordinary care; for the sha'nt put off ould uncle then with a bottle of whiskey; creature was milk white, devoid of spot or blemish, and I'll have a whole cask! Whir, man alive! can't you walk the stranger was to occupy Mick's bed, the poor natural and there's good six feet wather in the bottom of it. There, was content to share the calf's straw; but when his sister just where the moon shines, is the elin-tree, andwent to cover him with a supernumerary blanket, she found dog, and his eyes staring with the expression of one who tended victim, but that Michael-the half-idiot Michaellistens attentively.

"Go to sleep, Michael."

"Whisht!" exclaimed the boy, holding up his finger.

"What ails you, Astore?"

" Whisht!" he again repeated.

"Lie down, Michael."

"No, no;-I saw-whisht!-I saw what Lanty Pike strange man's breast-I saw the muzzle of it-he! he! then whirling it round his head. Uncle's the fool, if uncle trusts him-whisht!"

The astonishment occasioned by the stranger's story at a tone of voice, that the inebriated Burnett noted the once faded from Grace's mind; but if it did, her first im- change, and turned to look at his companion. pression revived with tenfold strength. How was her unwith the traveller's dream, or the broad flat stone in the a pistol from his vest. old grey abbey?-Her spirit sunk within her. A titheof her chamber, she put her eye close to the latch-hole, sides, what use have you for the fire-arms?" and saw to her astonishment her uncle evidently prepar-

"And when you pass that, you descend a steep green escape the girl's observation, that the whiskey bottle was nearly empty, and that though the stranger was perfectly sober, her uncle's cheek was flushed and his step unsteady. "At the foot of the valley runs a bright clear stream, She was about to let them see that she was not gone to bed, and to entreat her uncle not to go forth that night, when she remembered that their cottage was "a good step Peter Pike turned it into his milldam, as I told him, con- from any other dwelling, and that if their mysterious guest intended violence, he could easily overpower a halfdrunken man and a feeble girl; poor Michael was always counted as nothing. She saw her uncle take up his spade diately, and he continued, "And farther down that stream from out the corner, and notwithstanding the stranger's entreaties to be permitted to carry it, she was pleased to observe he persisted in his determination to bear it himself. A tremor she could not account for came over her, as they closed the outer door, she nearly fainted.

Black Burnett and his visiter proceeded on their way in

"You're sure of the road?" inquired the stranger.

"Am I sure that this is my own hand?" replied Bur-"I don't see—I don't understand—You've not insensed nett; "first the gravel pits—then the bridge—no, then the einto it yet," said Burnett. stone! Ah! what will the neighbours say, when Grace flourishes off to mass on a side-saddle? and to think of you bringing me such news just as I'd got into doldrums about the lease. Three days-three nights, I mean-since you dreamt of the goold?"

" Three exactly."

"Under the flat stone ?"

" Ay! do let me carry the spade; and see, as we seem

"I thought you said you war up to every turn of the

crag, through the drame?"

" Ay, to be sure; but give me the spade."

"I tell you I won't; hav'n't you the bag that's to carry home the red goold? Lord, how they will all stare! Grace consequently regarded with superstitious tenderness. As straight, as I do ? you almost had me over the edge of the pit,

In all human probability the word would have been his him sitting, his arms enfolding the neck of his favourite last, for the murderer's grasp was on the arm of his inwith a whoop and a halloo, bearing a lighted stick in his hand, rushed so closely by them that the sparks of his wild brand starred the stranger's coat; while Snap, hearing his master's voice, barked either in glee or anger.

"Hurroo! hurroo! Uncle, uncle, here's the light for your's or the devil's pipe! Hurroo! night-rovers-ill gatherers! hurroo!" and shouting and jumping, Michael kept kills the birdeens with, peepin', peepin', peepin' in the before his uncle, now tossing his torch into the air, and

" Send the cub to his den," said the stranger, in so fierce

" Send the idiot home," he continued, " or by the Lord, cle to make his fortune? What connection could be have I'll send him somewhere else;" and, as he spoke, he drew

The sight of the weapon sobered the old man in a moproctor had been murdered about two years before, and ment; "Stop, stop!" he exclaimed, "if you hurt a hair of thrown into the gravel pit. Her heart beat feebly within that boy's head, you'll pay for it-that's all. You're no her bosom, and half creeping, half staggering to the door true man to draw a pistol on such a natural as that :- be-

"Use," repeated the traveller; "why, you know your ing to accompany the stranger out, though the night was country has not the reputation of being the quietest in the

r take " said

chim-

uld be

-every

ced fa-

Grace urf. alking ty girl nge?"

ng his s little

served tifully reller ;

honest phew. orney rnett."

ossing while st be e, and house

I was home Every been round into ase of sprinat on ops to o she

your n was ot al-

n this g suco not have od as your-

rnett, there f the e elin

to say anything against the country. I'm thinking you're the storm, the more Michael rejoiced. He leapednot the sort I took you for, -to offer to fire at a poor natu-clapped his hands; he seemed to his sister as if under the ral, whom every man in the parish would fight to protect; impression that his uncle owed his safety to the war of and then to abuse Ould Ireland !"

of you to send that boy home; to trust our secret with an idiot would be absurd in the extreme."

"As to getting Michael in, when Michael would rather be out, I might as well tie a rat with a sugan. There's no darlint, I want to spake a word to ye; it's about the lease, use in gainsaying the poor natural. So I'm thinking the night is so wild, and that craythur so bent upon watching what I'm after, that we'd better go back ;-to-morrow night he doesn't want any of us to know it, because he's always will do as well."

"If you'd just let me frighten him with a flash in the pan, it would send him to bed as gentle as a fawn."

"Flash in the pan! God help you, man alive!whisper of a pistol even would send Michael over the whole town land before you could say Bannacher; and he'd have a crowd round us that would beat a priest's funeral to nothing. No, no; all we've for it to-night is to go back and be asy."

Burnett was determined, and his companion was compelled to submit, after trying in vain to impress upon the farmer's mind, that as it was the third night after the dream it was particularly favourable for such an adventure.

"Sure, the gould is there, and if it has stayed there for maybe a hundred or two years, what's to take it away now, or before to-morrow night?" argued Black Burnett; but I much doubt if the idea would have influenced him, had not the sight of the pistol awoke his suspicions, or as care of him!" he said himself, if something had not "come over him" that turned him homeward.

The next morning the stranger lingered about the cottage, making himself familiar with every winding and path in the vicinity, and trying, as it is called, to " make friends" with Michael. Michael, however, was true to his first feelings, and eyed the visiter as a shy dog may often be observed to regard a person who has treated him secretly with harshness, and yet would wish to be on outward terms of civility. He offered him gingerbread-Michael threw it in the fire; nuts he flung them back into his lap. In the favour of Grace he made no progress either. His compliments were unregarded; and to complete his mortification, the favoured carpenter came there for a day or two. He could not help thinking that the carpenter had been sent for either by Grace or Michael, as a spy upon his actions. He saw that every movement he made, every word he spoke was watched, and whatever plan of action he had formed was evidently frustrated for the present. Black Burnett talked to his guest eagerly of the anticipated treasure; whatever suspicions or fears had been awakened in his mind had passed away with the darkness of night, and his habitual incaution and natural obstinacy tended to make him as easy a prey as a murderer could desire. The next night it blew a perfect hurricane—the sort of storm which a strong man cannot stand in-and derful how he knew us all." the thunder and lightning sported in their ferceness with the winds and rain. The door of the cottage was forced in more than once; and as the fire gleamed upon the stranger's face (for he had gathered himself up, silent, moody, and disappointed, in Burnett's chimney-corner). Grace could hardly forbear thinking him the incarnation of an evil spirit. If superstition detracts from our wisdom, it adds to our poetry; it is the high-priest of a poetic mind, and I much doubt if a vivid imagination could exist without it. There is often more genuine poetry in the mind of an Irish peasuch that no one dared venture out; and the more terrific her uncle a lease of years, she more than half persuaded elements, which shook to the foundation their humble "My good friend," interrupted the stranger, "let me beg dwelling. At intervals the visiter and his host would look out upon the night, but it was only to return with discomfited aspects to their seats.

> "Uncle," said Grace, drawing him gently aside, "Uncle, uncle. Matthew (her lover) has tould me that the landlord himself will be passing through Ross to-morrow, and bothered about leases and the like; and you are sensible that no Irish gentleman in the world likes to be tormented about business of any kind-he'd rather let it take its own course without toil; but Matthew says, uncle, that maybe as my mother nursed him, and poor Mike-weak though he is -- is his own foster-brother -- if I watched and could get a glimpse of him, he'd spake to me anyhow."

"I wouldn't be under a compliment to him for the lase," replied Burnett, proudly. " Maybe, Grace, it's more than himself I'll have one of these days,"

" Sure it's no compliment, if we pay the same as another; and you were never a gale behindhand in your life. And, uncle, honey! if it's trusting to drames you are"-

" You're not going to prache to me, are you!" said the impatient man, interrupting her.

"No, not prache, only there's a look betwixt you man's two eyes that has no marcy in it. Uncle, a-cushla-take "You're a little fool-a worse natural than Mike-that's what you are!"

"But you'll take care-and about the lase ?"

"Let me alone, will you? Grace, you're a spiled girlthat's what you are-and it's myself spiled you," replied Burnett, turning again to look out on the night, which, fortunately for him, was worse than ever. It was long past two when the family retired to rest; but Grace's head was too full to sleep. She was up with the lark; a calm and beautiful morning had succeeded the storm. Matthew, her handsome lover, was soon roused from his light slumbers in the barn, and she councilled him long and carnestly upon her plans.

"The terror of that strange man leaves my beart when the daylight comes," said the innocent girl, "and yet I don't like to quit him alone with Mike and uncle. thinks he'd have pitched uncle into the gravel-pits, Thursday night, but for him ;-to be sure, there's no minding

what Mike says."

Matthew thought differently; he said he had observed that, at times, her brother evinced much intelligence.

"The landlord will be in Ross about eleven, you say; and it's a long walk from this. A weary on the drames! But for the dramer, uncle himself would go, I know ;and yet there's truth in them at times-and it was won-

Matthew smiled.

"Can't I go myself, and you stay here ?" she continued. No; Matthew would not do that. What, let her go alone, as if no one cared for her, to meet her young and handsome landlord !- He didn't care about the lease-not he-but, to suffer her to go alone! If she thought it would make her mind easy, his brother Brien, the stonemason, should go to work at the New Pier "fornent" the

That was a pleasant proposal; and in her eager desire sant than critics would deem possible. The weather was to obtain a promise from the landlord that he would grant herself that her fears were imaginary. "At all events," The clear and beautiful ale sparkled, as, after he received she argued, "no harm can happen him in the bames of it, he poured a portion into a measure, and turned towards the blessed sun. I'll be back before night; and if I do the fire with the remainder, inquiring of his companion, but bring the promise-the written promise from the land. "Shall I warm it for you? Would you like it warmed lord-uncle will be in a good humour; and then, maybe with some sugar and spice, as we do in Wales?" -maybe-I'd coax him over to give up the drame, and take a fresh oath against the whisky !"

Poor, poor Grace!

the

r of

ble

ook

dis-

cle,

ase,

nd-

and

ays ible

ted

wn

ybe igh

uld

ie,"

han

er;

nd,

the

n's

ake

at's

1-lied

ich.

ong ead

lm

ew,

mtly

ien t I

ike ITS-

ing

ved

y; es!

on-

ed.

go

nd

not

it

ne-

he ire

ant

led

She wakened Michael, and telling him to take care of his uncle, promised him some fresh gingerbread if he was " a good boy, and kept his promise; and having first left the breakfast ready, set off on her adventure, escorted by as walked far, and the heat and exercise had overpowered him. true a lover and as sensible a friend as ever fell to the lot Another moment, and his destiny on this side the grave of a country-girl.

tive, and industrious;—fond of his home—of his wife, and his uncle's uplifted hand, drank it nearly to the dregs.

children;—worthy to be held up as a pattern to all the "Sorrow catch you for an ill——" but ere Burnett married men in the country, whether poor or rich. I could finish the sentence, his eye rested upon the changed honour Matthew, and think him-(and that is saying a and changing countenance of the stranger. Disappointgreat deal)-as good as any English husband of my ac-ment, rage, anger, and hatred were painted upon his disquaintance. When Black Burnett got up he was not a torted features; painted so vividly, that both the landlady little annoyed at finding that pretty Grace had disappeared and the intended victim exclaimed at the same moment, contrary to his desire; and though he well know the cause " It is poisoned!" of her absence, for once he had the prudence to keep his own council, saying only to his guest that she had gone to of less than a minute; the villain seized the measure, and Ross. During the early part of the day, the visiter walked attempted to throw what remained of the contents into the about as he had done before; but at noon the mason saw fire, but the arm of a strong serving-maiden prevented his a strange boy give him a piece of paper - a note or parcel purpose. He then rushed to the door; but here, again he accompany Black Burnett a little way on the Ross Road, progress. to meet Grace on her return; nor did he object to poor Michael bearing them company. The stone-mason (honest deavouring to draw the pistol from his vest. Brien) thought, after a little time, he would follow in the distance; though from the earliness of the hour, and the poor Michael!" he exclaimed; "lay not a finger near road being much frequented, he had no apprehension of him: for if you do, this hour-this moment-shall be anything wrong; keeping, however, his eyes on the man your last!" he had been cautioned by his brother, and his intended sister, to watch till their return. The two went, to all the stranger, as his presence of mind returned. "Who appearance cheerfully, on their way; the stranger was one talked of poison? If there was poison in the ale, the landwho had seen many countries; he could make himself lady saw that he would not let ME put any thing in it." very entertaining, and nobody loved a jest or a good story better than poor Burnett. Michael stopped occasionally to villages, and a crowd soon collected round and in the gather blackberries, to speak "to a neighbour's child," to house. Amongst them—hurried forward by others, with-"hurrish" the pigs, or to throw stones at the crows which out knowing the cause of the excitement, but accompanied congregated in the fresh-ploughed fields. The brilliant by her lover—came Grace Burnett; on seeing her uncle morning had sobered down into the fine, tranquil autumn she could not resist throwing herself into his arms, and day; the broad-leaved coltsfoot (almost as destructive to the whispering, " I've seen his honour-I've got the promise, cultivator of Irish ground as the superabundant "rag- and his honour's own self is coming this way-run out weed") turned the silver lining of its light-green leaves to the declining sunbeams, and the hedges were gaily decked with rich clusters of the redripe hawthorn-berry.

"I cannot get on any farther without something to Michael." said the stranger, stopping opposite a way-side public-house, which was adorned by the O'Connell arms, girl, turning to her brother. and a most unlike likeness of the Agitator." "You have treated me; now I must treat you."

"I have no objection to a glass of 'rale Cork," ' replied jumping and tossing his arms. Burnett; " but I must not taste more than one, or Grace, the slut, will haul me over the griddle for it."

"I tell you what; have some of Cherry's excellent ale, and if that doesn't warm you, you can have something the public-house, the look of assurance which the stranger short afterwards."

"Something what?" inquired his companion, unaccustomed to English slang.

"Strong, you know. Come, my pretty mistress, a me you were in Dublin." quart of Cherry's best!"

" No, no, do not put it on the fire, I would rather have it as it is," replied Burnett: "Cherry's ale wants nothing but the drinking."

"You see," said the stranger, turning to the landlady, you see he would not let me put anything in it."

In an instant the drought was at Burnett's lips; he had would have been decided; but his time was not yet come, Matthew is a perfect jewel in his way-sober, atten-Michael rushed into the room, and seizing the cup from

What has taken some time to write, was the transaction he could not tell which, it was so "squeeged" between was interrupted by the stonemason, who had quickly their hands; but something of that sort it certainly was, followed their steps; and poor Mike, who, with the strong After dinner the stranger proposed that he should animal instinct of hatred, clung to his legs to impede his

" Fool! idiot! cursed fool!" exclaimed the ruffian, en-

This recalled Burnett to his senses. "My boy! my

"Why do you hold me-what have I done?" inquired

It happened to be fair-day in one of the neighbouring an' make your obedience to him."

"He's a magistrate, thank God!" exclaimed Burnett, rushing to the door. "Grace, for the love o' God, look to

" Michael, what ails you, honey?" said the affectionate

" Nothing, nothing, nothing ails me-they're all foolish -nothing ails Mick-nothing ails Mick," he replied,

" Keep asy-keep asy," said the landlord. "Sure the Doctor's sent for, and will tell us what to do presently."

When Burnett's landlord left his carriage, and entered had assumed changed to one of fixed despair—he seemed like one for whom there is no redemption. "What you, Lawler-accused of such a crime? Your brother told

" My brother ought to have done his own business himself," growled the fellow: "but no one can say I meant who, under the name of "Martin Doyle," has published to hurt the boy."

Burnett's landlord to promise him, that when the last life greater than pure gold. in the lease dropped, he should have the farm upon which the gravel-pits: this failed, by the providential interposition of poor Michael, whose idiotcy was strongly mingled with shrewdness. The villain waited another opportunity, knowing he had a strong hold upon Burnett's superstition and his love of wealth; but that every morning he received the intimation from his brother that it must be done Boyhood, with other Poems and Translations, by Charles A quickly, as the landlord himself was talking of passing through and about his farms, and if once the Burnetts "got speech of him," it would be "all up." He at once decided on using poison, and we have seen how it was prevented from taking effect upon his intended victim; had any evidence been wanting, the remains of arsenic found in a paper on his person-his brother's letter, which the stone-mason had seen him receive-the contents of the beer when analyzed by a neighbouring doctor, who unhappily did not arrive until p or Michael had felt that something more than uaual "ailed" him,—were all proofs of his guilt; but it is impossible to imagine anything more vehement, more terrible, than the excitement which prevailed amongst the country-people, while the poor idiot was suffering the agonies of death. It was difficult to prevent their tearing the culprit to pieces. The fact of his wanting to take land over another man's head would have been enough to rouse their indignation; but when they saw the simple, inoffensive creature, whose gentle words, and good-natured though witless offices, had endeared him to every cottager, their wrath knew no bounds.

" It's a lesson to the landlord to see after his tenants himself, that, I hope, he'll not forget," said one. "Sure the God of heaven, if he lifts the dews from the earth, sends it back again in rain; but everything is took from full measure of its verse the burning indignation of satire.

poor Paddy, and nothing returned !"

" Lift me to the air, Gracy," whispered the dying boy to his sister: "I know I'll be waked soon; but let poor Snap have the butter and gingerbread you promised me, for I never preached my sermon since, to vex you, Gracy." The hardest and the sternest wept when they saw the poor faithful dog lick his master's purple lips, and saw that master's dying efforts to push from him the thing he cerhurt him-maybe 'twould hurt him !"

Dread and fearful was the oath of exterminating vengeance which Black Burnett swore against the stranger Lawler and his brother, over the body of the dead idiot; but it was not needed-the one paid the forfeit of his crime, and was executed within a month after its committal-the other disappeared, and was never again seen or heard of in the country. Black Burnett abandoned whiskey, and grew rich; but never could bear to hear of people finding money under flat stones.

Matthew and Grace inhabit the dwelling still, though it is far more comfortable than it was; and Snap's descendant cannot find a hole in the door-post to poke his nose through, though he is quite as cross and as curious as his grandsire.

[There are persons now living who remember well the of this story. It was related to me me by a clergyman of every sentiment belonging to it.

hurt the boy."

A variety of little works upon rural and domestic economy the rest is soon told. A favourite steward had induced the value of which, to the Irish farmer and cottager, is

It is singular that while the tale was in the hands of the his heart was set. By bribes and entreaties he prevailed printer—but a few weeks ago—a murder was committed upon his brother—a man of wild and reckless habits—to at Windgap, near Kilkenny, under circumstances very undertake the getting Burnett out of the way. His first similar, and with the same object-a resolve to get rid of plan was to decoy him from home and precipitate him into the last life in a lease. Unhappily, in this case, the attempt was successful.]

From Binckwood's Magazine.

ELTON'S POEMS,

Elton, London.

There are moments, and not the worst of our existence. when we would be at perfect rest with regard to the present and to the future. When even hope has wearied us, and despairing of drawing us one step further, has packed up all the forward schemes of life, and has quietly gone to sleep upon them as her pillow. It is then that, like a rope that has been stretched and loosened, we fly back with avidity into the coils of our past years. The first rebound takes us farthest from the present. We fly back the whole length, and then rest, involved as it were round and round in the recollections of a charmed circle.

It was in such a moment that we took up Mr. Elton's poem of "Boyhood," because its very title fascinated us with the promise of an indulgence so natural to our desires in our hours of relaxation. But we were disappointed. Boyhood is no light, gay, or semi-pathetic enumeration of the joys, sports, minor sorrows, or even affections, of the mysterious age; nor is it, indeed, redolent of spring; but it is a grave, didactic, and philosophical poem. Yet is it pathetic, for it has much feeling, but it is the feeling of the Father, not of the Boy. It is grave as admonition, strengthened by conviction, can make it; and though in its parts of reasoning calm as philosophy could desire, it bears in the

Were Grimalkin to lecture on kittenhood she could not be more indifferent to its gamo ls. Indeed, her own autobiography would exhibit a dead blank of leaves in the greater part of the first of her three volumes. But we have nothing to do with that-we must take up the story just where the author pleases; he has a right to walk round and round his subject, and take what view of it he likes best, all that is required of him on this point being that tainly loved best in the world, murmuring, "Maybe 'twould the view be one, let him take the ante or post position, so that we have not both, or that the subject do not turn its back upon itself. There is not much sense in quarrelling with any titles that authors choose to prefix to their works; they are but euphonous Christian names, having little to do with the inner marrow—and if Montaigne preferred "Coaches," Mr. Elton may take "Boyhood," nor do we think him accountable for our disappointment. Nevertheless, we think that other views of boyhood may be taken than Mr. Eltons, and we would gladly consider the present poem, though it may have a certain completeness in itself, as a fragment from boyhood's larger history. To Mr. Elton such a history may be painful, but he is not the less qualified on that account, and he has shown in other poems, particularly in that most pathetically beautiful elegy "The Brothers," that he has thrown his whole soul, intellect, and affection into the very nature and character excitement produced in the county in which it occurred of boyhood, has sported with it, and wept with it, and for by the appalling event that has formed the ground-work it, and that he knows how to receive and impart the luxury and the ear creates its due wonder. Then the feelings are the laws he wots of, tender, and there is yet so much sweet natural helplessness as serves to keep ever warm and active our affection, to be St. George?" "That I should, papa, very much indeed." "And why?" "Because he has killed the draus, the source of mutual delight.

ed

4

ıs,

to

pe

th

:d

s

e-

d.

of

ne

it

hts

e.

e y d o is g o d e

entific stal

volume, is of the somewhat earlier period of boyhood. It cult to find a better reason for wishing one's self St. is from a painting by Rippingille, and we may be sure, George. O, happy, enviable age !—and so is it that dear boy-therefore, that it is true to nature. There is in it the pe-hood is drinking into his thirsty soul, through eye and ear, culiar expression that boys have when alone, a look of the fine essences of the virtues, that by growth within him, mingled thought and wonder. Boys are, indeed, gregari-under God's blessing, will become perennial fountains of ous creatures, and when in troops, having confidence in love and magnanimity in manhood. themselves and in each other, they are all noise and sport.

"Turning to mirth all things of earth, As only boyhood can."

and intuitive perception. with any exactness, your feelings, your tastes, your im- and judge for yourself. pressions, your desires, your affections. Childhood to But our business is with Mr. Elton's poem of Boyhood, notice, though we doubt not of their being then interest but a very inadequate notion of Mr. Elton's powers as a ing objects; but when alone, if they have not been early poet. spoiled, they excite our wonder, admiration, and love. This poem appears to have two objects in view—the What a fair index of the mind within is "the shining treatment of boys by fathers, and to remove the sting drill the happy lounger into his bolt upright attention. pursuing the second object, his reply to the Tyrocinium, Attention! is there not attention here? Look at the half Mr. Elton has, with great candour, admitted, and forcibly, open mouth, the carnest eye, quick, as gifted with a dou-ble action of looking and conveying intelligence within. bated the false conclusions to which these objections have "And what, dear boy, are you reading?" "The Seven led.

Boyhood! what is the abstract idea of it? Does the Champions of Christendom." "And who is now your Chamword convey an individual portrait, or a compound of the pion ?" "St. George of England." "And how would What is its age? When does it commence? you like to be St. George?" "Not at all." And why?" When depart? It has several stages. The beau-ideal of "Because he's in prison for seven years." Could a more boyhood is somewhere between eight and twelve—though rational answer be given? In your most mature age could it exists before and after that age—but when within those you find a better? Here is a glorious love of liberty. Is years, is invested with its greatest charm. Then is the boy, then, an incipient liberal? Oh no, Heaven forfirst spring of intelligence, when all that meets the eye bid-for he is cheerful in his obedience, and reverences all gon, and rescued a beautiful princess, the King of Egypt's The portrait of the Sweet Boy in the frontispiece to this daughter, and is going to marry her." It would be diffi-

Beautiful boyhood-that link uniting in itself and to itself both parents-half feminine in feature, form, mind, and affection; yet how decidedly masculine in adventurous spirit, that springs at the touch to instant action, and spark-But when quite alone, even in their most delightful idle- ling in the eyes, changes all that was feminine into masness, sauntering and loitering, by geen lanes or village culine energy; and again, at the voice of love and sympahedge-rows, they show no signs of mirth. Watch them thy, melting all that was masculine into tears of gentlest, unseen, and you will find the lips apart, the eye enquiring; most feminine tenderness. Beautiful boyhood, sporting in there is then a look that might be mistaken for pensive, every wind, tossing his sun-lit locks into the darkness of but it is not that, nor is it easy to define; it is, however, the stormiest skies, and bearing his breast to every elesingularly expressive of happiness, the result of sensibility ment-fearless, beautiful boyhood! beloved of nature, who, like a kind schoolmistress, sits upon the hills, and clapsher If you would know what a boy is, find him alone, win hands in joy at his pastime, giving him the earth with all his confidence. There is a depth in him worth your study-lits landscapes, at once for his school and his play grounding; and if he hath been well brought up to love all crea- and then the rocks and woods re-echo his mirth; and then tures, and hath not fallen into birds' nesting, the thrush and in thoughtful liberty wandering away, the quiet nooks enblackbird will not shun him, the little wren will come out close them in their greenness, making companions of every from her hiding-place to look at him, for his eye hath not thing, animate and inanimate-endowed with beauty, yet acquired the look of command or cruelty, that any searching with a worshipping curiosity into every leaf and living thing should fly from it. He bears about him much flower about his path, while the boughs bend to him, and of the sanctity of purity that Adam had when all the creatouch him with their sunshine; picking up lessons for pretures of the earth came to him for their names. If you sent delight and future wisdom, by rivers' sides, by brooks, are a naturalist, where is a nobler object for your scrutiny? in glens and in the fields, inhaling, in every breath he You know not what you yourself were-you cannot recall, draws, intelligence and health. Look at the frontispiece, grown man is in much a sealed book; and if the grave be and why more particularly with that poem we know not, "that bourne from whence no traveller returns" childhood for it is but a small portion of the volume, nor do we think is not unlike it, for once passed, it becomes a period for it the best piece. As it is made the principal in the title, speculation, more than of knowledge-the memory fur- we treat it with the first respect. Admire it we do, greatly; nishing but a few glimpses and a slight picture of that but we think that those who read Boyhood only, because state. Children, boys particularly, in masses, we seldom it is so recommended in the title to the volume, will have morning face." Shakspeare was the best of portrait from the prejudice against public schools, inflicted on many painters here. While we are now writing there sits be- a parental mind by the unhappy Cowper. For the first side us our own dear boy, ætatis suæ 10. Oh, what an point, the examples are Mirabeau and Chateaubriand; and attitude for painter or sculptor! It is neither sitting nor in a note Mr. Elton remarks, "These illustrations were lying, but rounded as a ball, folded up, body and mind, suggested by the able and eloquent reviews of the Memoirs with an enviable flexibility; and there are some who of Mirabean, and the Fragments of Chataubriand's Auwould show their envy by a thump on the back, and would tobiography, in Blackwood's Magazine for 1834." In

The reading public has been saturated with compositions of highly wrought passion, and inconceivable incidents and woful catastrophes have done their best to engender a morbid sensibility, and a distaste for the probable and the rational.

Why must we ever pass over all that is poetical in the and probably never shall or can see. "Nihil humani a rience leads us to doubt the humanity altogether.

power, has ventured once more upon the rational system. tue, in the other of malignity. We are glad to see again a didactic and philosophical

The introduction of the boy is very beautiful, -he comes upon the sight as with a charmed presence, yet not without an omen of the dangers of life that await him.

"And such art thou !- O source of holier joy ! Gifted and wondrous creature! beauteous boy! Fresh to the world, in thy confiding sight All nature gleams with phantoms of delight, They by thy path a watch, like genii, keep, And gild the twilingt of thy charmed sleep; Ah! who, that gazes on thy snow-white bro w Sighs not 'be ever thus! be blest as now!"

This may not be. Beautiful and apparently uncontaminated as the fair creature is, yet is there in the very making of his heart the spot and taint of original sin.

"The curse, that with the blighted earth began, The curse that hath fallen upon the heart of man."

The freedom of will is asserted-Intellect throned supreme to direct, amid conflicting motives-the Passions hurry on the Will, now degraded-the knowledge of ill is acquired.

" Knowledge of ill abridged his forfeit breath, Yet brought him virtue, though it brought him death.

And is, then, all a wilderness within?"

No-the atonement is asserted. The sacrifice of Christ the Redeemer hath

" Made the plea of penitence avail."

The aid of the spirit is maintained, and the mercy of The devastation where it claim'd its share affliction and its power working with grace to regenerate, is at once concisely and powerfully shown.

"Want stries him; sickness robs of bloom his cheek; Grief staggers him, and what was strength is weak; The merciful hath smitten him to earth, And a new nature struggles to the birth; Th' astounded will, then starting from its chain, Compels the motive and resumes the reign.

From this preliminary matter commences the appeal to parents.

" Graved on thy heart let the reflection be, What of his weal or wo depends on thee.

Great tress is laid upon the importance of early impressions, and upon the parent's kindness.

"And see how many a boy's ingenious heart Is sear'd and harden'd by the parent's part. A stranger to the fostering smile that owns Merit where due, the friend's endearing tones; In dens of reckless revelry he flies The stony glitter of those ruthless eyes, False friends beset him."

What are the consequences of such treatment.

" He shrouds him in his melancholy halls; There, musing stern on what he might have been Misanthropy and silence close the scene."

The first illustration, Mirabeau, is indeed a terrible one. world which we see, for that which may be supposed to In the second, Chateaubriand, while Mr. Elton exhibits in be in characters and situations which we never have seen, full force the evil of severe treatment, he does not omit to and probably never shall or can see. "Nihil humani a manifest the power of religion, that has turned even so me alienum puto," is the motto of a wholesome taste; great an evil into good. For misanthropy and revenge we but there are literary extravagances of which our expe-have kindness and magnanimity. Such are the respective fruits of atheism and religion in beings of the highest or-We therefore greatly rejoice that a poet of Mr. Elton's der of genius. Suffering in the one was the school of vir-

Mirabeau, rushing upon his wretched career of revenge from the grave of the suicide, is vigorously described; and his utter impotence in the hour of compunction, the bitterness of his punishment to allay the fury of bloody revolution, should be an awful lesson to the vanity of any man who entertains such conceit of his own power.

"Was then the tumult of those senses hush'd? Was that heart broken and that spirit crush'd? On her bewept, though unblest, grave he cast One melting look, the saddest and the last, Then turn'd him to the world : did earth not quake Ere the dread gamester play'd his fearful stake Was Heaven not shrouded in portentous shade, As onward march'd th' avenging renegade?

When dark eclipse had pass'd o'er Gallia's sun, And the whole frame of nations was undone; He raised, in haughty and vindictive hate, His arm, and smote the pillars of the state. With Tullian accents, bold, impassion'd, grand, He paralysed the great, and fired the land. The high nobility, his father's class, He quash'd and level'd with the common mass; His warning threat upon the platform hurl'd A monarch's head, his gauntlet to the world; Then blood, like water, flowed, scarce yet atoned; Lust, avarice reign'd, and atheism was throned; Innocent gore the sharpen'd axe defiled, That droop'd with life of woman and of child; Till late compunctions in his breast rebel, And foretastes of a vainly-doubted hell. That outstretch'd arm faint struggles to repair The well-poised throne, sure freedom's guard, restore, And the brave chivalry, renown'd of yore; But fear'd, distrusted, where he sought to save, Blindfold he sinks within his yawning grave."

We turn us from the dream of a loathsome charnelhouse, where the fiends Sin and Misery sit and howl in damp and darkness, to the illuminated path of religious truth; it is true that path was beset with gloom, but an angel has bid the prison doors fly open and let in a flood of light; and "Virtue makes herself light through dark ness for to wade."

We cannot forbear quoting the entire passage wherein Chateaubriand is the illustration. We do not recollect to have read any thing more truly graphic than the first part of it; how beautifully contrasted is the mother's affection with the father's harshness. The suspended tale-the cowering children-the stern father poctically left undefined, but by his shadow and his voice, are perfectly ma-gic. The after visit to the "haunt now desolate" most admirably concludes that passage. We know not when we have found so much in so small a compass -- so perfeetly graphic, yet so concise.

" See Chateaubriand !-boyhood's genial mirth Froze in the circle of his cheerless hearth; Behold the nook where cowering children raise Their timid glances by the pine-bough's blaze; Through that antique saloon long shadows fall, As the stern father's steps repace the hall; The steps advance—the mother's whisper'd tale ls hush'd, and the suspended listners quail; The harsh ejeculation sounds—' who speaks?' And paleness quivers on those glowing cheeks; The foot retires—that soothing voice resumes Its murmur'd tone; the cheek, that faded, blooms; O moments! sad, yet sweet! in after years The full-grown man has moistened with his tears That haunt now desolate, and gazing o'er The tarnish'd tapestries that sweep the floor, 'Midst those remember'd shadows sees appear That smile so tender and that mien so dear Then, gliding by those weed-grown courts and trees, Whose boughs, dishevell'd, straggle on the breeze That moans as to his sighs, floats on the tide Of the world's shifting flood, with Heaven his guide.

in

t to 50

we

ive

or-

ir.

ge

nd

er-

lu.

" Were not the native energies represt? The milk of kindness gall within his breast? No—for the light within him shone from high; He knew a father and a friend was nigh. Strong in the strength that mocks at human might, He smiled at contumely, and bore the slight Of a misjudging world; his hands were pure; His path, in indigence and peril, sure. Heart-sick of horrors which his eyes had seen, In a new world, again, he breathed serene; 'Midst those primeval forests he pitch'd his home, And sate on rocks above the cataract's foam; His genius did, in that their cradle, scan The features of uncultivated man; The savage, hanging on his lips, grew mild, And gospel glory dawn'd upon the wild.

" But when these strange vicissitudes were o'er, The patriot noble trod his native shore; On courts he fixed his calm undazzled eyes, Nor power could awe, nor stratagem surprise; Flatteries he spurn'd, threatenings he defied, Nor deign'd to live a bribed liberticide; Contented with his conscience and renown, He laid the symbols of his greatness down; And bared his breast again to meet the blast; In exile feared and honoured to the last. His name shall live, the statesman and the sage, Priest of his faith, and prophet of his age."

These examples of Mirabeau and Chateaubriand are very curious, and afford matter for much thought; both were men of extraordinary power and character. If we ask what effect this austerity had upon their genius or "-Yet vice, precocious, in that hot-bed thrives, their energies, we are forced to admit that, so far from Meek artlessness with strong example strives; the one being crushed, it expanded in both far beyond that Of vice he learns the nature, not the name of men even highly esteemed for that great quality-and He learns that fraud is skill, detection shame; that the latter, their energies, so far from being destroyed, And feigns a villany beyond his years." attained a surprising power. Whence does this arise? The fact is, the danger is not to the genius, but to the He then would reason with the bard of Olney, admitting briand. Undoubtedly every unkindness, every act of in- general result. justice done to the child, is a poison to its mental constitution; Chateaubriand imbibed it largely, but there had overcome, is exposed to dangers, and taught even to seek root within him, and had become a fair plant of power to and from every combat, acquires the better use of his neutralize the worst poison; nay, to convert it into the weapons, and a dauntless courage, and is victor in the growth and strength of Christian manhood. We have but end. VOL. XXVIII. MARCH, 1836 .- 34.

to look to the former example to see the natural effect of such poison if left to itself.

But it does not so work with the intellect; we doubt if it would be generally destructive of that. We can easily conceive that some portion of the greatness in both of these characters was the result of their treatment. The child, the boy, the youth who is thrown back upon himself, is forced to think for himself, act for himself, and inasmuch as he acquires the habit of throwing off all other reliance, he assumes a power peculiarly his own. Hardships harden and give strength to the general powers, yet as often keep the affections tender. Parental kindness, at all times a delight and a duty, carries yet with it authority, influence, and engenders in the object a sense of reliance which, if it be ever present, creates a feebleness, or at least checks a vigorous growth.

Instinct is generally wiser than reason. The old bird forces the timorous young from the nest, and encourages them to make flights from their home. How few men arrive at any excellence until they have been thoroughly freed from parental influence! Few that live with their fathers long show much power; and every one must have observed what surprising steps of advance, in fixed character, men commonly make in a year, or even in a few months, when their parents have been withdrawn from them. There is a time when all reliance upon the will or judgment of others should cease: and we believe that even at an early age we should be practised into decision, by having much left to ourselves, and that increased according to our age and power. These are-as we should collect from the remainder of the poem of " Boyhood," which ably and impartially discusses the point of public education—the sentiments of Mr. Elton. He commences this part of his poem by an affectionate appeal to the Boy, that he should think " the kindless father is a father still," and then to the father that he should not practically too long indulge his affections,

" Nor yield thy heart-strings to those fettering arms," but that he should bear to part with the boy, for whom he anxiously trembles.

"Then wisely lose him, and, recover'd, find The growth unfolded of his former mind. Let him for others form his young esteem, And range with them the groves of Academe; Where dicipline evolves her generous plan, And the boy ripens for the future man.

Notwithstanding this, he does not spare to explore the very depth of the danger immediately in these strong lines :-

temper; not to the intellectual power, but to the whole all. Yet how finely does he show that it is the combat disposition of the mind! nor is harshness necessarily de- with the vices that makes the virtue, and points to the structive to these. It was not so in the case of Chateau general result! And we have no doubt but that it is the

The young boy, like the knight-errant, has much to been dropped in with it a glorious seed, which had taken them-is occasionally worsted; but, from every suffering, We are to live in the world, and must be exercised to And impulses, of no material birth, it; and where can this be better done than in the public That lift the veil of intercepting earth schools, themselves little worlds, where boyhood learns And seas and stars, till visible, th' Unknown decision and firmness, and will not long suffer degradation, but is sharpened into heroism, to endure and to act The poem concludes with an affectionate apostrophe to as his future destiny may require of him? We have known some lamentable failures of the opposite system. whose bright example is the best answer to the Tyroci-One now forces itself upon us of utter ruin, where the youth was taken immediately from a strict religious home, from the daily admonition of parents and pious family Elton's of singular beauty. preachers, to the university. He rushed into the gulph partly from ignorance, and more from feebleness. But we prefer that the reader should hear Mr. Elton.

"What though that lesser field be planted still With scattered tares of intermingled ill; The passions glare with pre-excited fire, Hate, wanton Cruelty, and coarse Desire; With these the spirit strives of lofty aim, Virtue her reverence meets, and vice her shame. All candour honour'd, bared all false pretence, The boy's experience is the youth's defence. Sown in that hardy soil the talents shoot, The great emotions strike the vigorous root There Pride, that spurns the sordid and the low, The steady arm that breaks th' oppressor's blow; The heart that melts at undeserved distress, The hand that hastens with its prompt redress. Launch'd on the world, like barks that brave the winds They mingle dauntless with the strife of minds : Poise the dread balance of the state, or pour The opulence of realms from shore to shore. Not shrinking pale at every ruffling blast, They press right onward where their lot is cast; Make obstacles before their strength recoil, And dare the brave impossible of toil. Pleasure and sloth are shivered at their shock; The vices drop, like foam-flakes from a rock; The weapons they have proved they conquering wield, Men their compeers, the universe their field.'

Mr. Elton very ably draws the reverse of the picture.

"The young anchorite taught To shun communion with his fellow's thought, To shrink from conflict with temptation's host, And make a pious solitude his boast : To tend the culture of the seed within-From love of goodness?-no-from fear of sin."

At length he is forced into life, with his "father's bless ing," and his " mother's tears."

" He joins the crowd; nor yet averse to roam From the dull langour of his lifeless home.

We will not pursue him through Mr. Elton's very powerful description; but we cannot forbear quoting a striking feature of the degradation, which we think beautifully marked.

"The very charities have ceased to bind The breast, that once was link'd to humankind; The very scenes, that charm'd the mind before, The lake, clear-slumbering in its cradling shore, The sun, that hovers in its purple glow On Blanc's dark masses, pinnacled with snow; The sky with its careering stars, that drew The gaze whose awe with contemplation grew; The rolling gulfs of ocean, uttering deep A mystic voice, or calm'd in moonlight sleep; These in that maddening trance are all forgot, As though the world without existed not. Forgot with these the trains of thought, that rise As nature wakes our wondrous sympathies;

Shone, as in darkening splendour, heaven his throne."

nium. We quote but a few lines, because the last will lead us to introduce to the reader another poem of Mr.

" O thou! whose glorious course too soon was run, O more than nephew, and almost a son! Speak from thy tomb by Severn's wailing tide, The gentle boys reposing at thy side.

And who were these " gentle boys?" Alas! reader, you must be answered by no story of fictitious wo. The author of "The Brothers" was the sufferer-their father. The boys were, indeed, brothers-lovely in their lives, and not disunited in their deaths. They were of the age of twelve and fourteen. They were drowned, September 20, 1819, at Weston super Mare. The elder perished in an attempt to save the younger. But what are these bare facts? Thousands have come to as untimely graves, thousands have wept, and the scenes, griefs, persons have departed without a memorial. How little of suffering has been ever really painted! How few have the rare power of telling their own! None who sympathize in the hours of affliction know the sorrow in its extent, minuteness, or true character. It comes, when it comes, upon every heart as an agony unconceived, unexperienced, unheard of, unread of. Perhaps there never was, and never will be, in any language, more pathetic poetry than "The Brothers." It has nigh reached that impossible of conveying a true knowledge of grief. We do not recollect ever to have read any thing like it for truth and pathos: it has no prototype. Lines here and there may remind us of Milton; but the "Lycidas," that wondrous poem, is artificial. There are passages in it that remind us of Dante; but, as a whole, it is like no other composition that we ever read. It has been said that Lord Littleton bewailed his Lucy when his sorrow was no more. Doubtless, the anguish of it had departed. But there is no vivid passion of grief in the monody. There is mournfulness in the melody. In "The Brothers," there is nothing artificial; there are no Dryads, no Aonian maids. Pindus and Castaly are nothing to his real passion. Was then this poured off in the very torrent of the author's we? No; but it had left indelible marks of every ebb and flow upon his memory, and it was the power of no common genius that could note them upon the chart of suffering. Oh the magic of grief! In the immediate bitter hour of bereavement the mind is paralysed, and knows but by fits and starts, and then not all. The details is of after-collection, when other feelings have taken the mist of tears from the eyes, and the communication is again opened between all outward objects and the heart. For other feelings do arise, and even such as are pleasurable, to recruit exhaused nature, some soon, and, so, by daily repetition of the healing virtue, there is repoyation and health.

The mourner but rarely goes mourning all his days; and if he does, he dresses up his grief till it is, as it were, the plaything of his thoughts, the source of pleasure. is the blessing of Providence that endows the mind with this elasticity, and will not suffer its powers to be destroyed. Destroyed, indeed! How are they heightened!

The poem of "The Brothers" is all power. Do we mean to say that Mr. Elton did not grieve when he composed it? By no means-we are sure that he did; but the tion of a pure and scriptural picture! nature of that grief had changed, and he found a luxury in it. Nay, before and since he has written it, we are certain that he has enjoyed many a cheerful hour-has been thankful for those left him, as whereon his affection may feed-and has found himself not bereaved. We doubt not that he could read this poem himself and judge of it critically, as if it were another's composition-feel From whose unclouded top the steps ascend, all its beauties, as if they were not belonging to his own Like Israel's ladder, to thy God and Friend peculiar affliction. He is now master of his grief, and can manage all the stops of it, and make it subservient to his skill, and can turn from it to light and playful compositions, for his genius is healthy.

10."

e to

ore,

oci-

will

Mr.

vou

hor

The

not

lve

19, npt

8 ?

de

ed

er

ng

ic-

ue

ns

ad

ny

ue

ad

e.

re

e,

d

10 e

8,

-

8

n

There are, it is said, and we believe it, who die of grief; but then they have no objects of comfort left, none for the bewildered affections to rest upon, and they corrode inwardly. What may be the effect of the loss of an only child—one whom the parent had educated, for whom alone almost he had lived—we know not. The other affliction we have known, and therefore feel sensibly the power and truth of "The Brothers;" and we know that the remarks we have made are well founded. Yet, in some points we do not all feel alike-we mean not in degree, but in manner. Some seek the world's sympathy, and love to converse about the loved objects lost-preserve and exhibit slight relies, pictures, treasure looks and sayings, and frame memorials. Others again, and we ourselves are of the number, put an interdiction on all such things. Names never escape our lips, nor others' lips in our presence. There is, at least, an outward oblivion passed upon all. We would not have a portrait of one we have lost: we indulge not, and dare not think, nay, force our thoughts into other channels, than such as lead that way, till the habit of silence is acquired to ourselves, and to all about us, and is continued when the sensitiveness has subsided. To some the heart is as an inner sanctuary, where the beloved object is enshrined. It must not be opened to the gaze of any eye, nor its precincts trod by any foot; it is private—for silence and for the mourner. To others it is as a fair and open chapel, whose monuments, each of sep- his toils over the whole covey, amid their sunshine and arate and religious gloom, are its ornaments, where chant happiness, we wait for the drawing together of the cords and requiem invite, and all who approach are welcomed as that shall enclose in ruin and dismay the whole "family of pilgrims, and the mourner feels his sorrow sanctified by love." Some of these incidents, for their concise pathos, human sympathics.

There is an introductory dedication of this elegy to the mother of the unfortunate youths. It is of very great and they are truly elegiac. beauty, breathing all tenderness and love, and pointing to the only availing argument-religious trust.

"Yet would I bring what solace still is left For minds afflicted, humbled, scourg'd bereft; That only solace which the wandering eye Can find to fix on ere it close and die.

"When life was in its spring, and fancy free, Its lays, the lays of love, were breathed to thee! When, as in vision, hover'd on my sight Th' elastic step and glance that swam in light; And the live rose, that deck'd thy virgin prime, Glow'd on thy cheek, as though it mock'd at time.

" And now, that hope and joy are seen to fade, Like stars dim-gliding till they mix with shade; Now, that thy cheek has sorrow's canker proved, When thus by sadness changed, ah! more beloved! Now, pale, and leaning o'er a weed-strewn hearse, I call upon thee with a mourning verse!"

How exquisite are the following ! What a tender applica-

" What calms the tumult? what allays the loss? What stills thy sorrowing, thy despair !- the cross ! The cross-that brazen serpent, raised to save-That key which open the portal of the grave; To that, O lone one ' raise thy tearless eye, symbol and gate of immortality; Where they, for whom thy pillow sleepless lies, Descend and reascend before thine eyes; And beckon to that Eden of the blest Where souls departed in expectance rest.

" Believe that angels stay the thrilling tear For those they loved, for those who loved them here : Think that to those pure souls e'en now are given Shadowings of bliss and gleams of future heaven. Not in th' obstruction cold of mortal clay Deem that they sleep till earth shall pass away ; But lift ev'n now their intellectual eyes Midst visions of the mediate Paradise See him whose bruised heel crush'd death's wormy stings

And listen high, unutterable things.

"Bethink thee, for thou know'st-some checkering years Shall sweep, like shadows, o'er thy path of tears: When thou shalt every mortal pang resign, And their exulting spirits spring to thine

Those years have passed, the prophetic vision has been fulfilled. The beloved mother of those boys-as we find in a note-died in March 1830.

This poem is the history of the brothers from their earlier boyhood-but how told! by a succession of scenes at various periods, epochs marked by deep feeling; and they are made doubly interesting by occasional incidents connecting them with an endeared circle at home. We soon see that the net of affliction is cast not over one, or two, or three, but over all; and, as when the fowler throws remind us of some passages in Dante. The narrative is only interrupted by bursts of feeling that naturally arise,

The opening is fine and solemn. We can imagine the father, roused to a full sense of his wo by the return of the wintry wind, bidding him in hollow tone "remember," and instantly the scene, with its peculiar aspect the level light above the boiling sen, when he saw it in his agony, strikes upon the vision of his mind, and he breaks forth-

" Again - yet once again-oh winter's wind ! I hear thee; as the cloud rack fleets by, And the bare trees with crashing boughs aloft Rock and re-echo, and at times are hush'd : I commune with my spirit and am still.

"Is the gust raging round the shores I left So suddenly? and does its angry breath Now work and chafe with the quick-heaving surge, That foams and gurgles round those weedy rocks, Or clangs in dash'd commotion? Lies there now A tremulous line of level light above The boiling sea, as when I last beheld Is waters rolling in their strength, and stood On the high headland in my mute despair

" A respite-and an interval of tears-My soul that ached with that vacuity, That pressure of life's hopelessness, the sense Of the drear present, and the future dim And anxious-trode the vista of the past : A vision and the picture of a dream Lay on mine eye and heart: those eyes must close, That heart be still, or ere they pass away."

He then flies back to the earlier passages of their lives; and thus how exquisite is the description of the teaching the elder. The scene is at Clevedon Court.

"Beside me on the lawn One sate, who should be master of these walks, And that grey mansion, and those home-green nooks Of silvan tracery, and whose heart was framed To sympathize with all that flourish'd there. The locks were crisp'd upon his head; his lip Form'd like a rosebud, and his forehead snow : His garb a summer mantle; and he held A book upon his knees, and seem'd to bend His thoughts on what the father-teacher told: But still his eye would wander from the page To where the holly glisten'd in the sun, Or some streak'd bird had bent the rustling bough With fluttering motion: for his heart was link d To nature, and his fancy fed itself With sights and sounds beneath the open sky: I see him, and the scene is changed and gone."

given. Their sports are described with simplicity and beauty of painting.

" Their half-bower'd heads were seen Above the thicket, while the straggling flock Grazed near them, by their presence undisturbed:"

But when the amusement of bathing is described, how does the father break forth-he sees them

" Floating, as still they float before mine eyes;"

but we must give the whole passage, for it is most moving-

"Together, with their father's guiding aid, They clave the waters, while the sun rode high, And learn'd to breast the blue sea's billowy swell Fearless, and with a passion sought the shore Floating, as still they float before mine eyes, Upon the sapphire bosom of the deep, With face upturn'd to heaven, or plunging free, Like dolphins in their play, beneath the wave. That closed above them, and the circling rocks. Rang with their joyous voices. 'Twas the will Of God:—their art of safety was their snare; And he, that look'd with trusting gladness on, Lived to lament the omen of their joy.

" My heart is drown'd in softness, as again I see, I feel them present; their known looks And loved familiar shapes; where er I wend, In daylight, or the gloom of fading eve, Through peopled marts, and streets that thronging sound

With hum of multitudes, and most, oh most !-Among the hills and hedge-rows, and near brooks Where sedges dip their verdure, and o'er heaths Sprinkled with yellow broom, whence far the range Of azure mountains, like a mist, appears
Beyond the channel'd sea; and where, deep sunk
In sleep's o'erpowering heaviness, with eyes That, waking inward, view th' external world, its colour'd shadows and its moving forms, I still am doom'd to see-for ever there For ever !-by my side and in my sight Th' inseparable phantoms: they attend My rising up and lying down: pursue My steps, and flit around me with their bright, Yet shadowy, presence-angels of the dead

The individuality of each is nicely marked, and their mutual affection.

" I saw them-and that elder shapely boy, Tall for his years, and slender as the stem Of 'spiring pine; and femininely soft With silken skin, and smooth and tapering hands, And lips of rose; the flexile, graceful hair Waved with light bend, as of a Roman youth; And the arch'd brows, and lashes lengthening dark: In the clear eyes beam'd sweet th' ingenuous mind, And frank simplicity and girlish love. Beside him, still beside him, one appear'd Of lower stature; his young limbs were cast In somewhat stronger mould: his visage still Retain'd the rounded form of infancy, And the vermilion glow'd upon his cheek, Type of robuster health: a deeper blue Was in his eyes: and trains of serious thought, Manly and calm, would mark his steady glance : While mirthfulness oft revell'd in his smiles As though the heart could not restrain the tide That elder boy became the teacher of a child-the younger, and their entire brotherly affection is most touchingly Play'd on his dimpled mouth, or glancing tears, Supprest by resolution, dimm'd his eye, The other smiled or sadden'd; shared in all His joys or troubles, for their hearts were one."

> Is it possible that such boys, so brought up—under the guidance of a "father-friend," should entertain one thought of cruelty in their hearts, or practise it in their sports? Oh, no. The vice of cruelty is too often taught in infancy, by an unaccountable carelessness of parents on this point, and by inculcating a ferocious horror of some of God's creatures, even the most innocent. We well remember a scene that in our mere boyhood made an impression upon us that will never be effaced. A boy at school had stolen some of our books. The fact being ascertained, we took another boy with us, and went to his parents, with whom he then was and demanded the books. The father and the moti er were sitting in the parlour; a younger child, about five or six years of age, brought in a half-fledged bird, delighted with his prize. His amusement was to pluck off feather by feather from the creature, and throw it to the ceiling, bidding it fly, whilst the parents were looking on, and smilingly enjoying his animation. Could those parents with reason complain, if that child lived to break their hearts? But hearts they had none. But these lovely boys had learned a different lesson-

"They saw the gracious Father in his works, For they would listen to the book of life With solemn, gladden'd aspect : him they lov'd Ev'n in his meanest creatures; reverenced him In the rook's instinct and the emmet's craft; The soothed familiar reptile fled them not; The speckled toad beneath the bramble lay, His bright eye shining like a gem, nor shunn'd Their footstep; and the brutal urchin shrank Rebuked, who in their presence sought to harm One creature that had life. The most opprest Or scorn'd to them were dearest; nor their mind Eudured the dainty sophistry, that deem'd Which no intruding worm may violate, But that his life was forfeit; they had learnt Another lesson from their gentle hearts; And what their heart had taught them, no tame fear Of mocks from the unfeeling, nor the sight Of bold and base example, could repress: But, with an Abdiel pride, retorting scorn Of unintimidated innocence, They turn'd from the seducer or withstood.

"Oh promise early blighted! blasted hopes! Crush'd germs of mortal excellence! oh ye Whom earth could not detain, but heaven required: Lost friends! dear, lost companions! vanish'd feet, Whose traces are upon the hills and shores, Pursued, bewept, and linger'd on in vain! Follow'd with upward gazing agony From the bare mountains into opening clouds-Oh! found of God, but oh! how lost to me!"

Omens! how natural to the afflicted is the belief in omens. They look back upon moments of endearment Reaching at berries on the brier-hid wall; or of alarm, and most of all, of fancied unkindnesses, and Such oft, in playful tribute, he would bring, are sure to find out some character of warning. If, too, we say that this is the most poetical way of treating such a subject, what do we mean but that it is the most natural —the most true, if not to fact, to feeling. But who will say that there are no warnings, no omens? Surely not the Christian who believes in a particular providence, and Parental chiding of delay, I named who knows that not a sparrow falls to the ground without That spot their boundary; the green range beyond God's permission; "God speaketh once, yea twice, and man Forbidden; and they smiled upon my threat; perceiveth it not-in a dream, in the vision of the night." And are there not day-dreams and visions, where the day of understanding is dark as night? How was it with the foreboding heart of the mother!

" The mind's clear light Was darken'd for a season, and lone thoughts Of undefined emotion would obtrude, Seen in the sadness of the troubled eye That ever fixed on them"

ht

1

n-

is

of

es-dok m

d r

The vision opens clearer as it approaches the fulfilment. This incident, told as it is, will reach every heart. Nought could give the alarmed mother a sense of security.

"And the sun gleaming in a diamond shower
Upon the rippling waters, fail'd to soothe.

Oh dim presage!—whence rose th' o'ershadowing held out to save, to lead them through the gate of death.

thought That fell upon her, when no fear disturb'd Their happy spirits, and the heaven and earth In like serenity were glad and calm? Her look had wander'd where the grey church-tower Peer'do'er the sea-crag's verdant ridge; there dwelt With mournful meaning, eloquent yet mute; Then quick-averted, turn'd itself on me And them; her thoughts were dark; their very trace Has disappear'd; but those two happy boys, Beneath whose steps all buoyancy and life, The springy hill-turf quiver'd as they flew, Rest side by side, within that grey church-tower."

The omen is progressive, the temporary absence, and late return of the elder, who had missed his way; the " unquiet shock and troubled fear," and the father's "thrill of inexplicable dread," while on his search for him, are of awful boding, from slight events.

"And in my tenderest place of memory still Haunts the dear vision of that fleeted form, Then lingering anxious on the stair, and swift In fondness of abash'd preventing love To rush upon a father's boding heart And falter out his welcome. Welcome more He ne'er shall hear; that thou wast seeming lost Embitters this thy heavy loss indeed; That thou wast dead and instantly alive Doth make thee doubly dead : portentous words A double loss, a double death was there!"

It comes again upon the vision fearfully.

" I see them on the hills, th' elastic air Of early autumn glowing on their cheeks, And tracing their young limbs; I hear them yet; They shouted in their joy. Those hills no more Shall echo with their voices, nor the turf Spring to the pressure of their bounding feet.

Upon the noon, the Sabbath noon, that shone To them the last, and harbinger'd the day Whose sun should set unheeded by their eyes, Perchance we wander'd to a place of graves, Along the green-hill side : myself pass'd on, But sudden stood, surprised in solitude. Retracing, then my steps, I saw the boy-I see him yet—with features rosy flush'd, A pastoral offering to his father's hand : And on the midway hill the elder stoop'd, Lingering at distance, as he cull'd the plants With which his bosom and his grasp were fill'd. The limit of their pleasant pilgrimage, Then, and alas ! for ever !- so, with feign'd And up the hill, that rose full opposite The field of graves, we climb'd by rugged stones, Which, piled by rustic hands, had form'd a stair In the green mountain. They ascended up, And turning from those heaps of osier'd turf, Homes of the village dead, they raised their heads In the hill sunshine of the breezy heaven, Unconscious that their way was through the grave; Their spirits summon'd; and that mountain stair The steps that led to angels. Might I thus, Oh! might I tread on death and climb with them!

How beautiful is what follows-the burst of grief had taken away with it half its gloom-a gleam of hope arises that it is God's mercy that has called them. They wor-

"O pious youths! dear infants! that last eve Which spread before your earthly gaze its arch, Cluster'd with circling stars, beheld you tread The rural temple's pavement, where ye sate And watch'd the preacher's lips that breath'd the word Of life, and heard the simple fervid strain Of village voices swell their Saviour's praise. The summons found you there; e'en at the door God's angel stood, and beckon'd you away.

The omen becomes fearfully visible on the "appointed day." The elder is even there, as if the waves were impatient for their victims, nearly drowned-but the father was present, and this thought recurring to him afterwards makes him blame himself thus-

"He was far, far away, Who should have saved, or drunk with them in death The bitter flood."

But the father did on that day save his child, and how naturally the mind hurries from that incident to the ea tastrophe.

" Mysterious Providence !- a shade e'en then Of peril hover'd round us: the recoil Of that fast-ebbing tide had borne him on: But at my voice-for I had climb'd the rock, And, pale and hurried, in the name of God Implored him turn, he turn'd, and labouring stemm'd The stubborn coze, and won his shoreward way, And panted in mine arms; oh dear embrace! It was our last on earth!—I see him yet, His supple strippling limbs fresh from the brine; So soon to welter underneath the wave, Hurl'd on the distant shores to which he spread His venturous arms, and in that warping stream Sunk low the head of him he died to save ; Embracing him in death, as life; while seas Were now their bed; their slumber still and deep; Their waking in the paradise of God.'

The omen does not leave them even after the fatal event; " simple William," their companion.

Cross'd by our casement with his passing shade."

We will not pursue the detail of the dire catastrophe. The omens were fulfilled. The description of the being made acquainted with the event is most graphic and thrill-

" Voices now, Low-mutter'd voices, throng'd around our calm And cheerful dwelling: gazing groups appear'd, Mysteriously inquisitive, yet sad, Before my threshold: as I issued forth, With the first pang of vague inquictude,
A friend cross'd quick my path, who anxious sought
"messenger of wo."

Of him thus speaks the author—
"Suddenly Conviction flash'd in horror; and I rush'd Along the promontory side and look d— Alas! on vacancy!—I saw alone The sea wide-rolling in its strength; I saw Along pale line of tremulous light that spread Along the heaving waters-there, e'en there, They last were seen, who now were seen no more.

" It hovers o'er me like a fearful dream, That dreadful, slow return; the drear saloon With its excluded light, and, heard without, The lifted voice of weeping; stranger forms, Compassionate and soft, with ministry Of female offices, and she, who wept Refusing comfort, since she wept in vain."

There is a very fine touch of nature in the infant with "little arms fettering his knees," arousing him from his

"Twas his hand That led thee to me, and that felt embrace Chid my despondence and assured my soul."

The two lines immediately succeeding, though after a pause in the poem, are most rich in pathos and beauty. tell a volume, a history of grief-of a night, ages long in agony when the parent's eyes saw nought but them weltering, or their places where they should have been-but they speak too vividly for us to attempt their feeling.

"That night the little chamber where they lay, Fast by our own, was vacant, and was still."

are of Dante. The very soul of that great poet is in those two lines. It would be impertinent to point out the exqui-description.

site beauty of every word in these two lines; but who in reading them will not lay down the book and trace and dwell upon the innumerable thoughts and pictures which they call up? Every word is pregnant with the deepest feeling. " That night"-the solemn, awful hour of that fatal day-" The little chamber"-that endearing diminutive that encloses the most precious jewels of the house within a casket-" Where they lay"-Oh what a history of wonted rest, and childhood dreams, and watching love of growth, and health, the nightly and the morning prayer, the present and the promise of all domestic happiness is read in these few simple words-"Close by our own." How home do these words come to the parent's heart, expressive of the nearest and dearest. So far all is the bygone history of love-broken, severed, dissipated. For the spirit of all has its abode, its perpetual home. But, broken as is the history, we must still go back to contrast the happy past before the knowledge of it reached them, the omen crossed with the bitter present. That little chamber is vacanttheir path. Their meal was spread, but they came not the imagination instantly fills up every vacant spot—the One in whom they would have trusted for their safety, the bed, the furniture, and objects of their suspended sport, and themselves warm, and enfolded in their eleep, and in a moment they are gone. They are elsewhere-and where? under the cold wave-and tossed far, far from that little chamber, to a distant shore. It is then that we feel the spell of the words-" recent-and was still," Would we hear the awakening-the cheerful voices? They are no more-the stillness is death. Is the angel of death departed, or lingers he still hovering about the "surge"

"That foams and gurgles round these weedy rocks?

The angel of death still lingers-but to strike. A friend, a kind and generous friend, finds his death, from illness caught in his anxious search for the bodies. That friend was the

" Suddenly Death struck thee in thy deed of charity The green sod lies upon thy breast, and thou Already art, where I could wish to be.'

Does the poem end here? No. The melodious verse flows on, and, like a river of wo, circling, re-seeks old haunts and scenes now endeared to memory. And parental affection is with it every where. Even the desolate house, that shall not be visited, is visited; for, against his purpose, even there he hastens in vision.

" Our dwelling-house is desolate; this foot Shall ne'er re-pass the threshold which ye pass'd. Silence is in the walls that range so late With your sweet laughter, and th' unheeded bird Flits round the chamber of your happy sleep. The plants ye loved are withered like yourselves; torpor—and the whisper to his heart, that he should "live The wrecks and relies of your curious search, to praise the God of consolation"— Gleanings from fields and woods, the air and streams, The weed, the fossil, and the insect's wing, Remain-the records of your innocent tastes, Remembrances of days of happines That never can return: your pen's known trace-The limnings of your pencil's opening skill-Oh thought of agony ! are those then all, All that are left me of your lovely selves?"

Again he is on his search.

"There is a spot that haunts me when alone; Nay, ev'n amidst the moving multitude.

It is here with an intense desire he had watched the happy group of childen-" The little Mary leaning on the older's We have before said, that Mr. Elton occasionally reminded hand"—seeking the thicket. We cannot forbear, though we have quoted largely, giving the following part of this "I saw them all, by casual circumstance Thus drawn together; and I gazed on those Who were my sole society, who form'd The circle where all earth's felicities Were center'd; and the fulness of my heart Gush'd forth to look upon them, all, at once, Within my view, a family of love; Their virtues and their beauties budding fresh With promise. On that evening I had felt Intense desire to meet and see them thus All gather'd in my sight; and therefore gain'd The rising hill, whence I might trace the path By which they sought the thickets. Never more That sight shall bless my vision; nor the sound Of those funited voices make the mead Echothe jubilee of childhood joy.

I saw not the slow peril, that e'n then Rose from the horizon, like a man's dim hand, To fling its blackness o'er my star of life Heard not the stifled step of death, that hung Close on our rural haunts; pass'd stealthily Within the social chamber, and kept watch Beside the couch of guileless sleep. Oh i Rolling in brightness, and thou concave heaven Blue with serenest air! hills, rocks, and shores! When shall I close mine eyes and see you not? The everlasting mountains are a weight Upon my spirit, for the feet I loved Have prest them; and their flitting shadows pass Before me and round; the sea and earth Borrow their motions, and their voices fill The sounds of breezes and of rivulets: Oh could I close this mock'd and weary gaze, Shake off the burthen of this beauteous earth, And hide me from their shadow, where themselves Lie, side by side, within that sealed vault, Wrapt in their blessed slumber!"

ich

est

fa-

ive

iin

ed

th, ot

80

he

of

ıll

he

in

le

0

10

A particular spot where he had read with them then rushes upon his memory; he describes it, and then adds,

" So pleasantly They turn'd the classic page. The page is closed; The book unopened rests, a mystery, A sign and a memorial. He that saw Those sunny features and those azure eyes, Looks on them still in vision; but for him The letter'd dead converse in vain; the face Of nature smiles in vain; there is a shroud Upon the sun; a blank throughout the rich And beautified creation; the blue hills And undulating waters, wafting life And fragrance, and the joyous sounds that ring Among the thickets and the craggy dales, Are images and echoes that are gone Remember'd, not possest; a scene of dreams From which the heart is shut; from which it turns, Lest it should open springs of bitterness; The paradise is there, but still beyond! There is a gulf betwixt: I may not pass And taste the pleasure of that genial earth, And feel the balm of you embracing heaven."

The conclusion is perfect, both as a picture and as a moral. It is a wintry scene; the view is from St. Vincent's rocks. The view encloses the now almost sacred skilful painter. consolation of a christian.

" Now I look Upon a scene of wintry dreariment, Pale, leafless, herbless, cold; on that black stream, Black from o'erpowering white, the very barks, And they the living beings, that propel Their sullen, sluggish motion, darkling move, As if the nether Acheron rolled on Its tide before me, and a ghostly fleet Sail'd on its ebon current. Oh most strange And most congenial picture; death is there-Death is before my vision; death within My heart; but, as I lift my saddening eyes. The tops of those tall cliffs are tinged with light As it were gold, on my left, the sky Is one clear space of azure, where the sun, A broaden'd orb, in ruddy splendour hangs, About to drop beyond the western hills ; Making the whiten'd banks and woodlands brown, The clear black current, and the darksome barks. More desolate from contrast, yet to all Yielding a glory and sublime relief
With mingled gorgeous imagery of light,
Though solemn still and chasten'd with the gloom Of desolation. How the mind, effused Out of itself, communicates the hue Of its own subtle spirit to the forms Of outward things, and makes the woods and streams Respond to its discourse, and character Their feature by its passion! I beheld A grave of waters, deepening dark and still Beneath me, and above, the tinging gleam Of light from heaven; the resurrection's dawn Gilding the funeral vault; and, in the sun, The Christian's rest of glory; light and strength In his decline—the earnest of his rise!"

From Blackwood's Magazine.

MEMOIRS OF LUTHER.

Written by himself, and edited by M. Michelet (chief of the Historic Section of the Archives of France.)

THE gentleman who has undertaken the very useful and important labour of translating and arranging the papers which compose the volumes before us, and of introducing them to the public, has every claim that literary merit, and a life devoted to serious and ennobling pursuits, can give to a large space himself in our pages. The absorbing interest, however, of the subject on which he treats in the work now under our consideration, precludes us from the gratification of making his own distinguished merits known on the present occasion to our readers. It must suffice to remind them that M. Michelet is the author of a history of the Roman Republic, and of two volumes (to be continued) of a history of France. Both of these works display immense erudition, not merely derived from the beaten highroads of historic research, but also from the excursive enquiries of the poet and the antiquarian. But unfortunately for M. Michelet's reputation, he seems ever to have been questioning rather the disembodied spirit than the palpable facts of history. He has been in the habit of summoning before him as good historic matter, the fables, symbols, le-Clifton. It is painted with all the discrimination of a gends, and superstitions of past times, and has endeavoured to extract from them the secret philosophic meaning, which, haunts of the childhood and boyhood of those dear ones he will have it, they enfold. This has rendered him oblost; paints, too, a father's companionship, though in the scure, and has hindered him from acquiring that popularity time of winter, the recollections are of summer. Is there, which many who possess not the tithe of his genius and then despondency? No. Whilst all below is of dark-attainments daily obtain. Every one, nevertheless, can ness, dreariness, and death, there is above a light, as from perceive that his productions give evidence of surprising heaven, that turns the thoughts to pious adoration-to the learning, eloquence, and labour, and of a vivid and potent fancy and power of reason, which-albeit they deal chiefly pletely a hermit of knowledge. Though a very young and views he was the most moderate of all the reformers. man, he keeps himself quite apart from the distractions of In his coarseness, however, his low origin certainly speaks pleasure and agitations of politics. He lives in an obscure out, yet there is something sublime in the peasant (the and retired part of Paris, and devotes his days and nights miner's son) dragging popes and kings into his wrestling to conscientious study and labour. It is not at all beside ring, and handling them with as much roughness and as our present purpose to notice the characteristics of mind little ceremony as he would a hobnailed clown from a and conduct of the author before us. When a life of Lu-country market-place. But let us follow him into private ther is given to the world, and that by a Frenchman and life. Here it is that we shall best learn to appreciate him. a Roman Catholic, one naturally inquires into the habits We will not dwell upon his constant contentment in poverty, of thought and life of the person from whom such a com- and his contempt for riches, because this is the charactermunication proceeds. This inquiry in the present instance istic of almost all great men who are really worth more meets with a satisfactory answer. M. Michelet has him-than gold can procure them; but his long unbroken friendself informed us why he broke off from his historical re-ship with Melancthon-a character so opposite to his own, searches to devote his time to an examination into Chris-land in some respects so superior, as he was the first to actianity: "In the middle," he says, "of the Roman histo-knowledge himself-has always struck us as a proof that ry I met with Christianity in its origin; half through the he possessed much sweetness and gentleness of disposition. history of France, 1 encountered it aged and decrepid. Envy or jealousy never interrupted for a moment the fra-Proceeding a little farther, I meet it again. To whatever ternal affection that subsisted between these great men. quarter I turn, it is before me; it bars my way, and for-bids me to pass on." A serious conviction of the import-susceptible. Neither did personal ambition come near him. ance of this subject is thus the sound preparation which Though he had so many titles to it, he never claimed the resting memoirs now on our table.

his portrait have been completely shaded from sight. If, to say, shows his native greatness, but we correct ourselves, bursts of savage and uncouth manners, we should not have all the messengers of God, from Moses downwards, have a more erroneous impression of him than is generally en-displayed. Such men are moulded at once by the hand tertained of Luther. Another reason of our misconcep-that sends them. The accidents of this world have no tion is, that we too often honour mere daintiness of mind power (as they have upon others) to change or modify their smack, to the taste of drawing-room, fashionable, elite so-ciety, whence opinions are usually circulated, only of bru-idea, and one only—and that external to their earthly contality and ferocity. Perhaps, however, the finest, richest, dition. Hence was begotten the simplicity and homeliness and most generous species of character is that which pre- of Luther's walk in life. Had he acted the great man he sents to the dainty the most repulsive surface. Within the would have proved that he was not the apostle. The frank, rough rind the feelings are preserved unsophisticated, ropopular, coarse, and somewhat peasant-bearing which bust, and healthy. The noti me tangere outside keeps off marked him, has made him the hero of the populace to that insidious swarm of artificial sentimentalities which this day in Germany. What is also remarkable in a man taint, and adulterate, and finally expel all natural and vigor- of his indubitable and profound piety is, that he had no ous emotions from within us. The idea of a perfect man sanctified airs, no austerity. On the contrary he loved has always been figured forth in our minds by the emblem of painting, music, singing, and decent conviviality. We the lion coming out of the lamb, and the lamb coming out wish indeed it were not considered necessary now-a-days of the lion. Of this description of character was Luther to assume a peculiar solemnity, a peculiar formality of Nothing could exceed his submissiveness and humility when manners, as a badge of piety. Nothing makes so many a choice was left him whether to be humble or daring; hypocrites as this. The pious man should endeavour to but when conscience spoke, no other consideration was for avoid as much as possible the external manifestations of a moment attended to, and he certainly did then shake the his piety, all that can be imitated without being realized. forest in his magnificent ire. But if we behold him one In this matter Luther was a perfect model. We feel thomoment, to use his own quotation from scripture, pouring roughly convinced that all which he possessed was real, contempt upon princes, and highly raging against the high- precisely because there was no show, no parade whatever est upon earth, we see him the next in his familiar corres- of sanctity about him. In his family, and among his pondence a poor, humble, afflicted man, not puffed up with neighbours, he was jovial, affectionate, debonnaire. pride at the great things he had accomplished, but rather piety was not put on him, but broke out of him. It flowed atruck down by a sense of his own unworthiness. As to in a mingled stream with his every-day life and conversahis violence, it was part of his mission to be violent, and tion. The gravel and the gold rolled together in the rich those who lay it to his charge as blameworthy, seem to us channel of his mind, and he made no effort to exhibit only not to accuse him, but to accuse Providence. Not to have the one and to conceal the other. been violent, would in him have been not to have been in earnest. And here it must be observed, that his violence shall avoid as much as may be those which allude to the

with unmanageable abstraction—exhibit an intellect of the was only verbal; it was merely the rousing roice to awahighest order. M. Michelet is in his private character com-ken Europe from the lethargy of ages. In his opinions M. Michelet has brought to the compilation of the inte-supremacy over his contemporary reformers. Notwithstanding the great things he had performed, he gave him-These memoirs are composed altogether of letters and pa-self no air of grandeur or importance. He seemed to pers written by Luther himself, and give us a complete pic-consider himself as a common man among common men. ture of the man as he was in life. Hitherto the too common He was Doctor Martin Luther, and nothing more. There idea of the great reformer's character has been that it was was a simplicity and commonness in his habits and cona mere compound of violence and ruggedness. These versation which contrasts wonderfully with the mighty retraits have been made so prominent, that the finer lines of volution he brought about. This simplicity, we were going in fact, we knew nothing of Dr. Johnson but his occasional and add, that it exhibits that apostolic frame of mind which with the names of delicacy, sensibility, humanity, virtue; moral conformation. There is a oneness, a wholeness, an whilst the rough exterior and the passionate expression, uncompoundedness of character in these elect instruments;

We shall now proceed to our extracts, and in these we

ers.

aks (the ling as

n a

vate im.

rty, terore

nd-

wn,

ac. hat

on.

fra-

en.

een

im. the

ith-

im-

to

en. ere

on-

re-

ing

es, ich ave

nd

no eir

an

ts;

oness

he

nk,

ch

to

an

no

red Ve

ys. of ny to of

ed.

10-

al,

er

lis

ed

ch

ly

The boyhood of Luther was marked with the most ex-letter to the Romans. houses, particularly at Eisenach, my dear town."

of mercy gave me a father, who, by his labour and sweat disc." nourished and formed me such as I am, little as that is. Certainly I rejoice that he lived till now, and saw the light trouble and solution of the question they speak of, hinged of truth. Blessed be God through all eternity for all his all the after career of Luther. We must see him now at councils and decrees! Amen!"

a monk. One of his friends was struck dead by a flash of Rome, sanctified by the holy martyrs, and by their blood lightning at his side. At the instant he made a vow to which has been shed here!" In his fervour, he says, he St. Anne to make himself a monk if he survived. He visited every sacred place, saw all, believed all. tion for the monastic state. His father was not, till two utterly forgotten in the capital of the Christian world. years after, reconciled to the determination of his son, but The warlike fiery Julius II. was then Pope, and this father into his hand all the money he had been able to save by speak of grace and the inefficacy of works to this singular his hard labour, twenty florins.

which Luther suffered, and which form so prominent a an absurd contradiction of sense. In the churches, too, feature in his life. On one occasion he declares himself Luther could not find the consolation of a good mass. The to have experienced so keen and so long continued an an-Italian priests made a scandalous parade of their infidelity. guish that he neither ate, drank, or slept for fourteen days In consecrating the host they used to say, "panis es et and nights. We may readily imagine at least that he panis manebis." "I would not," says Luther, "for an was so absorbed in his affliction as hardly to know what hundred thousand florins have missed seeing Rome" (and he did mechanically, and to have been insensible of the he repeats these words three times). "I should have distrussed repose which must nevertheless have come upon feared that I might have done injustice to the Pope." him. It is remarkable that all our great awakeners in religion have had a depth of experience in the spiritual viction that Popery was anti-Christian are well known, reachings of our nature which others can scarcely com- but his conscientious hesitations, his extreme submissivefrom which this arises often threatens to unseat the reason, would even have been abject if it had not sprung from a and generally leaves behind it some ravaged spot in the conscience afraid to transgress the line of duty, has not intellect. But such is the misery of our moral conduct, been appreciated. His subsequent violence has been that it requires a violent wrench, almost a disorganization trumpeted abroad as something very scandalous, but his of the mind, to loose it from its stubborn holdings, on lukewarm censurers have failed to perceive that both viothe earth, and give it its original upward direction. So lence and submission arise in him from the same sources that where true wisdom is, there is usually some staring -conscience. Of his submissiveness, we have, besides early controversies of the Reformation, concerning which folly to mock at it. Luther is a striking example of this the world has long since made up its mind, and shall give He could not believe in God without having grinning merely such as exhibit the character, and touch upon the devils to mow and gibber at his creed. He thus writes of most interesting passages of the life of the reformer. Our the temptation he experienced in the monastery. "Ah! first shall be from a letter wherein he recapitulates the extraordinary events of his life: "I have often conversed," what sort of temptation he experienced. His thorn in the he writes, "with Melanethon, and have related to him the flesh was not what the Papists imagine. Oh no, it was history of my whole life from point to point. I am the something greater than the despair caused by sin. It was son of a peasant; my father, my grandfather, and great the temptation spoken of in the Psalm; 'my God, my grandfather, were mere peasants. My father, went to God, why hast thou forsaken me.' As if the Psalmist Mansfeld, and there became a miner. I was born there, would say, you are my enemy without a cause, and like That I should afterwards become a bachelor, a doctor, Job—I am nevertheless just and innocent. I am sure &c., was that written in the stars? When I made my-that the book of Job is a true history, of which a poem self a monk I astonished every one; when I changed the was afterwards made. Jerome and the other fathers have This indeed had their temptations, but these were nothing in comparibrown bonnet for another, a new surprise. This indeed had their temptations, but these were nothing in compari-vexed my father, and displeased him much. I afterwards son to those which assault the soul,—when the messenger dragged about the Pope by the hair of his head, and then of Satan strikes with his fists." He tells us afterwards married an escaped nun, and have had children. Who how these horrible thoughts here alluded to were appeased. could have seen all these things in the stars? who could "In studying the epistles of St Paul, I had a violent have announced such strange events to me beforehand?" desire to know the scope of St Paul's argument in his One single expression stopped treme poverty. His father, instead of making him work me. Justitia Dei revelatur in illo. I hated this word, in the mines, sent him to school, but it appears that he sub- Justitia Dei, because, according to the doctors, I had sisted at this time partly by charity, indeed by begging. understood it to mean active justice, by which God is just, "Let no one despise before me," he writes in after life, and punishes the unjust and sinners. I hated this just "those poor people who go singing from door to door, and God, the punisher of sinners. But as I meditated on these asking panem propler Deum. I also have been a poor words day and night, 'The justice of God is revealed in beggar. I have received bread at the doors of many him, as it is written the just shall live by faith,' God had at last pity on me; I understood the justice of God (trans-For his father he always entertained the most filial lated in our Bible more correctly, 'righteousness') was that affection and respect, and writes as follows to Melancthon, by which by the gift of God the just lived, that is to say, when announcing the death of his humble parent: "It is faith. I from that moment felt myself, as it were, new a duty of piety in me to weep for him in whom the father born, and I seemed to enter through open gates into para-

We have quoted the above passages because on the Rome. "When I arrived," he says, "I fell on my knees, A terrible accident was the cause of Luther's becoming lifted my hands to heaven, and exclaimed, 'Hail! holy fulfilled his vow, though he declares that he felt no voca- soon perceived that he believed alone. Christianity seemed at the end of that time assisted at his ordination, and put of the faithful breathed nothing but blood and ruin. To s hard labour, twenty florins.

Here is the place to speak of these terrible temptations destroying Bologna by his benedictions, would have been

The gradual steps by which Luther arrived at the con-It is true the great tension of abstracted thoughts ness to the Pope and Cardinals in the beginning, which his first letters to the Pope and other instances, the folurived at Oppenheim, near Worms, Master Bucer came lowing example. When summoned to Augsbourg, he had to me, and persuaded me not to enter into the city. Seplied."

VOL. XXVIII. MARCH, 1836 .- 35.

an interview with the Archbishop of Trent, of which he glapian, the confessor of the Emperor, had told him, that gives the following account. "At the expiration of three if I entered Worms, I should be burnt alive. These days, the Archbishop of Trent arrived. I came before wretches gave out these menaces, that I might be deterred him in all humility. I fell at his feet, prostrating myself from making my appearance; for if I had delayed three on the earth, and remained there till he had ordered me to days, my safe-conduct would have been no longer good, rise three times. This pleased him much, and gave him the gates would have been shut upon me, I should not hopes that I might retract. But when I returned to him have been heard, and have been condemned tyrannically. the next day, I refused to do so in the slightest particular. I advanced, then in the simplicity of my heart; and when He then said to me, 'Do you think the Pope cares about I was in sight of the city, I wrote to Spalatin, to tell him Germany? Do you think the princes will defend you I had arrived, and to ask him where I was to lodge. They with arms and armies? Certainly they will not. Where, were astonished at my unforseen arrival; for they thought then, will you find refuge?' 'Under the heaven,' I re-that I should have remained without, arrested by terror. Two of the nobles, the Lord of Hersfeld, and John Schott, The next public arena he appeared on was Leipsic, came to me by order of the Elector of Saxony, and conwhere he had been challenged by Doctor Eck to defend his ducted me to their own apartments; but no prince came doctrines. We only mention this well-known polemical to see me. Only the counts and nobles looked at me very combat which took place there, as it gives us occasion to carnestly. The Pope had written to the Emperor not to quote the following letter which Luther was obliged to observe the safe-conduct. The bishops urged him in the address to the Elector of Saxony, praying him to furnish same sense; but the princes and the states would not conhim with two surplices before he could appear with decency sent. All this drew upon me great consideration. My before his antagonist. "I beg," he says, "of your elec-teremies, indeed, were more afraid of me than I was of toral grace to have the goodness to buy for me a white them. The next day after my arrival, at four o'clock in surplice and a black one. The white one I humbly ask for. As for the black one, your highness owes it me; for and the herald who had accompanied me from Wittemtwo or three years ago you promised it to me; and berg, came to conduct me to the Hotel de Ville. They led Pfeffinger loosens the strings of his purse so unwillingly, me through secret passages, to avoid the great crowds that I have been obliged to procure one for myself. I which were assembled in the public ways. In spite, howhumbly beg your highness, who thought that the Psulm-ever, of this precaution, a great concourse accompanied me ster merited a black surplice, to adjudge a white one to to the gate of the Hotel de Ville. Many had mounted to the tops of the houses, to see me pass. When I had Although the great act of Luther's life-his appearance entered into the hall, many lords came up to me, and before the Diet of Worms-is better known than any other addressed me in words of encouragement. 'Be intrepid,' event of his career, we cannot pass over so important a said they; 'speak like a man; fear not those who can kill passage in his life. To all Protestants it must be perpetu- the body, but have no power over the soul.'- Monk,' said ally interesting, and the accounts we can now furnish the famous Captain George Frundsberg, putting his hand have not been hitherto, we believe, published. We will upon my shoulder, 'take care; you are in more peril than first take the description of his procession to Worms from any of us have ever been: but if you are on the good road, the pen of an enemy. "A chariot," it says, "was pre- God will not abandon you. My examination was begun pared for him in the form of a closed litter. Around him by Dr. Eck, the official of the Bishop of Treves. 'Marwere many learned personages, the prevot Jonas, the doctor tin,' said he, 'you are summoned here to say if you Schurf, and the theologian Amsdorff, &c. &c. Where acknowledge the books placed upon the table.' After I had ever he passed, there was a great concourse of people. In acknowledged them, he demanded again, 'Will you now the hotelleries was good cheer, joyous libations, and even disavow them.' I replied, 'My very gracious lord Emperusie. Luther himself, to draw all eyes upon him, played ror, some of these my writings are books of controversy, the harp like another Orpheus. Although the safe-con- in which I attack my adversaries. Others are books of duct of the Emperor prohibited him from preaching on instruction and of doctrine. In the latter, I can and will his route, he preached at Erfurth, and on the day of retract nothing, for they contain the word of God. As to Quasimodi had his sermon published." Another account, my books of controversy, if I have been too violent against from a friendly hand, says-"Martin is of a middling any one, I am willing to allow myself to be convinced of height. Cares and studies have made him so thin, that it, provided time is accorded me to reflect." We regret one may count all the bones in his body. He is, never that we cannot give the whole of the simple and most theless, in all the force and verdure of his age. His voice graphic narration of Luther of one of the most deeply inis clear and piercing. Powerful in his doctrine, admirable teresting and important scenes that was ever acted before in his knowledge of the Scriptures, he can recite almost a human audience. We must content ourselves with a all its verses, one after the other. He is never at a loss, few of the concluding passages. "The last and third part and has at his disposition a world of thoughts and words of my books," continued Luther, "is of a polemical na(sylva ingens verborum et rerum). In his conversation he is agreeable and easy. There is nothing hard or austere bitter than suits my religion and my robe. But I give not in his air. He even suffers himself to enjoy the pleasures myself out for a saint. It is not my life which is in disof life. In society he is gay, pleasing, unembarrassed, and cussion before you, but the doctrine of Jesus Christ.—preserves a perfect screnity of countenance, in spite of the Nevertheless, it is not fitting that I should even make any atrocious menaces of his adversaries. It is difficult to retraction here; for I should by so doing approve of the believe that this man could undertake such great things tyranny and impiety which ravaged the church of God. without the divine protection." Luther himself has given I am but a man; I cannot defend my doctrine otherwise as a most interesting recital of what took place at the Diet, than did my divine Saviour. When he was smitten by from which we give the following extracts: - "When I had the officer of the high-priest, he said, If I have spoken demanded, in consequence, a simple and unconditional re- to, and take nothing from the gospel. If I could only highnesses demand of me a brief and simple reply, I will had yielded thus far, he might have told me to wear whatgive you one which has neither teeth nor horns. If I am ever he would, and I would have worn it to please him." not convinced by the holy Scriptures, or by other reasons If we were not quite sure that the volumes from which nor councils, who have often erred), I neither can nor will into English, we should feel it quite impossible to pass over against his conscience. Here I am. I cannot act other- cloquence of Luther on these subjects are most remarkawise. May God help me! Amen." The last clause of ble. He makes it evident that he was not carried away this passage he uttered in his native German, the rest of by that spirit which has been since called the "spirit of his discourse having been delivered in Latin. Since the the age," and which always means eriminal excess, although time when St. Paul justified his doctrine before King it is considered at the actual period the height of virtue to Agrippa, no human being has cut so simple, so noble, and follow its impulses, but wrote and judged-albeit with his therefore so sublime a figure as did Luther at the Diet of accustomed energy-with the temperance, moderation, and life. of images, the Anabaptists, and others. Luther strenu-treated like mad dogs." ously opposed these men, and in nothing did his moderation and powerful sense appear so much as in the advice Erasmus, on the great question of free will and predesti-he gave concerning them. "Take care," he says, in a let. ter to Melancthon, "that our prince does not stain his mysterious matter, in which all disputants—whilst they hands in the blood of the new prophets. It is with the bring, each in his own sense, positive and conclusive word we must combat, with the word we must conquer; proofs to bear them out in their respective views-must it is with the word we must destroy that which they have be foiled; we will merely notice one singularity which atraised up by force and violence. I condemn only by the tends it, viz. those who deny free will in man (the small word. He that believes, let him believe and follow; he that number), which denial, in logic, destroys moral responsibelieves not, let him not believe, and go on his way. No bility, are almost invariably the most scrupulous, strict, and one should be constrained to the faith or the things of the pure in their lives; whilst those who deny predestination faith. By the word alone we must persuade. I condemn (the great majority), which, in logic, is a denial of the eximages but by the word-not that they should be burnt, istence of God, are, with many exceptions certainly-the but that no one should put confidence in them." In ano irreligious and the reprobate. It has always struck us ther letter, he shows that he carried the spirit of modera- that the two adverse propositions must both be admitted tion, and conciliation, even farther. When alluding to the as positively true, though our reason is sufficient to reconreform just introduced into Brandenbourg, and the object cile them together. The point where they meet and are tion of the Elector to suppress exterior ceremonies, he reconciled is alone hidden from us. Except in this parwrites-"As to processions and other external things, ticular, the double proof of the respective truth of each is which your prince will not abolish, this is my advice,-If complete. The two truths seem to be the two great chains he allows you to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ purely, of human destiny, the extreme ends of which descend to and without human additions, to suppress the adoration of earth, while their summits reach to heaven, and the link saints and masses for the dead, to renounce holy water, that unites them is covered by the upholding hand of God. and not to carry the holy sacrement in processions, let him Instead, however, of entering further into this matter, we have all the ceremonies he likes—carry a cross of gold or will give a most interesting letter from Luther to Erasmus, of silver—wear a surplice and a hood of velvet, of silk, of whilst they were yet friends. This letter gives a good cloth, or whatever he chooses; if your prince is not con-description of the character and genius of the person to evil, bear witness of the evil.' If, then, the Lord himself Aaron, who put on three robes, one over another, all splendemanded to be interrogated, and that by a wicked slave. [lid, all magnificent; if his electoral grace is not content how much more should I, who am but dust and ashes, and with one procession, made with parade and song, let him who may deceive myself easily, claim the liberty of justi. have seven at once, like the children of Israel going seven fying my doctrine. If the testimony of Scripture is against times round the walls of Jericho, shouting and blowing me, I will retract with all my heart, and be the first to trumpets; and if it amuses his grace, let him open the throw my books into the fire." After this discourse, the march himself, and dance before the others to the sound of orator of the Emperor rose and said, that what had been sackbut, harp, dulcimer, cymbal, and all sorts of instrudecided by councils could not be called into doubt. He ments: I shall not oppose it. These things add nothing traction. Luther then rose again, and concluded with have brought the Pope and his adherents to this, how these words:- "Since your imperial majesty and your thankful I should have been to God! Truly, if the Pope clear and incontestable (for I will yield neither to Pope we are extracting, will, in a very short time, be translated revoke any thing. The testimonies I have cited have not those chapters which treat of Church Government, of mobeen, and cannot be refuted. My conscience is a prisoner nastic vows, and the war of the peasants which broke out in the word of God. No one should be counselled to act at an early stage of the Reformation. The wisdom and judiciousness of a spectator rather than an actor. It is re-We must now pass over many large spaces of Luther's markable, that although Luther was, if ever one existed, We do this with regret, for there is not a single page an advocate of popular rights, and the people's champion in the volume before us from which we do not feel tempted against the tyranny of the high and mighty, he is yet the to extract something. After our hero reformer had been sternest reprobater of revolt and insurrection that ever carried off to Wartbourg, by his good friend the Elector, lived; he says "I think that all the peasants ought to to put him beyond the reach of his enemies, and from perish rather than the princes and magistrates" (princes which place he dates his letters from the region of the oir, and magistrates whom he has just before taxed and taunted from the region of the birds, or from the mountain of the in the bitterest language for their cruel oppressions), "beisle of Patmos, he was recalled to Wittemberg by the alarm- cause the peasants take the sword without the divine auing character which the reform began to take in the hands thority. No pity, no tolerance, is due to the peasants but of Carlostad, of the demagogue theologians, the breakers the indignation of God and of men. They should be

The last great controversy Luther entered into was with tent with one surplice, put on three, like the high-priest of whom it is addressed, and is as follows: "I have been a

that hese rred hree rood, not ame

ally. vhen him They ught rror. hott, con-

ame very t to the con-My

s of k in pire, temy led wds

nowme d to had and pid, kill said and than road, gun Mar-

you had now npeersy, s of

will is to ainst d of gret most

y inefore th a part naand

not dis-4.any the

God. wise by

you to begin. I do not repreach you with having kept against me, and I will publish none against you," &c. apart from us in the fear of embarrassing the cause which you maintain against our enemies, the Papists. I am not otherwise displeased with you than that in some of the you bite and sting us rather keenly for the sake of gaining the favour and softening the fury of our adversaries. We perceive that the Lord has not given you the energy and the mind freely and courageously to attack those mensters. and we do not exact from you that which is above your whole world cannot deny that you have made literature, by which the real understanding of the Scriptures is aclents and your eloquence, but since your heart fails you, it dear Erasmus, in proof of my candour, and because I de- or wrong." sire that the Lord may give you a spirit worthy of your During the domestic period of his life, Luther was long time without writing to you, my dear Erasmus. Inname. Should not that happen, I demand at least of you expected that you, the greatest of the two, would have first that you remain spectator of our drama. Unite not your broken silence. I thought even that charity commanded forces to those of our adversaries; publish no books

We must now see Luther married, and at home. Mr. Dunham, in his History of Germany, has made, in our opinion, some very superficial observations upon the marbooks you have published, there are some places in which riage of the reformer. He seems to think, that once having taken the vow of celibacy, this vow obliged Luther to remain always unmarried. Without pushing this argument into the absurd consequences it would lead to, we will merely observe that a vow, if it be at all rationable and permissible, is made up of the moral considerations strength. We have respected in you your weakness, and and convictions which go to its formation, and that when the measure of the gift of God imparted to you. The these are proved to have been false, the vow-its component parts no longer holding together-dissolves of itself, and goes to the winds. To consider it otherwise, is to quired, flourish, and that this gift of God is in you magni. make it a self-existent demon to tyrannize over and enchain ficent and admirable, for which we must all render thanks, men, quite irrespective indeed, in defiance of their reason. I have therefore never desired that you should advance We have always admired the conscientious boldness Lubeyond the measure of your mind to enter into our camp; ther gave evidence of in marrying, and that his taking this you would render us no doubt great services by your ta- step was not occasioned by the gross motive which his grosser enemies have delighted to imagine, is clear, from is better to serve in the sphere for which God has prepared the following passages from his letters. Writing to Armsyou. We fear only that you may be seduced by our addorf, he says, - "Trusting still to live some years, I have versaries to attack our dogmas in your books, and then I not refused to give my father the hope of a posterity. I shall be constrained to resist you to the face. We have wished also to practise what I have taught, especially as appeased some of our own party who had written works others have shown themselves so pusillanimous in not proto drag you into the arens. It is for this reason that I fiting by what is so clearly recommended in the Scriptures. wished that the Expostulatio of Hutton, and still more that I have followed only the will of God. For my wife I feel vour Sponge of Hutton, should not have been published. no burning disordered passion, but only affection." As a You must have felt yourself, in this last work, how easy it proof that this statement of his feelings was true, he wrote is to write on moderation, and to accuse Luther of vio- to a young scholar at Nuremberg, Baumgartner, to whom lence; but how difficult-how impossible-without a spe. it appears his wife had been attached, in the following cial gift of the Spirit, it is to be mild and moderate in our terms, just before his marriage:-"If you wish to obtain language, and in earnest at the same time. Believe it your Catharine de Bore, make haste before she is given to then, or believe it not, but the Christ is my witness, that I another, who has his hand upon her. Nevertheless, she feel for you from the bottom of my soul, in seeing so much has not got over her love for you. As for me, I should rehatred, anger, and bad passions excited against you. Ne- joice to see you united." A year after his marriage he vertheless, perhaps your antagonists of our party are writes to Strefel,-"Catharine, my dear rib, salutes you: prompted by a legitimate zeal. It seems to them that you she is in good health, God be thanked, gentle and loving have unworthily provoked them. As for myself, although to me, obedient and meek in all things beyond my hopes. irritable and often urged by anger to write with bitterness, I would not change my poverty for the riches of Crossus." I have never done so except against the obstinate. I have Luther was indeed at this time in extreme poverty, so therefore restrained my pen, in spite of your stinging remuch so, as to be obliged, like St Paul, to work at a trade. marks, and I have promised still to restrain it, till you "If the world," he says, "will not ket us live by the world, declare yourself openly against me. For whatever may let us live by our hands." He became a turner. "Since," be our differences of opinion, with whatever impiety or he says in another letter, "there is neither art nor literature dissimulation you express your disapprobation or your among us barbarians, I and Wolfgang, my servant, have doubts on the most important points of religion, I neither taken to turning." He also built and planted. "I have can nor will accuse you of wilfulness. But what is to be planted a garden," he wrote to Spalatin, "and built a founcone now? On both sides controversy has become greatly tain, and both the one and the other have succeeded. envenomed. As for me, I would if I could become a me. Come, and you shall be crowned with lilies and roses." diator, make your adversaries cease from attacking you An abbot of Nuremberg made him, at about this time, a with so much fury, and suffer your old age to repose in present of a clock. "I must," he says, when acknowthe Lord. They would agree to this, I think, if they ledging the present, "make myself a disciple of the marghily considered your feebleness, and the greatness of thematicians, to comprehend all this mechanism, for I have the cause which has long since outstripped your little sta- never seen any thing like it." And, some time after, " I ture. Things have come to such a point, that there is no have received the instruments for turning. I have, for the thing to fear from our cause, even if Erasmus should unite moment, tools enough, unless you could send me some of all his forces against us. Yet there is some reason that a new kind which may turn of themselves, whilst my seryour adversaries should be ill able to hear your attacks; vant is gaping and staring about him. I am already pretty human weakness is easily frightened and irritated at the far advanced in clock-making. Your clock is precious to authority and name of Erasmus; to be bitten by Erasmus mark the time to my drunken Saxons, who pay more atonce, is a very different thing from being attacked by all tention to their glasses than to the hour, and care little the Papists in a band. I wished to say all this to you, whether the sun, the clock, or he who regulates it, go right seized with a sudden and violent illness. He believed him-i "But do you think that we know not your edict! Do you self to be on the point of death, and, after a fervent prayer, believe that we are ignorant that, by this edict, all the he turned towards Doctors Bugenhagen and Jonas, and swords of the enemy are sharpened and unsheathed, all said, "The world loves falsehood, and there are many who the arquebusses loaded, all the cavalry ready to burst upon will say I retracted before death. I beg of you, then, in-the Elector of Saxony and his party, to spread fire and stantly to receive my profession of faith. I declare, on blood, and to fill the country with tears and desolation? my conscience, that I have taught the true word of God, This is your edict, these are your murderous enterprises, which the Lord has imposed upon me, and constrained me sealed with your seals and with your arms; and you would to do. Yes, I declare that what I have preached of the call this peace, and you dare to accuse the Lutherans of faith of charity, of the cross, of the holy sacrament, and troubling the public tranquillity? Oh, impudence.-Oh, of other articles of Christian doctrine, is just, good, and hypocrisy without bounds! But I understand you—you salutary." Some hours after he asked for his wife, would wish that the Lutherans should make no preparaand when she came, said, "Where is my little heart, tions for the war with which their enemies threaten them.

my dear little John?" And when the child was brought, Thanks—thanks, sweet souls! I, as a preacher, truly he said, with tears in his eyes, "Oh! dear little child, I ought to endure this-I know it well; and those to whom commend you to God, you and your good mother, my dear the grace is given, ought to endure it likewise. But that Catharine. You have nothing, but God will take care of others will also submit, is what I cannot guarantee to tyyou; He is the father of orphans and of widows. Pre-rants. If I gave publicly advice to the Protestants, the serve them, Oh, my God! as you have preserved and in-tyrants would profit by it, and I will not free them from structed me to this day." He then said a few words to his the fear of our resistance. Do they wish to gain their spurs wife about some silver goblets. "You know," he added, by massacring us? Let them gain them then with peril, " we have nothing but that," the following characteristic passage, which no other man than ten years I have humbled my self and giventhem that ever lived could have written but Luther:—"My good words; and the rustics have grown proud and health is feeble. But I despise the messenger of Sahaughty. Well, then! since they are incorrigible, since with the devil, and then sleep, idle, play, and sing. As for with my imprecations, without stop or rest, to my tomb. you, my dear Philip, do not afflict yourself about this af-fair, which is not in your hands, but in that of one more would that my thunders and my lightnings roared and powerful, and from whom no one can take it." An allublazed over their grave." * * * "I cannot pray withsion is made in the above passage to the reconciliation out cursing. I cannot say, hallowed be thy name, without Melanethon was trying to bring about between the Papists adding, cursed be the name of the Papists, and all those and the Reformers. He, Luther, writes on the subject to who blaspheme thee. If I say, thy kingdom come, I must Spalatin,-"I learn that you have undertaken an admira-add, cursed be the Popedom, and all the kingdoms which ble work, to make Luther and the Pope agree. But the are opposed to thine. If I say, thy will be done, I add, Pope will not be reconciled, and Luther also refuses. cursed be the designs of the Papists, and of all those-Take care that you are not losing your time, and troubling may they perish—who fight against thee. In this way I yourself in vain. If you succeed, I will also, to follow pray every day, and with me all the true faithful in Christ your example, engage to reconcile Christ and Belial!"

thundering and blasting eloquence. An anonymous writer selves well." had accused the Protestants of Germany of Arming in secret for the purpose of surprising the Catholics. strike hard upon the sack, and if my blows fall upon the the earth, the air, and the water, but also in trees and ass within, it will not be my fault." * * * "Whether stones. Every one knows that there are trees, such as it be true or not that the Lutherans are making prepara- the apple and the pear tree, which are like husband and tions, this concerns me not. I have neither ordered them wife, and which prosper better when planted together. or advised them in the matter. I neither know what they Among stones the same thing may be remarked, especially announce in this book that they believe in these arma- heaven is husband of the earth. He vivifies her by the ments, I receive the report with pleasure, and rejoice in heat of the sun, by the rain and the wind, and causes her their allusions and alarms. I would augment, even if I could, to bear all sorts of plants and fruits."  The children these illusions, for no other reason than to make them die of the doctor were near the table, and were looking earof the fright. If Cain kills Abel, if Caiaphas persecuted nestly at some peaches which were passing round. The Jesus, it is just that they should be punished. Let them doctor observed, "He who would see the image of a soul live in trances of terror; let them tremble at the rustling enjoying hope let him look here. Ah, if we could expect of a leaf; let them see on all sides the phantoms of insurand hope for the life to come with as much joy." . . .

as becomes brave knights. Cut-throats by trade, let them Luther was roused from his domestic avocations by the expect at least to be received like cut-throats." * * " Whewar which threatened Germany from Turkey, and after-ther I am censured or not as being too violent, I care not. wards by the Diet which was held at Augsbourg. In a It shall be my glory and honour in future to be accused of letter, written to Melancthon at this period, we meet with tempesting and raging against the Papists. For more tan, who is sent to buffet my flesh. If I can neither read there is no farther hope of shaking their infernal resolunor write, at least I can think and pray, and even quarrel tions by mildness, I break with them; I will pursue them Jesus. . . . Nevertheless, I have for all the world a heart We give the following passage as a specimen of Luther's good and loving, and my greatest enemies know this them-

We must return again to Luther in private life, and The whilst he is seated at his table, by the side of his wife, in the following is the reply to this accusation :- " From whence midst of his children and his friends, gather up some anecthis publication proceeds, is carefully hidden. No one must dotes and scraps of his conversation: " It is almost as imknow its author. Well, then, I am willing to be ignorant possible," he said, "to dispense with female society as it also. I will have a cold, that I may not smell the awk- is to live without eating and drinking; the image of marward pedant. Nevertheless, I will try my skill; I will riage is found in all creatures, not only in the animals of will do, or what they will not do; but since the Papists in precious stones,-the coral, the emeral, and others. The rection and of death.-Nothing can be more equitable. * certain sign that God is the enemy of Popedom, is that he

Mr. our marhaver to

you

your

argu-, we tions when mpotself, is to hain Bon. Luthis from rms.

bave y as proures. feel ls a rote

ving tain n to she d ree he ou:

hom

pes. us." 7, 80 ade. ord, ce," ture

ving

ave ave ounded. es." e, a owmaave "I the e of

ecretty s to atittle

ght was

source of all human life. The word is brief, but neither shall abide eternally with thee." ble to it. I like it better than any Psulm." . . . I love rivers, she was the ocean. not," he said, on another occasion, "that Philip (Melancthon) should be present at my lectures or sermons, but I character of the Roman Catholic Church than the above. world; my life is nothing else but patience."

We must now hasten to the last hours of this great man. there by the Mansfield family to appease some domestic quan about every fibre of the heart, and satisfying every contrarels, in which he succeeded. He wrote several most beautiful dictory principle. Though not logical, it is judicious, ferand affectionate letters to his wife from that place, addressed tile, and complete in taking every print, touching every quaintly-"To the very learned and profound Dame Catharine point, meeting every case, and compounding with every Luther, my gracious wife. To the gracious Dame Catha-difficulty. Like Catholicism, too, its grandeur is, that it rine Lather, my dear wife, who torments herself too much. is all-accommodating, all-enveloping; and its feebleness To my sweet dear wife Catharine Lather de Bora." His likewise resembles that of its stupendous offspring—it is last words were, a few minutes before his death-"Oh, feeble against a speciality-against Truth.

has refused to it the benediction of a natural posterity." my father, God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the father of all Holy Spirit, gave her the most beautiful and glorious of well beloved Son, in whom I believe, whom I have preached names. He called her Erg, that is, the mother of all and acknowledged, loved and celebrated, and whom the living. He called her not wife, but Mother, the mother of Pope and the impious persecute. I commend to thee my all living. This is a glory and an ornament more precious soul, Oh, Jesus Christ, my Lord. I am quitting this than that of wife. She is fone omnium viventium, the earthly body; I am leaving this life, but I know that I Cicero nor Demosthenes could have been so eloquent. It was the Holy Spirit who spoke by our first parent, and as give a very different idea of Luther's character from what he gave such noble praise to marriage, it is fitting that we is generally entertained. We have, however, merely taken should cover and conceal all that is weak in woman."  a bit here and a bit there, from two volumes; every page One day when his little boy Martin was at the breast of of which is full of interest. We have, nevertheless, fulhis mother, the doctor said, "This child, and all that be- filled our task, and presented such a picture of the chalongs to me, is hated by the Pope, and by Duke George, racter of the Reformer, as, we believe, could be furnished hated by all their partisans, and hated by the devil. Yet from no other book than the Memoirs now before us. all these enemies give no disturbance to the dear child. Here, then, we should stop, if a passage in Monsieur Mi-He troubles not himself because so many powerful lords chelet's preface did not seem to call for a remark or two. owe him deep grudges; he sucks gaily at the teat, looks Monsieur Michelet is stating the great argument which all about him, laughing aloud, and suffers himself to be makes him prefer Catholicism to Protestantism. The passcolded and chided at as much as one likes." * * * One sage, slightly abridged, is as follows:-"The Catholic docday, on the road to Leipsic, the doctor, seeing a plain co-trine appears to us, if not more logical, at least more juvered with superb wheat, burst out into the following pray-dicious, more fertile, more complete, than that of any of er,—"Oh, God of goodness, you have given us a bountiful the sects which have risen up against it. Its feebleness, season. It is not on account of our piety, but to glorify and its grandeur also, is, that it excludes nothing that be-thy holy name. Grant, oh, my God, that we may amend longs to man, and would satisfy, at the same time, all the our lives and increase in grace. All in thee is miracle. contradictory principles of the human mind. Universal Thy voice makes these plants, these beautiful wheat crops, in every sense, it is feeble against a speciality. Heresy is which rejoice the sight, to spring out of the earth, even a choice, a speciality. Having embraced humanity at from the arid sand. Oh, my Father, give to all thy chillarge, the Roman Church has also partaken of its miseries, dren their daily bread!" * * * When speaking of the saints, its contradictions. The pious and profound mystic of the he said: "What are all the saints in comparison to Christ? Rhine and of the Low Countries, the rustic and simple Nothing but little drops of the night dew on the head of Vaudois, pure as the verdure of the Alps, seemed to trithe spouse, and in the locks of his hair." * * * "The Pater umph when they accused her of adultery and prostitution, Nester," he said, "is my prayer; there is none compara- who had received all, adopted all. But they were merely put the cross before me, and I say, Philip, Jonas, Pomer, But Monsieur Michelet has overlooked the real question, and the others are nothing to me. If I thought of Me-viz .- Whether this character corresponds with the characlanethon and the doctor, I should do nothing good, but I ter of Christianity? We feel quite sure that if his honest preach simply to the ignorant, and that pleases all. If I and conscientious mind would examine the matter, with know Greek, Hebrew, Latin, I reserve these for our pri-the aid of the New Testament, he would find that Chrisvate meetings; and then, indeed, our subtleties must asto-tianity itself is truly described as he has described heresy, nish even God himself." * * "I avow that I have often been viz .- It is a choice, a speciality. Indeed, a moment's retoo violent, but not against the Popedom. Against it there flection will show him that truth, compared with error, should be a language apart, and all its words should be must always be a choice, a speciality, and that error has althunderbolts. You cannot believe how I love to see my ways the same kind of universality as he so much adadversaries enraged against me. I am never so superb or mires in Catholicism. To carry on the same sort of paralso audacious as when I find I have irritated them. Doc. lel between them as he has established between Protestanttors, bishops, princes, what matter? It is written: tremu- ism and Catholicism, Truth might say to error, "You are erunt gentes et populi meditati eunt inaniam. Adsisterunt an adulteress, a prostitute;" to which error might reply, reges terra et principes convenerunt in unumadeersus Deum "Triumph as you like, you are but a little miserable crea-et adversus Christum ejus. I have such a disdain for these ture, inhabiting obscure corners; but I am universal, I Satans, that if I were not retained here, I would go straight receive all, I adopt all; you are but a river, I am the ocean." to Rome, in hate to the devil and all his furies; neverthe- In his zeal to do honour to Catholicism, Monsieur Micheless, I must have patience with the Pope, with my disci- let has precisely pointed out its general all-pervading chaples, with my domestics, with my Catharine, with all the racteristic, which most thoroughly condemns it, by completely identifying its features with those of falsehood. Falsehood also excludes nothing, rejects nothing. It also He died at Eisleben, where he was born. He had been called would embrace humanity in the gross, by winding itself

From the Metropolitan.

JAPHET IN SEARCH OF A FATHER, BY THE AUTHOR OF " PETER SIMPLE," &C.

(Concluded from p. 248.)

I found my father, who had now completely recovered from his accident, walking up and down the room in a brown study. He did not speak to me until after dinner, your duty to obey." when he commenced with asking some questions relative to Cecilia de Clare. I replied, " that I intended, if he did not like, would you allow me to marry her ?" not want the carriage, to call there to-morrow with Mr. Harcourt."

"Is she very handsome?" inquired he.

"Very much so, sir. I do not think I ever saw a hand-somer young person. Yes, I do recollect one." "Who was that?"

thy hed

the

my

this

t I

hat

ken

age

ful-

ha-

hed

us.

Mi-

wo.

ich

as-oc-

ju-

of

be-

the

les

is

at

the ple

ri-

on,

ely

ral

ve.

m, ic-

est

th

is-

y,

re-

or, al.

dal-

nt-

re ly,

. 19

10-

8-

d.

elf

1-

ry

"A young lady with whom I was slightly acquainted,

when living in the country."

"I have been thinking, my dear boy, that with the competence which you will have, it is right that you should marry early; in so doing you will oblige your father, who is anxious to see his grandchildren before he dies.

My health is not very good."

I could not help smiling at this pathetic touch of the old governor's, who if one could judge from appearances, was as strong as a lion, and likely to last as long as his dutiful riably finished his bottle every day. I did not therefore look about you." feel any serious alarm as to his health, but I nevertheless replied, "Matrimony is a subject upon which I am willing to obey you." have never thought,"—(a hem! a De Benyon never tells "My dear boy! Well, then, I'll talk the matter over an untruth !) "I am very young yet, and am too happy to remain with you."

riously of it."

"My dear father, allow me to observe, that at present I am not in a situation to support a wife, and I should be sorry to be a tax upon you, at your age; you require many you, Japhet, would have made me cry so much; but I forcomforts and luxuries, and I presume that you live up to give you for it, as I would a thousand times as much more. your income."

"Then, my dear fellow, you are under a great mistake. left us." I can lay down one hundred thousand pounds on the day at the same time that it proves what a generous and intune, I have a right to expect that the lady will also bring into your presence. An hour of such suspense must be a handsome addition. Miss de Clare is engaged, I believe, dreadful, and before we sit down, I wish every one should to Mr. Harcourt, or I might have made strong interest in feel comfortable and happy." that quarter,"

a-days is all that we expect with wives and those who are question, Japhet. I considered that your return had rennot born to too much wealth; still she should bring some- dered it necessary that it should be deferred until I saw thing; but tell me, Japhet, who is that young lady whom you. I have not forgotten Japhet, and never will forget, you thought handsomer than Miss de Clare?"

" A Miss Temple, sir."

up in the country make the best wives."

They do, sir, most certainly; they are more domes-and wish you would think of it. You will please me much more than a brother. I am, as it were, a creature

" My dear father, I shall be most happy to obey in every thing else, but in so serious a point as uniting myself for life, I think you must allow that a little discretionary power should be given to a son. All I can say is this, show me a young person who is eligible, and if I find that I can love her, I will not refuse to obey your wishes."

" Well, sir, do as you please," replied my father angrily; "but I think, sir, when I desire you to fall in love, it is

"Suppose I was to fall in love with a person you did

" Most certainly not, sir."

"Then, sir, is it reasonable to expect me to marry without being in love ?"

"I did not marry for love, sir."

" No," replied I, forgetting myself a little; " and a pretty mess you made of it,"

"I did," rejoined my father in a rage, "by begetting an undutiful, good-for-nothing, graceless, insolent, ungrateful son."

"My dear father, I was not aware that I had a brother."

" I mean you, sir."

"To prove to you how unjust you are, sir, and, how little I deserve what you have called me, I now promise you to marry as soon as you wish."

"Thank you, my boy, that's kind of you; but I will say that you are a comfort and a treasure to me, and I Moreover, his appetite was enormous, and he inva-bless the day that brought you to my arms. Well, then,

" No, sir, I leave it all to you; select the party, and I with Mr. Masterton to morrow," and the general shook me warmly by the hand.

"But, my dear boy, I propose that you shall remain The next day I picked up Harcourt, and proceeded to with me—we will all live together. I do not intend that Park street. A note from Harcourt had informed them of we shall part. I really wish, Japhet, you would think se- our intended visit, and other visiters had been denied. "All has been explained, Cecilia," said I, after the first greeting . "I was very wrong, and very foolish."

"And made me very miserable. I little thought that Now sit down and tell us all that has happened since you

" Not yet, my dear Cecilia. You as well as I, owe a of your marriage, with any lady whom I approve of, and reparation to poor Harcourt, whom, I think, you have still not spend half my remaining income." "That, sir," replied I, "certainly removes one difficulty, vital moment when I broke in upon you, and you have since kept him in a state of cruel suspense for more than dulgent father I am blessed with; but sir, with such a for-three weeks, refusing him an answer until he brought me

" It was not altogether to stimulate Mr. Harcourt to "Something, my dear boy; but a moderate fortune now-bring you back, which induced me to refuse to answer his what I was when you rescued me; and when I think what I might have been had you not saved me, I shudder "Temple-it is a very good name, I think girls brought at the bare idea. I have not forgotton how you risked, and nearly lost your life in Ireland for my sake-neither has my mother. We are indebted to you for all our present tic, and make their husbands more content and happy at happiness, and I am eternally indebted to you for rescuing me from ignorance, poverty, and, perhaps, vice. You "Well, my dear boy, I have mentioned the subject, have been more, much more than a father to me-more, of your own fashioning, and I owe to you that which I can never repay. When, then, you returned so unex- with him, and appointed them a quarter of an hour before pectedly, Japhet, I felt that you had a paramount right in my disposal, and I was glad that I had not replied to Mr. Harcourt, as I wished first for your sanction and approval. I know all that has passed between you, but I know not your real feelings toward Mr. Harcourt; he acknowledges against Mr. Harcourt-if you-

I took Harcourt's hand, and placed it in hers. him in this his favourite dress. "May God bless you both, and may you be happy!"

every body else, I believe. It was lucky for Harcourt "In Berkshire, was it not? Miss Temple, allow me to that I was in love with Susannah Temple. As soon as introduce General De Benyon." Cecilia had recovered a little, I kissed her, and passed her over to her right owner, who led her to the sofa. Lady de Clare and I went out of the room on important business, and I did not return for a quarter of an hour. When we returned, Cecilia went to her mother and embraced her, while Harcourt silently squeezed my hand. We then all sat down, and I gave them an account of all that had passed during my second excursion-how I had nearly been hanged-how I had gone mad-how I had turned Quaker and apothecary-which they all agreed, with what had happened to me before, made up a very eventful history.

"And, Japhet, if it be a fair question about one so fair, was that Miss Temple who was at church with you yesterday?"

"It was."

"Then, Cecilia, if ever she appears in the same circle, except in my eyes, your beauty will stand in some danger of being eclipsed."

"How can you say, except in your eyes, Mr. Harcourt," doubt."

"And perhaps may, some of these days, Cecilia."

"Oh! do, Japhet. I will love her so."

must dine with my governor.

On my return, I found that the table was laid for three, he arrived, but he gave me a wink and a smile, and I was some time he recovered, and was able to name his resistatisfied. "Japhet," said my father, "you have no engagement to-morrow, I hope, because I shall call at Mr.

It was late in the evening when I received a note from versation became general.

I accompanied my father the next day to Lincoln's Inn, and when we went up, we found Mr. Masterton at the table, with Mr. Cophagus and Susannah sitting apart near requested him to select, he had selected her accordingly. the window.

was afterwards told by Mr. Masterton, he had prevailed the note was put into my hands. I read it, stated its con-

our time. This he had arranged, that the general might see Miss Temple as if by accident; and also allow me, who, my father supposed, was not aware of Miss Temple being in town, to meet her. What a deal of humbug there is in this world! Nothing but plot and counterplot! I that he treated you ill, and it was his sincere repentance shook hands with Cophagus, who I perceived, had, notof having so done, and his praise of you, which first won withstanding his wife's veto, put on his blue cotton net panmy favour. And now, Japhet, if you have still animosity taloons and Hessian boots, and he appeared to be so tight in both, that he could hardly move. As far as I could "Stop, my dear Fleta, I will answer all your questions judge, his legs had not improved since I had last seen

May God bless you both, and may you be happy!"

"Mr. De Benyon, I believe that you have met Miss Cecilia threw her arms round me and wept; so did Temple before," said Mr. Masterton, winking at me.—

introduce General De Benyon."

I went up to Susannah, who coloured and trembled at the sight of my father, as I expressed my hope that she had been well since we last met. She perceived that there was some planned scheme, and was so puzzled, that she said nothing. My father then spoke to her, and after a short time took a chair, and scated himself close to her-I never knew her make herself so agreeable. He asked her where she was staying, and when he heard that it was with Mr. Cophagus, he said that he should have the pleasure of calling upon Mr. Cophagus, and thank him for his kind information relative to me. Shortly afterwards Cophagus took his leave, and Susannah rose to accompany him, when my father, hearing that they had walked, insisted upon putting Miss Temple down in his carriage.-So that Mr. Cophagus had to walk home one way, and I

Alas! little did Mr. Cophagus know how fatal to him would be the light cotton nets when he put them on that day. He had proceeded, as it appears, about two-thirds replied Cecilia, "the very observation proves that it is of his way home, (he lived in Welbeck street, when he eclipsed in your eyes, whatever it may be in those of oth. perceived a rush from up a street leading into Oxford ers. Now, as a punishment, I have a great mind to or. street. He looked to ascertain the cause, when to his horder you away again, until you bring her face to face, that ror he perceived—what to him was the greatest of all hor-rors—a mad bull. If any thing could make Mr. Copha-"If 1 am again banished," replied Harcourt, "I shall gus run; but he could not run fast in his cotton nets and have a second time to appeal to De Benyon to be able tight Hessians, which crippled him altogether. As out of to come back again. He can produce her, I have no pure spite, the bull singled him out from at least one hundred, who exerted their agility, and again was poor Mr. Cophagus tossed far behind the animal, fortunately breaking his fall by tumbling on a large dog who was in full "You must wait a little first. I am not quite so far chase. The dog, who was unable to crawl from beneath advanced as you and Harcourt. I have not received the the unfortunate Cophagus, was still in a condition to bite, consent of all parties, as you have to-day. But I must which he did most furiously; and the butcher, who had an now leave you, Harcourt, I presume you will dine here, I affection for his dog, when he perceived its condition, also vented his fury upon poor Cophagus, by saluting him with several blows on his head with his cudgel. What between and that the general had asked Mr. Masterton, from which the bull, the dog, and the butcher, poor Mr. Cophagus was I augured well. Masterton could not speak to me when taken into a shop in a very deplorable condition. After Masterton's on business, and wish you to accompany me." Susannah, informing me of that unfortunate accident.— I replied, "that I should be most happy," and the con- My father had just finished a long story about filial duty, country girls, good wives, &c. and had wound up by saying, that he and Mr. Masterton both considered that Miss Temple would be a very eligible match, and that as I had I had just proved how truly dutiful I was, by promising "The plot thickens," thought I. The fact was, as I to do all I could to love her, and to fulfil his wishes, when upon Cophagus to pretend business, and to bring Susannah tents to my father, and, with his permission, immediately jumped into a hackney coach, and drove to Welbeck My father made over to me the sum which he had men-

fore

ght

me,

ple

ere

not-

an-

ght

uld

cen

liss

to

at

ad

ere he

r a

ed

as

ea-

his 0-nv

in-

m

at ds

he

rd

r-

-T

nd of

r.

ili

th

e,

in

th

n 19

m

y,

y-

